A major provision of the legislation revises the abandonment procedures of the Bus Act to give States more time to work with local communities to encourage ridership, study the financial needs of retaining existing service, and, if necessary, to find alternative service. Under existing law, schedules may be dropped and substitute service may actually be discouraged. The Bus Act is less than a year old and Greyhound, the largest carrier, has filed petitions to abandon service to approximately 1,300 communities in the country.

Under my legislation, bus companies would publish a list of routes which are candidates for abandonment on March 1 of every year. This would be followed by a notice of intent to abandon routes that would include basic ridership and revenue information. Finally, 60 to 90 days later, a carrier would be permitted to petition the State to abandon a route and the State would then have 90 days to rule on the application. As provided for in current law, the carrier could still appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) for a rehearing.

This prior notice provision is patterned after a procedure that is used in the railroad industry which provides the necessary time to preserve a valuable service. Without prior notice, it is difficult for communities to react to the threat of abandonment in an effective manner by alerting other companies of a possible new market.

Another provision of this legislation addresses the problem of insufficient consultation between the ICC and the States. The current procedure of granting new route authority fails to give the States adequate notice. While a State would normally welcome new service, the adverse effects on existing carriers may far outweigh the advantages of a new carrier. In Illinois, 47 communities may lose service because of a recent ICC decision. The legislation, therefore, requires the ICC to consult with the States for advice and comments whenever a new carrier applies for a grant of authority to establish a new route. The States surely have a right to know at the earliest possible date whether a new carrier may be operating within the State.

A third provision of the measure would restore to the States the authority to oversee the schedule of any company that provides fewer than three round trips per day. Under existing law, carriers can reduce service to one trip per day, perhaps scheduling trips at unreasonable hours that then justifies the termination of a particular route.

Last, the bill reaffirms a State's legitimate right to protect its transportation system. While the ICC must work closely with the States to effectively address the abandonment problem, I am sure that my colleagues would agree that States have a regulatory role to insure that the needs of the public are met.

We cannot sit back and wait for potential bus companies to compete for abandoned routes when it is already apparent that this is not likely to happen. The bus routes facing near-term abandonment are almost exclusively the last form of public transportation available to the communities served by them. Many of these communities have elderly citizens who depend on buses as their only means of transportation. In the future, as the population gets older and even more dependent upon intercity bus transportation, the relative need for service will increase.

In addition, the loss of bus service further isolates small towns and reduces the attractiveness of the community for economic development. Medical supplies, automobile and farm machinery parts, legal documents and other vital materials are shipped by bus in rural America.

The legislation I am introducing has been endorsed by the National Governors Association, the National Conference of State Transportation Specialists, the executive committee of the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners and several State regulatory commissions. The legislation reflects the research and recommendations of the Illinois Commerce Commission, and I very much appreciate their assistance on this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the legislation be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1916

Be it amended by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Bus Regulatory Reform Act Amendments of 1983".

SEC. 2. (a) Subsection (a) of section 10935 of title 49, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(a)(1) Each motor common carrier of passengers having intrastate authority under the laws of a State, and interstate authority under a certificate issued under section 10922 of this subchapter, to provide transportation over any route from any point in such State to any other point in such State shall prepare a list of any such points with respect to which such carrier is considering a discontinuance of transportation or a reduction in the level of service provided to a level which is less than one trip per day (excluding Saturdays and Sundays) from such point to such other point. Such a list shall be prepared and submitted to the Commission and to the department, agency, or instrumentality of such State having jurisdiction over granting such discontinuances and reductions (or, if such State does not have such a department, agency, or instrumentality, to the Governor of such State) not later than 60 days after the date of enactment of the Bus Regulatory Reform Act Amendments of 1983, and March 1 of each calendar year thereafter.

"(2) Any carrier may amend a list such carrier submits under paragraph (1) of this subsection on the first day of any month following the date of such submission.

"(3) Before a discontinuance of service or a reduction in level of service described in paragraph (1) of this subsection may take effect with respect to any point in a State, a carrier shall file a notice of intent to discontinue such service or reduce such level of service with the Commission and with the department, agency, or instrumentality of the State having jurisdiction over granting such discontinuances and reductions (or, if such State does not have such a department, agency, or instrumentality, with the Governor of such State). Such notice of intent may only be filed after the last day of the 30-day period beginning on the date such route is included on the most recent list submitted under pargraph (1) by such carrier. Such notice of intent shall include the following:

"(A) the number of passengers carried over the route during the preceding 12-month period;

(B) the amount of revenues derived and variable cost incurred from passenger and freight service over the route during such period; and

"(C) such other information as the Commission or the State may specify by regulation.

"(4) Before a discontinuance of service or a reduction in level of service described in paragraph (1) of this subsection may take effect with respect to any point in a State, a carrier shall request the department, agency, or instrumentality of such State having jurisdiction over granting such discontinuances and reductions for permission to discontinue such service or reduce such level of service. Such request may only be made no less than 60 days and no more than 90 days after the date of filing of a notice of intent to discontinue such service or reduce such level of service under paragraph (3).

"(5) After a carrier has requested a department, agency, or instrumentality of a State having jurisdiction over granting discontinuances of service and reductions in levels of services described in paragraph (1) of this subsection for permission in accordance with this subsection to discontinue any service or reduce any level of service described in such paragraph and the request has been denied (in whole or in part) or such department, agency, or instrumentality has not acted finally (in whole or in part) on the request by the 90th day after the carrier made the request, the carrier may petition the Commission for such permission.".

(b) Subsection (e) of such section 10935 is amended—

(1) by striking out "to any point" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "from any point to any other point"; and

(2) by striking out "to such point" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "from such point to such other point".

(c) Section 10935(g)(1) of such title is amended by striking out "accord great weight to" and inserting in lieu thereof "take into account".

(d) Paragraph (2) of section 10935(g) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(2) In making a finding under subsection (e)(1) or (e)(2) of this section, the Commission—

"(A) shall consider to the extent applicable, at least—

"(i) the national transportation policy of section 10101 of this title; and

"(ii) whether the motor common carrier of passengers has received an offer of, or is receiving, financial assistance to provide the transportation to be discontinued or reduced from a financially responsible person (including a governmental authority); and

"(B) in the case of a petition to discontinue transportation to any point, shall accord great weight to whether the transportation is the last motor carrier of passenger service to such point and whether a reasonable alternative to such service is available.".

(e) Subsection (h) of section 10935 of such title is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. (a) Paragraph (1)(A) of section 10922(c) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting "and after consultation with each State in which the transportation to be authorized will be provided" after "the issuance of the certificate".

(b) Paragraphs (2)(A) and (2)(B) of such section are each amended by inserting "and after consultation with such State" after "the issuance of the certificate".

(c) Paragraph (3) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(3) In making any findings relating to public interest under paragraphs (1)(A) and (2)(B) of this subsection, the Commission—

"(A) shall consider, to the extent applicable—

"(i) the transportation policy of section 10101(a) of this title;

"(ii) the value of competition to the traveling and shipping public;

"(iii) the effect of issuance of the certificate on motor carrier of passenger service to small communities; and

"(iv) whether issuance of the certificate would impair the ability of any other motor common carrier of passengers to provide a substantial portion of the regular-route passenger service which such carrier provides over its entire regular-route system; except that diversion of revenue or traffic from a motor common carrier of passengers in and of itself shall not be sufficient to support a finding that issuance of the certificate would impair the ability of the carrier to provide a substantial portion of the regular-route passenger service which the carrier provides over its entire regular-route system; and

"(B) shall accord great weight to the recommendations of each State in which the transportation to be authorized will be provided.".

(d) Such section if further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(10) Not later than 10 days after taking final action upon any application for authority to provide transportation as a motor common carrier of passengers, the Commission shall notify each State in which such transportation will be provided of such final action.".

SEC. 4. Section 10101(a)(3) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by striking out "; (B) to provide Federal procedures" and all that follows through the period at the end of such subsection and inserting in lieu thereof the following: ", and (B) to coordinate State and Federal regulatory actions to ensure the provision of bus service to rural communities which have no other means of public transportation.".

SEC. 5. (a) Paragraph (4) of section 11501(e) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof "and to any reduction in level of service to less than one trip per day (excluding Saturdays and Sundays) from any point to any other point".

(b) The second sentence of paragraph (5) of such section is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof "and to any reduction in the level of service to less than four trips per day (excluding Saturdays and Sundays) from any point to any other point".

SEC. 6. It is the sense of Congress that the Interstate Commerce Commission, the States, and the national associations representing State departments, agencies, and instrumentalities should work in close harmony and cooperation in developing innovative regulatory approaches and procedures to ensure the preservation of bus service to areas which are threatened with the total loss of public transportation service.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished senior colleague, Senator PERCY, in introducing legislation to correct problems in the Bus Regulatory Reform Act that have seriously affected the ability of State regulatory commissions to insure that local communities in their States continue to receive adequate bus service. Identical legislation is being introduced today in the House of Representatives by a number of distinguished Illinois Congressmen, led by Congressman SIMON, who has played a major leadership role in drafting this legislation, together with the Illinois House delegation, the Illinois Commerce Commission, Governor Thompson of Illinois, and Senator PERCY and me. I want to especially commend the Illinois Commerce Commission for bringing this problem to my attention, and for its hard work in shaping this bill.

The Bus Regulatory Reform Act was fairly widely supported both by the bus industry and the Congress when it was first adopted. The fear of many States that passage of the act would result in much less bus service to rural areas, however, has unfortunately been borne out. In the 6 months since the Bus Act was enacted, Greyhound alone has filed to abandon over 1,300 communities nationwide.

In Illinois, Greyhound originally petitioned to abandon 62 communities, but as a result of hard work and diligent persuasion by the Illinois Commerce Commission Greyhound reduced that number to 36. Two other bus companies have filed petitions to abandon Illinois routes and a third has notified our State commerce commission of its intention to do so.

Sadly, Illinois' experience is not unique. Similar problems are occurring in many other States. Rural bus service is deteriorating all around the Nation. In fact, Philip O'Connor, chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission, stated in letters to Senator PERCY and me that he had "no doubt that, without remedial legislation, intercity bus service in rural areas will largely be eliminated very soon."

Mr. President, I do not believe we can stand idly by and see Chairman O'Connor's gloomy prophecy fulfilled. The legislation the Illinois congressional delegation is introducing today in both the House and the Senate is an attempt to give the States the tools they need to insure that essential public transportation services are preserved. It does not undercut the Bus Act; it merely gives the States the time, information, and authority they need to effectively work with bus companies and local communities in working out reasonable solutions to abandonment problems.

Briefly, the legislation provides for:

A revised abandonment procedure that gives States and communities prior notice of a potential route abandonments, a procedure based in part on railroad abandonment procedures;

Closer cooperation and consultation between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the States regarding awards of new bus route authority;

State involvement in the regulation of scheduling when only a minimal level of service is offered; and Reaffirming the States' legitimate interest in, and right to protect, their transportation systems.

The legislation borrows from ideas and concepts used before in handling railroad and airline abandonments. It is eminently reasonable and deserves the Senate's support. Unless it is adopted, rural bus service will continue to deteriorate, with predictable consequences for the communities, the elderly and needy, and the small businesses that rely on good public transportation.

Bus service is often the last public transportation alternative available to a small town. The railroads abandoned passenger service to most of rural America long ago; the airlines serve only a tiny proportion of our Nation's communities. Our small towns need bus service; it is essential to their economic vitality in many cases and it provides the only means for many citizens, particularly the elderly, to travel.

Mr. President, I think it is worth making some modest changes to protect essential service to rural America. The changes we are recommending are reasonable and will not unduly burden bus companies, the ICC, or any other interested party. The legislation does not undermine deregulation, but merely puts a human face on it.

In sum, I believe this is good legislation, and that its quick enactment is both warranted and needed if we are to seriously address the growing transportation problem facing smalltown America. I commend the bill to my colleagues, and I urge its early adoption.

By Mr. PACKWOOD:

S. 1917. A bill to provide that the Federal Communications Commission shall not regulate the content of certain communications; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION ACT OF 1983

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation in the U.S. Senate to repeal the content doctrines imposed on the electronic media. This bill will remove the statutory basis for the so-called Fairness Doctrine and other restrictions on the freedom of the electronic press, including the equal time rules, reasonable access, and the lowest unit charge rules.

While this legislation will remove the stigma of second-class citizenship for broadcasters, it is also vitally important to the print media. Currently, the Federal Communications Commission is, by law, required to regulate editorial and news content that is broadcast. The law endangers the print media because newspapers are rapidly moving into the broadcast realm. USA Today and the Wall Street Journal, to name but two newspapers, are already sending their columns by satellite to printers across the country. More important, many newspapers are allowing their columns, including their editorials, to be carried via teletext over cable systems. The FCC has already begun regulating the cable industry, and other areas cannot be far behind. Print protections may soon be lost in an environment where regulation of editorial content is permissible. This legislation is vitally important to both print and electronic media.

Furthermore, this legislation will benefit the public. The public is best served when there is a free flow of diverse ideas. The public is badly served when the Government prohibits that free flow of diverse ideas. I hope the public will force Congress to act responsibly and demand repeal of the laws which now prohibit that free flow. Call these regulations what you will, they stifle political debate and prevent the widespread discussion of public issues.

Thomas Jefferson said that democracy cannot work well unless the voters are educated about the issues of the day. When the Founders amended the Constitution for the first time in 1791, they did it to protect the only two forms of communications known: press and speech. Our Founders were concerned that the freedom of expression be guaranteed. It is time we returned to that standard, not only to insure better services and more information for consumers, but to guarantee a lively discussion of issues and a revitalization of our electoral process.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1917

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Freedom of Expression Act of 1983".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) free and unregulated communications media are essential to out democratic society;

(2) there no longer is a scarcity of outlets for electronic communications;

(3) the electronic media should be accorded the same treatment as the printed press;

(4) regulation of the content of information transmitted by the electronic media infringes upon the First Amendment rights of those media;

(5) regulaton of the content of information transmitted by the electronic media chills the editorial discretion of those media and causes self-censorship, thereby dampening the vigor and limiting the variety of public debate; and

(6) eliminating regulation of the content of information transmitted by the electronic media will provide the most effective protection for the right of the public to receive suitable access to a variety of ideas and experiences.

PURPOSES

SEC. 3. The purpose of this Act is to extend to the electronic media the full protection of the First Amendment guarantees of free speech and free press.

AMENDMENTS TO THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934

SEC. 4. The Communications Act of 1934 is amended—

(1) in section 312 (a) by—

(A) adding "or" immediately at the end of paragraph (5);

(B) striking out the semicolon and "or" in paragraph (6) and inserting in lieu thereof a period; and

(C) striking out paragraph (7);

(2) by repealing section 315;

(3) by amending section 326 to read as follows:

"SEC. 326. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to give the Commission the power to—

"(1) censor any communication;

"(2) review the content of any completed communication; or

"(3) promulgate any regulation or fix any condition which shall interfere with the right of free speech, including any requirement of an opportunity to be afforded for the presentation of any view on an issue.".●

tor from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 141, a joint resolution to designate the week of September 25, 1983, through October 1, 1983, as "Carrier Alert Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 152

At the request of Mr. LEVIN, the name of the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 152, a joint resolution to designate the week of May 6, 1984, through May 12, 1984, as "Batten's Disease Awareness Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 161

At the request of Mr. CHAFEE, the name of the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 161, a joint resolution to designate the week of April 15, 1984, through April 21, 1984, as "National Child Abuse Prevention Week."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 67

At the request of Mr. GORTON, the name of the Senator from Maine (Mr. COHEN) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 67, a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that it is not appropriate at this time to transfer ownership or management of any civil meteorological satellite system and associated ground system equipment to the private sector.

SENATE RESOLUTION 130

At the request of Mr. GORTON, the name of the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 130, a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that the President should award the Presidential Medal of Freedom to Barney Clark, to be presented to his family in his memory.

SENATE RESOLUTION 183

At the request of Mr. CHAFEE, the names of the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ), and the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS) were added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 183, a resolution dealing with the prevention of arson.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 71—RELATING TO AN INVESTIGATION OF THE ASSASSINATION OF BENIGNO AQUINO

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. DODD, Mr. GLENN, Mr. HART, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. PELL, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. SARBANES) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 71

Whereas Benigno Aquino, Jr., was a leading figure in the effort to restore democracy and constitutional rule in the Philippines;

Whereas, in returning to the Philippines, he willingly faced death to lead the struggle for the restoration of democracy and nonviolent change;

Whereas his brutal assassination was a despicable act that cut short the life of a dedicated Filipino patriot who was deeply committed to the cause of peaceful change and the restoration of democracy in his country;

Whereas, in the wake of his assassination, there may be a greater tendency on the part of the Filipino people to support those who would resort to violence as a way to bring about change in the Philippines; and

Whereas the elections for the National Assembly scheduled for May, 1984 have now become more important than ever, in terms of providing the Filipino people with an opportunity to peacefully determine their own future and to bring about such political changes as they may desire: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring),

1. That the Congress strongly deplores the brutal assassination of Benigno Aquino, and expresses its sincere condolences to his family and to all Filipinos who have shared his commitment to democracy;

2. That it is the sense of the Congress that all appropriate steps should be taken to achieve a thorough, independent, and impartial investigation of the Aquino assassination in a timely fashion and to bring to justice all those responsible for that assassination;

3. That it is further the sense of the Congress that the President of the United States should not visit the Philippines until there has been a full and accurate accounting of all the facts surrounding Senator Aquino's assassination and until the President's security can be adequately guaranteed;

4. That it is the policy of the United States to support genuine, free and fair elections to the National Assembly in May, 1984 and, to that end, to urge the Government of the Philippines to take the necessary steps to secure the full participation of the opposition parties in these elections, including the prompt reconstitution of an objective, impartial Electoral Commission and the restoration of full freedom of the press, so that all issues can be fully and openly debated and decided;

5. That the United States Government should take into account the conduct of the Government of the Philippines investigation into the Aquino assassination and the fairness of the 1984 National Assembly elections in the conduct of its relations with the Government of the Philippines.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am proud today to join with Senators CRANSTON, DODD, GLENN, HART, MOYNIHAN, PELL, RIEGLE, SARBANES, and TSONGAS in submitting a concurrent resolution calling for justice and democracy in the Philippines. Congressman SOLARZ and 42 cosponsors are introducing the same resolution in the House of Representatives.

This resolution strongly deplores the tragic assassination of Senator Benigno Aquino, the principal leader of the democratic opposition in the Philippines, and calls for a thorough, independent, and impartial investigation. It urges President Reagan to defer his visit until there is a full accounting of the facts surrounding the assassination and adequate guarantees of his security. The resolution declares as U.S. policy support for free and fair elections to the Philippine National Assembly in 1984. Finally, it calls on the U.S. Government to take into account in our relations with the Philippines both the conduct of the investigation into the assassination and the fairness of the 1984 National Assembly elections.

A month ago, Senator Benigno Aquino was brutally murdered. On September 21, one month after his death and 11 years after President Marcos had declared martial law in the Philippines, Manila was rocked by a huge protest rally that erupted into violence, leaving at least 11 killed and 200 wounded. Other demonstrations have followed; the American Embassy has become the scene of several protests. In response, President Marcos did not seek to engage in dialog with increasingly critical religious and opposition leaders, but instead threatened to reimpose martial law and take other repressive measures against his people. He has so far turned a deaf ear to the calls of the church, political leaders and increasing numbers of students, businessmen, and workers for justice and democracy in his land.

The full dimensions of this tragic setback for the cause of democracy in the Philippines are now even clearer. At stake are the prospects for the restoration of democracy in the Philippines and the country's long-term stability.

Senator Aquino was a lifelong champion of human rights and democracy. He was also a dedicated defender of the historic and close bonds between the United States and the Republic of the Philippines. He held high the torch of hope for the Filipino people. It is the solemn duty of the Philippine Government and all of us in the international community to make sure that Senator Aquino's torch was not extinguished in vain. We in the United States have a special obligation to support the struggle for human rights and freedom to which Senator Aquino dedicated his life.

In his own words before he returned to Manila in August, Senator Aquino saw the struggle in the Philippines as "between those who have been mesmerized by the 'efficiency' of authoritarianism and those who still hold that democracy with all its flaws and inefficiency is man's best hope for betterment and progress. Man's sense of justice makes democracy possible; man's injustice makes it necessary."

Over a month has gone by since Senator Aquino was struck down. But what information, after all these weeks, has the Philippine Government revealed about the perpetrator or perpetrators of that brutal assassination? The Government appointed a commission to investigate the assassination. But what has been accomplished? Nothing. The commission is foundering. Is this the way the truth about Senator Aquino's assassination will emerge?

It is imperative that a thorough, independent, and impartial investigation of Senator Aquino's assassination be conducted. The U.S. Government should take whatever steps are necessary to make this happen now.

Senator Aquino's assassination makes the elections for the Philippine National Assembly, now scheduled for next year, more important than ever. These elections can be a critical milestone on the road to the restoration of democracy in the Philippines. For the Filippino people truly to voice their views, these elections must be free, fair, and held on schedule. The opposition parties must participate fully. The electoral commission must be reconstituted on an impartial basis. Full freedom of press must be restored.

On August 25 I wrote to President Reagan to make clear my view that it was unthinkable for an American President to visit the Philippines until those responsible for Senator Aquino's assassination were identified and brought to justice. A Presidential visit at this time would be interpreted as a sign both of indifference to Senator Aquino's assassination and of disregard for democracy in the Philippines. Now—when an unprecendented number of Filippinos have been killed in protests in Manila—is not the time for business as usual.

All of us should also take note of the growing anti-American sentiments being voiced in recent protest rallies. The President's trip can only serve as a lighting rod for additional protest that might further fuel those seeking to rupture United States-Philippines relations.

The United States has historic ties with the Philippines, marked by the struggle for independence and democratic institutions during the first half of this century. We have strategic interests in the Philippines: Clark and Subic are two pillars of our military power in the Pacific. We have major economic interests in the Philippines—American investment there exceeds $1.26 billion; our two-way trade last year totaled $3.4 billion.

But is the recent trend of events serving those interests? Does the cloud of suspicion surrounding Senator Aquino's assassination strengthen those ties? Do threats of martial law add to our confidence in Philippine political stability? It is time that the Philippine Government face these challenges and turn to the path of national reconciliation, democracy, and human rights that the Filippino people demand and our bilateral interests require.

I request that the letter which I wrote to President Reagan, and two important articles on the current situation in the Philippines appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., August 25, 1983.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The assassination of Benigno Aquino is a tragic setback for the people of the Philippines, and for the cause of democracy and justice around the globe. Senator Aquino was a lifelong champion of human rights and a dedicated foe of communism. From personal experience he knew the pain of liberty denied. He also knew that America's singular contribution to the Philippines was the legacy of democractic ideals which it bestowed on that island nation. In life and in death Benigno Aquino strengthened and deepened the historic bond between the United States and the Republic of the Philippines.

The people of the Philippines and others throughout the world who cherish democracy are now looking to this nation to exercise its moral authority. The United States has an obligation to support the struggle for human rights and freedom which Benigno Aquino supported and ultimately died for.

The announcement of your intention to visit Manila was made before the brutal event of August 21. It is now unthinkable for an American President to visit the Philippines until the perpetrators of this crime against humanity are brought to justice. To lend your moral and political support to the Marcos Government at this critical time will be interpreted as a sign that America is indifferent to the assassination and condones the violation of human rights in the Philippines.

I also believe that the United States should delay action on all aid and support for the Philippines until the Marcos government has conducted a full, satisfactory, and impartial investigation of the Aquino assassination and reported its findings to the United States Government. I will urge my colleagues in Congress to support this position, and I intend to take action toward this end when Congress reconvenes in September.

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. KENNEDY.

THE PHILIPPINE SAGA HAS YET TO END

(By Benigno S. Aquino Jr.)

(The following article is adapted from an introduction to "The Philippines: Democracy or Dictatorship?", a book that Benigno S. Aquino Jr., President Ferdinand E. Marcos's strongest political opponent, was writing before he returned to Manila on Sunday and was assassinated.)

On July 4, 1946, America fulfilled her pledge and the Republic of the Philippines was born. This Republic was a mirror image of the American Republic conceived in 1776. It was the only republican democracy in all Asia. In fact, it was the first colony to be granted full independence after the Second World War.

For 25 years, the Philippines had the freest press in Asia and perhaps the entire developing world. Every four years it held Presidential elections that saw every incumbent President being booted out of office through the ballot. Since independence, the Filipinos have had six Presidential elections and, in the process, removed from office four incumbent Presidents. Two Presidents died in office and only one ever got re-elected to a second term. He was Ferdinand E. Marcos, elected for the first time in 1965 and re-elected in 1969.

On the seventh year of his non-extendable eight-year term, Marcos declared martial law in an attempt to prolong his stay in power, putting an end to a democratic experiment that started some seven decades earlier at the turn of the century.

It is Marcos's thesis that a developing country like the Philippines cannot afford the luxury of bread and freedom. It has to be either bread or freedom. It is his thesis that the democracy passed on to the Filipino people by America is unworkable because it is inefficient and inconvenient. What a third-world developing country needs, he asserts is a strong "authoritarian" leader who will rule unobstructed by a nagging Congress and a licentious press.

The Philippine saga has yet to end. And the many questions raised by Marcos's martial law regime remain to be answered: Are democratic institutions as developed in America really unworkable in a third-world developing country? Can a single man, no matter how well-meaning, solve all the ills of 48 million people? Is "authoritarianism" a mere euphemism for one-man rule? Is dictatorship the answer for struggling developing states?

A number of Filipinos refuse to accept that democracy cannot be made to work in the Philippines. These Filipinos hold that there is no substitute for the democratic institutions introduced and encouraged by Americans in the Philippines since 1898.

[The battle being fought in the Philippines] is between those who have been mesmerized by the "efficiency" of authoritarianism and those who still hold that democracy with all its flaws and inefficiency is man's best hope for betterment and progress. Man's sense of justice makes democracy possible; man's injustice makes it necessary.

POSTPONE THE VISIT TO MANILA

(By William J. vanden Heuvel)

William J. vanden Heuvel, former deputy permanent representative to the United Nations, practices law in New York City.)

For three years, Benigno S. Aquino Jr. and his family found sanctuary in our country. Americans are proud that he lived among us. We will never forget his humanity, his courage and his commitment to democracy. In life and in death, he deepened the historic bond between the United States and the Philippines.

His murderers have made certain that his memory will not die. Benigno S. Aquino Jr. is now part of the legend of Filipino patriots that dates to the 19th century.

President Reagan's announcement that he intended to visit Manila in November was made before Mr. Aquino was slain Aug. 21 on his arrival at Manila airport. Now, however, Mr. Reagan must reconsider that decision—not to insult those who disclaim involvement in the assassination but rather to hold intact the memory of Senator Aquino and what he lived for.

The likelihood is that we will never know all the facts of the murder. Undoubtedly, the report resulting from the official investigation will uphold the claim of President Ferdinand E. Marcos and his wife, Imelda, that they were not implicated.

Mr. Marcos has said: "We practically begged him to help us in the effort to protect his life." Too bad that those efforts did not extend to supplying the security that the presumed threat to Mr. Aquino's life would reasonably have suggested.

Mr. Marcos has also told his nation that "the Communists did it." The official investigation may sustain that accustion, but we should remember that the Marcos definition of "Communist" included Benigno Aquino, a man of true democratic commitment who abhorred violence and who wrote in the statement that he was to deliver to his waiting supporters at the airport in Manila: "I was sentenced to die for allegedly being the leading Communist leader. I am not a Communist, never was an never will be."

It is not because of what Mr. Marcos did or did not do to Senator Aquino that Mr. Reagan should postpone his visit to the Philippines. Rather, it is because of the violence that President Marcos has done to the Constitution of his country that our President's embrace should be denied him.

Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman, Gen. Douglas MacArthur—and thousands of Filipinos and Americans who died at Corregidor, Bataan and Luzon in World War II—helped create that Constitution, which assured free elections and guaranteed the civil rights of the Philippine people. When President Marcos suspended the Filipino Constitution on Sept. 21, 1972, he set in train the violence that inevitably led to the brutality and bloodshed of Senator Aquino's murder.

At a time when totalitarian and democratic forces are in conflict throughout the third world, at a time when the possibilities of constitutional democracy are the heart and rationale of our involvement in Central America, there is a danger that President Reagan's visit, like the incomprehensible words of Vice President Bush during his visit to Manila in 1981—"We love your adherence to democratic principle and to the democratic processes"—will be misunderstood as United States acceptance of the violence done to the Philippine Constitution.

Our national interest may oblige us to pay a high price for military bases; it may oblige us to have diplomatic, political and economic relations with authoritarian and totalitarian governments; but our national honor obliges us to avoid the embrace of leaders who can too easily use such visits to imply that the United States supports and has accommodated itself to governments that have no popular base.

If President Reagan decides to carry out his plan to visit the Philippines, I hope he will remember the way that Pope John Paul II handled his television appearance with Gen. Wojciech Jarulzelski. The Pope blessed Poland and its people, not the dictator and his Government.

Therefore, when the people of the Philippines watch Mr. Reagan, I pray that the President will mention the outrage and sadness that Americans share with the family of Benigno Aquino.

And at that point, these words written by Benigno Aquino might be repeated as a testament that all Americans share: [The battle being fought in the Philippines] "is between those who have been mesmerized by the 'efficiency' of authoritarianism and those who still hold that democracy with all its flaws and inefficiency is man's best hope for betterment and progress. Man's sense of justice makes democracy possible; man's injustice makes it necessary."

Our Founding Fathers could not have said it better.

SENATE RESOLUTION 237—TO UPGRADE THE CHILDREN'S BUREAU

Mr. BENTSEN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

S. RES. 237

Whereas the United States has a mediocre record of infant and child health care compared to other industrialized nations, with an infant mortality rate no better than 14th over the last two decades:

Whereas there are some 90 to 100 child health and related federal programs scattered across half a dozen agencies with no coordination in operation on policy development and management;

Whereas the lack of program coordination data on child health issues has a major impact on the effectiveness and cost efficiency of federal spending on child health programs;

Whereas for most of this century, national child health policy was coordinated by a Children's Bureau, which now has very limited responsibility for selected children's issues;

Whereas there is now a need to improve the data base, and the coordination of child health programs and related issues to improve the coverage and effectiveness of such federal programs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President shall reorganize the Children's Bureau and provide such administrative powers as are necessary for it (a) to gather extensive data on the status of children and on the impact of federal programs on that status; and (b) to prepare and submit to the Congress an Annual Report on the Status of Children.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President.

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, Monday, October 3, has been proclaimed Child Health Day by the President. That proclamation is certainly appropriate and I join the President in urging greater attention to the health care needs of one of our most helpless citizen groups—our children and infants.

That proclamation can serve another more fundamental purpose as well, however. The fiscal year 1981 reconciliation legislation reduced spending for child health care—particularly in the large maternal and child health, and primary health care programs. We have lived with a reduced program level for 2 years now and it is time for the impact of those cuts to be examined. My support—and I suspect the support of many of my colleagues—for that aspect of the reconciliation legislation 2 years ago was based on the belief that we were making good progress in reducing child and infant disease. Certainly, statistics such as our declining infant mortality rate supported that belief. These programs, along with medicaid, WIC and the national immunization program, deserve substantial credit for the 41-percent decline over a scant 11 years in the infant mortality rate beginning in 1970. That rate fell to 11.7 deaths per 1,000 live births in 1981 from 20 per 1,000 in 1970. It took over twice as long—25 years—to achieve a comparable reduction in that rate in the absence of most of these programs during the 1950's and 1960's. That is strong evidence that these programs played an instrumental role in improving the health of our Nation's children and infants.

Yet, a need to reassess our progress toward improved child health and the impact of the 1981 cuts is suggested by those same infant mortality statistics. As the accompanying table shows, we are not as successful in controlling infant mortality as a number of other nations. Indeed, in 1979, 17 nations had lower infant mortality rates than the United States and we have run in the middle of the pack internationally for most of the past several decades—with a rank of only between 14th and 18th out of the best-performing 25 industrial nations. That is not an impressive performance. In 1979, the United States lagged behind such medical world powers as Hong Kong, Spain, Ireland, and East Germany. Sweden, Japan, Norway, and Denmark all enjoyed infant mortality rates at least one-third lower than our own. Had the United States enjoyed the same rate as Japan, over 17,000 fewer babies would have died here that year.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks, a table entitled, "Infant Mortality Rates, Selected Nations, 1970–1980."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE I.—INFANT MORTALITY RATES [1]

[Selected nations: 1970–80]

Country	1970	1975	1979/1980 [2]
Austria	25.9	20.5	13.9
Canada	18.8	14.3	10.9
Denmark	14.2	10.4	8.5
East Germany	18.5	15.9	12.6
France	18.2	13.8	10.0
Italy	29.6	21.2	14.3
Japan	13.1	10.1	7.4
Norway	12.8	11.1	8.8
Poland	33.2	24.9	21.2
Spain	[3] 27.9	[3] 12.1	11.1

Source: Infant Mortality: A report prepared by the Congressional Research Service for the Committee on Energy and Commerce, U.S. House of Representatives, (Print 98–5), June 1983, table 6.

Mr. President, the time has come for Congress and the administration to join in a bipartisan examination of Federal child health programs. The infant mortality data from abroad is more than a mere straw in the wind. It is a warning that we are not doing the job we are capable of in improving the health of our infants and children.

A CHILDREN'S BUREAU

As a first step toward better child health in America, we need a focal point of Federal efforts to promote child health and well-being. To best achieve that goal, I believe the President should assign major new responsibilities to the Children's Bureau with the Department of Health and Human Services to gather data on the status of children in America, to prepare comprehensive reports annually to Congress on the status of children, how Federal programs are affecting that status, and to coordinate issues within the Federal Government and the Nation dealing with child health, nutrition, education, and other related children's issues.

Each of us in this chamber today—and our parents and children as well—grew up under the watchful eye of the original Children's Bureau established in 1912. That Bureau emerged from constructive and badly needed efforts to end child labor abuses. In its first 50 years, the Bureau played a significant coordination and advocacy role within the Federal establishment and across the Nation for better child education, health and safety.

Despite its successes, however, it was downgraded a decade ago. Its policy role was abolished. And, it now sits as an office within the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) with limited responsibility over a handful of issues unrelated to child health. This downgrading of child health and children's issues is not warranted. Despite the success we have enjoyed, other nations have made faster progress and have healthier children, as well. We cannot afford to be smug and stand on our own health record. Indeed, there are those who argue that the less said about our lagging child health record, the better.

It is important that the issues raised by the President in his Child Health Day proclamation be pursued here and at the White House. They should not serve only as media grist for October 3, and ignored thereafter.

Some 90 to 100 children's programs exist today, scattered across a half dozen agencies from Defense to HHS. We need much better coordination between these Federal child health and associated programs. A rehabilitated Children's Bureau would be able to provide that coordination. It could play a data collection role, as well. In fact, that is the key role I would like to see an upgraded Bureau play. Specifically, it should collect extensive data on a continuous basis regarding all aspects of the status of children and submit annual reports with that information—including the impact of Federal programs on the status of children—to Congress. That exercise would assist Congress mightily in formulating Federal policy involving children—a function which now occurs only in a haphazard and ineffective fashion in the Federal bureaucracy, if it can be said to occur at all. Its role as a national clearinghouse for information and data on children and on children's issues would be reestablished. Children have no effective voice in the political process. They need such a voice and the Children's Bureau can serve that role.

EXPLANATION OF LEGISLATION

The resolution I am introducing today calls on the President to upgrade the Children's Bureau and requires it to submit an annual report to Congress on the status of children. A resurrected Children's Bureau could improve child health and nutrition for more youths at lower cost. This could be accomplished without additional cost by beefing up the responsibilities of the existing administrative office within HHS. And, centralizing the collection of data relevant to children's health and related issues in one office would enable both Congress and the administration to deal more effectively with the need to improve the health and well-being of future generations.

I fought successfully in 1981 to keep the maternity and child health program as a separate block grant. The primary beneficiaries of these grants are infants and children, who are among the most deserving but least powerful constituents in our Nation. They warrant unique attention. And reorganization and upgrading of the Children's Bureau with potent interagency coordinating, data collection, and reporting powers would go a long way toward providing them that attention.

That is the purpose of the resolution I am offering today. And I urge my colleagues in this Chamber to join me in supporting it. It has been said that the care taken of its most defenseless citizen is a good measure of the worth of a society. We do not now measure up well by that standard in nurturing the well-being of our children. My resolution is designed to start us along the road toward better care for our children.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

CRITICAL AGRICULTURAL MATERIALS

JEPSEN AMENDMENT NO. 2265

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. JEPSEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 2733) to extend and improve the existing program of research, development, and demonstration in the production and manufacture of guayule rubber, and to broaden such program to include other critical agricultural materials; as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

"(7) No later than sixty days after the date of the enactment of the Agribusiness Loan Act of 1983, the Secretary shall issue regulations to carry out this subsection.".

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. HOLIDAY

RANDOLPH AMENDMENT NO. 2268

Mr. RANDOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 3706) to amend title 5, United States Code, to make the birthday of Martin Luther King, Jr., a legal public holiday; as follows:

Strike all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following: That section 6103(a) of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting immediately after the item relating to New Year's Day the following:

"Birthday of Martin Luther King, Jr., January 15.".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this Act shall take effect on the first January 1 that occurs after the two-year period following the date of the enactment of this Act.

WILSON AMENDMENT NO. 2269

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. WILSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill H.R. 3706, supra; as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

SEC. 3. Section 6103 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) The Congress finds that—

"(A) the cost of the growing number of legal public holidays to the Federal Government has become prohibitive; and

"(B) outstanding individuals deserving of national recognition by legal public holidays should be commemorated in other appropriate manners.

"(2) Legal public holidays under this section shall be limited to ten in number.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

S. 371: AID FOR LONG-TERM UNEMPLOYED AND NATION'S SMALL BUSINESSES

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, it is my hope that when the Senate moves to consider revenue legislation this session, we will see action on S. 371, my targeted jobs tax credit legislation. My desire to see action on this legislation is simple enough. While we have recently heard much news about a recovery taking hold in our economy, there are still some very chilling figures and troubling trends that we must deal with.

There have been indications that we are pulling out of the recession we have been mired in the last 2 years. We have seen the Nation's unemployment level begin to fall a bit after reaching record levels. Yet, while many, including myself, are cheered by this downward turn, I am troubled by the large number of long-term unemployed persons across America. Of the 10.7 million Americans out of work in August, 2.4 million, or 23 percent have been unemployed for 27 weeks or more.

What is particularly disheartening about this figure, Mr. President, is that it reflects a trend of increased long-term unemployment. In 1979, the percentage of unemployed persons who had been out of work for 27 weeks or more stood at 8.7 percent. This figure increased to 14 percent in 1981 and 16.6 percent in 1982. Using this year's statistics, we see that long-term unemployment is running at a yearly level of 24.3 percent through August. The percentage of long-term unemployed individuals in America has nearly tripled in 4 short years.

This is a problem that I have attempted to deal with in S. 371. As many of my colleagues know, this legislation creates another target group under the existing tax credit sections of the Tax Code for this increasing segment of our Nation's unemployed. Firms hiring long-term persons will be entitled to such a tax credit. Nearly one quarter of all the Nation's unemployed, some 2.4 million Americans, will be eligible for this credit.

S. 371 goes one step further and increases the amount of tax credit available when the hiring firm is a small business. This provision is equally necessary in light of the continued increases in recorded business failures across the country. Dun & Bradstreet reports that for the week of August 18 of this year, 662 businesses failed compared with 572 for the same period last year. To date this year we have reported 19,336 business failures. As my colleagues well know, last year saw the greatest number of business failures since the Great Depression. This year's reports indicate we will witness another record-breaking year in this dismal category.

The men and women who operate our Nation's small businesses need the type of assistance available under S. 371 to help keep them afloat. And while there are those who argue that such a tax credit would not prove beneficial to beleaguered small firms, I believe to the contrary. Earlier this year, the Senate Small Business Committee heard testimony from several small business owners regarding S. 371. These individuals stated that they would make use of the type of credit offered in S. 371. They felt it provided the type of catalyst which would speed hiring activity by small firms.

In closing, Mr. President, I would like to raise one last point disclosed during the Small Business Committee's hearings on S. 371. Testimony presented by John Chapoton of the Department of the Treasury, indicated his Department's belief that S. 371 would cost the taxpayer less than $250 million per fiscal year. I should point out Mr. President, that this figure does not take into account the reduced Federal expenditures for those persons put back to work, nor the increase in revenues from such increased hiring. When these two factors are weighed in, I believe that this small sum of $250 million would shrink drastically and indeed, the tax credit established in S. 371 may actually prove a revenue enhancer.

It is my hope, Mr. President, that we may see action on this important piece of legislation in the near future. Given the impact of this legislation on a wide segment of our society, and its low cost, I feel S. 371 is a measure this body should consider. I am hopeful an appropriate revenue vehicle may be found which will allow my colleagues the opportunity to come to the aid of the Nation's long-term unemployed and small businesses in a constructive manner.●

PUBLIC SAFETY OFFICERS BENEFITS ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor two bills concerning survivors' death benefits for Federal law enforcement officers and firefighters which have been introduced by my distinguished colleague, Senator GLENN.

S. 1163 amends title 5 of the United States Code to provide death benefits to survivors of Federal law enforcement officers and firefighters. It would authorize a $50,000 death benefit to the surviving spouse and children of such officer whose death is the direct result of injuries sustained in the performance of duty. The House version of this bill, H.R. 622, passed the House by the overwhelming margin of 390 to 33 on July 26, 1983.

S. 1164 defines "direct result of injuries" to include situations in which death results from a "medical condition sustained while ingesting or inhaling a poisonous substance, or while subject to extreme physical stresss on a single occasion, or during a single event, in the performance of duty."

Legislation very similar to that which I am cosponsoring today has previously passed both Houses of Congress. It passed the Senate on December 10, 1980. It was, however, vetoed by President Carter. The legislation was objectionable, he said, "because it would single out certain groups of employees for preferential treatment under the Federal employee workers' compensation law (FECA)." He indicated that there were other Federal employees who are also exposed to special hazards in their work.

It has also been claimed that, under current law, the Federal Government pays death benefits to survivors of employees who die on the job. Depending on family size, these benefits may be as high as 75 percent of an employee's salary.

Although these arguments merit our consideration, they do not withstand close scrutiny. It is not logical or fair to deny protection to an especially deserving group because you cannot presently cover all groups exposed to risk. The nature and extent of the risk involved in law enforcement is deserving of special consideration. As we increase our anticrime efforts, these risks will inevitably increase. Other groups are exposed to hazards, but no group is exposed so constantly to so many as those involved in the absolutely essential task of securing domestic tranquillity.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated the cost of this legislation to be $500,000 per year. In some years, the expense may be more and, if we are fortunate, in many years it will be less. For this minimal cost we can relieve great hardship and the ever-present fear for those in law enforcement that their families will not be adequately provided for in the event of their deaths. These brave public servants and their families deserve no less.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to repeat the wise action taken by the Senate in 1980 and, again, to support this important legislation.●

SCS PROJECTS APPROVED

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, on August 3 of this year, the Committee on Environment and Public Works adopted resolutions authorizing five Soil Conservation Service small watersheds projects. The five projects were Brundage watershed, Idaho; Elk Creek watershed, Kansas; Calapooya Creek watershed, Oregon; South Fork Licking River watershed, Ohio; and Loc Olmos Creek watershed, Texas.

I take this opportunity to inform the Senate that a committee print describing the five projects, together with the view of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, has been printed and can be obtained from the committee.●

HOW TO HELP AMERICA COMPETE

● Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, international competition is one of the greatest challenges facing the U.S. economy today. Although high interest rates and an overvalued dollar have made many of our products less attractive on world markets than those of some of our competitors, waiting for these forces to subside will not be enough. There is much we must do to onset the competitive challenge. Some of these actions are set out in an eloquent commentary by Dr. Robert B. Reich of Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government, that appeared in the New York Times, September 30, 1983.

Mr. President, I would like to share Dr. Reich's thoughts with my colleagues, and I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

HOW TO HELP AMERICA COMPETE

(By Robert B. Reich)

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—Question: Your company's widgets are losing out to low-cost imports. What do you do?

1. Close your American factory and start making widgets or widget parts in South Korea, Mexico or some other place where labor is cheap.

2. Automate the factory to cut your workforce (and labor costs) by two-thirds.

3. Quit the widget business, scrap your plant and equipment (or sell it to your employees), then buy an insurance company, mining company or a shopping center.

4. Threaten to do 1., 2. or 3. unless your employees agree to reduce wages and benefits.

5. Go to Washington, complain of unfair "dumping" of foreign widgets, forecast greater job loss, show that widgets are critical to defense and get a tariff or quota to block imports.

Answer: all of the above—at least, that's the answer our producers of steel, autos, textiles, apparel, televisions, video games and machine tools have come up with.

But others have different answers. Labor prefers to block imports. Many politicians talk about automation but vote for protection. Financial prefer diversification into other businesses. Most economists disparage protection, are indifferent to the other concerns and worry about overvalued dollars. Conservative Republicans often want to cut wages and benefits.

While any of these alternatives may improve our companies' competitiveness, none will lead directly to higher standard of living. That's because none will improve the competitiveness of Americans themselves. None will increase the number of Americans whose skills command higher real earnings in world markets. For that, we need another alternative: Retool your factory and retain your workers to produce a more sophisticated line of widgets.

What would this mean for our industries? It would mean shifting from basic steel to custom-cast steels with new additives and different levels of purification; from low-skilled car-assembly operations and the production of simple auto components like dashboards and seat covers to complex components like fuel-efficient engines, transmissions and graphite-fiber chassis; from basic cotton, wool and simple synthetic textiles to carbon fibers and specially-coated polyster filaments; from simple machine tools to computer-run tools.

These products would require skilled labor. But much of the training would be on-the-job. Advanced technologies would be applied not so much to reduce labor costs as to enhance workers' capacities to recognize and solve production problems and to improve efficiency and product quality. Lower-level employees would assume greater responsibility and the whole enterprise would be made more flexible. These new products and processes would represent a new generation of industries. As their markets grew, so too would jobs.

But this alternative is not at the center of debate over competitiveness. Most of American management has not embraced it, labor is at best lukewarm, investors and creditors are skeptical. Why? Because it poses large risks and costs for each player. Profits and jobs may not always materialize; if they do, they may be many years away. The other alternatives are relatively sure bets, at least in the short term.

The answer is to make this alternative more attractive to business and labor. For this, we don't need a Federal development bank or a Japanese-style central-planning agency. We need measures that alter the rules of the game by reducing the costs and risks of restructuring industry: for example, tax credits for company investments in employee retraining, subsidized vouchers unemployed workers can cash in for on-the-job training, antitrust exemptions for undertaking research joint ventures and consolidating older plants, changes in labor law to link greater job security to greater flexibility in work rules and job classifications, changes in banking regulations to allow larger equity holdings, unemployment compensation taxes tied to employee job security and retraining, a requirement that firms or industries receiving import protection simultaneously retool and retrain.

Improving competitiveness is a goal almost everyone can endorse. But the chorus of endorsement drowns out the key question: how? Most obvious alternatives would reduce workers' earning's increase unemployment or else keep out foreign goods and thereby impose new costs on consumers. But such strategies for improving competitiveness by reducing our standard of living confuse means and ends. A real gain in competitiveness can come only from making better use of our only unique national asset—our people.●

CENTRAL AMERICA

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, a couple of days ago, in the aftermath of our debate on Lebanon and the War Powers Act, I came across an editorial cartoon which expressed the dilemma we all face in dealing with foreign policy. The cartoon showed a person reading a newspaper which was filled with headlines about Lebanon. The person was asking his friend "What happened to Central America?"

Obviously, nothing has happened to diminish the importance of Central America, nor to make easier the guest for a long term and durable policy which will bring stability, prosperity and peace to that troubled region. But, as is so often the case in our country, attention has shifted away from the tough questions of the long term and has focused instead on other things which momentarily appear somehow more important. It is unfortunate that we often tend to think of our foreign policy in terms of whatever is most important at the moment, rather than recognizing that several things are vitally important simultaneously. It is also unfortunate that we too often tend to think in terms of today's headline, which emphasizes the dramatic, rather than tomorrow's problems, which are complex and often unclear.

As Senators may know, I recently returned from a brief trip to Costa Rica, a country I have been visiting for more than 10 years. I went to Costa Rica in conjunction with a business and investment conference sponsored by Caribbean/Central America Action, a remarkable group of public-spirited citizens and former State Department officials. Groups like CCAA are absolutely vital to a long term foreign policy based on more than reaction to today's headlines or tomorrow's crisis, for CCAA asks the hard questions about how to achieve prosperity and how to establish the conditions which will foster that prosperity. It does more than ask questions, however. It encourages thriving democracies like Costa Rica to join U.S. business in innovative programs of investment and development. It makes clear to countries which are not yet democratic that the kind of foreign investment needed to fuel equitable development will be forthcoming only in a political climate that is stable and representative. In short, the efforts of CCAA and other such groups go hand-in-hand with our own efforts to develop a long term policy.

One of the most frequent topics of conservation at the CCAA conference was a remarkable speech recently delivered by Kenneth Dam, the Deputy Secretary of State. Secretary Dam understands the challenges which face the developing countries, and he has outlined them with particular reference to Central America. He has done more than outline problems, however. He has pointed the way to a long term policy of political and economic development. I think his speech is one of the best I have read in many years, and I want to share it with my colleagues. Therefore, I will ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Ken Dam's speech had its counterpart in the remarks delivered to the CCAA conference by Anthony L. Andersen, the president of H. B. Fuller Co., in St. Paul.

I have known Tony Andersen for many years. He is the son of former Minnesota Governor Elmer Andersen, and he has carried his family's traditional concern with public service to the H. R. Fuller Co. Tony has a first-rate grasp of the problems of Central America, and he is not a Johnny-come-lately to the region nor one of those who only discovered the area after the headlines began to accumulate in the late 1970's. It was during my own association with H. R. Fuller, before coming to the Senate, that I traveled so often and so extensively throughout Central America.

Under Tony Andersen's leadership, Fuller has remained committed to Central America. It rebuilt its plant in Nicaragua after the revolution. It remains a major employer in Costa Rica through its subsidiary, the Kativo Corp. And now, as Tony announced at the CCAA conference, H. R. Fuller plans to devote 2 percent of its pretax profits to community affairs projects throughout Central America, a remarkable demonstration of public duty by a private corporation. In fact, Fuller will increase its contribution from 2 percent to 5 percent of pretax profits over the new few years.

It is in recognition of this kind of hard-headed philanthropy and this deep interest in and concern for hemispheric relations that Costa Rica recently named Tony Andersen its honorary consul in the Twin Cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul. Tony's appointment will serve as the capstone of an ongoing relationship between the Twin Cities and Costa Rica, for the two have been joined for some years in a sister-city relationship through the chambers of commerce.

Mr. President, the kind of imagination and intelligence shown by Ken Dam and Tony Andersen will be needed if our country is to develop and pursue a long-term policy in Central America. The current focus on military assistance can only be a short-run holding action. The real problems in the region—problems which our policy has too often ignored or failed to address—go well beyond immediate security threats. They cover the entire spectrum of social, political and economic difficulties which many of the Third World countries face. I am delighted to see people like Ken Dam and Tony Andersen doing more than simply talking about these problems. They are acting.

Mr. President, I would like to conclude by adding to the RECORD the transcript of some remarks I made at the Westminster Church in Minneapolis shortly after my return from Costa Rica. Those remarks expand upon the comments I have here today. I therefore ask Kenneth Dam's speech, an extract of Tony Andersen's speech, printed in the St. Paul Pioneer Press/Dispatch, and a copy of my remarks to the Westminster Church be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

ECONOMIC GROWTH AND U.S. POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Remarks by Hon. Kenneth W. Dam)

President Reagan on April 27 spoke to a special joint session of Congress to explain our response to the problems in Central America. He outlined a policy based on four interlocking elements: democracy, dialogue, defense, and development.

First, and I quote the President: "We will support democracy, reform and human freedom. This means using our assistance, our powers of persuasion, and our legitimate 'leverage' to bolster humane democratic systems where they already exist and to help countries on their way to that goal as quickly as human insitutions can be changed. . . . We will work at human rights problems, not walk away from them."

Second, we favor negotiations and dialogue to resolve conflicts in ways that promote the development of democracy. The President's special envoy, former Senator Richard Stone, is working to facilitate negotiations both within and among the countries of Central America. We welcome the meeting that took place August 28 in Bogota, Colombia, between representatives of El Salvador's Peace Commission and the guerrillas. And we support the regional Contadora process, in which five Central American nations, including Nicaragua, are engaged with their nearest neighbors.

Third, to give diplomacy a chance to work, we are using military assistance as a shield to help Central American countries defend themselves. This shield should foreclose a military victory by anti-democratic forces supported through Nicaragua by Cuba and the Soviet Union.

Fourth, and again I quote the President: "In response to the challenge of world recession and, in the case of El Salvador, in response to the unrelenting campaign of economic sabotage by the guerrillas, we will support economic development."

It is this economic dimension of our policy toward Central America that I would like to focus on today. Amidst all the debate over the situation in Central America, surprisingly little attention has been paid to what should be done about the region's pressing economic troubles.

Few would deny that economic difficulties lie at the heart of much of Central America's instability. Or that sound economic growth is vital to the region's future. Promoting that growth in a framework of equitable development is a major focus of our policy. Our assistance to the region makes the point: eighty-one cents of every dollar of U.S. aid to Central America this fiscal year is devoted to economic goals. And now the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America headed by Dr. Kissinger has begun to give special attention to the region's long-term development needs.

So it is fitting that we take a moment to assess both the obstacles to growth in Central America and how they might be overcome.

II.

Let me begin with something that is often overlooked. Central America is clearly capable of strong and sustained economic growth. That is the proven record of the 1950s, the 1960s, and most of the 1970s.

From 1960 to 1979, real GNP in the United States grew by an average of 3.7 percent per year; the industrialized market economies as a whole grew at a rate of 4.2 percent per year. During those same 20 years, Central America did more than keep up. According to the World Bank, every country in Central America grew faster than the United States, and faster even than the European average. Annual growth rates averaged from a low of 4.4 percent in Honduras to a high of 6.3 percent of Costa Rica.

It is also true, of course, that Central America's population growth during those same 20 years was among the highest in the world, averaging about three percent. Even so, per capita income increased in every country. And in each case, the percentage of total production accounted for by manufacturing and other industrial activity increased. For instance, between 1960 and 1979 industrial activity in Honduras rose from 19 percent of total production to 26 percent.

In the mid-1970s, in fact, Central America's economic prospects attracted a major Japanese investment campaign. In El Salvador, for example, Japanese firms were particularly active in textiles and electrical appliances. By 1978, Japan was El Salvador's second largest foreign investor.

Against such a favorable background, how is it that Central America's rapid development lost momentum? How do economic problems relate to today's tragic conflicts?

Many factors are involved, but three standout: local social and political conflicts, the impact of the global economic recession, and the spread of guerrilla warfare and attacks on the economy.

Let me take each in turn.

First, local social and political conflicts. In Central America, misrule and maldistribution of the benefits of development span many years. The region was still relatively quiet politically when I travelled there briefly five years ago. But even then the underlying economic problems and social tensions were unmistakeable. In major cities, high walls separated palatial homes from the deepest squalor. Growth was slowly improving the lot of many people; but growth was also increasing expectations. And except for Costa Rica, there were few democratic outlets to help resolve frustrations and social tensions peacefully. The repressions and instability that ensued proved bad for both business and labor. Over the past five years, social conflicts and political uncertainty have increasingly prevented new investment and set back development.

The second obstacle to growth was a series of adverse developments in the world economy. Beginning in the late 1970s, the prices of Central America's basic export crops plummeted. Consider the four principal exports of the region: Coffee is the single most important export product for most countries in the area. Bumper crops in Brazil and Colombia caused world coffee prices to fall by more than 26 percent in nominal terms between 1977 and 1990. Cotton is the second most important export of El Salvador, Guatemala and Nicaragua. In 1981, cotton prices stopped keeping pace with world inflation and fell by some 20 percent in nominal terms in just nine months. The world price of bananas, a mainstay for Costa Rica and Honduras, also failed to keep pace with world inflation rates. The price of sugar, meanwhile, fell near its historic lowpoint in real terms.

The rise in import costs was nearly as damaging as this fall in export revenues. Two of Central America's most important imports are petroleum and financial capital borrowed from hard currency countries. In 1978 and 1979, the second oil shock almost doubled the price of imported oil. And in the 1980s, the higher cost of capital on world financial markets increased the cost of rolling over old debt and contracting new debt to offset falling export revenues.

The result was a shocking economic dislocation. By 1981, it actually took two bags of Central American coffee to buy what one bag had bought in 1978. The shift in overall terms of trade meant that Costa Rica, for example, had to export 1.7 times as much to pay for the same amount of imports as three years before.

Domestic policy responses to these changed circumstances were generally slow and sometimes inappropriate. This led to the flight of local capital, heavy external indebtedness and vitality-sapping controls. The Central American Common Market, the vehicle for preferential trade within the region, weakened rapidly as the economy of each of its members declined and grew more protectionist. The value of trade among Central American nations fell by a third in nominal terms, from a high point of over $1.1 billion in 1980 to $775 million in 1982. In real terms the decline was much greater.

No Central American nation escaped the effects of this general decline. Even democratic Costa Rica, which faced fewer of the political and social challenges prevalent elsewhere in the region, went into a deep economic slump. Until 1980, Costa Rica's real growth rate had averaged more than 6 percent per year—the highest in the region. In 1982, in contrast, economic activity in Costa Rica declined 9 percent.

The economy of El Salvador contracted even faster. The reason is that El Salvador has been hit hardest by the third, and in certain cases, the most important, factor in Central America's economic decline: the disruption of economic life by guerrilla violence.

In a nation where safe drinking water is scarce, guerrillas have destroyed water pumping stations and the transmission towers that carry the energy to run them. They have destroyed 55 of the country's 260 bridges and damaged many more. In a 22-month period ending last November they caused over 5,000 electrical interruptions—an average of almost 8 a day. In 1982 alone, the guerrillas destroyed over 200 buses. Less than half the rolling stock of the railways remains operational.

In a nation where overpopulation is endemic, where employment is hard to find, and where capital investment must be nurtured, guerrilla attacks have forced the closing of factories, the abandonment of farms and the displacement of thousands of workers. One out of eight of El Salvador's most productive land reform cooperatives is either abandoned or operating only sporadically because of guerrilla interference.

The result has been human as well as economic disaster. On the average, every man, woman and child in El Salvador is one-third poorer today than four years ago. During the off-season, agricultural unemployment is now 40 percent. In 1981, El Salvador was able to import only two-thirds as much by volume as in 1977. Critical goods like medicines and raw materials have been cut back sharply. And to maintain even this reduced level of foreign purchases, its central bank has had to increase net borrowings by almost $300 million.

El Salvador, moreover, is not the only country affected by the consequences of guerrilla warfare. The spread of violence and uncertainty has made investors wary of ventures anywhere in Central America, even in the most stable countries of the region, Honduras and Costa Rica.

III.

The United States is working hard to help the Central Americans overcome these obstacles and resume strong economic growth. Our policy is designed to address each of the problems I have mentioned.

First, to combat social tensions and the long-term instability of dictatorships, whether of the right or the left, we are supporting democratic politics and reform. Democracy gives people a stake in peaceful development. And it gives investors the stability they need to plan ahead, confident that the future is less likely to hold arbitrary shifts in government policies or sudden outbreaks of civil strife.

El Salvador's elected Constituent Assembly has, for example, twice extended land reform legislation in response to popular demand. 500,000 Salvadorans have now benefitted directly from the land reform. Both the AFL–CIO and the Agency for International Development are working hard to consolidate the reforms and to increase agricultural productivity. After initial declines, yields are beginning to increase again. And by developing a rural middle class, with money to spend on domestically produced goods, the land reform should provide an indispensable base for greater national output and employment.

Second, to help cushion adverse developments in the world economy and complement domestic policy reforms, we have increased both bilateral economic assistance and other forms of cooperation.

In this fiscal year, we are obligating some $625 million in bilateral economic assistance for Central America. That amount is more than four times greater than our military assistance. This economic aid includes:

Balance of payments support to permit needed imports of consumption and production goods;

Project money to build or improve basic assets like roads and bridges;

Technical assistance to help the Central American governments provide services to their people more efficiently;

Food aid; and

Funds for the construction of low-cost housing.

We are also going beyond traditional economic assistance in two ways. We are encouraging close cooperation between individual countries and the International Monetary Fund and the development banks. This cooperation should facilitate necessary internal adjustments and provide essential external capital flows. At the same time, we are creating new market opportunities for Central American products. The Caribbean Basin Initiative, which received strong bipartisan support in Congress and which the President signed into law just this past

August 5, is a hallmark of our efforts to lay a sound basis for future growth. I shall return to it in a minute.

Third, because of the guerrillas' explicit targetting of the Salvadoran economy, our military assistance program is designed to help shield economic activity. Behind that shield, the Salvadoran economy can function, people can go to work, and vital public services can be restored. A major civil-military operation is now under way in the two provinces (San Vicente and Usulutan), where guerrilla activity has been most damaging to coffee, cotton, livestock and dairy farming. This operation is expected to permit 28 of El Salvador's 42 largest farm cooperatives to resume normal operations. Twenty schools and eight small hospitals have been opened since June.

It is difficult to quantify the lost value of foregone investments and disrupted production. We estimate that all our economic assistance since 1980 does not fully offset guerrilla damage to the Salvadoran economy. But it is making a critical difference.

IV.

What does the future hold?

The answer, of course, depends on the ability of our friends in Central America to design and implement policies that will go beyond immediate needs and improve conditions for long-term development.

But we can certainly help. U.S. businesses have relatively small stakes in Central America. At the end of last year, for example, total U.S. direct investment in Central America was less than half of one per cent of U.S. investment abroad. Nonetheless, economic development in Central America is in the national interest of the United States. The peace and prosperity of our neighbors is a goal worth spending money on, even a lot of money.

So it is not surprising that many Americans have recently been talking about a Marshall Plan for Central America. Americans are every bit as committed to the peace and prosperity of Central America as they were to the reconstruction of Europe after World War II.

But the term "Marshall Plan" should not be taken literally. The analogy between post-war Europe and present-day Central America is less than precise. Post-war Europe faced problems of reconstruction, not of long-term development and immediate defense. Europe's internal conflicts and even occasional violence were contained by democratic experience and widespread belief in a new future. And Europe had a large pool of trained manpower with a long industrial tradition. For all of these reasons, massive infusions of capital were quickly usable in post-war Europe. The problems of Central America are different.

But if the term "Marshall Plan" is used to emphasize the high priority we are already giving to economic assistance for the region, it is consistent with our thinking. Central America needs relatively high levels of assistance. It needs them now, and perhaps for some years to come. It needs them for both development and defense. And it needs them to restore destroyed or deteriorated assets.

As the region recovers its balance, however, we will want to ensure that Central America's economies do not succumb to the tendency of some small, developing economies to adjust to large inflows of capital in ways that create permanent dependence. Massive inflows of aid can reduce the incentives for domestic saving. They can help maintain exchange rates at levels that discourage domestic investment. And the necessarily large role of governments in using foreign aid can also inflate the size of the public sector at the expense of more dynamic private enterprise.

Looking to the future, then, I would suggest six considerations that should be kept in mind in determining realistic levels of assistance for Central America after the present emergency.

The first is the one I have just outlined: the need to avoid impairing the region's independent economic potential by fostering dependence or undermining productivity.

Nicaragua provides a concrete illustration. Since July 1979, Nicaragua has benefitted from unprecedented levels of economic assistance from around the world. Their own figures indicate that they received more than $500 million in assistance loans each year from 1980 through 1982. During the Sandinistas' first twenty-two months in power, the United States was Nicaragua's single largest bilateral donor of assistance, and we supported them when they applied to the international financial institutions for multilateral aid.

In spite of these high levels of aid, and an initial spurt of growth in 1979 and 1980, the Nicaraguan economy is now declining rapidly. We do not know just how rapidly because the Nicaraguan government no longer publishes timely statistics. We do know that the public sector's share of GNP, which was 15 per cent before the revolution, reached 41 per cent in 1980, and is even higher today. The indications are that the growth of the nationalized sector has been accompanied by disastrous losses in production. And little of the available external assistance has gone into developing the productive activities that will be needed to sustain Nicaragua's praiseworthy new literacy and public health programs. Arturo Cruz, once the Director of Nicaragua's Central Bank and a member of the revolutionary government junta, has concluded that "Nicaragua is condemned to be an international beggar."

A second consideration is the private investment, not official aid, is the key to growth. Funds for investment can come from only two sources: domestic savings, or foreign savings in the form of foreign investment, loans, or economic assistance.

To be self-sustaining, most of the investment must come from domestic resources. As I noted in presenting the U.S. position to the UN Conference on Trade and Development in June: "Adequate incentives for people to produce, save, and invest are the heart of effective policies for sustained growth."

Domestically, the nations of Central America can work to develop the kind of business environment conducive to private domestic investment. Political stability is a prerequisite. But open markets, an equitable and efficient tax system, sound monetary and foreign exchange policies, and a government commitment to encourage new enterprises are also needed. Sound government policies and non-discriminatory legal procedures can also attract foreign investment, and with it the technology and know-how to increase Central America's international competitiveness.

A third consideration is the distribution of investment. My own conviction is that industry should be developed, but not at the expense of agriculture. In country after country, an increasingly productive agricultural sector has proved to be the force driving economic growth.

Central America's own record is a case in point. For the most part, Central America has been highly successful in selling its agricultural goods to the world market: coffee, cotton, sugar, bananas. Without disturbing the production of agricultural exports, the Central Americans can also increase their industrial exports. In the late 1970's, they had already begun to achieve this goal, as the statistics I mentioned earlier demonstrate. They can do so again, and better.

This brings me to a fourth consideration: international trade is key to Central America's future growth.

Although Central American domestic markets are relatively small, Central America enjoys a similar resource base and shorter transportation lines to major markets than the five members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN). The ASEAN nations have had an average growth rate of about 6 percent over the last decade. With the exception of the Singapore city-state, the ASEAN nations are, like Central America, engaged mainly in agriculture and the production of basic commodities. But unlike the Central American Common Market, they have not protected themselves behind a common tariff barrier. Instead, they have fostered growth through open markets and exports, combined with cooperative economic policies and joint industrial projects. The experience of the ASEAN nations confirms what common sense suggests—that the Central American nations should also be able to compete effectively in world markets.

A fifth consideration is that we should commit ourselves to making the benefits of American trade and commercial investment available to Central America.

For years, Latin American experts have been telling us that what our neighbors wanted and needed most was a long-term U.S. commitment to their stable growth. That is why the President worked so hard on the Caribbean Basin Initiative. The CBI, to which I referred earlier, is an innovative twelve-year program of one-way free trade and tax incentives for twenty-seven nations in the Caribbean and Central America. The CBI provides market-oriented incentives for investment and business in the region, based on free trade and free investment flow. It emphasizes private enterprise and private investment as the engine of development. We expect the designation of the first CBI beneficiaries to take place in November, and the 12-year free trade provisions to go into effect in January.

By harnessing normal market forces to foster a growth pattern appropriate to the region, the CBI should attract capital and create employment opportunities on a lasting basis. It is an approach that creates opportunities without dependence. I believe it should typify much of our thinking about how to promote future growth in the area.

My sixth and final thought is that we should do more to help meet the basic human needs of the people of Central America. On a world scale, these are "middle-income" countries. But continued technical assistance and other forms of cooperation in health, education, and population are still essential. Indeed, because they are our neighbors, the grounds for a special U.S. effort are strong.

Our private sector could and, I believe, should play a major role—both independently and in cooperation with the Agency for International Development. There is great scope for universities, businesses, religious organizations and even local governments to cooperate with their counterparts in Central America. The needs are great for improved training, transfer of technology, health services, and other cooperation to better the quality of life in both urban and rural areas.

V.

The United States is now on the road to a sustained economic recovery; most other industrialized nations are not far behind. The challenge is to transform this revival into a truly global recovery, based on renewed growth in world trade and investment.

Central America, which is so close and so important to the United States, must share fully in this recovery. I think it can. The six considerations I have outlined today are designed to do just that. Central America can avoid dependency, strengthen its private sector, develop agriculture as well as industry, and increase its foreign trade. In turn, the United States can ensure the availability of American markets and enterprise, and cooperate to better meet the basic human needs of Central America's people.

The key to establishing this dynamic is freedom. Freedom from outside intervention. Freedom from tyranny. And freedom to create. As President Reagan stated in his September 1981 speech to the IMF and World Bank:

"Only when the human spirit is allowed to invent and create, only when individuals are given a personal stake in deciding economic policies and benefiting from their success—only then can societies remain economically alive, dynamic, prosperous, progressive, and free."

That is our goal: neighbors who are both free and independent. Let us move to an era of economic and political cooperation, securely founded on peaceful development.

CYCLE OF BUSINESS UNCERTAINTY FEEDS CRISIS IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(By Anthony L. Andersen)

H.B. Fuller is committed to the future of Central America. We have been here in good times and bad. We will be here in the future.

The Central American region has been an important area for our company. We have plants in five of the seven Central American countries.

With that in mind, I would like to examine some of the troublesome contradictions I have noticed in U.S. policy to this region.

First, when President Reagan announced the formation of the Central America Study Commission chaired by Henry Kissinger, he said: "Help us warn the American people that for the first time in memory we face real dangers on our borders, that we must protect the safety and security of our people."

Our president's memory, which is usually excellent, is obviously short in this case. Danger is nothing new in the Central American area. In 1962, for example, the Cuban Missile Crises brought America and the Soviet Union perilously close to nuclear conflict. During the 1970s and '80s economic crisis, particularly the growth of foreign debt, threatened Central American nations. Our neighbors in Central America have known constant danger for several decades now.

Second, I believe that we have abused the notion of what it means to be a good neighbor. We have given steady lip service to the importance of the Central American region, but have ignored the responsibilities that come with being a good neighbor. We have paid sporadic attention to the region and have ignored long-term and consistent policies that are absolutely required if this region is to grow and prosper. And we can't make any more promises. Promises are cheap.

Third, the United States has seemed to believe that we could ignore Central America when it suited our needs. We have in fact a one-way relationship. Only two-way relations can develop lasting solutions.

The majority leader of the House, Jim Wright, described U.S. policy towards Central America as "broken promises and benign neglect."

This must change. We do not need temporary strategies. Magic and razzle-dazzle solutions will wear off. Results count.

Only with the promotion of a consistent foreign policy that fosters and assists broadly based economic and personal income growth can Central America prosper. We should not downplay the important position and potential the United States has in the region. This is why the development of a long-term positive and humane foreign policy is critical.

Central America's greatest danger, in my mind, is not the guerrillas supported by the Soviet Union. I believe the Central American people will see through the deception and recognize the emptiness of Soviet colonial, exploitive foreign policy.

My fear is that Central America will become caught in an accelerating cycle of business uncertainty that will result in increased national investment in the non-productive sector, or reduced foreign investment, expanded debt and increasingly greater instability, all of which further weakens the social and commercial fabric of these precious nations.

This vicious cycle must be firmly interrupted. The flow of capital, both local and international, must be redirected back to Central American nations. The United States government should assist Central American governments, where needed and wanted, to create a total climate whereby business investment—one necessary ingredient—can find its way to Central American countries.

The 1982 Caribbean Basin initiative was a modest beginning, but it was not enough. It benefited only a few Central American countries and did not create a long-term solution to problems at hand.

The United States government must also ensure that economic aid and credit deals directly with human needs. Today these programs are subject to shifting political moods in Washington. Businesses and Central American governments cannot plan thoroughly and with assured continuity if aid is turned on and off. We need to make a long-term commitment to help free people and free enterprise, not only political enterprise or political ambition.

The International Monetary Fund and the World Bank should not be treated as political tools. The governments of Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras and others need to know that their basic needs will receive attention and support and that these organizations are not short-term friends.

One of President Reagan's best initiatives has been to encourage and increase capital for OPIC, the Overseas Private Investment Council, which provides loans and risk insurance for overseas development. H.B. Fuller has used OPIC insurance coverage in the Dominican Republic, which encouraged us to make investments that we might not otherwise have been able to justify.

OPIC funds are readily available to countries like Panama, Belize and Costa Rica. OPIC insurance is much more difficult to get in El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras because they are defined as "risky." If we are going to play it safe, we will lose. We must invest, because by investing we clearly become an active, involved participant in the solution, not a contributor to the problem.

Economic aid guarantees, loans and insurance are commitments difficult for United States leaders to make. They must understand that we must make commitments now to improve the Central American economy. Tomorrow is too late. This is truly an opportunity for our government leaders to exercise statesmanship vs. politics for the next election.

Government involvement, as I have said all along, is no panacea. Interhemisphere governments must create a climate for private enterprises to invest and in the long run remove the need for government assistance. In addition, over the long term, the attitude of the U.S. people must be changed and then they must be informed about the Central American region.

Private enterprise has responsibilities as well. Private enterprise must reinvest locally earned capital into Central America to stimulate business growth. At H.B. Fuller, we reinvest more than 80 percent of our earnings.

H.R. Fuller has an abiding commitment to assist the communities in which we are located. We recognize that stability is fostered, growth encouraged and faith and confidence instilled not only by economic development, but by reinvesting profits back into those communities into projects of social importance.

This philosophy has led us at H.B. Fuller to develop an extensive program of community affairs in Minnesota and throughout the United States.

I am proud to announce that H.B. Fuller will make a similar commitment in the Central American communities where we are located. We will take 2 percent of our Central American generated pretax profits for community affairs projects. This amount will increase to 5 percent over the next several years.

The United States government, private enterprise, Central Americans and nations in the Americas all have a stake in each other's future. We have a great opportunity here in Central America, but the opportunities are frought with danger. Let us start working together so today's opportunities become tomorrow's realities.

REMARKS OF SENATOR DAVE DURENBERGER TO WESTMINSTER CHURCH

As all of us here have found out, one of the hazards of involving yourself in the debate over Central America is that opinions vary and emotions run high. For instance, all throughout last year's political campaign, I remained essentially behind the administration's policy. The result was that several hundred uninvited guests showed up at my birthday party in 1982 to shout that I was somehow indistinguishable from Roberto D'Aubuisson. Later, after the election, I wrote a fairly harsh letter to the President, criticizing his policy and his rhetoric. The result was that nobody showed up at my birthday party in 1983. As they say, I'm not getting older, I'm just getting better.

The point here is to illustrate that it's hard to stay on top of the situation. Partly, that's because so few North Americans have any experience in the region. Partly, it's because now that there's a sudden surge of interest, it's easy to fall into the trap of getting information from only one source or through only one prism. I'm a little amused by the huge flow of Congressmen on the two-day, "now I'm an expert" trips down what I call the "liberation theology trail."

Another source of confusion is that the region is not static. Every time we think we understand it, something changes. For instance, a cabinet-level Costa Rican official told me last week: "You know that we provided assistance to the anti-Somoza forces for many years. We detested Somoza. But we did not fear him. Now, we detest the Sandinistas and we fear them as well."

There are some constants in Central America, to be sure.

Far too many of the nations in the region have suffered from years of institutionalized squalor and institutionalized violence. Too many times, we've been partly to blame. There is no better example of this than our reliance on the Monroe Doctrine and several regiments of Marines to install the Somoza family in Nicaragua.

Our approach to Central America has for too long been characterized by alternating cycles of panic and neglect. The result is that our policy is often hasty, reactive, and simplistic. Every few years, an ongoing or potential crisis of some kind attracts our attention momentarily, and we respond by either sending the Marines or by rushing in with ambitious plans for economic development. The attention, however, is typically short-lived and the ensuing cycle of neglect feeds the crises which produce the next cycle of panic.

We can't afford this kind of stop-start policy. We must not continue the errors of the past because we won't look to the reality of the past and present or the potential to shape the future with a positive and long-term policy. But it's not easy.

VIEWPOINTS ABOUT CENTRAL AMERICA

There is an ironic consonance of views among many of the people who otherwise violently disagree about U.S. policy in Central America. It is shaped by a tacit belief that we should look at Central America—if at all—only in geopolitical terms. A surprising number of people fall into that mental trap.

Let's begin with a commonly expressed view: that somehow Central America just isn't worth all the fuss. We have heard President Reagan tell us that Central America and the Caribbean Basin are vital because they could serve as a naval chokepoint, strangling our access to Europe.

We often hear the region spoken of in vivid terms: "A dagger pointing north and south," or "a vital land bridge between two continents."

Regardless of how the metaphors are cast, a large number of Americans share a belief that Central America is only instrumentally important, not intrinsically important. In other words, many people believe that Central America is of concern only because it might spawn floods of refugees—"feet people," as the President calls them—or it might be used as a staging area for military and paramilitary activities. At bottom, therefore, many people look upon the region as simply a problem to be managed or solved.

There is by no means any common view on how to do this. In fact, people who knowingly or unknowingly share the geopolitical view can and do strongly disagree over such major policy questions as economic versus military assistance. Let us not forget that the Alliance for Progress, which was unveiled with such great fanfare by the Kennedy Administration, was fundamentally justified to the public in geopolitical terms. It was seen as a way to keep the Russians out of our hemisphere. Like the Reagan Administration, the Kennedy Administration viewed the Third World in instrumental rather than intrinsic terms, and it tried to buy off problems before they became too large.

Economic aid is humane and needed, so I don't want to leave you with the impression that I oppose it. By the same token, there are times when military assistance may be called for in a given country at a given time. Once again, however, we've heard the arguments chiefly offered in geopolitical terms: If we can't buy them off, let's kill them off.

In all events, however, our policy premises are shaped far too frequently by a viewpoint which holds that the only relevant factor is the geopolitical. When we adopt this viewpoint, we resort to elementary map-reading. The result is frequent neglect and occasional panic. If the map seems clean, we ignore the region. If it seems cluttered, we panic. Worse, by reading the map, we often think in map-maker's colors. Central America is colored yellow on the four-dollar world map which I picked up at a local bookstore ten years ago, before my first visit there. That suggests that every nation in the region is the same. They aren't.

CENTRAL AMERICAN REALITIES

Each society is quite different. Guatemala is little more than a military dictatorship supported by a few powerful people, and repression is increasingly taking the form of atrocities against the large Indian population. Costa Rica on the other hand, is a vibrant democracy in the literal sense of the word, with free and representative elections, a highly advanced welfare system, a social democratic government, 90 percent literacy, and a commitment to peace sufficient to have prompted a Nobel Laureate in medicine to nominate the entire country for the Nobel Peace Prize. In a region too often characterized by military repression, Costa Rica has no army at all, having dismantled it in 1949.

In between these two extremes, we find the three remaining countries. Honduras is a troubled land which is slowly and painfully moving toward greater freedom. If it can avoid being sucked into the spiral of civil insurgency and regional violence, the Hondurans have a good chance.

El Salvador is a country desperately trying to do in a few years what it should have done over a half a century: Legitimize the government, redistribute income, remove the last vestiges of the oligarchy, and develop a constitution. It is challenged by its own bitter history, by local figures who violently resist the tide of change, by insurgents who are bent on destroying the economy in order to topple the government, and by Nicaraguan policy.

Finally, Nicaragua itself faces a profound choice. It succeeded in ridding itself of a despicable dictatorship. It faces awesome economic problems, many of which date back for decades. The governing junta came to power with widespread support. But Nicaragua now seems bent on a course which aims simply to consolidate the rule of a hard-line Marxist minority within the Sandinista movement, effectively threatening to replace one dictatorship with another.

Why should we care about these kinds of realities? If we accept that the geopolitical view is insufficient, and if we are unwilling to argue that as Managua goes, so goes San Antonio, Austin and Dallas, why should we care at all? Let me briefly touch on a few reasons.

First, whether we like it or not, we are inextricably involved in Central America, partly because of our lamentable history and partly as well because Cental America wants us to be involved. When people in the region object to our policy, they want a change, but not a total abrogation of our role.

Why should people in Central America want us to remain involved in their region? First, many of them have a genuine admiration for what is best in our country: our form of government, our scientific and technological skills, our prosperity, our health, social services and educational system. Second, Central America faces a horrifying economic crisis which is both long-term and structural, and which will require patience, commitment, and investment by the United States. If we ignore Central America, we consign 20 million people to perpetual poverty. They know that, even if we don't. So, like it or not, we are involved in Central America, and will continue to be, simply because Central America looks to us.

A second reality relates to the first. We often forget that ours was the first revolutionary country on earth. An astonishing number of people in this century have taken their inspiration from our own Declaration of Independence, and not all of them have been Jeffersonian democrats.

I believe that we in this country have an inescapable heritage of democracy and a mission of reform which derive from our most fundamental believes as a people. Just as this Church and my own have seen the message of Christianity in universal terms, so too I believe that this country has a duty to see democracy, human rights, and prosperity in universal terms. Obviously, that does not mean that we should guide every nation on earth toward a carbon copy of our own political system. But democracy is an ideal, just as religion is; it is a pathway more than a structure, and we in this country can and should light the way.

Third, remember that we are increasingly interdependent with the rest of the world. One acre in four of our farmland goes to exports, and the bulk of that export goes to the Third World. Much of what we consume comes from the Third World as well. We are linked economically with Central America, and that cuts both ways: we are their market as much as they are ours. As they prosper, so too we shall prosper.

So the point I want to make is that it is narrow and foolish to look at Central America simply in map-maker's terms. There is far more to the region than simply some metaphor about daggers and land bridges. It is a vibrant place, and one which should command our attention, not our apathy; our persistence, not our panic. It merits a positive and long-term policy, rather than a precipitate application of blunt instruments or a rush to judgment. Like any complex area, it raises quandaries.

THE NEED FOR NEW INFORMATION

If we are to begin to grasp our way toward a new and affirmative policy, we must begin to recognize some of the dilemmas we face. In many instances, those dilemmas are of our own making. There is no better illustration of this than in the area of informaton.

I noted at the outset of this speech that one constant in Central America has been that too many political systems are characterized by maldistribution, repression, and personal aggrandizement. In fact, that image has become something of a cliche here in the United States. Mention Central America to most people, and the likely response will be "banana republic." Obviously, there's a lot more to the area than that, and many informed Americans know better. But many of the people who daily write to me have equally one-sided views of current reality, even if those views are a little more advanced than before.

How many of us in this country, for instance, are aware of the massive refugee flow from Nicaragua into Costa Rica? Costa Rican authorities now estimate that some 200,000 illegal aliens—many of them Nicaraguan—live in Cost Rica. In fact, the Costa Rican government has quarantined the northern region because of the public health threat posed by Nicaraguan and Miskito refugees who bring with them malaria and dengue.

You are unlikely to learn about this by watching the news. Certainly the Sandinistas don't boast of it. A major television network recently wanted to investigate a rumor that Costa Rica was wasting U.S. refugee funds, and it sent a crew to the country. When it was unable to prove waste, it went home, leaving uncovered the story of the increasing refugee flow.

Let me mention one other illustration which flies in the face of the current imagery. Before I left on this last trip, I was advised to visit Archbishop Roman Arrieta, who chairs the Central American Secretariat of Catholic Bishops. I was told that Bishop Arrieta, who was somewhat fondly known as the "Red Bishop" when he supported anti-Somoza forces some years ago, was very critical of the U.S. In fact, over the course of 45 minutes at his home, the Archbishop repeatedly stressed that under current circumstances the United States must remain in the region, doing what it is doing. He spoke in gentle but critical terms of his "beloved brethren" in this country who flirt with "liberation theology." He said that we must never forget that Marxists will capitalize on the legitimate grievances of people, and that they will use religion as a "scaffolding" to assist in the creation of a new society. "But," he cautioned me, "remember that after a building is erected, the scaffolding is destroyed. This is what I fear in Nicaragua."

CURRENT POLICIES IN CENTRAL AMERICA

I've stressed the need for new and better viewpoints and information because I think our policy is potentially very troublesome. That doesn't mean I share all the views of the critics. Quite the contrary, I am convinced that just as we must avoid dwelling on the geopolitical approach which looks to military threats everywhere, so too we must reject the romantic viewpoint which leads people to believe that so long as any regime brings health workers and teachers to the country it must be considered good. Naivete is not an acceptable substitute for cynicism. But having said that, let me briefly touch on our current policies and close by mentioning my principal concern.

At bottom, the Administration is pursuing a policy which is shaped by four premises. First, they continue to see Central America in terms of East-West confrontation over spheres of influence. Second, they look upon Central America as a region, often to the detriment of policies fine-tuned to each of the countries. Third, they increasingly tend to see the principal struggle as military, rather than as a political one in which force would be the last option, not the first. Finally, they are seeking a policy which is as painless as possible to us in this country.

The net effect, if these are carried to their logical conclusion, will be to feed the status quo at a time when it needs changing. Central America has been confronting a nascent revolution for years, and if we try to stand in its way we will get crushed. What we can and should do is to ensure that the revolution is not stolen by Marxist-Leninists.

In El Salvador, for instance, we seem increasingly to be talking in terms of a battlefield victory rather than in terms of letting the best of the FMLN rejoin the mainstream while isolating the worst of the insurgents in the hills. A guerrilla force which is scattered, isolated, and cut off from the population is at worst an irritant, not a security threat. As we know from experience, it is possible to achieve that through a judicious combination of locally-based security coming from the people themselves and small-unit tactics which aim simply to keep the guerrillas off balance. Instead, we are looking at battalion-sized sweeps, large battles, and little a progress in terms of letting the population—a population which bitterly opposes insurgent violence—get a stake in their own society.

There's no reason why the government can't talk while it does the necessary job of fighting to protect itself, but negotiations have been ruled out with a lot of rhetoric about "power-sharing." There's no excuse for continuing to look upon the armed forces, the national guard, or local civil defense as the private preserve of a few landowners rather than as a supplement to a genuinely national militia. But so long as we look upon the struggle in El Salvador as one in which large armies must confront each other over geopolitical stakes—stakes which are apparently seen as open-ended and absolute—our policy will take on more and more military overtones. We must never forget that an armed struggle is ultimately a dispute over political goals. If we lose sight of the essentially political nature of the conflict, we will simply feed violence for the sale of violence.

In Guatemala, we are now considering the resumption of military assistance to a regime which simply does not merit it. We have allowed the Guatemalan government to convince us that if they are well armed, they can protect us from a common threat. In fact, the Guatemalan government makes war on its own people more than on Nicaraguan communists. In doing this, it only increases the likelihood that Guatemala will some day fall, and fall violently. Frankly, as of today, U.S. policy in Guatemala is where Jimmy Carter's was in Nicaragua in 1978—looking for answers.

In Honduras, we are unfortunately viewing the country more as a convenient staging area than a society which faces its own problems. Certainly, Honduras should not be expected to tolerate cross-border incursions by Nicaraguan military forces or Sandinista agents carrying arms into El Salvador. So there is obviously a necessary security dimension to our relations with Honduras. But there is much more as well, and I have yet to hear anybody describe how we can help the people of Honduras continue their move closer to democracy and prosperity.

Finally, in Nicaragua, we have made the fundamental mistake of not letting the Sandinistas die on the vine. The Borges and Ortegas and D'Escotos of the world put on a grand show. But they lack much in the way of genuine popular support. They face the problem of consolidating their power once they have stolen a revolution. Inevitably, we seem to assist them by giving them the pretext to posture as nationalists who are resisting outside pressure. Left to their own devices, the Sandinistas would have become more and more at odds with the people of Nicaragua as they set about muzzling the press, intimidating the Church, and mismanaging the economy. The refugee flow shows how little support they have.

Thus far, I have touched on the first three points I mentioned: East-West rhetoric, regional rather than fine-tuned policies, and over-reliance on armed forces. The final point I want to make is that our government is making the fundamental mistake of trying to pursue a potentially costly policy while reassuring us that it will be painless. The American people are rightly concerned, for they recognize the contradiction.

When any one viewpoint becomes the exclusive way we approach policy, we risk dealing in rigid and absolute terms. In the case of current policy, we have over-stressed the geopolitical framework to the point where the government now speaks in the most dire terms of a possible setback. In other words, we have escalated the stakes. But at the same time, remembering the presumed lessons of Vietnam the President has emphasized that we won't send troops. It is simply contradictory to tell us that we face a huge threat but then reassure us we won't fight. It is more than contradictory, however. It is haunting, for that was the essence of our policy in Vietnam, and people remember. Like President Kennedy, President Reagan wants to galvanize us but to reassure us at the same time. In this lies folly.

If we learned one thing from our experience in Vietnam, it is that our policy collapsed because we were unwilling to win but unwilling to lose. We repeatedly heard American presidents say that we would not fight a major land war in Asia while also stressing that we could not afford to lose Vietnam—particularly because of its purported geopolitical value. The result was the policy of incrementalism which seemed to suck us in deeper and deeper while we became increasingly confused over goals. Two and one half million young Americans were sent to Vietnam for reasons that were never fully explained to them. The Minnesota salute to Vietnam veterans which is going on today is a poignant reminder of those times and those policies. Only now—as they approach troubled middle-age—are the veterans beginning to understand.

What caused that policy? Nothing more than a rigid and artificial view of reality and self-imposed dilemma. We face that possibility once again today. But let us not forget that we could face the same kind of disaster if we were to adopt any one-dimensional view of reality. A romantic view is just as dangerous in this regard as a geopolitical one. American policy is not the only source of potential hazard in Central America. Just ask any Costa Rican. We can neither impose our own solution nor abandon the region in a naive faith that things will somehow work out. We must instead begin a quest for a positive, affirmative and progressive policy which accounts for the complexity of the region, the fact that our heros of the moment often have clay feet, and the reality that problems will change as the region changes. You and I must be part of that quest.●

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there may very well be other Senators who wish to speak today. However, I would like to make arrangements for the session of the Senate tomorrow. I have consulted with the minority leader, who is on the floor, and I now make the following request.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business until 10 a.m., in which Senators may speak for not more than 1 minute each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS TOMORROW FROM 12 NOON TO 2 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, between the hours of 12 and 2 p.m., the Senate stand in recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the hour of 10 a.m. tomorrow, the Senate turn to the consideration of H.R. 3913, Calendar Order No. 418 appropriations for the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education; and I further ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that no call for the regular order will serve to displace this item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object. Of course, in not objecting, I am giving up what could be an opportunity for me to press the vote on the Watt amendment. But, in this instance, I am going to cooperate with the majority leader and not object to the order.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am most grateful to the minority leader. I detect in the twinkle of his eye and the tone of his voice that he may not have abandoned that thought altogether, but simply for this measure. But, in any event, I am grateful.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I thank all Senators, and I especially thank the minority leader.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 9:30 A.M.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess in accordance with the previous order.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 5:13 p.m., recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, October 4, 1983, at 9:30 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate October 3, 1983:

COMMUNICATIONS SATELLITE CORPORATION

Neal B. Freeman, of Virginia, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Communications Satellite Corporation until the date of the annual meeting of the Corporation in 1985, vice Justin Dart, resigned.

Engineering duty officer

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, October 3, 1983

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT).

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God, You have promised that You will judge the peoples with equity and guide the nations of the Earth. We respond with joy that Your will may be known in the councils of government and in the hearts of all who believe. Protect, counsel, and enable all who strive to be peacemakers and healers of division to be witnesses to Your kingdom of righteousness, where pain and hurt are no more and where love is the only way. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

On July 29, 1983:

H.J. Res. 258. Joint resolution designating August 3, 1983, as "National Paralyzed Veterans Recognition Day."

On July 30, 1983:

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is the day for the call of the Consent Calendar. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

AUTHORIZING SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR TO CONVEY CERTAIN LANDS IN LANE COUNTY, OREG.

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 1062) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey, without consideration, certain lands in Lane County, Oreg.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

H.R. 1062

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, the Secretary of the Interior may convey, without consideration, to any person claiming to have been deprived of title to any portion of real property in Lane County, Oregon, as a result of the Bureau of Land Management survey entitled "Resurvey and Subdivision of Section 31, Township 21 South, Range 1 West", dated June 27, 1957, all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to such portion of real property if application therefor, accompanied by such proof of title, description of land, and other information, as the Secretary of the Interior may require, is received by such Secretary within five years after the date of enactment of this Act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 3, strike "June 27, 1957" and insert in lieu thereof "November 12, 1959".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HAROLD L. RUNNELS FEDERAL BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 3308) to designate the Federal Building in Las Cruces, N. Mex., as the "Harold L. Runnels Federal Building."

□ This symbol represents the time of day during the House proceedings, e.g., □ 1407 is 2:07 p.m.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 3308

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the building located at 200 Grigg Street, Las Cruces, New Mexico, known at the Federal Building, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Harold L. Runnels Federal Building". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to that building shall be deemed to be a reference to the "Harold L. Runnels Federal Building".

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3308, a bill to designate the Federal Building in Las Cruces, N. Mex., as the Harold L. Runnels Federal Building. Harold L. Runnels was born in Dallas, Tex., on March 17, 1924. He attended the public schools in Dallas, Tex., and was a graduate of Cameron State Agricultural College in Lawton, Okla. During World War II, he enlisted in the U.S. Air Force Reserve.

Congressman Runnels began his political career in 1960 when he was elected to the New Mexico Senate and served with distinction in that body until 1970. He was elected to the 92d Congress on November 3, 1970, and was reelected to each succeeding Congress until his untimely death in August of 1980. During his tenure in the U.S. House of Representatives, Congressman Runnels was held in high esteem by his colleagues. His marks of leadership remain indelibly etched on numerous laws affecting all Americans across the Nation. Harold Runnels' fairness and objectivity were recognized and admired on both sides of the aisle and he earned additional respect for his solid reputation as an energetic guardian of the interests of the American taxpayer.

In view of his outstanding record of public service, it is most fitting and appropriate to name the Federal building in Las Cruces, N. Mex., as the Harlod L. Runnels Federal Building.

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3308, a bill to designate the Federal building in Las Cruces, N. Mex., as the Harold L. Runnels Federal Building.

Mr. Speaker, Harold Runnels served with distinction as the Congressman from New Mexico's Second District for 10 years until his untimely death in August 1980. I was pleased to have the privilege of serving with him in this body. Congressman Runnels was a man who had a conscientious concern for his fellow human beings. He was a man of compassion and courage. Congressman Runnels cared about the people he served and effectively represented their interests, and the interests of the country.

It is a fitting tribute that the Federal building in Las Cruces be named in his honor as the Harold L. Runnels Federal Building.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works and Transportation be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 1724) to designate the Federal Building in Las Cruces, N. Mex., as the "Harold L. Runnels Federal Building," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 1724

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the building located at 200 East Griggs Street, Las Cruces, New Mexico, known as the Federal Building, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Harold L. Runnels Federal Building". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to that building shall be deemed to be a reference to the "Harold L. Runnels Federal Building".

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, S. 1724 is identical to H.R. 3308, just passed by the House, which designates the Federal building in Las Cruces, N. Mex., as the "Harold L. Runnels Federal Buildings."

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 3308) was laid on the table.

EDWIN D. ESHLEMAN POST OFFICE BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 3379) to name a U.S. post office in the vicinity of Landcaster, Pa., the Edwin D. Eshleman Post Office.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows.

H.R. 3379

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States Post Office Building located at 1400 Harrisburg Pike in the vicinity of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Edwin D. Eshleman Post Office". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such building shall be held to be a reference to the "Edwin D. Eshleman Post Office".

With the following committee amendments:

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3379, a bill to name a U.S. post office in the vicinity of Lancaster, Pa., the Edwin D. Eshleman Post Office. Edwin D. Eshleman was born in Lancaster county, Pa., on December 4, 1920. He graduated from Franklin and Marshall College with a degree in political science and later enrolled in graduate school at Temple University. During World War II, Edwin Eshleman attended and was graduated from the U.S. Coast Guard's Officer Candidate School and later served 18 months of service overseas, for which he won commendation for conduct in action as a lieutenant aboard a landing ship.

Edwin Eshleman's early achievements seemed to destine him to a life of public service. After serving as a teacher in the public schools for several years following the war, he directed the Pennsylvania Bureau of County Audits. Shortly thereafter he became an executive assistant in the Pennsylvania Department of Treasury.

In 1955, Edwin Eshleman began what would become a long and distinguished legislative career when he won the first of six consecutive elections to the Pennsylvania State Assembly. During his tenure in the Pennsylvania General Assembly, he rose to positions of prominence, first as chairman of the house education committee, and second, as the assistant Republican leader. Later as majority whip, he was able to use his accumulated expertise to shape and direct Pennsylvania's education programs.

Edwin Eshleman was elected to the 90th Congress on November 8, 1966, and was reelected to the five succeeding Congresses. During his tenure in the U.S. House of Representatives, he built upon his record on education issues by securing an assignment on the Education and Labor Committee. He rose to become the top Republican on the Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, and later became the ranking Republican on the Select Education Subcommittee. From those important positions in the House, Congressman Eshleman became a recognized national spokesman on education issues, a noted author, and an always quotable source of information for the national media.

Since his retirement from the House of Representatives in 1975, Congressman Eshleman has lived in Lancaster County and remains active in civic affairs.

As a gifted educator, an active community servant, an effective State legislator, and a U.S. Congressman, Mr. Eshleman has been a dominant force in the political and social life of the Lancaster County community for decades. Naming the U.S. post office building in the vicinity of Lancaster, Pa., in honor of Edwin D. Eshleman would bring well-deserved recognition to a former Member of this body who has contributed a lifetime of outstanding service at the local, State, and Federal level.

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3379, a bill to name a U.S. post office in the vicinity of Lancaster, Pa., the Edwin D. Eshleman Post Office.

Mr. Speaker, Congressman Edwin Eshleman served with distinction in this body from 1966 until his retirement in 1975. During his tenure in the House, he served as ranking minority member on the House Education and Labor Subcommittee on postsecondary education, and later became the ranking Republican on the Select Education Subcommittee. Congressman Eshleman became a recognized national spokesman on education issues. He served his constituents and the Nation with a sense of integrity and commitment.

To pay tribute to Congressman Eshleman by naming the U.S. post office building in Lancaster, Pa. in his honor is most appropriate.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: A bill to name a U.S. post office building in the vicinity of Lancaster, Pa., the Edwin D. Eshleman Post Office Building.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN WELD PECK FEDERAL BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 3576) to designate a Federal building in Cincinnati, Ohio, as the John Weld Peck Federal Building.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal building located at 550 Main Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, shall hereafter be named and designated as the "John Weld Peck Federal Building". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such building shall be held to be a reference to John Weld Peck Building.

With the following committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3576, a bill to designate a Federal building in Cincinnati, Ohio, as the "John Weld Peck Federal Building." Judge John W. Peck was born and reared in Wyoming, a suburb of Cincinnati, Ohio. He attended the elementary and high schools of the public system. He received his BA degree from Miami University in Oxford, Ohio, and received his Bachelor of Laws from the University of Cincinnati in 1938. He holds three honorary doctors degrees: one from the University of Miami, one from the University of Cincinnati, and one from the Salmon P. Chase Law School.

Judge Peck is a former soldier in the U.S. Army, serving in the European theater as a captain for 3 years during World War II. He has served as tax commissioner for the State of Ohio. He is a walnut tree farmer. He is an educator. Judge John Peck has taught continuing legal education, he has taught law at the University of Cincinnati and Chase Law School.

Before he ascended to the bench, John Peck was a lawyer with the law firm of Peck, Shaffer, & Williams where he practiced until 1947 when he became executive assistant to Governor Frank J. Lausche. Judge Peck is responsible for the existence of the Cincinnati chapter of the Federal Bar Association. He serves as chairman of the board of directors of the bar.

Judge Peck's career on the bench began in 1953 when he became a trial judge in the Common Pleas Court of Hamilton County, Ohio. He was a justice on the Ohio Supreme Court from 1958 to 1961. President John F. Kennedy appointed Judge Peck as trial judge in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Ohio in 1961. For the last 18 years, since his appointment by President Lyndon Johnson in 1965, he has been a judge for the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. Although he has elected to become a senior judge for the circuit, Judge Peck has not retired and continues to carry a full caseload. He is an emergency judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals. Judge Peck also served on a special commission to revamp the criminal code, by appointment from former Chief Justice Earl Warren.

Naming the Federal building in Cincinnati, Ohio, as the "John Weld Peck Federal Building" is most fitting and appropriate in view of his distinguished career and tremendous contributions to the Federal system.

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3576, a bill to designate a Federal building in Cincinnati, Ohio, as the "John Weld Peck Federal Building."

Mr. Speaker, Judge Peck's career on the bench began in 1953 and, although he has now taken the status of a senior judge, he continues to carry a full caseload for the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. He is well known for his professionalism and a man who meets the highest standards.

In view of his distinguished career with the judicial system, it is fitting to name the building in his honor as the "John Weld Peck Federal Building."●

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you and speak in support of H.R. 3576, designating the Federal building in Cincinnati, Ohio, as the John Weld Peck Federal Building. I certainly want to recognize the fine efforts of my friend and colleague, BOB YOUNG, in bringing this bill so quickly to the floor.

John Weld Peck has been very important to Cincinnati and the Federal court system, and I feel privileged to have introduced legislation naming the Federal building in Cincinnati in his honor. Judge Peck is one of the best known and eminent jurist ever produced by Cincinnati and the entire State of Ohio. As Senior Circuit Judge for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, he has earned a reputation as one the Nation's great judges. He is one of the only judges who has ever sat on both the trial and appellate courts of the State and Federal system.

It is a tremendous honor for a building to be named after a living person. As you and I know, the naming of buildings usually takes place after the subjects have departed this life, but I must say that I have long been in favor of flowers for the living.

I consider my longtime friend and colleague, John Peck, among the great men of my lifetime. He possesses greatness of spirit, greatness of vision, greatness of will to make this a better world than he found it. His accomplishments and record speak for themselves.

Judge Peck's judicial experience knows no bounds. His career on the bench began in 1953 when he became a trial judge in our Common Please Court of Hamilton County, Ohio. He was a justice on the Ohio Supreme Court from 1958 to 1961. President John F. Kennedy appointed Judge Peck as trial judge in the U.S. District Court for the District of Ohio in 1961. For the last 18 years, since his appointent by President Johnson in 1965, he has been a judge for the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. Although he has elected to become a senior judge for the circuit, Judge Peck has by no means retired and continues to carry a full caseload. He is an emergency judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals, which is a situation where he is a trouble-shooter in complicated oil-related litigation. Judge Peck also served on a special commission to revamp the criminal code, by appointment from former Chief Justice Earl Warren.

Before he ascended to the bench, John Peck was a lawyer and a good one, he loved his profession. He has been in the mainstream of activity of the legal profession in Cincinnati for more than 40 years. He is responsible for the existence of the Cincinnati chapter of the Federal Bar Association, and serves as chairman of the Board of Directors of the bar. He is their benefactor, their partol saint.

Judge John W. Peck is a home-town product, born and reared in Wyoming, Ohio, a suburb of Cincinnati. He is also a man of all seasons. He is not just a judge who has held forth in four of five different courts. He is a scholar, besides his law degree Judge Peck holds three honorary doctors degrees. His is a former soldier in the U.S. Army, serving in the European theater as a captain for 3 years during World War II. He has served as tax commissioner for the State of Ohio. He is a walnut tree farmer. He is an educator. Judge John Peck has taught continuing legal education, he has taught law at the University of Cincinnati and Chase Law School. He takes part in the activities of the Cincinnati community and is considered a pillar of the community. He is truly a man of many parts.

Perhaps the thing that I want to say most about him, as a person, is his concern for and his warm relationships with other people. I have become warmly familiar with how many people he knows, how many people in and out of court he has helped, how many people look on him as an adviser and a friend. I know of none who have deserved to be honored in their hometowns as John Peck, none who more deserve to have a building named in their honor.

Judge John Weld Peck is truly one of our Nation's great judges. He's been a hard working judge who has written distinguished opinions, the expert on practice and procedure in Cincinnati. Judge Peck is a distinguished and outstanding man who fully meets the highest standards and we would be well served to preserve his image for future generations. There could be no more fitting way to recognize Judge John Peck's tremendous contributions to the Federal system, and especially to Cincinnati, than the naming of the Cincinnati Federal building in his honor.

I regard it a very special honor to have the opportunity to take part in a tribute to Judge Peck by naming the Federal building in Cincinnati, Ohio, as the John Weld Peck Federal Building. I thank you for your favorable consideration of this piece of legislation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JULIETTE GORDON LOW FEDERAL BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 1551) to name the Federal building to be constructed in Savannah, Ga., as the Juliette Gordon Low Federal Building.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

COLONEL HOMER GARRISON, JR. FEDERAL BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 1748) to name the building to be constructed in Lufkin, Tex., and leased to the United States as the Colonel Homer Garrison, Jr. Federal Building.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the building to be constructed at the intersection of North First Street and Rhodes Avenue, Lufkin, Texas, and leased to the United States shall hereafter be named and designated as the "Colonel Homer Garrison, Jr. Federal Building". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such building shall be held to be a reference to the "Colonel Homer Garrison, Jr. Federal Building".

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 1748, a bill to name the building to be constructed in Lufkin, Tex., and leased to the United States as the "Colonel Homer Garrison, Jr. Federal Building." Col. Homer Garrision, Jr. was born in Anderson County, Tex., in 1901. His family later moved to Lufkin, in Angelina County. It was here, while still a teenager, that he began his law enforcement career as a deputy sheriff. He served in that capacity until 1929, when he became a license and weight inspector for the Texas Highway Department. He joined the Texas Highway Patrol when it was created in 1930 and was made captain.

After the Texas Highway Patrol and the Texas Rangers merged to become the Texas Department of Public Safety, Homer Garrison, Jr. was named assistant director of the department.

In 1938, Colonel Garrison was made director of the Texas Department of Public Safety and chief of the Texas Rangers. Under his leadership the department grew from a modest agency to over 1,000 patrolmen, 62 Texas Rangers, and several other specialty law enforcement organizations, including a group commissioned as special rangers.

Colonel Garrison died on May 7, 1968, at 66 years of age. Shortly thereafter, the Texas Senate adopted a resolution paying tribute to him, stating that "he exerted greater influence on the direction of law enforcement than any other man in the Lone Star State.

In view of his outstanding service, it is most fitting to name the building being constructed in Lufkin, Tex., and leased to the United States as the "Colonel Homer Garrison, Jr. Federal Building."

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 1748, a bill to name the building to be constructed in Lufkin, Tex., as the "Colonel Homer Garrison, Jr. Federal Building."

Mr. Speaker, Col. Homer Garrison, Jr., dedicated his entire life to a career in law enforcement in Lufkin, Tex. During his career, he attained the position of chief of the Texas Rangers. To name the Federal building in his honor will enshrine the memory of an American instrumental in upholding our system of law and order throughout the United States.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHARLES A. HALLECK FEDERAL BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 3090) to designate the Federal building at Fourth and Ferry Streets, Lafayette, Ind., as the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal Building at 4th and Ferry Streets, Lafayette, Indiana, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building". Any reference in any law, map, regulation, document, record, or any other paper of the United States to such building shall be deemed to be a reference to the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building".

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3090, a bill to designate the Federal building at Fourth and Ferry Streets, Lafayette, Ind., as the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building." Charles A. Halleck was one of the most distinguished Members of the House of Representatives during the 20th century. For 34 years, Charles Halleck served the people of Lafayette, Ind. and surrounding counties as their Congressman.

Born on August 22, 1900, in Jasper County, Ind., he attended the public schools in Rensselaer, Ind. After serving in the U.S. infantry in World War I, Charles Halleck enrolled at Indiana University. He received his B.A. degree, Phi Beta Kappa, in 1922, and his law degree in 1924. Subsequently, he was elected prosecuting attorney for Jasper and Newton Counties and served in that capacity for five 2-year terms, from 1925 to 1935.

Charles Halleck was elected to the 74th Congress in 1935 and was reelected to each succeeding Congress until his retirement at the end of the 90th Congress. During his tenure in the U.S. House of Representatives, he was a member of the Rules Committee and the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. He served as chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee from 1943 to 1946. During the 80th Congress, Charles Halleck ascended to the role of majority leader of the House. In 1955, Congressman Halleck was designated assistant minority leader of the House. He became majority leader of the House again in the 83d Congress. In 1958, he was elected minority leader of the House and in that capacity he reorganized the House Republican Policy Committee.

Congressman Halleck was an example of a dedicated public servant and party leader. He was held in high esteem by his colleagues on both sides of the aisle. During his tenure in the House, Charles Halleck had great respect for the institution and gave highest priority to preserving our Nation's interests, values, and way of life.

Naming the Federal Building in Lafayette, Ind., the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building" will pay tribute to a man who represented his Indiana constituents and all Americans with unswerving dedication and historic success.

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3090, a bill to designate the Federal building at Fourth and Ferry Streets, Lafayette, Ind., as the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building."

Mr. Speaker, Congressman Charles A. Halleck served with distinction in this body for 33 years. He was elected to the 74th Congress in 1935 and reelected to each succeeding Congress until his retirement at the end of the 90th Congress. A Republican, during his tenure in the House, he served as both majority and minority leader. Charles Halleck was a master political tactician and held in high esteem by his colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. Speaker, honoring Charles Halleck, an exceptional legislator, by naming the Federal building at Fourth and Perry Streets, Lafayette, Ind., as the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building" is most fitting and appropriate.●

● Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, it is with pride that I rise to support H.R. 3090, a bill to designate the Federal building at Fourth and Ferry Streets in Lafayette, Ind., as the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building."

Charles A. Halleck is remembered in the State of Indiana as being a lifelong resident of Rensselaer and in serving the people of Layfette and the surrounding communities. He was first elected to public office as a prosecuting attorney in 1925. It was in 1935 that he was first elected to the House of Representatives in a special election. He served in Congress for over 33 years, representing the people of the Second District of Indiana. He was designated the House majority leader for the 80th and 83d Congresses, and as the House minority leader for the 86th, 87th, and 88th Congresses.

The years during which Charles Halleck served in Congress were filled with many historical events of note. He was a leading force in getting passed the Marshall plan for the recovery of Europe after World War II, and in applying the Truman Doctrine to Greece in order to contain the spread of communism. He was able to guide the passage of civil rights legislation in 1957 and again in 1964. There are many more examples of his leadership abilities and of the respect the people gave him during his years in Congress. Perhaps the biggest highlights of his political career were the Presidential nominations he made at two Republican national conventions, once in behalf of Wendell Willkie and again in behalf of Dwight Eisenhower.

In 1968, Charles Halleck retired after serving 17 terms in Congress. In his parting address, he noted that the Nation was in troubled times. A feeling of unrest and civil disturbance was surrounding the country. However, he also expressed his conviction that the public believed Congress to be an honorable institution. The fact that the people he represented elected him time and time again is a testimony of their faith in him. And now today, in naming this building for him, we pay tribute to his years of service. The Charles A. Halleck Federal Building will always remind the people of Indiana and the Nation as a whole of the work he has done for us all.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works and Transportation be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 1465) to designate the Federal building at Fourth and Ferry Streets, Lafayette, Ind., as the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal Building at Fourth and Ferry Streets, Lafayette, Indiana, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building". Any reference in any law, map, regulation, document, record, or any other paper of the United States to such building shall be deemed to be a reference to the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building".

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 3090) was laid on the table.

GEORGE W. WHITEHURST FEDERAL COURT BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 3303) to designate the Federal Building in Fort Myers, Fla., as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 3303

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the building located at 2301 First Street, Fort Myers, Florida, known as the Federal Building, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building". Any reference in a law, map regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to that building shall be deemed to be a reference to the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building".

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3303, a bill to designate the Federal Building in Fort Myers, Fla., as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building". George W. Whitehurst was born in Wauchula, Fla., in 1891. He became an attorney in 1915 and was elected county judge of DeSoto County 2 years later, for the term commencing on January 1, 1917. In 1919, his performance as county judge earned him appointment by the Governor as the first circuit judge of the 12th circuit, of which Lee County, Fla., was then a part.

Judge Whitehurst became a resident of Fort Myers shortly thereafter, in 1923, and was a pillar of his community from that time until his death over half a century later in 1974.

President Harry Truman appointed Judge Whitehurst to a Federal judgeship in 1950. In 1959, he became chief judge of the Southern District of Florida and served with distinction in that capacity until his 70th birthday in 1961.

Upon his retirement, Judge Whitehurst had served as a judge of either the State or Federal courts for a period of 54 years, which is considered one of the longest judicial careers in the State of Florida.

Naming the Federal Building in Fort Myers, Fla., as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building" is most fitting and appropriate in view of his half century of exemplary service to the ideals of truth, justice, and integrity.

● Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, I appear today to speak on behalf of my bill, H.R. 3303, which would designate the Federal building in Fort Myers, Fla., as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building."

Judge Whitehurst was a well-respected jurist whose career on the bench was a sterling example of integrity and professionalism. Born in Wauchula, Fla., in 1891, he became an attorney in 1915 and was elected county judge of De Soto County 2 years later, for the term commencing on January 1, 1917. In 1919, his performance as county judge earned him appointment by the Governor as the first circuit court judge of the 12th circuit, of which Lee County, Fla., was then a part.

Judge Whitehurst became a resident of Fort Myers shortly thereafter, in 1923, and was a pillar of his community from that time until his death over half a century later in 1974.

President Harry Truman appointed Judge Whitehurst to a Federal judgeship in 1950. In 1959, he became chief judge of the southern district of Florida and served with distinction in that capacity unitl his 70th birthday in 1961.

Upon his retirement, Judge Whitehurst had served as a judge of either the State or Federal courts for a period of 54 years, which is considered one of the longerst judicial careers in the State of Florida. During his years on the State bench, Judge Whitehurst was never opposed for office.

It is for this half century of exemplary service to the ideals of truth, justice and integrity that I ask this Congress to honor Judge Whitehurst by naming the Federal building in his hometown of Fort Myers after him, to serve as a constant reminder to those who utilize that building of the principles to which he devoted his life.●

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3303, a bill to designate the Federal building in Fort Myers, Fla., as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building."

Mr. Speaker, Judge Whitehurst, was a well respected jurist whose career was highlighted by integrity and professionalism. In view of his 54-year tenure with the courts at either the State or Federal level, it is most appropriate that the Federal building in Fort Myers, Fla., be named in his honor.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works and Transportation be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 552) to designate the Federal Building in Fort Myers, Fla., as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse," ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so only for the purpose of asking the chairman the nature of the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that section 2 of S. 552 amends section 3(b) of Public Law 98–1 which authorized the Administrator of the General Services to accept contributions of money provided to him by private individuals or organizations within 6 months of February 15, 1983, for the purpose of erecting at suitable locations at the Nancy Hanks Center at the Old Post Office Building appropriate markers or displays commemorating the accomplishments of Nancy Hanks. Section 2 of S. 552 merely extends the time for up to 2 years for which contributions of money can be accepted by the Administrator of General Services.

Mr. CLINGER. I thank the chairman, and I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 552

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the building located at 2301 First Street, Fort Myers, Florida, known as the Federal Building, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Building and United States Courthouse". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to that building shall be deemed to be a reference to the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building".

SEC. 2. Section 3(b) of Public Law 98-1 is amended by striking the words "six months" and substituting therefor "two years".

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 3303) was laid on the table.

BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL POST OFFICE BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 3238) to designate the U.S. Post Office Building in Flushing, N.Y., as the "Benjamin S. Rosenthal Post Office Building."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 3238

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the United States Post Office Building located at 41-65 Main Street, Flushing, New York, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Benjamin S. Rosenthal Post Office Building". Any reference in any law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to that building shall be deemed to be a reference to the "Benjamin S. Rosenthal Post Office Building".

(b) As soon as practicable after the date of enactment of this Act, the Postmaster General shall install in such post office, in a place in open view to the public, an appropriate plaque indicating the designation of the post office pursuant to this Act.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3238, a bill to designate the U.S. Post Office in Flushing, N.Y., as the "Benjamin S. Rosenthal Post Office Building." Benjamin S. Rosenthal, born on June 8, 1923, in the Bronx, was brought up in Queens, N.Y., and attended City College. In 1949, after wartime service as a military policeman in Iceland, he graduated from Brooklyn Law School.

Congressman Rosenthal was elected as a Democrat to the 87th Congress in a special election on February 20, 1962, and was reelected to each succeeding Congress until his untimely death on January 4, 1983. During the 88th and 89th Congresses, he served as a member of the National Commission on Food Marketing.

As chairman of the Government Operations Subcommittee on Commerce, Consumer, and Monetary Affairs, Congressman Rosenthal was in the forefront of consumer justice and paid particularly close attention to the needs of our most vulnerable citizens, especially the aged, the minorities, and the disadvantaged. A thoughtful and hard-working legislator, Ben helped to move our country toward greater social justice for all citizens in the 1960's and 1970's. He compiled a legislative record on behalf of the consumer that will be remembered with respect and gratitude.

As a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, he promoted a stronger congressional role in foreign policymaking, and was among the first in the House of Representatives to publicly oppose the Vietnam war. Congressman Rosenthal was a passionate advocate of the sovereign State of Israel and a powerful champion for the rights of the Greek Cypriot population.

Congressman Rosenthal was a man of incredible integrity and intelligence—of commitment and capacity. He was a man of compassion, courage, and high principle. He was held in high esteem by his colleagues and enjoyed the overwhelming support of his constituents who appreciated his honesty, sincerity, and conscientious concern for their welfare.

Honoring Congressman Rosenthal, a statesman and exceptional legislator, by naming the U.S. Post Office building in Flushing, N.Y., as the "Benjamin S. Rosenthal Office Building" is most fitting and appropriate.

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3238, a bill to designate the U.S. Post Office building in Flushing, N.Y., as the "Benjamin S. Rosenthal Post Office Building."

Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues are aware, Ben Rosenthal served with distinction in the House of Representatives for 21 years until his untimely death on January 4, 1983. I had the privilege of serving with Ben for 18 years.

Ben Rosenthal was a man totally dedicated to the needs of both his constituents and the Nation as a whole. He was a distinguished and articulate member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and a major influence on this body during his tenure. As chairman of the House Government Operation's Commerce, Consumer and Monetary Affairs Subcommittee, Ben Rosenthal clearly established himself as our country's recognized national champion in the battle to protect the rights of consumers.

Mr. Speaker, it is most fitting to pay tribute to the memory of our late colleague, Ben Rosenthal, by naming the U.S. Post Office building in Flushing, N.Y., the "Benjamin S. Rosenthal Post Office Building."●

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, today we are voting on a bill to create a lasting tribute to a former Member of Congress deeply respected and missed by all in the Chamber. H.R. 3238 would rename the U.S. Post Office building in Flushing, N.Y., in honor of Benjamin S. Rosenthal.

For over a decade, Ben Rosenthal's district office was located in the Flushing Post Office, a historic building still used daily by the residents of Queens.

The citizens of Queens elected Ben to Congress in 1962, and they reelected him to each succeeding Congress by resounding margins. His popularity at home, among his colleagues in Congress, and with people across the Nation, was known and well deserved.

Ben had a way of getting things done without a lot of fanfare. But the impact of his actions was felt by all.

In the midsixties, when Ben was still a newcomer in Washington, he was one of the first to take a stand against our country's involvement in the Vietnam war. And, by the end of that decade, he was known as a diligent worker on both national and international issues.

The breadth of Ben's activities was astounding. He won a reputation as an effective and vigilant lawmaker. He was an originator of consumer protection legislation and a champion of social reform. The disadvantaged, handicapped, and aged always knew that Ben would stand up for their rights.

As a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Ben Rosenthal was recognized as the leader in the movement to cut off arms to Turkey after that country's invasion of Cyprus. And he will always be remembered as a passionate supporter of the State of Israel.

Ben's critical leadership in foreign affairs and his great ability to get things done for the people of Queens was respected by all—even those who did not share his views.

Ben was a truly compassionate and honest leader. He was a hard-hitting intellectual with great integrity, who gave politics a good name. He set the standards.

Ben was my Representative on the Hill from the first time that I ever voted, and I am only one among the many of who were inspired by his dedicated and tireless service.

Naming a post office for this great man is but a small gesture. But, back home, we will all appreciate the Benjamin S. Rosenthal Post Office Building as a tribute to a public servant whose memory will forever remain in the hearts and minds of all with whom he came into contact.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days to revise and extend their remarks on the eight bills just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR THE USE AND DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS AWARDED THE RED LAKE BAND OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS

The Clerk called the Senate bill (S. 884) to provide for the use and distribution of funds awarded the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians in docket numbered 15-72 of the U.S. Court of Claims.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding any provision of the Act of October 19, 1973 (87 Stat. 466; 25 U.S.C. 1401 et seq.), or any other law, regulation, or plan promulgated pursuant thereto, the funds appropriated with respect to the judgment awarded the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians in docket numbered 15-72 of the United States Court of Claims (less attorney fees and litigation expenses), including all interest and investment income accrued thereon, shall be distributed and used as follows:

(1) Eighty per centum of such funds shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") in the form of per capita payments (in sums as equal as possible) to all enrolled members of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians who are living on the date of enactment of this Act.

(2) Twenty per centum of such funds, including any interest or income accrued thereon, shall be—

(A) held in trust and invested by the Secretary for the benefit of the members of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians, and

(B) distributed from such trust, subject to the approval of the Secretary, to the governing body of such tribe for the purpose of making expenditures to meet common tribal needs or educational requirements.

SEC. 2. (a) Any payment of a per capita share of funds to which a living, competent adult is entitled under this Act shall be paid directly to such adult.

(b) Any per capita share of funds to which a decreased individual is entitled under this Act shall be paid, and the beneficiaries thereof determined, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

(c) Any per capita share of funds to which a legally incompetent individual or an individual under eighteen years of age is entitled under this Act shall be paid in accordance with such procedures (including the establishment of trusts) as the Secretary determines to be necessary to protect the interests of such individual.

SEC. 3. None of the funds distributed under this Act shall be—

(1) subject to Federal, State, or local income taxes, or

(2) considered income or resources in determining either eligibility for, or the amount of assistance under, Federal, State, or local programs.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR THE USE AND DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS AWARDED THE ASSINIBOINE TRIBE OF THE FORT BELKNAP INDIAN COMMUNITY, MONT., AND THE ASSINIBOINE TRIBE OF THE FORT PECK INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

The Clerk called the Senate bill (S. 1148) to provide for the use and distribution of funds awarded the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Belknap Indian Community, Mont., and the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., in docket numbered 10-81L by the U.S. Court of Claims, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the funds appropriated on September 30, 1981, in accordance with section 1302 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act (31 U.S.C. 724a), in satisfaction of an award in United States Court of Claims docket numbered 10-81L, including all interest and investment income accrued, less attorney fees and litigation expenses, shall be divided on the basis of 42.5 percent of the award funds to the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Belknap Indian Community and 57.5 percent of the award funds to the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation and utilized for the purposes herein provided.

SEC. 2. The funds apportioned to the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Belknap Indian Community, Montana, less the costs incurred by the Fort Belknap Assiniboine Treaty Committee in connection with planning for the use and distribution of such funds, including costs in connection with this legislation, and related attorney fees and expenses, shall be used and distributed as follows:

(a) The Assiniboine membership roll of the Fort Belknap Indian Community shall be brought current to include all eligible members born on or prior to and living on the date of enactment of this Act. Subsequent to the preparation and approval by the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter "Secretary") of this roll, the Secretary shall make a per capita distribution of 80 percent of the funds (in a sum as equal as possible), to each duly enrolled member. The Secretary's determination concerning eligibility to share in the per capita payment shall be final.

(b) 20 percent of these funds, and any amount remaining after the per capita payment, shall be held in trust and invested by the Secretary for the benefit of the members of the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Belknap Indian Community. The Treaty Committee of such Tribe, with the approval of the Secretary, shall distribute an annual family interest payment to all enrolled members of the Fort Belknap Assiniboine Tribe. All members on the Assiniboine tribal membership roll living on November 15 of each year shall be eligible for the annual interest payment. Members born after that date and living on the following November 15 shall be eligible for the next annual payment.

SEC. 3. The funds apportioned to the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Montana, less the costs incurred by the Fort Peck Assiniboine Council in connection with planning for the use and distribution of such funds, including costs in connection with this legislation, and related attorney fees and expenses, shall be used and distributed as follows:

(a) The Assiniboine membership roll of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Montana, shall be brought current to include all eligible members born on or prior to and living on the date of enactment of this Act. Subsequent to the preparation and approval by the Secretary of this roll, the Secretary shall make a per capita distribution of 70 percent of the funds (in sums as equal as possible), to each enrollee.

(b) 30 percent of these funds and any amounts remaining after the per capita payment, shall be held in trust and invested by the Secretary for the benefit of the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation and its members. The principle of the funds and the income therefrom shall be applied and used for the benefit of the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation and its members in accordance with reasonable terms established by the Fort Peck Assiniboine Council with the concurrence of the Tribal Executive Board of the Assiniboine and Sioux Tribes of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, and approved by the Secretary: provided that until such terms has been agreed upon, the Secretary shall fix the terms of the administration of the portion of the funds as to which there is no agreement.

SEC. 4. The per capita shares of living competent adults shall be paid directly to them. Shares of deceased individual beneficiaries shall be determined and distributed in accordance with regulations of the Secretary.

SEC. 5. None of the funds distributed per capita or held in trust under the provisions of this Act shall be subject to Federal or State income taxes, and the per capita or family interest payments shall not be considered as income or resources when determining the extent of eligibility for assistance under the Social Security Act or any Federal or federally assisted programs.

SEC. 6. The Secretary is authorized to prescribed rules and regulations to carry out the provisons of this Act, including the establishment of deadlines for filing applications for enrollment.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

IN SUPPORT OF THE SELF-SUFFICIENCY ACT OF 1983

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration is continuing its war against the rural electric cooperatives. The latest volley is the administration's announced opposition to legislation designed to keep the Rural Electrification Administration's revolving fund in a financially healthy state.

The Self-Sufficiency Act of 1983, which has been endorsed by the National Rural Electrification Association and which has 159 House cosponsors, including myself, would permit co-ops to continue to receive the low-interest loans that are vital to the co-ops' ability to provide electric service in our Nation's rural areas. The revolving fund would be maintained under the bill by allocating $7.9 billion in loan repayments from member co-ops back onto the REA's revolving fund.

Mr. Speaker, many of my colleagues who represent rural areas know that the cost of delivering electricity to rural areas is very high, and that even with the low interest loans the revolving fund provides, electricity costs, on average, 12 percent more in rural areas than in urban centers, where transmission and distribution costs are considerably lower. Yet, instead of working to preserve a financing system which is critical to the ability of rural America to remain economically productive, the Reagan administration has been trying for the past 3 years to gut the REA altogether.

Harold Hunter, President Reagan's REA Administrator, has spent his entire term in office attempting to hold up any loans for generating and transmission cooperatives. Now, he wants to double the interest rates for the revolving fund from 5 to 10 percent, reduce available loan money by $350 million, and require each cooperative to find private funding sources for half of each new loan. The impact of the first two proposals are obvious, the third proposal—that co-ops go to the private capital market for half of their funds is even worse, because private lending sources fully understand the high cost of delivering electrical service to rural areas, and they will demand very high interest rates on any loans.

What is the cost of the Reagan administration's proposals? According to Charles Robinson of NRECA, the Administration's plans would cause the electric bills of many rural Americans to rise by $100 a month or $1,200 a year.

Mr. Speaker, the farmers and ranchers and senior citizens who live in the rural areas of my district cannot afford to have their electric bills increase. They already pay more than people living in towns and cities. I urge my colleagues to say no to this plan to punish rural America and I urge my colleagues to support the Self-Sufficiency Act of 1983.

DO NOT BLOCK IMMIGRATION REFORM

(Mr. FISH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am bitterly disappointed that the House Democratic Leadership refuses to bring up the Simpson-Mazzoli Immigration Reform and Control Act. The Senate has twice voted overwhelmingly for it. The House Judiciary Committee reported it out 4 months ago.

The reason given for blocking consideration is literally unbelievable. We are all used to politics in the Congress, but never in my 15 years here have I heard a less credible explanation. To think the President would veto immigration reform in order to curry favor with Hispanic voters accepts fantasy over fact, selfish political gain over the national interest. I prefer not to believe it.

The facts are—this administration endorses the Senate-passed version of Simpson-Mazzoli. Immigration reform was the subject of the first Cabinet level task force of this administration in 1981 and has been forcefully pursued for over 2 years.

It is no secret that our Hispanic colleagues and the leadership of some Hispanic organizations object to employer sanctions, the enforcement features of the bill. Their objection delayed consideration by this house in both the last Congress and in this one. To be opposed is their privilege, even in the face of polls showing 60 percent of the Nation's Hispanics favor the legislation. But for this House not even to consider the bill is highly irresponsible and displays a complete disregard to addressing an urgent national problem.

I for one am prepared to take the legislation to the floor and face up-or-down votes on alternatives to each of its provisions—that is our process. That is the democratic process which apparently we are not going to honor.

The essentials of Simpson-Mazzoli stems from 2 years of thorough consideration in 1978 and 1979 by the bipartisan Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy, chaired by Father Theodore Hesburgh, the 16-member panel included four Members of President Carter's Cabinet, a public member from organized labor, Judge Cruz Reynoso, as well as Senators KENNEDY and DECONCINI and Representatives RODINO and HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, employer sanctions were endorsed by the Commission by a vote of 14 to 2.

Sensitive to the potential for discrimination in the application of the sanction, the House Committee on the Judiciary went further than the Select Commission. Our bill contains mandates for the Civil Rights Commission to monitor the enforcement of employer sanctions, and for the Attorney General, the Secretary of Labor, and the Chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to establish a task force to review and investigate complaints of discrimination. The President must consult with Congress every 6 months concerning the implementation of employer sanctions—including possible discrimination in employment. The very extensive monitoring and reporting mechanisms are an expression of the importance we attach to guarding against discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, the American people want an immigration policy that fairly addresses the pressures on our borders, and the status of those already here illegally. Inaction on our part will mean we continue to tolerate a large underclass in our midst, vulnerable to exploitation, fearful of discovery. Inaction will deny us the opportunity to address this problem rationally and with compassion.

There is a further fundamental need for reform of our immigration laws. Public perception is that immigration is out of control and it is the correct perception. Already we have had warnings of unrest in areas impacted with illegal immigrants and with refugees. The pressures from the Caribbean basin driven by rapid population growth and by proverty will only intensify.

Mr. Speaker, I fear if we do not act now to bring order to our immigration procedures, tension and resentment will grow. A repressive reaction would not distinguish lawful immigrants and refugees from illegal immigrants. At stake, is nothing less than our policy of reuniting families and our humanitarian tradition of welcoming those suffering persecution.

Those who would block action by this House carry a heavy burden. Mr. Speaker, let the House work its will.

SOVIET THEFT OF AMERICAN TECHNOLOGY

(Mr. ROTH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, last night "60 Minutes" did an exposé on Soviet theft of American technology. It was right on the mark. But, unfortunately, it only touched the tip of the iceberg. The KGB has admitted that its goal is to steal American technology and the KGB said that Western technology and especially American technology, they consider that as their natural resource.

Now the hangman's noose, as I see it, draws tighter and tighter around the neck of America with each legal Soviet acquisition of American technology. Yet even in this House there are Members who would consider eliminating all licensing to Cocom.

Many countries today are a haven for Soviet fronts seeking to steal American technology. The Export Administration Act is serious business. It makes no sense to spend billions and billions of our taxpayers' dollars to develop high technology only to enhance the Soviet military machine.

NICARAGUA'S HUMAN RIGHTS ASSAULT ON THE MISKITO INDIANS

(Mr. SOLOMON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute)

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, before the Sandinistas, before Samoza, long before even the Spanish, the primitive countryside of Nicaragua belonged to the Miskito Indians. Today, it does not.

Today, the Miskito live penned up in the concentration camps of the Sandinista government, denied food or medical attention, watching their elderly wither away, and their children tortured by malnutrition and the diseases born of filth and overcrowding.

Jim Steiglitz, a former Green Beret medic in Vietnam, and the grandnephew of the great photographer Alfred Steiglitz, has returned from Nicaragua with graphic evidence of what the left-wing totalitarians are doing to the Miskito Indians of Nicaragua.

Is it genocide? At the very least, we have evidence of massive and systematic human rights violations on an enormous scale. I intend to see that the testimony and photographic evidence of Mr. Steiglitz is presented to the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on Human Rights.

It is time that we in America awoke to the reality behind the slogans and banners of the Sandinista regime. This so-called people's paradise is a client state of the Soviet Union, complete with a Soviet-style Gulag of forced labor camps.

Many critics of President Reagan's Central America policy say we are swimming against the tide of history in Nicaragua and El Salvador. But if the Sandinistas succeed in their cruelty against the Miskito Indians, it will not be because history sided with the villians—but because we failed to side with the victims.

CONGRESS IS TO BLAME FOR OVERSPENDING AND CREATING DEFICITS

(Mr. BLILEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, for several days now our colleagues from your side of the aisle have taken to their feet to blame our budget deficits on President Reagan. As a Member of Congress, I say that nothing could be farther from the truth.

Lest we forget, it was Congress in 1974 that gave itself control over the public purse, and it was not because the president at that time was spending too much money.

Congress is to blame for overspending and creating the deficits that crowd-out private sector expansion and suppress new employment. Congress's free-spending is what threw our Nation into a recession. And it is Congress's taxing and spending that have moderated our recovery and keep it from blossoming into a sustainable explosion of growth.

A prime example exists before us right now. In June of this year, House Democrats passed their own budget. That budget requires us to spend an unprecedented amount of money even as it requires us to raise $73 billion more in taxes in the next few years. And yet, even with carte blanche budget authority, the House still cannot adhere to its own budget directives. It is no wonder that we have deficits larger than most countries' budgets.

But it is shameful for House Democrats to lay the blame for those deficits at President Reagan's door. The Congress has always wanted the responsibility for controlling the public purse. Let the Congress now accept the blame for 30 years worth of a job poorly done.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS AND TRANSPORTATION TO SIT DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE ON WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1983

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation be permitted to sit during the 5-minute rule on Wednesday, October 5, 1983, to consider legislation relating to the Smithsonian Institution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman from Missouri to say that this has been cleared with the minority?

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I understand that it has.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING FUNDS FOR CAPITAL IMPROVEMENT PROJECTS ON GUAM

Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 589) to authorize $15,500,000 for capital improvement projects on Guam, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Guam?

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he will be offering the amendment which we have agreed to in lieu of the committee amendments?

Mr. WON PAT. If the gentleman will yield to me?

Mr. LUJAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WON PAT. Yes, I will.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Guam?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 589

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1(a)(1) of Public Law 95-348 (92 Stat. 487) as amended by Public Law 97-357 (96 Stat. 1705) is amended by deleting the word "and" where it last appears, and inserting after the words "fiscal year 1983," the words "and effective October 1, 1983, $15,500,000,".

SEC. 2. Funds authorized to be appropriated for the construction of a hydroelectric facility in Ponape pursuant to section 101 of Public Law 96-205 (94 Stat. 84), as amended, may be appropriated directly to the Secretary of the Army for expenditure by the Chief of Engineers on such construction.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WON PAT

Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WON PAT: Page 2, beginning on line 3, in lieu of the Committee amendment, insert the following:

"SEC. 3. (a) Section 205(a) of Public Law 96-205, as amended by Public Law 96-597, is further amended by changing '1983.' to '1985.'.

"(b) Section 205(c) of Public Law 96-205 (94 Stat. 87) is amended to read as follows: 'As provided in section 602 of Public Law 94-241 (90 Stat. 263, 270) the term 'rebate of any taxes' shall, effective January 1, 1985, apply only to the extent taxes have actually been paid pursuant to section 601 of said Act, shall not exceed the amount of tax actually paid for any tax year, and may only be paid following the close of the tax year involved. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, effective Janaury 1, 1985, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands shall maintain, as a matter of public record, the name and address of each person receiving such a rebate, together with the amount of the rebate, and the year for which such rebate was made.'.

"(c) The Secretary of the Interior and the Governor of the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands shall each submit a report to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate on any efforts to develop any needed modification of the income tax rates required by sections 601 and 602 of the Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in Political Union With the United States of America approved by Public Law 94-241 (90 Stat. 263, 269-270) to enforce such sections. The initial report shall be transmitted not later than January 1, 1984 with subsequent reports to be transmitted every three months thereafter until January 1, 1985. The reports shall set forth the precise objectives of both the Commonwealth government and the Administration, any areas of difference, the modifications under consideration, and what progress has been made to resolve any differences and implement the provisions of Sections 601 and 602.

"SEC. 4. (a) Section 303 of Public Law 97-357 (96 Stat. 1705, 1709) is amended by deleting 'grants to' and inserting in lieu thereof 'grants or loans to'.

"(b) Public Law 94-392 (48 U.S.C. 1574(b)), as amended, is hereby further amended by—

(1) deleting the semicolon in section 2(b)(1) and adding the following: ', except that $28,000,000 of the guaranteed bonding authority will be used for water producing and power projects, including maintenance and overhaul of electrical generating and distribution mechanisms, and $12,000,000 of the guaranteed bonding authority will be used for repair and improvements of the water distribution and storage systems;'; and

(2) in section 2(f), strike '$61,000,000' and insert in lieu thereof '$101,000,000' and in each place where it occurs, strike '1984' and insert in lieu thereof '1990'.

"SEC. 5. (a) Section 29 of the Revised Organic Act of the Virgin Islands (68 Stat. 509; 48 U.S.C. 1543) is amended to read as follows:

'SEC. 29. All members of the Legislature of the Virgin Islands, the Governor, the Lieutenant Governor, all judges and all officials of the government of the Virgin Islands who report directly to the Governor shall be citizens of the United States.'.

"(b) Subsection (c) of Section 10 of the Organic Act of Guam is further amended by deleting all through 'Provided, That any' and inserting in lieu thereof 'Any'.

"(c) Section 1906(a) (55) of the Act of October 4, 1976 (90 Stat. 1832) is amended as follows:

(1) in paragraph (B) change the language to be inserted to read 'emergency relief purposes and essential public projects' and

(2) add the following new paragraph (D) to read as follows:

'(D) by amending the second sentence in paragraph (A) by changing the colon after "determine" to a period and striking the remainder of the sentences.'.

"SEC. 6. Section 501(d), of Public Law 95-134 (91 Stat. 1159, 1164), as amended, is amended by changing '$100,000' to '$200,000'.

"SEC. 7. Section 604(d) of Public Law 96-597 (94 Stat. 3477, 3481) is amended by inserting before the period 'and may implement any projects or programs contained in recommendations of the plan'.

"SEC. 8. The Secretary of the Interior is directed to implement the health care program required by Section 106 of Public Law 95-134 (91 Stat. 1159) for the populations of the four atolls in the Marshall Islands identified in such section immediately upon enactment of this section and shall promptly notify the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate if he finds that the populations of other atolls should be included in the program setting forth the basis for his finding and the estimated cost of extension of the program. The Secretary of Energy shall transmit annually to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs and Appropriations of the House of Representatives and the Committees on Energy and Natural Resources and Appropriations of the Senate together with the proposed budget for the next fiscal year, a description of the program and the estimated costs for implementation together with any recommendations which he may have for improvements in such program.

"SEC. 9. Subsection (b) of section 606 of the Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in Political Union With the United States of America, approved by Public Law 94-241, is amended by striking out 'upon termination of the Trusteeship Agreement or' and inserting in lieu thereof 'on January 1 of the first calendar year following the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement or upon'.

"SEC. 10. Section 419(a)(2) of the Act of August 23, 1958 (72 Stat. 731, as amended, 49 U.S.C. 1389(a)(2)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

'(D) The Board may, after considering the views of any interested community, the territory of Guam and appropriate federal agencies, determine what is the essential air transportation for Guam without regard to whether it is being served by more than one air carrier holding a certificate issued under Section 401 of this title.'.

"SEC. 11. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, upon petition of the governor of the respective territory, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (hereinafter in this section referred to as 'Administrator') shall by rule exempt any person or source or classes of persons or sources in Guam, American Samoa, or the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands from any requirement of or under the Act of July 14, 1955, (69 Stat. 322, as amended and supplemented 42 U.S.C., 1857 et. seq.) upon finding (1) that compliance with such requirement is impractical, unnecessary, or unreasonable due to geographical, meteorological or economic factors or other such local factors as the Administrator in his discretion deems significant, and (2) that an alternative requirement, enforceable under such Act, will be imposed to assure attainment and maintenance of the national ambient air quality standards and to assure compliance with any applicable emission standards for hazardous air pollutants unless such alternative requirement is unnecessary for attaining, maintaining, and complying with such standards. Such a rule shall be promulgated pursuant to the provisions of section 307(d) of such Act and shall be considered final action of the Administrator for the purposes of section 307(b) of such Act.

"(b) The Administrator shall notify the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate upon receipt of a petition pursuant to this section and shall notify such Committees of his approval or rejection of the petition and the basis therefore.

"SEC. 12. Amendments of, or modifications to, the Constitution of American Samoa, as approved by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to Executive Order 10264 as in effect January 1, 1983, may be made only by an Act of Congress.

"SEC. 13. (a) The Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers and in cooperation with the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, is hereby authorized and directed to study and draft plans for development, utilization, and conservation of water and related land resources of the Commonwealth. To carry out the purposes of this section there are authorized to be appropriated effective October 1, 1983, such sums as may be necessary.

"(b) Such studies shall include appropriate consideration of the needs for flood protection; wise use of flood plain lands; navigation facilities; hydroelectric power generation; regional water supply and waste water management facilities systems; general recreational facilities; enhancement and control of water quality; enhancement and conservation of fish and wildlife; and other measures for environment improvement and economic and human resources development. Such studies shall also be compatible with comprehensive development plans formulated by local planning agencies and other interested Federal agencies.

"SEC. 14. Section 101 of Public Law 97-253 shall apply only to that position of the United States referred to in section 48 of Public Law 86-70 (73 Stat. 151)."

Mr. WON PAT (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr VENTO). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Guam?

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, might I ask the gentleman if this is the same amendment that we discussed just a minute ago.

Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUJAN. I yield to the gentleman from Guam.

Mr. WON PAT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

It is.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Guam?

There was no objection.

Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, S. 589 was introduced at the request of the administration. The bill encountered no opposition in the Senate where it was revised slightly.

There was unanimous, bipartisan agreement to approve it in the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs with an amendment. This was to effect necessary updating of previous territorial legislation as well as changes needed to adopt statutes, and regulations under them, to the unique circumstances of the insular areas.

The amendment I have proposed as a substitute with bipartisan committee support incorporates the committee's initial amendment but makes technical and other worthwhile improvements. It conforms with the purposes referenced in the committee's approval of the bill and other goals which enjoy bipartisan support.

The amendment has no adverse budgetary implications. It responds to needs identified by the administration or the insular areas.

The primary purpose of the bill is to authorize essential capital improvements in my home territory of Guam.

Appropriations for most of this work—water and sewer infrastructure needed to develop our key private sector industry, tourism—have been approved by both Houses. They are also within the budget approved by this House. This project was endorsed by the administration after having been identified by our visionary Governor, Ricardo Bordallo, as his top priority request.

The other funds are needed to complete the penitentiary for which appropriations were made in 1980.

The cost of the project expanded to accommodate design changes, including those needed to meet concerns of the Inspector General of the Interior Department who is doing an exemplary job in the territories.

Section 2 of the Senate bill would transfer the existing authorization for the construction of a hydroelectric power project on Ponape, a state of the Federated States of Micronesia, from the Department of the Interior to the Corps of Engineers.

The corps, which conducted the feasibility study for the facility, is willing to handle construction. The $8 million project would result in substantial savings by replacing Ponape's current dependence upon imported petroleum with use of an abundant local resource.

My amendment would revise section 3 of the bill as reported by the committee to accommodate the concerns of the administration and the Senate as we have heard them and of the Northern Mariana Islands.

The overall intent of the amendment is the same as the committee reported section, however: To facilitate implementation of an equitable system of income taxation as provided for in the covenant between the United States and the Northern Marianas.

Section 601 is an integral part of our understanding with our newest territory. It provides that the Northern Marianas will have the same income tax rates as the United States applied as they are in Guam.

The necessity for section 3, as reported by the committee, is well explained in the committee's report; Chairman UDALL's May 19 further explanation to the House; and a committee staff paper on the background of this issue. I ask, at this time, that this latter document be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my statement.

To summarize, though, I would say that section 3 was needed to make the Northern Marianas understand that while the Internal Revenue Code may be imperfect, it represents rules that they committed in the covenant to joining the rest of us in living under. And this cannot be changed by unilateral action on their part.

Section 3, as reported, accomplished its purpose. It would be changed by my amendment to reflect the Northern Marianas' understanding of the points I have just made and would be, in fact, changed as they have suggested.

The revision would delay the effect of the original section 3 until January 1, 1985. We would also permit the territory and the administration until that time to develop legislation that may be needed to adopt the Internal Revenue Code to the distinct situation of the Northern Mariana Islands.

By doing so we do not want to suggest that we would support a locally determined alternative to IRC rates or a system that will be inequitable to Guam or other parts of the United States. Instead, we are simply affording the territory and the administration time to convince Congress that IRC rates need to be adapted to meet the islands' revenue requirements and insure stable and sustained economic growth.

Further, because of this and because we recognize that it is impractical at this point to expect the territory to adhere to the mirrored IRC for this tax year and, possibly, next as well, we would also accede to the request of the administration and the territory to defer the application of the mirror code until 1985.

In affording the Treasury and the territory until then to develop proposals or plan implementation of the mirror code, we have required regular reporting to the territorial policy committees of the Congress. These reports would be submitted by the responsible Federal agency, the Department of the Interior, as well as the territory.

We make this time available, although both the Federal agencies and the territory have had enough time already to implement the tax provisions of the covenant or proposed modifications, on the basis of good faith. We trust that when the distinguished Washington Representative of the Northern Marianas, Edward DLG. Pangelinan, other territorial officials and staff of the Assistant Secretary for Tax Policy inform us that they are close to an agreement on a proposed modification of the IRC rates required under section 601, they are serious this time. If nothing results, we will expect adherence to the letter and intent of the law and the treaty like commitment of the covenant. We hope that they also understand that we will never countenance more favorable tax treatment of the NMI than of Guam. Nor will we approve of a system that results in such an unreasonably light tax burden that the taxpayers of the United States must subsidize in the Northern Marianas what the people there do not pay to support their local government responsibilities.

My amendment would also revise section 4. The purpose is to obviate the problems that the administration has with the provision.

As reported by the committee, section 4 would have authorized a $10 million grant to fund the second phase of the territory's sorely needed 4-year, $40 million program of power and water generation and distribution infrastructure improvements.

My amendment would delete this authorization and replace it with off-budget financing assistance. This would be accomplished by expanding the existing bonding authority of the territory. This would enable it to finance the improvements itself in the private market under the most favorable terms. This bonding authorization has already been approved in the fiscal year 1984 Interior appropriations bill but our language has a slight technical difference.

To further accommodate budget constraints, my amendment would also make the $10 million authorized by Public Law 97-357 as a grant for the first phase of the project eligible for loan or grant.

Due to the persuasiveness of the representative of the Virgin Islands, RON DE LUGO, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs continues to regard the improvements as absolutely essential to the welfare of the people of the islands and continued economic activity and growth. Further, the committee believes that the imperative nature of the project and the significant element of Federal responsibility for the financial difficulties of the territory justifies direct Federal financing.

However, since initiation of the improvements program should not be delayed, and the administration is resolutely against a grant for this purpose, Delegate DE LUGO has agreed with us to facilitate funding as I have described.

My amendment would make no change in section 5, as reported by the committee, other than a technical amendment to accomplish the purpose of subsection c.

This section would remove three archaic and unnecessary restrictions currently in the organic acts of Guam and the Virgin Islands. It would limit the requirement that Virgin Islands government employees be U.S. citizens to principal elected and appointed officials. It would remove an unwarranted restriction on the ability of Guam to reapportion its legislature at the times it feels it is necessary to do so. It would lift restrictions on the use by the Virgin Islands of rum excise tax collections rebated to it for public improvements purposes that are not placed upon Puerto Rico for the use of the rum excise tax collections rebated to that territory.

My amendment would make no change in section 6. The provision updates the waiver in existing law of requirements that American Samoa and the Northern Marianas provide matching funds up to $200,000 to receive program grants.

The primary rationale is that it makes little sense to match Federal dollars with what are indirectly Federal dollars. A secondary reason is that the expenditures of administrative effort and funds which are required for matching are counterproductive.

Further, I should note that our committee agrees with the last administration that matching requirements should be selectively and flexiby imposed in the other U.S. territories so that all appropriate programs provide the maximum assistance possible.

My amendment also makes no change in section 7. The provision would broaden the Secretary of Energy's authority in existing law to develop comprehensive energy plans for the insular areas. This would permit implementation of followup projects recommended in the Secretary's December 1982 report to the Congress.

It is our hope that these followup projects will be implemented. They are needed to implement the national policy of developing the renewable energy resources of our Caribbean and Pacific insular areas. They would reduce the fiscally draining dependency of these islands on imported petroleum.

My amendment would also make no change in section 8. This provision would direct the Department of the Interior to implement the health care program for the atolls of Bikini, Enewetak, Rongelap, and Utirik in the Marshall Islands that is required in existing law.

The Department would be required to report to congressional committees if it determined that other atolls ought to be included in the health care program because of their exposure to radiation through U.S. nuclear testing. Further, Interior would have to report annually to Congress on the progress of the program.

Section 9 responds to a request by the Department of Health and Human Services. The provision would delay the extension of the social security program to the Northern Mariana Islands to the January 1 following the termination of the Pacific Islands Trusteeship, or a mutally agreed date. This is in lieu of the date of termination of the trusteeship, as provided for in existing law.

The territory joins the administration in support of this amendment. It is needed to prevent technical and administrative problems which would result since the application of social security to the Northern Marianas involves the merger of the territorial social security problem into the U.S. system, including funds and credits. Merger during the middle of a calendar year would be difficult.

Section 10 is identical to the provision that passed the Senate too late in the last Congress to be approved in the House. It would permit the Civil Aeronautics Board to make an essential air service determination for my own air transportation-dependent territory.

The CAB agrees that such a provision is needed. This is because a judicial decision last year cast doubt upon their ability to make these determinations for locations already served by one section 401 carrier.

While this sort of limitation might be appropriate for mainland locations with other forms of travel available, it clearly should not apply to Guam. My island is only linked to the United States by more than one certified U.S. carrier by a nonmajor carrier and service which makes many stops between Guam and Hawaii. This latter service is provided by Continental Airlines. Continental's bankruptcy makes this provision very important.

The relevant aspect of assessing the adequacy of Guam's air service should be direct United States-Guam flights. Hopefully, providing this territorial flexibility will lead to whatever steps are necessary to insure that Guam is reliably tied to the United States by commercial air service.

The Environmental Protection Agency has proposed that it be granted the special territorial flexibility which would be provied by section 11. Adjustments are needed to insure that clean air standards are maintained in the unique circumstances of the territories through reasonable application of requirements.

My amendment modifies the administration proposal slightly to require reporting to the territorial policy committees of Congress on requests for territorial adjustment of requirements.

This provision is necessary to prevent undesirable imposition of requirements which would be impractical, unnecessary, or unreasonable in unique territorial situations. The conditioning factor is that clean air standards are maintained.

Our committee has initiated legislation providing this sort of flexibility in modifying requirements in territorial circumstances to other executive agencies in the past.

Section 12 provides for congressional approval of amendments to the constitution of American Samoa. It is proposed at the request of the territory's effective Representative, FOFO SUNIA, and it is supported by the islands' Governor

The constitution was written pursuant to authority delegated to the executive branch by Congress. We, of course, have full and ultimate responsibility for the territories under the constitution.

The provision is necessary to prevent unilateral modifications of the territory's locally written constitution by the Secretary of the Interior. Recently, the Secretary was prepared to remove a local official appointed by the popularly elected Governor and confirmed by the legislature by tampering with the territory's constitutional authority. Apparently, only strong, bipartisan opposition from the Congress, stimulated by Delegate SUNIA, persuaded Interior not to proceed with what would have been an egregious violation of self-government rights.

The Corps of Engineers has authority to study and plan for development, utilization and conservation of water and related land resources in all of the territories except for the newest member of the American political family. Section 13 would extend the existing territorial authorizations to the Northern Mariana Islands.

Section 14 would accomplish a bipartisan purpose of legislation approved by the Committee on Agriculture which, due to problems with an unrelated provision, is considered unlikely to be enacted in the near future. Because of uncertain fate of their bill and their recognition of the justification for the provision needed for the insular areas, the Agriculture Committee has graciously agreed to inclusion of the provision in our insular areas measure.

This is the product of work I have done with Puerto Rico's very capable representative, BALTASAR CORRADA, and Hawaii's equally able Representative DANNY AKAKA. It is needed because of the apparently unintentional inclusion of the areas in the assessment to farmers in the dairy price support program.

Inclusion makes no sense because these areas comprise entirely separate and distinct milk markets. Production is locally regulated in the insular areas. Farmers there do not benefit from the price support program the assessment partially pays for, nor do they contribute to national surpluses.

Milk costs in the insular areas are already substantially above U.S. mainland prices. Extension of the assessment to them would only further increase the cost to farmers and, ultimately, consumers.

Finally, I want to recognize that this bill, although it represents the work of several of us on both sides of the aisle in this House, is really the work of our late and great colleague, Phil Burton.

As my predecessor as chairman of the Subcommittee on Insular Affairs, Phil felt that the most effective way to properly and sensitively legislate on many unique needs of the insular areas was to do so through annual omnibus areas assistance bills. In addition to leading these efforts in the past, Phil initially constructed this bill.

With the dedication of my subcommittee's ranking Republican, BOB LAGOMARSINO; the understanding of our full committee chairman, MO UDALL and ranking Republican MANUEL LUJAN; and now the participation of Phil's able wife and successor SALA BURTON; we are continuing Phil's tradition of responsiveness to the Americans of the insular areas in this, Phil's last territories bill.

The material follows:

INTENT OF THE LAW UNDER SECTION 601 AND 602, THE COVENANT TO ESTABLISH A COMMONWEALTH OF THE NORTHERN MARIANA ISLANDS IN POLITICAL UNION WITH THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA (PUB. L. 94-241)

PUBLIC LAW 94-241; 1974-1978

The erroneous notion that the Government of the Northern Mariana Islands (NMI) should establish and administer its own income tax code is not new. Even after the concept's rejection in the negotiating rounds leading to the farming of the Covenant, the presumption persists. In 1978—three years after the Covenant was approved by 78.8 percent voting in the Marianas' plebiscite and two years after enactment of the Covenant into federal law—Associate Professor of Law Harvey P. Dale, under retainer by Duty Free Shoppers, devised a scheme, wherein the letter, as well as the spirit, of the tax provisions of Public Law 94-241 might be circumvented. Dale's proposal was to construe abatement, whereby IRC taxes under section 601 would be forgiven without collection, for the rebatement provisions of section 602.

Interior and Insular Affairs Committee members, alarmed by Dale's proposal, initiated discussions with Commonwealth officials to ward off any action which might negate the intent of section 601, Public Law 94-241. In subsequent meetings, it was ascertained that apprehensions concerning IRC implementation in the NMI principally centered upon two issues: first, the increased costs of tax collection and earned income tax credits; secondly, the Commonwealth's lack of experience in administering a complex tax code. To allay these fears, Committee members pressed for the passage of section 3(d), Public Law 95-348, enacted into law on August 18, 1978 and directing the Secretary of the U.S. Treasury, upon request of and at no cost to the Commonwealth, to assist in IRC implementation. In legislative debate upon the floor of the U.S. House of Representatives, Congressman Phillip Burton observed:

I would like to convey publicly, and I believe it is good to have it on the record, that if there is any one provision that our committee was pleased about, it is that we were able to get the Governor and the Legislature of the Northern Mariana Islands, at least unofficially, and we hope it will be officially, to agree to let the IRS collect those taxes. We felt it would be subject to the same ground rules as they are generally here on the mainland. We also think this procedure will increase the revenues collected.

To which, Congressman Don H. Clausen added:

Mr. Speaker, I will state for the record that the gentleman from California [Mr. Phillip Burton] has stated the situation correctly. I did participate, along with the gentleman from California [Mr. Lagomarsino] and other members of the committee, in the exchange that took place between the governor and the members of the Northern Mariana Legislature where they specifically expressed their concern, and their request of us to see that the tax collection machinery would utilize the IRS [Internal Revenue Service], as stated by the gentleman from California [Mr. Burton].

In the winter of 1979 and in spite of IRS assistance available under Public Law 95-348, the First Northern Mariana Commonwealth Legislature passed House Bill 138, HDI, SDI, CDI (The Northern Mariana Islands Tax Act of 1979), which, if enacted, would have instituted income tax abatement.

In his veto message of April 6, 1979 to the Legislature, the Governor of the Northern Marianas stated in part:

I must veto it [House Bill No. 1-138] because I sincerely believe that a veto is indicated to avoid a useless, unwise and unnecessary confrontation between the Northern Marianas Government and the Congress of the United States. The extraordinary good will and cooperation that have been shown to us over the years by our friends in the U.S. Congress should not be strained or tested by the enactment of the bill as it is written.

All of you, I know, cherish our new relationship with the United States and wish to do everything within our power to preserve and protect our ties, as I do.

All of you, I know, have great respect for the Covenant, that document that was approved by the people of the Northern Marianas, approved by the U.S. Congress, and signed into law by the President in 1976, as I do.

Section 601 of the Covenant states that the U.S. federal income tax is to apply to the people of the Northern Marianas. All U.S. Citizens pay federal income taxes and we Marianas people as U.S. citizens were to share this responsibility with all U.S. citizens, whether in Guam, in the Virgin Islands, or in the continental United States. That seemed fair and equitable to the original negotiators for the Northern Marianas and it must have seemed fair to most of the people since you overwhelmingly approved the Covenant in a referendum.

In the case of the Northern Marianas there were even two advantages to having the federal income tax collected in our islands: 1) it would become a local territorial tax and all the revenue would stay here to be used by our government to improve the well-being of all our people; and 2) approximately 80 to 85 percent of our people would not have to pay this tax because of the level of their annual earnings.

So as you can see, the federal income tax was not going to be the evil and unfair tax burden that some have tried to make it out to be.

The Governor's veto message was partially based upon reassurances received from members of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. In a series of meetings held in Washington, D.C. during March 1979, Committee members expressed their dismay with the Northern Marianas Legislature's attempt to subvert the Covenant by unilaterally ignoring Section 601, P.L. 94-241. In turn, the Northern Marianas' Delegation—comprised of leaders of both political parties and branches of government—continued to express its concern that IRC implementation would significantly reduce annual Commonwealth revenues. Moreover, negotiations between the Northern Marianas Government and the U.S. Department of Treasury were proving troublesome. Consequently, members of the Committee decided that more explicit legislative language was probably necessary to outline the role of each party and to clarify some misunderstandings. Draft legislation, prepared with the assistance of the IRS, was dispatched to the Northern Marianas for comment. The response was favorable; on October 29, 1979, the president of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, Northern Marianas Legislature, replied as follows:

Dear Congressman Burton: Please be advised that we have reviewed the proposed amendments to Sections 203 and 204 [provision for IRS assistance], and find them to be in the best interest of the people of the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands and consistent with Section 602 of the Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in Political Union with the United States of America • • •

On behalf of the Senate and House of Representatives, we would like to thank you for your understanding, cooperation and assistance in resolving the issue of taxation in the Commonwealth.

Being now so late in the year, it was obvious to Committee members that implementation of the IRC could not meet the January 1, 1979 deadline imposed by P.L. 94-241 and the Presidential Proclamation issued in October of 1977. Accordingly, Committee members also drafted legislative language to exempt IRC application on income derived from sources within the NMI for two years (1979 and 1980), thus providing adequate preparation time for the government of the Northern Marianas and the IRS. A third year of exemption (1981) was authorized, provided that the abatement provisions of the NMI's own tax legislation were repealed and that the NMI governor notified the Secretary of the Treasury of this action no later than September 30, 1980. On March 12, 1980, Sections 204 and 205, P.L. 96-205, amending P.L. 95-348, were enacted. As a precautionary measure, however, Committee members added the following subsection to the legislation.

Section 205(c): It is the sense of Congress that the term "rebate" as used in section 602 of Public Law 94-241 does not permit the abatement of taxes.

To reduce future controversy, the Committee requested a former member of the Marianas Political Status Commission and a staff member of the Commonwealth Legislative to draft the legislative history of the above subsection. Their explanation is as follows:

The last part of this new section (c) clarifies the intent of the United States Congress when it used the term "rebate" in Section 602 of Public Law 94-241 by providing that the term "rebate" does not permit the abatement of taxes. The intent of Congress in the legislative history of Section 602 of P.L. 94-241 specifically proivides that taxes must be collected by the government of the Northern Mariana Islands prior to any rebate to taxpayers.

On the floor of the House, during passage of the above measures, the following observations were made:

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Under the terms of the Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in Political Union with the United States, residents of the Northern Marianas must abide by the Internal Revenue Code in paying their territorial income tax. This amendment delays implementation of this provision until January 1, 1982, providing preparation time for the Commonwealth to become familiar with the complex nature of the IRC. In the interim, the local tax code of the Northern Marianas will continue in effect. In this regard it is not our intent to create a tax haven in the Northern Marianas. Therefore, we once again, direct the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to this situation and request his close surveillance of future investment patterns in the Marianas.

Mr. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3756 [Later enacted as P.L. 96-205] as amended. Of particular concern to me—having been in from the start in the formulation of the Northern Mariana Commonwealth—is the difficult tax situation confronting the newest members of the American political family. By terms of the Covenant (Public Law 94-241) the territorial income tax of the Northern Marianas is required by law to conform with that of Guam—or in other words "a mirror image" of the Internal Revenue Code. Considering the complexities of implementing the IRC and under the provisions of Public Law 95-348, the Governor of the Northern Marianas, in concert with the Legislature, has requested the Treasury Department to implement the territorial income tax for them.

In the interim, however, much delay and misunderstanding has been encountered. And to date, the IRS still is not collecting taxes in the Commonwealth. H.R. 3756, as amended by the House, eliminates further delay and establishes a schedule, wherein the citizens of the Northern Marianas can implement, without penalty or hardship, the territorial income tax system as specified by the Covenant. I cannot overly emphasize the importance of these provisions—the foundation of good government rests upon a stable tax system.

During the ensuing year, attempts in the Northern Marianas Legislature to repeal the abatement provisions of the Northern Marianas Tax Act of 1979 failed. Similarly, negotiations with the Treasury Department reached a stalemate. As the deadline neared for IRC implementation, the following cable was dispatched to the Committee on October 1, 1980:

We regret to inform you that NMI Government was unable to comply with P.L. 96-205 because of failure by Senate to pass HB 163, HD1 [a bill, which if enacted would have alleviated the Committee's concern relative to abatement], which was also supported by Governor Camacho and U.S. House Subcommittee on National Parks and Insular Affairs. Senate action does not reflect wishes of our people as expressed by Governor Camacho and House of Representatives. We sincerely hope that NMI failure to carry out its commitment to U.S. Congress will not have adverse impact on our good relations with Federal Government. We will not oppose any action by Federal Government to achieve the purpose of HB 163, HD1. Any Congressional action in this regard should not violate sanctity of commonwealth covenant. Thank you. Governor Camacho, House Speaker Pangelinan, and Senate Minority Leader Herman R. Guerrero. Saipan.

Thus, faced with a political deadlock in the Commonwealth but assured of the good faith of the Northern Marianas people and some of their elected representatives, Committee members decided to delay IRC implementation in the Northern Marianas through 1982 in anticipation of a more stable political climate, wherein the obligations of the Northern Marianas to the rest of the American people would be recognized and accommodated. Section 303 of Public Law 96-597, enacted December 24, 1980, stipulated as follows:

(a) The Act of March 12, 1980 (Public Law 96-205; 94 Stat. 87) is hereby amended as follows: In section 205(a) change "and before January 1, 1981." to "until, but not after, January 1, 1983."

(b) The provisions of section 205(c) shall be suspended and shall be of no force or effect until January 1, 1983.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS TO S. 589; 1982-1983

Today, the political situation in the Northern Marianas appears little different from the time when Governor Camacho felt compelled to veto the Northern Marianas Tax Act of 1979. In his words:

So how can we resolve this matter [i.e., IRC implementation]?

One solution is to do as some of the Northern Marianas Legislators did. Some of them decided that U.S. citizens in the Northern Marianas ought to have different treatment from other U.S. citizens living elsewhere in the world. They decided that they knew best about the meaning of the Covenant language, and that they best understood the good will of the U.S. Congress. They, therefore, decided that all federal income taxes should be given back to everyone. In other words they decided to unilaterally ignore the tax provision of Section 601 of the Covenant and to rebate or return every single penny of all federal income taxes. And that's what they did in this tax bill before me.

Now, I and others knew there had to be another solution to the problem. How, I asked myself, could we go to the U.S. Congress and ask for $12 million for a power plant and over $20 million for a new hospital in addition to the Covenant guaranteed annual payment totalling some $20 million, and yet say to the U.S. Congress that while we're asking you for all this money we're rebating all federal income tax.

Throughout 1982 and early 1983, consultations and communications between the Committee and the NMI Government in regard to IRC implementation by January 1, 1983 occurred as follows:

(1) On May 11, 1982, Congressman Don H. Clausen hosted a meeting between Committee representatives, Commonwealth officials, including the Governor, and executives from the Department of Treasury and the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). Once informed that it was the Committee's intent that there would be no change in the schedule for IRC implementation, Commonwealth representatives indicated that the Governor would request direct IRS administration of the IRC under the provision of P.L. 95-348. Subsequently, the Commonwealth officials were advised, both in the meeting and later by correspondence, that if the Commonwealth wished IRS assistance, a request should be submitted no later than July 1, 1982. No such request, however, was forthcoming.

(2) In November 1982, during a visit to the Northern Marianas, two Committee staff members expressed to the Governor and his cabinet, as well as to a joint meeting of the legislature, that in their view there was little likelihood that the Congress would grant a further delay in IRC implementation. To the argument raised that the Northern Marianas need not abide by the IRC since U.S. citizenship had not yet been granted, the response was that the same logic would then also underlie suspension of the Commonwealth's eligibility for the numerous federal grant assistance programs in which the Northern Marianas were already participating.

(3) In early December 1982, the Northern Marianas Representative to Washington, D.C., after discussions with Committee members and staff, reportedly notified the Commonwealth as follows:

"It takes a Congressional act for [IRC] deferral and it will not take place during this Congress. . . ."

"Consequently, there will not be a deferral even if Department of Treasury presents a draft bill to Congress tomorrow," he stated. He suggested that the NMI either ask for assistance from Treasury to implement the code, or plan to take the responsibility itself. (Marianas Variety, December 3, 1982)

(4) In late December 1982, following an abortive attempt on the part of the Commonwealth Government to cajole the Congress into granting yet another IRC deferral, it was evident that the Northern Marianas could not implement Section 601 of the Covenant by January 1, 1983. Therefore, it was incumbent upon the Commonwealth to notify the Committee officially that it soon would be in violation of federal law; however, no such notification was received.

(5) In February 1983 at the Honolulu meeting of the Northern Marianas Laws Commission, Congressman Burton emphatically explained to the Northern Marianas delegation not only the necessity of meeting its commitments under Sections 601 and 602 or face possible reductions and suspensions of future federal funds, but also the legislative history underlying the tax agreement betwen the Northern Marianas and the United States.

(6) Lastly, prior to the Committee markup on S. 589 numerous attempts were made to obtain the views of the Northern Marianas leadership while it was in Washington for appropriations hearings. Although several meetings were requested, NMI's representatives failed to meet with Committee staff.

By May 1983, it was was obvious to all that the NMI had no intention of implementing the IRC. The Subcommittee on Insular Affairs met on May 9, 1983 to mark up S. 589, a territorial authorization bill. The following amendment, pertinent to IRC implementation, was adopted unanimously:

Sec. 3. Section 205(c) of Public Law 96-205 (94 Stat. 87) is amended to read as follows: "As provided in section 602 of Public Law 94-241 (90 Stat. 263) the term 'rebate of any taxes' shall apply only to the extent taxes have actually been paid pursuant to section 601 of said Act, shall not exceed the amount of tax actually paid for any tax year, and may only be paid following the close of the tax year involved. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands shall maintain, as a matter of public record, the name and address of each person receiving a rebate, together with the amount of the rebate, and the year for which such rebate was made.".

On May 11, 1983, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs considered and favorably reported S. 589 as amended for floor action (see attached report language).

LIMITATIONS ON CONGRESSIONAL PLENARY AUTHORITY

The limitations of Congressional plenary authority over the Northern Marianas are voluntarily undertaken with respect to only certain areas specified in Section 105 of the Covenant. To assume broader limitations upon Congressional authority is without foundation. In the process of seeking Congressional approval of the Covenant, Mr. Daniel H. Zafren, Legislative Attorney, American Law Division, Congressional Research Service, wrote on July 3, 1975 as follows:

It would appear that the labeling of any newly acquired territory of the United States as a "commonwealth" does not necessarily in and of itself have any special legal significance. Thus, under United States law and practice, the term "commonwealth" does not seem to have any fixed or technical legal meaning. . . .

Thus, it would seem that if the Congress agrees to the Covenant as presently proposed, a political entity in "free association" with the United States will be created when it comes into effect. Its legal status under United States law will be that of an organized and unincorporated territory, notwithstanding that it is called a Commonwealth. As such, the Congress would have complete and full authority over this territory, except as to any limitations thereover that it has agreed to.

And on the same topic, Mr. Robert L. Tienken, Senior Specialist in American Public Law, American Law Division, Congressional Research Service wrote on July 2, 1975 as follows:

In exercising its authority over unincorporated territories Congress may legislate directly, or organize a local government for the territory by legislation, or by compact with the territory as it did in the case of Puerto Rico, to provide for its internal governance. Because such authority is plenary except for certain fundamental constitutional limitations and treaty commitments, Congress may create a territorial government for an unincorporated Territory (Harris vs. Boceham, (C.A. Virgin Islands), 233 F. 2d 110 (1956). Whether this is accomplished through congressional legislation or by means of a compact is immaterial. The final authority rests with Congress. . . .

Section 105 of the Article I [of the Covenant] prohibits amendment of Articles I (Political Relationship), II (Constitution of the Marianas), and III (Citizenship and Nationality) and 805 (Restriction of alienation of real property to persons of Mariana Islands descent) without the consent of the proposed Government of the Northern Mariana Islands. Should Congress so wish to voluntarily restrict itself it may do so. . . .

In summary, consideration of the proposed Covenant by the Congress is actually an exercise of legislative authority over territory and possessions of the United States. In this instance it is the organization and creation of what is legally an unincorporated territory. In considering the Covenant Congress will be in the same position as though it were legislating as respects overseas territory and its legislative authority is thus plenary subject to certain constitutional limitations and international commitments.

The purpose is to create a political unit that is domestically autonomous but to which U.S. laws will be applicable as determined by the Covenant and by Congress.

Current legal opinion supports the findings of the Congressional Research Service. In Sablan Const. v. Government of the Trust Territory etc. (562 F. Supp. 135 (1981)), on November 4, 1981, the United States District Court, Northern Mariana Islands, Appellate Division held:

Whatever sovereignty is, prior decisions leave no doubt that it is something to which the Trust Territory's inchoate legal status and authority do not amount. That status and authority do not afford a shield against congressional legislation in general nor against the Covenant in particular.

Since the tax provisions of the Covenant are not designated by Section 105 as "fundamental provisions" which may be modified only with the consent of the Government of the Northern Mariana Islands, unilateral action on the part of the Congress is indeed possible. Such remedial legislation becomes all the more likely, considering that the Government of the Northern Marianas has refused to institute steps, in spite of promises to the contrary, to abide by the tax provisions of Public Law 94-241. In fact, it is within Congressional prerogative to extend by federal statute the IRC to the Commonwealth and to provide for IRS enforcement in a manner similar to its administration in the fifty states.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WON PAT. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. LUJAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have a question for the gentleman. One of the concerns has been on the reapportionment question as far as Guam is concerned.

And I might ask the gentleman. Is it correct that this bill does not mean that the Guam Legislature will run at large, they still must be redistricted to the same rules that apply to any other State; is that correct?

Mr. WON PAT. That is correct. As I told the gentleman in my letter of September 21, that is correct.

Mr. LUJAN. I thank the gentleman.

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of S. 589, a bill to authorize capital improvement projects in Guam, and the amendments that will be offered. I want to praise the chairman of the Insular Affairs Subcommittee, my good friend, TONY WON PAT, and the ranking member, BOB LAGOMARSINO, and their staff for their excellent work on this legislation.

S. 589, as amended, addresses a number of issues of importance to the territories. Congress has been entrusted with the responsibility over the territories of the United States and we should exercise that duty diligently and conscientiously. During the next couple of years, we will be called upon to vote on the termination of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, a trusteeship entrusted to us by the United Nations in 1948. Thus, the way we treat our territories is a reflection of the manner in which to exercise our responsibilities.

The different amendments of the legislation are being offered after serious and extensive discussion and consideration and should be adopted. Although this bill generally does not affect Puerto Rico, there are two provisions which are of importance to us. The first will exempt the insular areas of the United States—including Hawaii in addition to Puerto Rico and the other U.S. territories—from the provisions of Public Law 97-253. That law established, among other things, a 50 cent per hundredweight assessment on milk to discourage surplus production. Since the milk markets in these areas are distinct and clearly separate from the market in the U.S. mainland, this assessment constitutes and unreasonable burden on our consumers. The provision exempting the insular areas of the United States and Alaska from the dairy assessment has been included in H.R. 1875, the Dairy Production Stabilization Act of 1983 which has been reported out of the Committee on Agriculture and is pending before the House. Because of delays over scheduling action on that legislation, staff of the Agriculture Committee have assured us that there is no objection to including that provision in S. 589.

The second provision in the bill of importance to Puerto Rico broadens the authority of Public Law 96-597 to allow the implementation of the recommendations of the territorial energy assessment report submitted to the Congress in December 1982. Public Law 96-597 directed the Secretary of Energy to prepare comprehensive plans on the energy use, resources, potential and needs of each territory. It is extremely important that the work of the DOE be taken a step further and that its recommendations regarding projects and programs be implemented.

Again, I restate my strong support for this legislation and urge my colleagues to vote in favor of its passage.●

● Mr. SUNIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the omnibus territories bill. As you and the Members know, this bill contains a number of issues pertaining to the territories of the United States.

For American Samoa, this bill would change the amount of forgiven matches from $100,000 per grant to $200,000. This represents a savings of about $3 million to the territory each year. While such sums may not appear gigantic to you sir and most of my colleagues, it represents a sizable contribution to our annual budget.

This bill has been one of the best forms of assistance to my territory. The inability for American Samoa to put together the matching portion of many Federal grants has precluded us from participating in many grant activities. Because of the very limited resources of the territories, it is difficult, very very difficult, to find funds for matches. Passage of this bill will mean that we save the match and also participate in the program. The $3 million I mentioned as possible savings therefore does not completely indicate the complete picture of benefits. The full amount of the grant can also be considered as a benefit—derived from this passage.

Second, Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, this bill provides for the permanency of the constitution of American Samoa. Because this constitution was drafted by order of the Secretary of the Interior, and amendments to it are effective only by his approval, the Secretary has taken on himself the right of unilaterally amending the constitution without a vote of the people. The idea of unilateral changes to a constitution in my view is totally undemocratic. It brings back old and ugly memories of what this Nation must never be charged with—colonialism.

This bill contains a provision which makes all future changes to this constitution of the territory subject to congressional approval. It requires that, the Secretary of the Interior—and therefore the President of the United States—is prohibited from ever making any changes without the consent of the people who must live under that constitution.

Furthermore, since the territory has a Representative in Congress—and none at the executive branch—it makes sense to place the approval of changes at a place where the territory is represented. And it is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that the source of legislation must be Congress, not the Department of the Interior.

Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I would not be seeking this amendment if the Secretary and his representatives had not openly declared their possession of the authority to unilaterally make changes, plus their intention to use it in support of department policies. To do so would be to annul every bit of democratic principle this Nation stands for.

With these brief comments, I urge your favorable consideration of this measure, and its passage today.●

● Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this legislation and ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

This bill contains many provisions which are of great importance to our Nation's people living in insular areas throughout the Pacific and the Caribbean. Of special significance in this legislation is a provision which would exempt Hawaii and the territories of the United States from the burdensome dairy assessments imposed under the Agricultural Reconciliation Act of 1982. I firmly believe that this exemption is justified, and, in fact, long overdue. These dairy assessments impose a particularly large burden of offshore areas—such as Guam, Samoa, and Hawaii.

Dairy assessments were included in the Agricultural Reconciliation Act of 1982 for some very specific reasons: Many dairy farmers were simply producing too much milk and too many milk products. This surplus production became too expensive for the Federal Government. The assessments included in the Agricultural Reconciliation Act of 1982 allowed the Secretary of Agriculture to assess dairy farmers 50 cents per hundredweight of milk produced. As of September 1, 1983, this assessment was raised to $1 for each hundredweight of milk produced. While these assessments may possibly make sense for the continental United States, for places like Hawaii and other insular areas they are irrelevant, and may well put our dairy farmers right out of business.

As I am sure you know, Hawaii is located in the middle of the Pacific Ocean, some 2,700 miles from the continental United States. Many offshore areas are even further from mainland supplies and ports. The problems of supply and demand in our insular areas are not the same problems of supply and demand faced routinely by cities and States on the mainland. the nature of the dairy system in the insular areas of our Nation is simply unique.

Dairy farming in Hawaii has very little to do with dairy farming on the mainland. The dairy industry in Hawaii runs a fresh milk only operation. We have no facilities to process milk for cheese, butter or nonfat dry milk. There is no way in the world that a dairy farmer in Hawaii could contribute to the Nation's growing surplus of cheese, butter or dry milk products. If Hawaii cannot possibly contribute to the dairy surplus problem, then Hawaii certainly should not be forced to pay the penalty for creating such a surplus.

Not only are we in Hawaii unable to produce cheese, butter or dry milk products due to a lack of facilities, but we are also prevented from generating any surplus production by State regulations. Under the terms of the Fresh Milk Control Act, a rigid system of control and production has been instituted in Hawaii. This results in a level of production sufficient to satisfy demand within the State, while at the very same time, preventing any surplus production from occurring. The end result of this regulation is that supply meets demand production in Hawaii; no surplus is generated for use in Hawaii or in any other State.

To force Hawaii and other insular areas which do not contribute to the problem of surplus dairy products to pay an additional cost of production is simply unfair. Not only do we not contribute to the source of the problem, but many insular areas do not even benefit from Federal price supports. In Hawaii, for example, the cost of production is 21.09 cents per hundredweight. The Federal price support is at 13.10 cents per hundredweight. What this means is that in Hawaii, the cost of production is 60 percent higher than the rate of Federal price support. To make matters worse, the cost to the consumer is far higher in Hawaii than on the mainland; while milk costs an average of 66 cents a quart in mainland markets, Hawaii consumers pay an average of 98 cents per quart.

It is perfectly clear the offshore areas can and should legitimately claim that their markets are separate and independent from the mainland dairy market. Furthermore, they neither add to the current surplus nor benefit from the national program of price supports. Because of these special circumstances, it is quite clear that all offshore areas richly deserve the exemption from the dairy assessment which they are granted under the terms of this legislation.●

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, the very able chairman of the Subcommittee on Insular Affairs, TONY WON PAT, has comprehensively explained why S. 589, as he proposes to amend it, warrants the approval of this House. So, I will not comment upon the many meritorious provisions of the measure.

I do, however, want to make a couple of observations about the overall bill that support his call for its passage.

The first may have meaning only for me, although perhaps some others in this Chamber may find it persuasive as well. It is that this omnibus insular areas assistance bill represents my late husband's last efforts to meet the needs of the millions of our fellow Americans of the insular areas.

Phil worked on the development of this legislation during the last months of his life with TONY WON PAT, RON DE LUGO, FOFO SUNIA, BALTASAR CORRADA, DANNY AKAKA and, of course, BOB LAGOMARSINO and others. In fact, he made his final decisions about this worthwhile legislative package in Hawaii just over a week before he left us.

This bill, as it was just outlined by Chairman WON PAT, is virtually identical in intent to the bill outlined by Phil earlier this year. Thus, I feel a special sense of pride in being able to carry forth Phil's last wishes for the insular areas by recommending favorable action to the House today.

The second point I wish to make is that this bill before us adheres to Phil's dictum that measures affecting the insular areas be considered on a bipartisan basis.

Insular areas concerns are a national responsibility; they are a special assignment for leadership to the Congress under the Constitution. Partisan politics has no place in our exercise of this mandate for congressional decisionmaking.

The cooperation that the distinguished ranking Republican of the Committe on Interior and Insular Affairs, MANUEL LUJAN, and the very dedicated ranking Republican of the Subcommittee on Insular Affairs, BOB LAGOMARSINO, have extended throughout development of this bill indicate that this approach is agreed to on both sides of the aisle. MANUEL, BOB and others in the minority are to be complimented equally with the outstanding chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, MO UDALL, TONY and others for their fine work on this bill.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me address a message to the powerless people of the territories that this bill, like the omnibus bills enacted before it, is designed to assist: I will carry on Phil's dedication to you, working with the very capable Representatives you now have to this House. I pledge to you through TONY, RON, FOFO, and BALTASAR, my concern, compassion and my constant willingness and availability to help.

And to my colleagues in the House today, I entreat you to honor Phil's memory and love for the people of the insular areas by supporting this omnibus assistance bill now before us.●

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to vote in favor of passing an amended S. 589 today. The amendments cover a number of issues of importance to the territories.

One amendment which I have added is of particular interest to my district and removes the requirement that the Department of the Interior approve expenditures made from the rum fund. The fund consists of rum excise taxes collected on local rum when sold in the 50 States. The taxes are rebated to the Virgin Islands in order to provide a source of funding for capital improvement projects. This recognizes the additional assistance needed for the infrastructure difficulties the Virgin Islands must overcome.

Apart from the problems caused by inordinate delays in these clearly local decisions when dealing with a removed level of bureaucracy, Interior approval smacks of the colonial days when that department literally dominated every aspect of territorial government.

Congress has consistently endorsed the move to greater home rule in the U.S. territories. This is yet another opportunity for the House to say, "Yes, the U.S. Virgin Islands is ready."●

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 589 as amended. The provisions of this year's territorial omnibus bill are applicable to the U.S. insular areas and are designed to stimulate political, economic, and social growth in these strategic oceanic regions. In short, an explanation of the contents of S. 589 follows:

Section 1 authorizes $15.5 million for necessary water, sewer lines, drainage, and road improvements in the Tumon Bay area on Guam and to complete the islands' penitentiary. The other body passed this measure on April 7, 1983. And the administration concurs with the authorization, recommending partial funding, however, for fiscal year 1984. Since this is an authorization bill, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs prefers enactment of complete authorization at this time rather than to defer action to later years.

Section 2 provides authorization, already available to the Department of the Interior, to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers for the construction of a hydroelectric facility in Ponape.

To these provisions, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs added the following amendments:

Section 3 directs the Northern Mariana Islands (NMI) to abide by the tax provisions of the covenant (Public Law 94-241), effective January 1, 1985. The legislative history of this amendment is extensive, extending over 9 years and involving four different public laws. On September 20, 1983, bipartisan committee staff met with the Northern Marianas' representative to Washington and representatives from public and private sectors in the NMI and came up with the following recommended compromise to alleviate this complex situation:

The effective date of the Internal Revenue Code (IRC) tax provisions of the covenant would be changed from January 1, 1983, to January 1, 1985. The government of the NMI, in consultation with the Department of the Treasury, will be required to report to both Houses of Congress, beginning on January 1, 1984, and on a quarterly basis thereafter, on the progress being made toward the final drafting of legislation that would address the implementation of the IRC in the NMI to comply with sections 601 and 602 of the covenant and/or Federal Tax Code. This section, and any future legislation that addresses this situation, is not intended to remove the NMI from under the jurisdiction of the Federal Tax Code, but only to explore the possibility of permitting the NMI greater flexibility in adapting the code to meet their own peculiar tax needs. Last, it is agreed that the NMI will consult with the government of Guam to determine if any changes in the application of the IRC in the NMI would adversely affect Guam and, in doing so, arrive at a mutually compatible agreement in regard to any future legislation.

On the other hand, if legislative remedies fail, the "mirror image" of the IRC will go into effect in the NMI as currently specified by the covenant on January 1, 1985.

Section 4 authorizes $10 million in loan or grant authority in order to upgrade the power and water distribution systems in the U.S. Virgin Islands.

Section 5 limits the necessity of all employees of the government of the Virgin Islands to be citizens of the United States except for principal elected and appointed officials. Moreover, the committee finds no necessity to restrict the use by the Virgin Islands of rum excise tax collections rebated by the Federal Government, especially since the same constraints do not apply to Puerto Rico. Last, Guam's Organic Act is amended to permit reapportionment of the legislature more often than once every 10 years with the understanding that passage of this section will not affect the manner in which Guam's legislators are districted.

Section 6 increases the waiver on matching funds for Federal grants in aid to the Northern Marianas and American Samoa from $100,000, currently authorized in Public Law 96-205, to $200,000. The policy underlying this amendment is one of long standing. Since both territories are so heavily dependent upon the Federal Government for operational funds, it makes little sense to match Federal dollars with what are essentially other Federal dollars. This amendment is designed to account for inflationary trends and would result in an estimated outlay of no more than $150,000 each year.

Section 7 clarifies the intent of Public Law 96-597, continuing the authorization for the development of renewable energy resources in the U.S. insular areas.

Section 8 directs the Secretary of the Interior to implement a four-atoll health care plan for Bikini, Enewetak, Rongelap, and Utirik, whose populations were adversely affected by U.S. nuclear testing in the Pacific. This law has been on the books (Public Law 96-205) since March 12, 1980, but no action has been taken, pending results of political status negotiations between the Micronesian states and the U.S. Government. There is no assurance as to when this over 14-year process of political status negotiations will terminate or whether the U.S. Congress will approve the result. Accordingly, this amendment directs the Secretary to assume responsibility for health care of those eligible under Public Law 96-205 without further delay.

Section 9 is a technical amendment, recommended by the administration, to change the effective date of social security implementation from the date of trusteeship termination to the following January 1 after trusteeship termination.

Section 10 permits the Civil Aeronautics Board to conduct essential air service determinations for Guam even though it is served by more than one U.S.-flag carrier. Some of the insular areas are totally dependent upon air to provide passenger and mail service. Because of their isolation, the insular areas deserve special consideration in the determination of essential air service. A similar provision passed the other body in the 97th Congress; but because of its lateness in the second session, it was not enacted into law.

Section 11 permits EPA to issue case-by-case exemptions from Clean Air Act requirements for some insular areas. In many cases, the application of clean air requirements to the insular areas is inappropriate and expensive. For example, the installation of seawater scrubbers on Guam's powerplants would cost an estimated $20 million with a $10 million annual upkeep without any notable environmental improvement. This amendment is based upon testimony presented by the administration which seeks legislative relief from the imposition of Clean Air Act provisions in situations which are clearly inapplicable in the insular areas.

Section 12 requires that future amendments of the constitution of American Samoa be first approved by the Congress.

Section 13 authorizes the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to conduct water and related land resources studies in the Northern Mariana Islands, authority which already exists in the 50 States as well as the other U.S. territories.

Section 14 exempts the insular areas from the assessment to milk farmers under the dairy price support program. Once again, we have an example of legislation designed to fit circumstances on the mainland, inadvertently applied to the insular areas and harmful to their economies. This provision was recommended for passage in the Agricultural Committee, but for reasons unrelated to the insular areas exemption, the bill is considered unlikely to be enacted. Accordingly, the Agricultural Committee has voiced no objections to including this provision in the omnibus bill.

Mr. Speaker, S. 589 is prudent legislation. I recommend unanimous approval of its provisions by all my colleagues.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Guam (Mr. WON PAT).

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill just considered and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Guam?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken after legislative business on Tuesday, October 4, 1983.

NATIONAL SUMMIT CONFERENCE ON EDUCATION ACT OF 1983

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3245) to provide for the establishment of a National Summit Conference on Education, as amended.

H.R. 3245

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. (a) This Act may be cited as the "National Summit Conference on Education Act of 1983".

(b) The Congress finds that—

(1) increased economic competition requires the development of a better trained and educated workforce which our educational institutions must provide;

(2) problems and deficiencies in American elementary and secondary education require consideration of possible new directions in setting national education policy; and

(3) there should be a National Summit Conference on Education authorized by law by Congress to provide directions for such policy, and any conference established by the Department of Education should be complementary to the National Summit Conference on Education.

SEC. 2. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Education $500,000 for the purpose of conducting a National Summit Conference on Education, in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 3. The participants in the National Summit Conference on Education shall consist of no more than two hundred individuals. Such individuals shall be representative of teachers, parents, school administrators, school board members, State education officials, State legislators, Governors, students, business, labor, and special populations, including females, racial and ethnic minorities, and the disabled. The participants in the Conference shall be selected so as to provide racial, political, and geographic balance.

SEC. 4. The participants in the National Summit Conference on Education shall be chosen from nominees submitted to the Executive Committee (established pursuant to section 5) by organizations representing public and private elementary and secondary education, vocational education, adult education, teacher training, women, racial and ethnic minorities, and the disabled, as well as from nominees supplied by organizations representing business, organized labor, parents, and all levels of government.

SEC. 5. (a) There shall be an Executive Committee of the National Summit Conference on Education consisting of two individuals appointed by the President of the United States, two individuals appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and two individuals appointed by the majority leader of the Senate, and six individuals appointed by the Governors of the States acting as a group. The six individuals appointed by the Governors shall be appointed from individuals representing chief State school officers, local and State school boards (including State boards of higher education), State legislatures, and Governors. In making their appointments, the Governors shall ensure that not more than one-half the total membership of the Executive Committee shall be members of the same political party.

(b) The Executive Committee shall be responsible for selecting a presiding officer and for selecting the organizations (described in section 4) to supply a list of nominees for selection as participants in the Conference. No fewer than thirty organizations shall be so selected by the Executive Committee. Each organization selected shall nominate at least the number of individuals specified by the Executive Committee for that organization in order to provide the representativeness required by sections 3 and 4. The Executive Committee shall determine the total number of individuals to be selected for participation, in keeping with the limits and requirements of sections 3 and 4 and this section.

(c) The Executive Committee shall serve without compensation.

SEC. 6. (a) The Executive Committee shall appoint and fix the compensation of such staff as may be deemed necessary, not to exceed the equivalent of four full-time employees. The staff shall assist the Executive Committee in planning, conducting, and completing the work of the Conference.

(b) The Executive Committee, with the concurrence of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the majority leader of the Senate, shall appoint a staff director, who shall be responsible for keeping the Congress and the Secretary of Education fully and currently informed with respect to the activities of the Executive Committee.

(c) The Secretary of Education shall furnish the Executive Committee with suitable office space and such other assistance as it may require to carry out its functions. The Secretary shall designate an officer of the Department of Education to serve as a liaison officer with respect to the Executive Committee.

SEC. 7. A majority of participants of the National Summit Conference on Education shall constitute a quorum if votes are required. If task forces are created, the majority of task force participants shall constitute a quorum if a vote is required.

SEC. 8. (a) The Executive Committee, using data concerning education supplied by the Secretary of Education and by the States and regions, shall develop an agenda for the Conference prior to the Conference. The purpose of this agenda shall be to facilitate development of recommendations on various issues raised by such recently issued education reports as those of the National Commission on Excellence in Education, the Carnegie Report on American High Schools, the National Science Boards' Report on Mathematics, Science and Technology Education, and others.

(b) The agenda so developed shall take into account that among the purposes of the Conference shall be to create national bipartisan support for education at all levels of government, and to make recommendations for development of viable local, State, and national intergovernmental and intragovernmental cooperation to make the most efficient use of funds from all levels of government.

(c) The agenda shall also provide for procedures for determining national consensus regarding types of strategies to be used and the appropriate levels of government to have primary responsibility for implementation.

SEC. 9. The Executive Committee shall select the conference site and shall determine the duration of the Conference, not to exceed six days in length. The Conference shall prepare and transmit a written record of its recommendations to the President, to the Congress, and to the States not later than June 15, 1984.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS).

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the measure before us today represents the first step at the national level toward improving the quality of education in this country.

H.R. 3245 establishes a National Summit Conference on Education and authorizes $500,000 for its operation. I wish to commend our colleague, PAT WILLIAMS, for introducing this legislation, for amassing widespread support for it among educators, parents, business, and the public, and for shaping a legislative package that I feel we can all support. I would also like to call attention to the good work of our ranking Republican member on the subcommittee, Congressman BILL GOODLING, for his work in creating a bipartisan package and for recommending some real improvements to the legislation.

During the past several months, several major reports have been released dealing with educational quality at the elementary and secondary level. Although these reports include recommendations for bettering our schools, we have seen little organized discussion about how to implement these recommendations.

A National Summit Conference will bring together a bipartisan, diverse group of Americans to discuss the Federal, State and local responsibilities for improving and supporting education.

H.R. 3245 calls for this Conference to be held and to report to the President, the Congress, and the States by June 15, 1984.

The Summit Conference will consist of no more than 200 participants, representing all areas of education, parents, legislators, governors, business, and labor. The participants shall also be racially, politically, and geographically balanced.

Many of the details of organizing the Conference will be determined by a 12-member executive committee with 2 members apiece appointed by the President, the Speaker of the House, and the Senate majority leader, and 6 appointed by the Governors. The executive committee will be responsible for selecting participants from among nominees furnished by a wide array of educational and other organizations, for developing the Conference agenda, for selecting the site, and for determining its duration.

We all know that education has been the focus of national discussion recently. A National Summit Conference will enable us to take advantage of this interest in education and direct it toward bringing about genuine improvements.

H.R. 3245, NATIONAL SUMMIT CONFERENCE ON EDUCATION

Authorization: $500,000 to be appropriated to the Department of Education.

Purpose: To bring together a representative, bipartisan group of Americans to discuss how to implement recommendations to improve educational quality; the Federal, State, and local responsibilities in education; and how to make the most efficient use of resources.

Who participates: No more than 200 participants, representing teachers, parents, school administrators, board members, State education officials, State legislators, Governors, students, business, labor, females, minorities, handicapped persons.

Selection of participants: Participants chosen from nominees submitted to an executive committee by education and other organizations.

Executive committee: 12 members, appointed by President, House Speaker, Senate majority leader and the Governors. Responsible for selecting participants, developing agenda, selecting site, determining duration.

Timing: Report to Congress, the President, States by June 15, 1984.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS), one of the authors of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, for several months now education, its value and quality, has been in the forefront of our national thought.

Recent large-scale research studies conclude that our schools need change and our students' scholastic achievements need improvement. The various education analyses which have been conducted during the past 18 months do not concur about either the problem or the solutions, but they do point to the need to rectify existing problems and to focus upon providing quality education to all of our citizens.

It is instructive to note that most of the research studies prefaced or concluded the report with statements about the significance of education to Americans personally, to our industrial and social achievements, to our national life.

During 5 days this past June, I chaired hearings entitled "Education Quality and Federal Policy." Those hearings were held before the House Budget Committee and its Task Force on Education and Employment. We received testimony covering seven major education report , including "The Nation at Risk" and the "Twentieth Century Fund Report." Since our hearings, several other excellent reports have been completed, including the recent Carnegie report and the National Science Board study.

Forty witnesses came before our Budget Committee. The testimony was as helpful as any I have received during my 5 years in the Congress.

We discussed the appropriate role of the various levels of government, the significance and value of Federal support of our schools, and proper participation in education for business and labor.

Those hearings represented the collection of the best analysis, some of the most recently expressed concerns, and recommended solutions for the current dilemma facing education.

Our schools are at the divergence. American education will soon turn, and in the turning will set upon new tasks which will soon be significant in our national life.

It is in response to that turning, those soon to be created new directions, that I present this legislation creating a National Summit Conference on Education.

It is only common sense that, before we take action of any kind to attempt to solve this Nation's problems in education, before we increase or decrease spending, before we build up or tear down existing programs, before we create any new initiatives, that we take a moment to carefully consider the situation confronting us. We need to have access to as much information as possible. We need to hear more than one point of view. We need to take action that best suits the interests of all Americans. The National Summit Conference on Education would do that.

A number of my friends on the other side of the aisle agree with me. We believe that no one person or group has the right answer for our future. No single report, not one dealing only with secondary education, not one that contains only selective recommendations for change, not one that is in disagreement with other reports, can provide us with sufficient answers. It would be imprudent to tie our future to that one report alone, as excellent as it may be in its own right. The National Summit Conference on Education would consider recommendations of all of the leading education reports recently issued, not just the one report issued by the National Commission.

I do not have to tell you that the Department of Education is understaffed; until the "Nation at Risk" came along, the Department suffered from neglect; its mission was not clear; its internal workings have been repeatedly characterized by friction and stress; its morale is low. This Department is not being asked to organize a major national meeting, one that is supposed to give the Nation direction. Not only is it unlikely that such a meeting can be effectively planned and staged in the next 6 weeks, but also it is unlikely that the outcomes of such a meeting will be sufficiently comprehensive to meet our needs.

The national summit conference on education would include on its agenda, input from citizens at the local level, from all regions of the country. This conference would include on its agenda consideration of the diverse recommendations for change as included in the National Commission's report, the Twentieth Century Fund report, the National Science Board report, the Carnegie Foundation report; it would also include consideration of other relevant education data supplied by the Secretary of Education and the States. It is only commonsense to take all such data bases into consideration.

The national summit conference will be a structured working group. Individuals representing education, business, labor, parents, students, and others, will be selected by a bipartisan committee to participate in the weeklong conference. A specific agenda will be in place and the outcomes of this conference will be evaluated to determine its effect. It is not a study; it is not a commission.

It is a mechanism to avoid a costly rush to judgment.

It is a mechanism to provide a way in which to include Americans in the discussions in their system of education. It is, I believe, a strategy for success.

I am very encouraged and thankful for the bipartisan support we have received on this bill, and I am encouraged by the support we have received from all of the leading education groups, including the NEA, the AFT, the PTA, and others. I welcome the full support of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the AFL-CIO. So many of us seem to see this approach as the commonsense thing to do. I hope my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will join with all of us in supporting the national summit conference on education.

I thank the chairman for his support for this legislation.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3245, the bill to establish a national summit conference on education. I also would like to commend the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS) for his outstanding efforts to reach out to all of the education groups and the public and for his willingness to work with the minority members of our committee in developing a bipartisan substitute bill.

Among the purposes of this bill, a major focus will be to remove education out of the realm of partisan politics. This is made clear both by the specific structure of the executive committee of the conference, the selection and role of the conference staff, the selection of the conference participants, and the stated goals of the bill. In addition, the committee report strongly reinforces and clarifies this legislative intent.

This legislation is intended to go beyond the efforts of the Secretary of Education who has focused his efforts on only one national study. I commend him for his efforts but I must repeat that the summit conference on education will build upon and develop the work of the Secretary which will be completed by the end of 1983. In addition to the limited focus of the Secretary, the summit conference will examine the best way to implement the recommendations of the other national studies such as the Carnegie Foundation Report, the Twentieth Century Fund Report, the States' Task Force on Education, and the National Science Board Study. The efforts of the Secretary and his focus on the National Commission on Excellence in Education are useful but not sufficient if Congress and the American people are to take a comprehensive look at the condition of education in this Nation and then have the various levels of government take appropriate action. The issue is not how to throw more money at the problem, but to access where certain actions can be taken most effectively and how our resources can be utilized most efficiently.

Mr. Speaker, support for this legislation runs across the political spectrum from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to the AFL-CIO. It includes all of the major education associations such as the School Boards Association, School Administrators Association, both teacher unions, the American Vocational Association, and others. The administration is concerned that the summit will duplicate the efforts of the Secretary of Education, but I feel these concerns are not well-founded. We specifically addressed these concerns which the Secretary mentioned when he testified before our subcommittee. That is why I was surprised to learn that the administration has come out in opposition to this bill. The bipartisan substitute bill which was developed last week addresses the problem by insuring that efforts will be coordinated and that the summit will go beyond the Secretary's limited focus.

We hope to keep down the cost of this summit in a number of ways. For example, perhaps this conference can be held on a college or university campus, perhaps some of the organizations that will be sending people there to represent them will be able to pay for that transportation. But again let me emphasize, we go far beyond what the Secretary is doing with his regional meetings, where he is concentrating strictly on his study. "A Nation at Risk." We are going far beyond that. Among others, the Carnegie Foundation has done a study, the Twentieth Century Fund has done a study. We want to make sure that we have a coordinated effort with the Secretary so that we are not duplicating what he is doing but going far beyond that.

In closing I would like to reemphasize the point made in our bipartisan committee report.

During the past several months, education has emerged as a topic of national discussion and concern.

Spurred by the release of several major reports concerning educational quality—such as those by the National Commission on Excellence in Education, the Education Commission of the States' Task Force on Education and Economic Growth, the Twentieth Century Fund, the National Science Board's Commission on Pre-College Education in Mathematics, Science, and Technology and the Carnegie Foundation—this debate has focused on how to improve education at the elementary and secondary level for all students. Although these reports make recommendations toward this end, little organized discussion has taken place about the feasibility of difference recommendations and how they can be implemented. A coordinated effort needs to occur to develop a national consensus about educational goals and to delineate the rolls of all levels of government in carrying out and funding these approaches.

H.R. 3245 is the logical extension of this national debate. A Summit Conference would provide a comprehensive forum for a serious discussion about educational quality. Concerned individuals representing all areas of education, business, labor, and the public could approach solutions in a coordinated, rather than a piecemeal fashion. The Summit Conference will facilitate the sharing of ideas about effective practices, efficient use of resources, and new approaches to educational problems. A bipartisan, representative Conference will enable us to take advantage of the current climate of interest in and support for education and direct it towards effectuating real improvement.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODLING. I yield to the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS), the sponsor of the legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I again want to commend the gentleman for his work with me in the development of this bipartisan legislation.

I was very pleased to have my colleague's support because that support resulted in some amendments which significantly strengthened this bill and, frankly, made it make more sense than it did when it was originally introduced.

I also want to commend the gentleman, if he will yield further, for his understanding of the importance of the Secretary's ongoing meetings with regard to following up the National Commission on Excellence Report, "A Nation at Risk." Those are necessary meetings. It is important that the Secretary conduct them. But I certainly agree, as does my colleague and the overwhelming majority of the Members of our House Education and Labor Committee, that the Secretary's meetings were in no way meant to be a national summit conference.

They were not meant to cover a broad spectrum of problems in education. They have not, to this date at least, and they are half-ended, included members of the summit conference either in significant participation or in the development of the agenda for those meetings.

It makes good sense to me that the Congress should be involved as an equal partner with the President and the Secretary of Education in including the American people in an agenda where they can be heard with regard to their concerns and their solutions about education.

Again, I thank the gentleman for yielding, but particularly for his good help in the drafting of this legislation.

Mr. GOODLING. I thank the sponsor for his comments. Let me just then again say that we are not duplicating what the Secretary is doing. We are building on that. We are taking all of the different studies that are presently out and, in return, we hope to make sure that the Congress of the United States does not go ahead and throw money at a problem until we are exactly sure what those problems are and exactly sure whose responsibility it is to deal with those problems.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. GUNDERSON).

Mr. GUNDERSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I guess I would like to address my comments to those of my colleagues who have some skepticism about the bill that is now before us because I must admit to my colleagues, as I sat on our subcommittee and we began the hearings on this particular bill, I thought the last thing that education needs in this country is another study or conference, and the last thing this country needs is another expenditure not to exceed $500,000.

When one considers those two questions, one must ask, then, why would someone come to the well of the floor of the House today and support the National Summit Conference on Education, as I do.

The reason I do is because after sitting through all those hearings and looking at this bill and working with the subcommittee in trying to put together a bill that all of us could support, I have come to the conclusion that we have a problem in education that is even greater than the problem of poor quality. Perhaps the greatest problem facing education today is the politicization of our educational system. I do not know when it started, whether it started with the creation of the Department of Education, whether it started with the activism of various education associations in the political arena, whether it started before that time, but certainly it has become evident since the various national commission reports have come out.

As those reports have come out, all of a sudden we have had some great political debate about education, but I am not sure we have had a lot of substance about the solutions. Some people have suggested that the reason we have problems in education today is because the Federal Government became involved in the first place. Others have suggested that it is obvious that the only solution to our educational problems today is to throw more money at education. When one looks at the fact that we have perhaps the highest per capita expenditure on education in the world today, I think we quickly realize that both of those extreme positions—there ought to be no Federal role or there simply ought to be more money—are both wrong, and someplace there is a better answer and a more proper role for what the response ought to be to education at all different levels of government.

We can and we should have philosophical differences as to how to improve education in this country, but there is, my friends, a very big difference between philosophical differences in education and playing politics with education, as we have thus far in 1983.

That is why I support the bill before us, because to the great commendation of the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS), he had every opportunity to make this, frankly, a very political issue and to come in here and say we are going to have a conference on education to compete with the Secretary's regional and national summit meetings. But he rejected that idea, and I give him great credit. He rejected it because, frankly, education is too important to play politics with.

Through the cooperation of the gentleman from Montana and the cooperation of the chairman of our committee and our distinguished ranking member, we have been able to in this bill put a number of assurances in that I think will eliminate the party politics. For example, as the bill says, the participants in the conference shall be selected so as to provide racial, political, and geographical balance. I particularly point out the political balance that the conference members must include.

In addition to that, we have language now that will provide a political balance in the Executive Committee that will, in essence, run the particular conference, and also of the professional staff who will be a part of it.

If my colleagues will look, those who are skeptical about the Federal role in education, if they will look at the next to last section of the bill, section 8, they will notice that it says the agenda shall be developed to take into account that among the purposes of the conference shall be to create a national bipartisan support for education at all levels of Government and to make recommendations for the development of viable local, State, and national intergovernmental and intragovernmental cooperation to make the most efficient use of funds from all levels of government.

This, my friends, is not some ploy to take over education in this country at the national level. It is not some effort to conclude with recommendations that say the only solution to education's problems is more Federal money and more Federal participation and more Federal control. Nothing of the sort; rather, an effort to bring the various studies, the various commission reports, together and to find a way in which we can cooperate at the local, the State, and at the National level to improve education in this country.

My friends, the training of a work force in a complex society, the preparation of our young people to live in a difficult and complex and highly technological world, and I think education itself, all mandate that we eliminate the partnership that could destroy education, not improve it.

I think this bill represents a possibility, a chance, and a hope to do it. For that reason, I encourage my colleagues to support the passage of this particular bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I join my colleague from Wisconsin in his good remarks. I want to take 1 minute of his time to thank him for his understanding from the outset that it was necessary to remove education from the worst type of partisanship, that campaign wrangling that would end up defeating our real purpose, which is to improve education and to find new and innovative ways to do so.

The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. GUNDERSON) has consistently been encouraged by the bill, but wanted to assure, as he should have, that it would be conducted in a totally bipartisan, not necessarily nonpartisan, but bipartisan way which he believed, and I believe with him, would eventually benefit all the people in this country who need and want a decent education. I commend the gentleman.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I thank the gentleman for his remarks, and certainly for his cooperation.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to congratulate the gentleman in the well not only for his active participation in this piece of legislation, but for his interest in the subjects that we deal with.

In the past, unfortunately, we have had an awful lot of people on the committee who were there because they got assigned there. Finally, on our side of the aisle, we have a group of people who are truly interested in the subject matter. I appreciate that very much and want to again compliment the gentleman for his efforts on this legislation and other legislation that comes before our subcommittee.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I thank the gentleman for those comments, and particularly for the leadership he has shown the Members on our side.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3245, the National Summit Conference on Education Act, which would bring together a bipartisan group of experts in the field of education to discuss how local, State, and Federal Governments can implement the many recent recommendations for the improvement of schooling in this Nation.

Recently, we have been overwhelmed by a spate of reports criticizing the state of education, urging reform to the system, and presenting a myriad of alternatives to resolve the situation. Obviously, changes must be enacted and policies reexamined, but first we must determine which specifics should be pursued, and which alternatives will best return our educational system to an even and productive keel.

I commend my colleague, the gentleman from Montana, for developing this legislation, which will allow experts from all fields of education to come together, discuss previous reports and synthesize their recommendations into a concise plan of action which can be embraced by school officials at all levels. I am pleased to note the bipartisan support this bill has received, and the bipartisan design of the executive committee, which will organize the summit conference.

The education of our children should be a prime concern of this Congress and this Nation, an issue which deserves our most serious study. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of H.R. 3245, to set up a mechanism for close scrutiny of today's schools, and a blueprint for improving those of tomorrow.●

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support for H.R. 3245, the National Summit Conference on Education Act. It represents a continuing effort on the part of Congress to seek ways to enhance our present education system.

This legislation authorizes the Congress to hold a national summit conference on education that will bring together concerned individuals from across the country. These people will study the recommendations put forth by various organizations, such as the National Commission on Excellence on Education and the National Science Board.

The National Summit Conference will report its findings back to the President, the Congress, and the States on June 15, 1984. Their report will be timely and will hopefully provide a sense of direction for the Nation on this vital issue.

If we are to be successful in reviving our educational system, it will require a concerted effort on the parts of parents, teachers, and public officials. H.R. 3245 will help us achieve this goal.●

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my support for legislation that would authorize a National Summit Conference on Education. As the author of identical legislation introduced earlier this year, H.R. 3245, as well as a cosponsor of this bill before us today, I want to commend my colleagues on the Education and Labor Committee, Chairman CARL PERKINS and the sponsor of H.R. 3245, PAT WILLIAMS, for their timely attention to this very important problem.

At no time in our recent history have we witnessed such a growing national concern over our educational priorities at the Federal, State, and local levels of government. Scores of reports have denounced our existing educational systems as inadequate—I prefer to think that they need some readjustment. By providing for a national summit conference, we can for the first time bring together all the elements of the educational community which have a direct and vested interest in the improvement of education. At such a conference, we can merge the collective interests of all levels of government into a workable plan of action, Without such an agenda which has across-the-board support, we will, I believe, never see a comprehensive solution to our current educational crisis.

As the senior New York member of the Education and Labor Committee, I conducted hearings on this issue earlier this year in my home city of New York. At that time we received testimony from a variety of educational representatives. What we learned was that while the Federal Government cannot—and should not—impose national solutions to what are, in essence, local problems.

That is not to say that the Federal Government has no role in this process. Since my election to Congress and during my 14 proud years as a member of the Education and Labor Committee, I have joined in the establishment and extension of a variety of programs designed to provide equal access to educational opportunities for all students, young and old. Programs such as the Education of the Handicapped Act, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, bilingual education, adult education, and a host of others have secured the opportunity for equality that otherwise would not have existed. It is the role of our Government to identify special access problems of select groups and assure their opportunity to learn. It is also the role of the Federal Government to encourage and nurture local solutions to national problems. It is also the role of the Federal Government to insure that the quality of education remains constant in all 50 States—that students of one region do not suffer for lack of opportunity. Finally, it is the role of the Federal Government to reward excellence in education.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the establishment of this summit conference is a rational step toward a comprehensive approach to upgrading American education. I support its passage and urge my colleagues to do likewise.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3245, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

FIFTH ANNUAL SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY REPORT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Science and Technology:

HIGHLIGHTS OF THE NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM PROTECTION AND RESOURCES MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1983

(Mr. LUJAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chair for giving me the opportunity to address the subject of the legislation that we will be considering in a few minutes.

Basically, this bill, H.R. 2379, would require the Interior Department to assess its actions within park boundaries and determine whether proposed activities will have any significant adverse effect on park values. The Department of the Interior may proceed and exercise specific authorities—leasing, issuing permits, and disposing of parkland resources and associated interests—if the actions pose no significant threat to the park. As for those off-park boundaries, the Department of the Interior may proceed only if it determines that these actions will have little or no adverse effect on the park resources or adjacent lands; the public interest value of such action outweighs the adverse effect on the park; and, third, that the action is consistent with two particular basic acts that govern the administration of national park systems; any determination must be published in the Federal Register and action deferred for 30 days.

We have had extensive hearings on the Park Protection Act. As a matter of fact, we have had several of them—on February 4, February 5, February 8, and February 22, 1982. We heard a number of witnesses testify to national resource degradation.

Let me say at this point, however, that I have been pleased with the actions taken within the national parks. Some time ago the national parks were in a very deteriorating condition. As a matter of fact, about a year ago, perhaps a year and half ago, I went to my home State and made it a point to visit all of the national parks to see what condition they were in, and I must say that they were in a state of repair. Constantly things were being done to them, things as minor as perhaps fixing the roadway leading up to the park, the water and sewage systems within the park, and so forth. Those things have all been upgraded within the last couple of years.

As a matter of fact, it has been administration policy to upgrade the existing national parks rather than to continue as we were, just acquiring more land and acquiring more land, and along with that, acquiring, of course, more responsibilities without the necessary funds being there to keep them up.

I did the same thing again later. I took a tour during the August recess, and it was just excellent to see the enhanced condition that the parks were in. There is one problem that we will face in the consideration of this bill, and that is the definition of the word, "adjacent." We will address that at some later time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN) has expired.

NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM PROTECTION AND RESOURCES MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1983

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 298 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 2379.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2379) to provide for the protection and management of the national park system, and for other purposes, with Mr. PERKINS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, in 1979, resulting from a growing awareness of the pressures on our national parks, members of the Committee on Interior and Insulars Affairs of the House asked the National Park Service to conduct a nationwide survey of the damage and threats confronting the preservation of our parks. The state-of-the-parks report resulting from that survey and published in May 1980, revealed some alarming conclusions. Here is a copy of it for any Member who cares to take a look at it.

One of the general conclusions was that nearly all of our national park units are being degraded or threatened in significant ways from forces emanating from both within and outside their boundaries, and the trend is worsening. If Members want a quick look at the problem, I invite them to take a look at the issue of Life magazine for July 1983, which I have here.

The lead story is "National Parks in Peril," and on page 106 there are pictures and descriptions of some of the principal perils. They paint a very dire picture indeed.

Anyway, as a result of this report which detailed 4,345 individual threats in what was somewhat of a subjective study, because the study was the result of the Park Service's asking every park superintendent to detail what the threats were to the resources in his particular park and where they came from, we find that over 50 percent of these threats were from sources outside the boundaries of the park.

After review of the state-of-the-parks report, the Subcommittee on Public Lands and National Parks, which I chair, held 4 days of oversight hearings in February 1982 and 3 days of legislative hearings in 1982 and 1983. We heard testimony from numerous witnesses who verified the extent and severity of the problems facing the national park system. The evidence was overwhelming, and many of us became convinced that the Congress should attempt to provide some form of specific authority to the National Park Service so that the intent of the Congress to protect national park resources, expressed in law for almost 100 years, could be carried out in the face of modern pressures.

During the committee's many deliberations, we worked toward comprehensive bipartisan legislation which resulted in the House passing, in the 97th Congress, a bill that was virtually the same as H.R. 2379. The vote on that bill was 319 for to 84 against, almost 4 to 1 in favor of the bill.

The core of H.R. 2379 is a simple requirement that the Secretary of the Interior evaluate the impacts on park resources of his decisions regarding lands he administers within or adjacent to a part unit, and that Federal agencies as part of their normal decisionmaking process—not setting up any new process—first, notify the Secretary of Interior if a proposed Federal action in or adjacent to a national park unit could degrade the park; second give the Secretary time to reply; and, third notify the Congress regarding these decisions.

That should not be a particularly onerous responsibility. Nevertheless, some people seem to think that they do not want the right hand; namely, the Secretary or the National Park Service, to know what the left hand of the Federal Government is doing.

I might say that we defined Federal action so it only refers to actions by the Federal Government itself, such as Federal projects, or Federal actions that are dealing with a local or State government.

It does not involve such things as housing, FHA housing loans, VA loans and similar things, that are dealings with individuals.

In addition, the bill would require a biennual state-of-the-parks report to Congress which would identify resource threats in all park units and would recommend actions that must be taken to prevent resource degradation.

It would require the Secretary of the Interior to identify each year specific natural and cultural resource problems and would also direct an analysis of such problems or threats be submitted annually to the Congress.

It would direct the National Academy of Sciences to develop a research and monitoring system to help the National Park Service understand the extent of resource degradation in the parks and it would mandate the Park Service to provide small technical assistance grants to State and local governments where such assistance will increase cooperative efforts to protect park resources.

I emphasize that it does nothing to override or interfere with any State or local government's actions that are taken on their own, but merely provides a way for cooperative endeavors. However, for some reason, Secretary of Interior James Watt and some special interest groups do not want a requirement that the National Park Service be notified in advance so that it can comment on actions by other Federal agencies that might affect the parks themselves. So they are conducting an amazing campaign of misstatements and distortions against this bill.

Truly, this is a modest bill. It does not extend or expand the Federal Government's scrutiny or control over private land or local governments. It does not establish a buffer zone around national parks, as has been stated in some quarters.

It does not add another layer of bureaucracy. It does not give the Secretary of the Interior, or anyone else, a veto over any Federal, State, local or private action—and I repeat that, it does not give anyone a veto over any Federal, State, or local or private action.

It does not increase Federal jurisdiction over land near national parks.

It does not give the courts power to block or interfere with development around national parks.

It does not require or authorize inordinate delays in decisionmaking by Federal agencies.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, in order to make this abundantly clear, I have worked out with Congressman JAMES HOWARD, the chairman of the Public Works Committee, some amendments which further emphasize that all this bill is, is an information furnishing and communications bill. It does not give anyone the power to block Federal actions adjacent to parks. It does require the Secretary of the Interior, who is responsible for the parks, before he takes action, to consider the impact on the parks and to make a finding as to what that impact is.

Mr. Chairman, when these allegations were made in testimony before our subcommittee by administration witness, Mr. Russell Dickenson, the Director of the National Parks Service, I questioned him at some length during the subcommittee hearing on April 7 of this year. I would like my colleagues to know that he retracted statements, such as those I have just rebutted, as to what this bill does not do.

Let me share some of his retractions with you from the record. First, I discussed the Department's stated opposition regarding section 10 of the bill and pointed out that the Secretary has jurisdiction over federally owned lands within any unit of the national parks system and that the bill would require that he must find that any action he proposes for Federal land within a park will not damage the resources of the park before he can proceed.

I then asked Mr. Dickenson: "Do you really have any objection to that?"

Mr. Dickenson's response was,

If the Secretary and the Director of the National Park Service have the opportunity to make that kind of determination, I think that is the appropriate course to take, Mr. Chairman.

Second, I discussed the Department's stated opposition to the language in the bill that relates to the Secretary's actions on Federal land, under the jurisdiction of the Secretary, that is adjacent to a unit of the national park system. I pointed out to Mr. Dickenson that this provision applied only to agencies within the Department of the Interior, such as the Bureau of Land Management and that the bill language simply required that he take park values into account when he makes a decision.

Mr. Dickenson then stated,

Then this only applies to those units and he meant agencies, within Interior that the Secretary normally would have responsibility for giving oversight. In that case, we would have no objection. That is part of the Secretary's normal responsibility.

Finally, I said to Mr. Dickenson,

But, nevertheless, in principle, I don't really see how anyone could object to a requirement that the Secretary be consulted where other Federal agencies are acting and that within the Department that he take into account the views of the Park Service before approving actions by other units of the Interior Department. It seems to me that is just what he would be doing in the normal course and I take it there is no quarrel with that. You simply object to having it made a statutory requirement.

To which Mr. Dickenson responded,

That is essentially our statement, yes.

Now, in spite of the retractions by the Department of Interior's witness during that hearing, the Department continues to voice the same old discredited objections set forth, in their official report to the Interior Committee dated April 26, 1983.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know why Secretary Watt and his minions are so opposed to this bill, nor do I understand their obtuseness when it comes to dealing with the simple language of the bill; but I do know that our great national parks system is in danger from a slow, steady decimation of those natural and cultural resources we have tried to protect by placing them into park status.

I also believe this legislation will help to protect these parks before it is too late.

Now, I would not claim that this bill is going to solve all the environmental problems.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes, I am happy to yield.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to rise in support of the bill.

I want to commend the gentleman in the well, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) and the others on the committee, with myself, who cosponsored and worked on this legislation.

I think it is necessary, probably necessitated more by exactly that particular attitude which has prevailed in terms of the Interior Department trying to come up with a logical reason or a conclusion as to whether it should support or not this particular bill; because, indeed, I think there is a great difference with regard to the stewardship of our national parks.

The problems that have occurred in these national parks have occurred under both Democratic and Republican administrations. I think it is probably a logical consequence with regard to the development that has occurred around these tremendous resources.

I think it really is up to us as national policymakers to begin to define more precisely what the roles are and try to mediate and to alleviate some of the threats that are occurring to this particular problem in the context of the existing powers that these Federal agencies, including the Department of the Interior, currently have.

To be sure we may differ about how they exercise those particular authorities with greater or lesser lattitude. But I think that really this will place in the proper framework this particular legislation, a means to resolve those differences.

Now, obviously there are philosophical differences with regard to what constitutes a threat, what does not. But I would hope that we could at least pass the format and then argue about those details as we have I think done through many years.

I do feel that the current state of the parks, the current problems that are presented and that they are going to face in the near future do demand a definitive statement on the part of Congress with regard to who has what responsibility. And this I think does one thing and that is to pin down that responsibility once and for all with the Secretary of the Interior and the other Federal agencies and administrators that have responsibility in those, what we call adjacent areas that do of course impact this. And I think it is very good that we do that. And then I think down the road we may find there is a need for legislative tools, legislative refinement to deal with that. But this legislation itself poses no threat with respect to that. It offers I think the expectation that those issues will be resolved. I want to commend the gentleman for his leadership in bringing this to the floor and his work the last few years.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota for his statement of support. I want to also thank him for the tremendous support that he has given to this legislation in committee and in the previous Congress.

If we had the kind of devotion to studying and doing his homework that the gentleman from Minnesota has exhibited on the part of every single Member of this House, this bill ought to pass unanimously. It really is a bill that I do not think can be quarreled with in terms of a reasonable effort to try, without spending any huge sums of money, to have the Federal Government communicate within itself before taking actions that might have a significant damaging effect on the parks. This bill is no substitute for spending the kind of money that we are going to have to spend to redress some of the problems within the park. That is going to require more staff, it is going to require a lot of things to be done in our parks in order to protect this precious national resource. But the very least we can do is to make sure that the Federal Government itself, by its own actions, does not inflict further damage on this wonderful resource, that is the admiration of all the world.

The fact is that for some of our crown jewels of the national park system, and some of them are outlined in last of July's issue of Life magazine, with pictures that will shock you to the core, the fact is that for some of our crown jewels in this wonderful park system we are rapidly approaching the point where it may be too late. The experts who all too often we fail to heed tell me that at Glacier and Yellowstone National Parks, in Montana and Wyoming, we are reaching the point where the park ecosystems are in danger of collapsing, with the result that the grizzly bear, for example, may soon be extinct in the lower 48. In the Everglades National Park, which I visited this summer, the ecosystem is under such pressure from modified water flow conditions created by Federal projects that several species of birds which the Everglades National Park was created to protect are now in danger of extinction. I hasten to say that as a result of the visit there and subsequent work by Chairman JAMES HOWARD and ROBERT ROE and actions within the executive branch, actions are being taken to try to collect that situation.

The time to act to protect the national parks is now. This legislation is not a cure-all for the problems of protecting our national parks, but it is a step in the right direction. Now is the time to take that first step. If we do not, some Member of this institution will be standing in this same place in a very few years telling you that some magnificent resource of our Nation that once was in a national park and supposedly protected by it is no more.

I do not want to be present on the floor to hear that, and I do not believe any of you want to, either.

I ask all of you to consider that possible future event, and to join me in supporting the passage of this bill. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I wonder if the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the committee and our previous speaker, would mind yielding for a question.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Sure.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. The gentleman from Ohio, who spoke very eloquently about this bill, I would like to ask you some questions during the parliamentary part of it tomorrow. Am I correct in noting that the rule provides Mr. UDALL will offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute but that the rule does not allow your substitute to be treated as original text for the purpose of the amendment?

I yield to the chairman (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. That is correct. The rule makes in order an amendment in the nature of a substitute which is the original bill as marked up by the Interior Committee. And then it makes in order an amendment. But under the rules of the House, that amendment could not be further amended because it would be amendments in the third degree. However, other amendments could be offered to the bill.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. LUJAN. Was that an inadvertent error in crafting the rule, or was that rule crafted deliberately to preclude the amendment by the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN)?

Mr. SEIBERLING. The rule was crafted deliberately so as to avoid the situation we sometimes get in here where in an effort to delay the final progress of the bill, amendment after amendment is offered. That does not mean amendments cannot be offered. It does mean that my amendment could not be further amended. It would have to be voted up or down. If it was voted down, then other amendments could be offered.

Mr. LUJAN. The gentleman was very well aware of the fact that the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) and some of us had an objection to the fact that there was no definition of "adjacent," and that was really the only amendment that we were talking about here. So, the gentleman is now telling me that deliberately that was placed in there so that that most crucial amendment, the one that caused so much problem in Interior, was deliberately put in there in order to deny the minority side the opportunity to at least have an up or down vote on whether we ought to do something about the word "adjacent."

Mr. SEIBERLING. That is not a correct characterization at all.

The gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) or anyone else can offer an amendment to the definition section, defining what is meant by the word "adjacent."

Mr. LUJAN. But the argument was in our wanting to amend through the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) section 10 and 11. By the way, the rule came out, it precludes any attempt on our part to issue an amendment, because the gentleman fully well knows that when his amendment comes up we are not going to have a chance to do anything about it. I think that that is very unfair and kind of the same tactics that we saw in the committee of "this is the way I want it and we will trample over the minority regardless of what you may think. We have got the votes, so we are going to stuff it down your throat whether you like it or not."

And to add insult to injury, to come out with a rule that says "You cannot offer an amendment to that beautiful, perfected amendment that I have," I think that is really going a little too far and beyond the normal legislative process.

Mr. SEIBERLING. In view of the attack that has just been made on the integrity of the committee, not to mention myself, I wonder if I could respond to what the gentleman from New Mexico has just said.

Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I will in just a minute.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Udall amendment in the nature of a substitute to H.R. 2379 be considered as an original text for the purposes of amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman I object to the request.

The Chairman. Objection is heard.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. If the Udall substitute is offered and then if the Seiberling perfecting amendment is offered which substitutes two new sections 10 and 11, will it be in order to offer any perfecting amendments to either section 10 or section 11?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will respond as follows: First, if the Seiberling perfecting amendment were agreed to, other perfecting amendments broader in scope and going to other portions of the Udall amendment would still be in order.

Second, a substitute for the Udall amendment would, of course, be in order and voted on before the Udall amendment.

Finally, while the Seiberling perfecting amendment to the Udall amendment is pending, a further amendment to the Seiberling amendment would be in the third degree and would not be in order.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I thank the Chair.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I had understood the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) made a unanimous consent request at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The request was objected to.

Mr. SEIBERLING. It was objected to. I thought maybe he wanted to be heard on his request, but obviously it is not in order during general debate to make such a request.

The CHAIRMAN. That is quite different.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the remarks of the chairman of our subcommittee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING), what he said about this particular bill.

I really have enjoyed working with Chairman SEIBERLING; he is a very fine and decent man, reports these things out very well.

I really wonder though, when he tells us, keeps telling us to read the bills, how many on his own side do read the bills.

I have labored over this bill. I am one of the few who has read this "Parks Protection—Parks of 1980 Report to Congress."

I have read and reread this thing. And last night coming home on the airplane I read it again with a couple of our Senators, who are illustrious members of the bar, who went over it with me, determining what it really says.

Now we found some interesting things in this bill. The chairman pointed out that about 50 percent—it is about a 50-50 split of internal versus external types of threats to the park. It is interesting to note that the internal threats no one has any question, Mr. Chairman. The overpopulation of animals, example Yellowstone, the infestation of the pine beetles which we are going to have in most of our wilderness areas when they go in; overpopulation by people in a few other areas, are all internal threats.

Now the question comes down, what are the external threats? I have noticed that it is conspicuously absent in the subcommittee and in the committee and here on the floor, that no one has really gone through and mentioned these.

I could give it probably verbatim right now but I will not bore the group with them. In here in these particular things it talks about an aluminum plant that is 6 miles away from Glacier Park, it talks about a road improvement, talks about other things that I wonder very dearly in my own heart how anyone can call these things threats.

The chairman talks about Secretary Watt and, I do not know if he is really too interested in this, in this infinitesimal group of people out there who are trying to do their best to kill this. I sometimes wonder, hearing that type of language, who the other people are on the other side, or why this is so close and dear to their hearts and minds that they want this thing. I could give you that answer. If you look at this, if you just take the one amendment, the one amendment that we took out in subcommittee, thank the Lord, which would put 10 miles around it, it would take 20 percent of all of Utah and tie it up under Federal jurisdiction.

The chairman also talked about reports and studies that have been done. I would call his attention to one that we had done, it is called the Congressional Research Service, a very illustrious group of people composed of learned minds, members of the bar, all that type of thing that seems to be so important to some people around here.

As you look at that particular thing, maybe it would be well if we read from it. Keep in mind this is the one that talks about being adjacent to, it talks about these particular things. This is a very illustrious group. Let us see what they say.

Section 10(b) reads:

(b) In any case of areas which are adjacent to any unit of the national park system, where the Secretary is vested with any authority described in subsection (a), the Secretary may exercise such authority only after he has determined that the exercise of such authority will not have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such national park system unit was established:

H.R. 2379 gives the Secretary of the Interior discretion over natural resource development in "buffer zones," and access to them.

In hands of a zealous Secretary, this provision could conceivably be used to limit or to prevent resource development on Federal lands in the Western United States.

Then the amendment which we anticipate coming up tomorrow is addressed:

Both the bill and the substitute amendment would provide the Interior Secretary with virtually unlimited authority to restrict mineral development on Federal lands adjacent to the parks. Presumably this would be done with restraint, but if carried to an extreme, it could substantially limit western oil development on public lands and possibly on some private lands as well. Even limited "buffer zones" could interfere with leasing, exploration and development of petroleum resources in areas where prospects are high.

Then it goes on to section 11, and the chairman mentioned this and I appreciate him saying this. He said that "I worked out an amendment with Chairman Howard."

What he did not say, worked out absolutely no amendment with members of the minority party in Interior, this is only an amendment with the people in Public Works. It has nothing to do with us. Section 11 requires a six-step process before any Federal action can be approved. It will add 90 to 180 days to every EPA grant, road construction, mineral or grazing lease and so forth. This process can actually kill many of these projects.

The Congressional Research Services goes on to say: "The bill appears to add a layer of review to any Federal action."

Let us go back to this original thing called state of the park. What are some of the external threats that the chairman has not mentioned in any of our committees, never mentioned, dust. I have asked the question: Is a herd of cows going over BLM land creating dust, is that adverse effect? What is? We have two terms here, Mr. Chairman, that I really wonder about. One is "adjacent to" and one is "significant adverse effect" which nobody takes the time to interpret. In the rules one of the illustrious members of this group got up and said, "We don't want to interpret it." Where in the legislative body do we not want to interpret what a statute is going to say? If we accept that doctrine, if we accept that as a fact, we are automatically saying we are going to give it to a regulator, we are going to give it to a court because that is all we have got left to interpret this, the regulator and the court.

Is it not the place to have these things defined in the definitions section of this bill so that we know what we are referring to? That in my mind is the thing that bothers me the most about this bill. That is the thing that could lock up most of our Western States. And you folks who are watching in your offices, look in your own districts if you would, please. There are 334 parks that we are talking about in this particular area. Now what does this really do?

If we really are honest about it, if we do not give this left-hand-right-hand doctrine, not give the idea that it is innocuous and let us have an idea as to what the bottom line is on this thing, we are giving jurisdiction to a lot of people that really bothers me, and that will be millions of acres of ground, thousands of farms, ranches and businesses, hundreds of towns. This is far from being innocent legislation.

The chairman brought up an interesting point about Mr. Dickenson, Director of the National Parks.

Let me point out that subsequent to the meeting that he referred, Mr. Dickenson has given me a letter stating that he definitely does not want this piece of legislation.

The chairman talked about being down in Florida. I spent August going through national parks also in the West. I have yet to talk to one superintendent of national parks who wants this bill. And the list goes on and on and on. I asked the question, Who wants it?

Now the chairman is over there smiling. Sure, Mr. SEIBERLING could give me a number and we could get into a debate about it back and forth. I guess, the chairman of the subcommittee means, by talking to him, if I was a superintendent of national parks, I, all of a sudden would want it too. But anyway in reality I do not see anybody in the West that wants this real bad and it amazes me the force it has. Now in the event the chairman in his own heart and mind can see the wisdom and rationale of the great idea we are coming up with, and the great idea of not hurting our cities, not hurting our towns, not hurting our ranchers, I would be very happy to go along with the bill and intend to vote with the bill if you could let us take something out of section 10. I agree with the amendment that you have with Mr. HOWARD on section 11. But section 11 I think is one of the most devastating things I have seen come along for a long time.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would urge that tomorrow as we prepare to come along with an amendment to handle that, that the Members forget party lines, that the Members forget geographic areas and let us do what is good for America, do what is good for the growth of America and the economy of this Nation and see in their own minds that they should go along with section 10 and if they cannot do that, they should defeat the bill.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. LUJAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, let me say at the outset that I support this bill. I am one of the original cosponsors of the bill. So it is not in opposition to protecting the parks. As a matter of fact, as I said before we got into the bill, I want to congratulate the Department of Interior for the work that it has done in upgrading and the maintenance of the national parks.

It is certainly superior to anything that I had ever seen before.

I told about visiting the national parks in our area. And attention was paid to all aspects of it, whether it was roads, whether it was waterlines, whether it was sewage lines, all of those things are being worked on. As a matter of fact, I have seen charts—we all have—of how much money is being spent now on maintenance and it certainly shows up in our national parks.

An so we support and we think that we ought to do everything to protect our national parks.

What we do object to is that section of the bill that says that the Secretary must be notified of any action adjacent to the national park. Now, what does adjacent mean? Does that mean a mile away? Does that mean 10 miles away? Does it mean 100 milies away? Can the Secretary say if EPA is going to fund a sewer project in a city 100 miles away from the national park that the depth of that sewer line ought to be 7 feet instead of 6, or 13 or some other figures? It certainly does mean that if the Secretary of Interior decides that he wants to stick his nose into that and even designate the depth of it, as the gentleman said.

Does a little dust being raised by a car, or by a horse, a cow or whatever, in the vicinity, is that a significant action before going to lease that land for grazing?

So while we support that bill, we believe that there ought to be some rationale for saying an adverse action should trigger out some kind of discussion with the Secretary of Interior. But this city 100 miles away, while you might say, well, the Secretary is just going to say we are not concerned with that, that is not significant enough for us to worry about, the fact of the matter is that on top of all of the permits and regulations and everything that goes along with it, you are just piling up one more. And that could very well be the straw that broke the camel's back.

We are very disappointed that we will not be able to offer the kind of amendment that we would like to have in this bill, the kind of amendment that the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) was prepared to offer. That has been our history throughout this legislation. Why? Why stone wall? Why just all of a sudden say that you cannot do this. Those are the things that produced and nurtured the sagebrush rebellion in this country. And fortunately, because we have this administration that has been working together with local government, with State, county and city, that sagebrush rebellion has gone down in intensity anymore.

This is the sort of action that brings those kinds of responses

We certainly do not want to go into what we are being forced into now. The amendment will just have to be changed. We will just maybe repeal some other section of the bill that we all agree with just in order to be able to make it conform with this reprehensible action that was taken in the Rules Committee of saying, you cannot speak your peace on the floor of the House of the people of this country.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to refute some of the absolutely astounding statements that have been made by the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle.

First of all, let us talk about the rule. The gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) was present in the Rules Committee. He had copies of the rule. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) asked him twice if the rule was satisfactory to him and he said yes it was. Now, all of a sudden, we have this uproar about a rule and all the rule does is that if I offer amendments to sections 10 and 11, along the lines worked out with the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HOWARD), we will have an up-or-down vote on those amendments, without a lot of obfuscating efforts to amend them so that no one has a clear idea of what it is in them.

If the Members do not like the amendments I offer, they can vote them down. And if they vote them down, then they will be free to offer any other amendments that they want to sections 10 or 11.

What they are concerned about is that having worked out an amendment to sections 10 and 11 and some conforming amendments to another section, that that is going to go through and they will not have the opportunity to confuse the issue by trying to amend my amendments.

However, let me say that I, repeatedly, before and after the recess, offered to sit down with the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) and work out changes with him and see if he had any problem with the amendment. And so far my offer has not been taken up. I repeat my offer. I will sit down with him this afternoon and take the whole rest of the day, if he wants, to go over this and see if there is any way to make him feel better about it.

And let me say one other thing. We sat for 2 days in markup on this bill, in the committee, and I did everything possible to accommodate every objection that anybody had, including accepting an amendment from the other side that defined "adjacent to" as 10 miles, simply in an effort to try to be accommodating, and then they decided they did not want it defined that way, so I accepted its deletion.

So, I do not really see that there is any objection that is valid on procedural grounds.

Let me just say a couple of other things. The gentleman from Utah made the statement that this bill gave the Secretary jurisdiction to stop coal leasing adjacent to national parks.

This bill does not give the Secretary one iota of jurisdiction that he does not already have today. It merely says that when he exercises his jurisdiction, he has to stop and consider whether or not his action will have a degrading effect on the national park.

Now, I ask you whether or not you can just rely on this Secretary, James Watt, to make that kind of a determination and to take into consideration the protection of that national resource. I think after 2½ years of James Watt the country has a pretty good idea of what is uppermost in his mind and it is not protecting the natural values found in the national parks.

So, it does seem to me that it is not unreasonable to make him focus on that by statute and say what he has concluded. And if he concludes that his action will not have any degrading effect, that is it. We have agreed that nobody will have the right to bring any action in court to second-guess his ruling.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me point out that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA) was not in the committee at the time and no one asked that particular issue. But I do not want to make a point about that.

The only one on the Republican side was the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. TAYLOR), as the gentleman may recall. So I do not know where we get that information, but that is immaterial.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, my recollection is that the gentleman was asked that question twice, but it could be faulty.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I do not know where it was. OK I apologize to the gentleman if that is the case.

Mr. SEIBERLING. In any event, the gentleman had a copy of the rule, did he not?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. As I say, I am really not going to make an issue of that. It is not that big a point to me. But the point that the gentleman did make, and I have been waiting now, we were going to sit down for two weeks. I have been waiting for that call. I will take it this afternoon or any time. I have been waiting for somebody to make that call, because I always acquiesce to the chairman of a committee, being just a lowly member on the minority side.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I do not know how many times the gentleman has to be advised that I would be willing to sit down with him, but I reiterate my offer to do so.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Well, the gentleman from Utah would always respond, as the gentleman may recall, acquiescing to the gentleman's superior position, in saying just call me any time and I will sit down and go with the gentleman, any time. I am still waiting for the telephone call. I look forward to it as soon as this is over.

I would like to just mention one other thing.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, we do not need a telephone call. I will tell the gentleman right now. We will sit down right after this.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I am afraid what the gentleman is going to tell me right now.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, when all else fails, we have got to go back to the bill. Page 13, public land management, section 10: "In the case of areas which are within any unit of the national park, where the Secretary of Interior is vested with any authority to issue any lease, (2) authorize any permit, (3) sell or otherwise dispose of such land, he may exercise any authority," after he has determined the thing we referred to earlier.

Section (b) is the one that hurts. Section (a) is internal. Section (b) is external. And that is what we talked about originally.

Section (b), if the gentleman will please turn on page 14, "In the case of areas adjacent to * * *" he can do the same things he does in the other section. That is very clear.

The gentleman stands over there and says that he cannot do that.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, will the gentleman kindly tell me where it gives the Secretary any authority, other than the authority to be informed, that he does not already have?

It starts out and it says: In any case where the Secretary is vested with any authority.

If he does not already have that authority, he is not vested with it, is he?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Probably the gentleman has hit on the very significant question that a lot of us have been asking. The gentleman just asked the question: What authority is he given that he does not already have?

If the gentleman really believes that question, then why are we putting the bill out? If you already got it, why are we doing this?

Mr. SEIBLERLING. Because this bill requires someone to notify the Secretary and requires the Secretary, where he has authority, to consider the effect on a park. That is all.

If you look at section 10(a), it is where the Secretary is already vested with authority. It does not give him any additional authority. It merely requires him to consider the effects of exercising that authority.

So I really think the statement that this gives additional jurisdiction to the Secretary is so patently incorrect that it ought not be repeated with a straight face.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Surely.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Has the gentleman read the Congressional Research Service report on this?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I believe so, some time in the past.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Are they patently incorrect also?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I would say that their evaluation is erroneous in that regard.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. But they come out exactly with what I said.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, all I can say is that to that extent they have misread the bill.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I see.

Mr. SEIBERLING. All you have to do is read it. It does not give the Secretary any additional authority. It says to the extent that he has that authority, he is required to consider certain things. Does that sound like a grant of additional authority?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Utah (Mr. NIELSON).

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) respond to a question?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes.

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Assuming the term "adjacent" is defined properly, and assuming it means "close by," what effect would that have, if any, on the proposed nuclear waste repository adjacent to Canyonlands National Park?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, what it would mean would be that before the Secretary makes the determination as to whether to permit that development on the national park, on the land adjacent to the national park, he will have to consider whether or not it has an effect adverse to the park.

Although I would go on and add that whether or not it is located there depends on the language set forth in the specific statute that provides for the creation of such depository, and so obviously the specific language would take precedence over anything else.

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Was this part of the motivation of this bill at this particular time, to include that as a possibility?

Mr. SEIBERLING. No. That is governed by a separate piece of legislation and would continue to be governed by that legislation which specifically deals with nuclear waste repositories.

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Would it not have some definite influence on that particular aspect?

Mr. SEIBERLING. It would not have any definite influence except to the extent that it focuses the Secretary's attention in making his decisions on the impact on the park.

But the existing bill already does that, so the effect would be zero. It adds nothing.

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I object to the bill on several counts. The gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) and I share five national parks, containing several hundred thousand acres in southern and eastern Utah. This bill, if "adjacent" is not well defined, if it were, for example, the 10-mile radius that was mentioned earlier, would tie up, basically, all of southern and eastern Utah. It would tie up any development in oil shale or tar sands that might be necessary for improving our gas and oil supplies. It may cause ill effects on towns like Moab, which are adjacent to Canyonlands National Park because they have the jeeps and the 4-wheel vehicles for people to use. In the Canyonlands National Park they have also river raft running and a lot of things of this nature that may come under the purview of this particular bill.

Let me indicate, also, that the umbrella section ties all parks together. Urban parks are not the same as rural parks, and those parks which have roads throughout, such as Arches National Park, are quite different from those which are basically roadless, such as Canyonlands National Park. I think the umbrella is too broad.

There are several unnecessary redundant sections. Section 5 and section 13 are wordy and unnecessary, in view of what precedes them in the bill.

Section 6 and section 14 unnecessarily tie the Secretary's hands, it seems to me, in trying to improve the parks and improve the access of the public to the parks for which they were established.

The management plans are too frequent, they are not tied in with the general management plans cycle.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah (Mr. NIELSON) has expired.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. The land classification review may lead to limiting the access to the public, as I mentioned in section 8.

Section 10 has already been mentioned by the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN) and the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN), particularly the word "adjacent."

It also elevates the National Park Service above the Forest Service and BLM and other Federal agencies.

Finally, there are some difficulties with section 11 with local and State governments, particularly those adjacent to parks.

In addition, there are some other things wrong with the bill that allow terrible tax deductions of gifts of land when the gifts are given to those which are not in fact charities.

Those are some of the reasons why I object to the bill. It would be very bad for the State of Utah, it would be very bad for the West, wherever we have national parks.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. DENNY SMITH).

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the bill. I do not see any particular reason why we should be expanding the national park system in this manner.

Park protection are words synonymous with the personal commitment we all share for preserving our resources that make up the national park system. Millions of people enjoy these resources and I feel sure they will continue to do so in the future, but I do not believe H.R. 2379 is the vehicle to insure resource management in our national parks. The Department of the Interior, which has management responsibility for our parks, stated that this bill is "unnecessary, duplicates existing laws and administrative programs, creates more redtape and imposes inflexible requirements on resource management efforts that should remain flexible enough to apply available staff and funds to changing needs.

Specifically, I have problems with section 10 of the bill which requires any Interior action to meet a "no significant adverse effect" test. Park boundaries serve an important purpose—they establish a point whereby special protections should be given to lands within. By creating a "no significant adverse effect" test to those areas adjacent to a national park, we are determining that park protection takes precedence over all other needs. However, in providing this type of protection, we are not providing the criteria for what would be considered an impairment to park resources. Parks were established for the people and are to be maintained so that the people can continue their enjoyment of the resources; however, the local and State governments who through no fault of their own are located adjacent to national parks, should not be asked to sacrifice their growth and economic well-being because of perceived threats against park resources without adequate opportunity to identify and correct the perceived problems. Section 10 clearly creates buffer zones around the national parks which encumbers non-Federal landowners outside the parks through Federal management decisions.

Another problem I have with section 10 is that it provides that in the case of areas "adjacent to" any park unit the Secretary may exercise his authority to issue leases or permit other uses, only after he has determined that these uses will not adversely affect the values of the particular unit of land. The term "adjacent to" is an ambiguous term that can mean nearby or contiguous to according to Black's Law Dictionary. The Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs concluded that "a precise definition was neither possible nor desirable." I disagree. The term "adjacent to" leaves the interpretation unclear—in other words, what lands constitute nearby?

I think section 10 is something that is going to have to be either decided by the courts or the bureaucrats, and I am not sure that that is the kind of law that the people from Oregon would like anyway.

The fact that there are not boundaries to this "adjacent to" provision, I think we should be extremely concerned. Yet we have been unable to get the chairman of the subcommittee to revise this provision, nor has the gentleman been able to give us a clear definition as to what "adjacent to" really means.

So I would rise in strong opposition.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENNY SMITH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. In view of the fact that all of the words "adjacent to" require is that in areas adjacent to, the Secretary be notified as to actions that are proposed to be taken, what difference does it make whether it is 1 mile or 100 miles? All it does is require him to be notified. So there is not going to be any case in court as to what is meant. In the amendment which I am going to offer tomorrow we make it clear that you cannot even question the decisions in court. The only thing that you could do in court was if the Secretary had not been notified, an action could be brought to compel whatever Federal agency was taking the action to notify the Secretary. That is all. What is so terrible about that?

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I see no reason why, if we need an expansion of the park system, as the gentleman is well aware——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. DENNY SMITH) has expired.

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 additional seconds to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. DENNY SMITH. A few years ago we did expand Crater Lake National Park in Oregon, when it was found and deemed by this Congress that we needed an expansion of that park. I just think this bill is a little loose in its determination as to what constitutes "adjacent to," and I think we ought to tie that down closer, Mr. Chairman.

Basically, I believe this bill will do little to enhance the protection of the National Park System, will contribute a great deal to delay Federal decisionmaking, and will interfere with the existing management of Federal lands that have been set aside for multiple use. H.R. 2379 threatens community development, improvement projects, sewage treatment plants, road construction, and airports. This bill as currently drafted will also hinder mineral exploration, timber harvest, grazing, recreation, and other multiple uses in areas adjacent to national parks. These delays will certainly have a negative impact on jobs and the economies in communities adjacent to national parks.

I do not discount the need to restate our intentions for protecting and enhancing our park resources, but I cannot support H.R. 2379 as the approach we should take. Building additional layers of bureaucracy for what can be accomplished through existing reports and land use plans is unnecessary, costly, and burdensome.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG).

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to this legislation today. I will not restate the arguments made by the previous gentlemen who have argued against the term "adjacent to" and "buffer zone." I happen to believe that this is indirectly an attempt to impose concepts and ideas upon local governments. The GAO has supported my position, I believe the Library of Congress has supported that position. "Adjacent" is not defined. It would cause imposition upon small communities.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the thing that disturbs me most about today—and there are differences of philosophy on the legislation—there is no one here. We have done this time after time, with legislation that is far-reaching, we debate the issue on a Monday, with nobody to hear the arguments, the pros and cons, and I can see what could happen tomorrow, "Oh, this is a good vote to protect your park," when in fact it will be a detriment to your local communities and the areas which Congressmen represent.

I would suggest very strongly that tomorrow, if we can, we attempt to bring to light some of the arguments that have been made today against this legislation. I know this is not the chairman's fault. It is the leadership's fault again to bring legislation that affects the future resources of this Nation and each individual near to these parks.

I can tell you, for the listening audience, I look here and we have five Members on this floor. That is unfortunate, that the leadership of this House will bring forth important legislation such as this and not have the body here to hear the full debate.

So I will strongly urge today the defeat of this legislation, and hopefully tomorrow we will have an opportunity to bring some of the arguments before this body to show the true effect, backed up by the GAO, backed up by the Library of Congress Congressional Research Service, to show what this does to the local communities.

So again, I urge the Members who are here, small though the number may be, and those Members who are not here, to at least read the Journal and understand what this will do to their areas in all the States of the United States other than Alaska.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to point out that this debate has shown one thing. It has been very obvious to all of us on this floor today that there is a tremendous difference of opinion as to what is going on. It clearly illustrates that we do not know what the "adjacent to" means. We do not know if the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) is right. We do not know if I am right. We do not know if the Congressional Research Service is right. We do not know if the GAO is right.

So it is ambiguity at its best. It is throwing it up in the air and let us let it all fall out and see where it is going to land. But I think when we carefully study this, we carefully, carefully look at it, we do find that section 10 will create the problems that we have alluded to. Section 11 I do not have a problem with if the amendment goes through, and I think if it is as innocuous as the gentleman from Ohio says it is, then there should be no reason to take it out. But we notice the complete idea of not taking it out, of leaving it in, and if it as bad as I say it is, there is no question we should kick it out.

I would think that if every Member who has a park in his district would carefully look at the adjacent towns, then go over to the definition section and realize if he has a sewer, water, safe sidewalks, tennis court, anything for which he gets matching funds or any Government money from, has to, according to this bill, right in the definition section, has to have the Department of the Interior look at it and give their OK. If that is not another layer of government. I do not know what is. It is very clear in the bill.

So I would just urge if we were able to take section 10 out, if we are able to amend paragraph (b) of section 10, I will vote for the bill, because then I think it will be helping the internal parks. If we cannot do that, there is no question in my mind the bill should be defeated because it would probably be devastating to those towns, cities, ranches, business, logging, mining, that are contiguous to those areas.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 2379, the National Park System Protection and Resources Management Act of 1983.

Little more than a year ago, the Members of the 97th Congress gave their overwhelming 319 to 84 endorsement to H.R. 5162, a virtually identical measure developed by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. SEIBERLING, and myself. I fervently hope that the Members of this, the 98th Congress, will give this successor bill an even stronger endorsement.

Last year, the need was great. Extensive hearings by the Public Lands and National Parks Subcommittee established a voluminous record of the threats now facing the natural and cultural resources of the 335-unit national park system. That record offered irrefutable evidence of the erosion of our resource base through theft, vandalism, Park Service mismanagement, man-made encroachments, air and water pollution, and a battery of other pressures.

I will not recount those findings here. Rather, I invite all of my colleagues—if they have not already done so—to read for themselves the 800-plus pages of testimony received by that subcommittee. The evidence certainly should shock and sadden each and every Member of this body.

Those hearings led us—the then members of the Interior Committee—to develop the legislation which is essentially identical to that before you today. We attempted to isolate the principal causes of these frightening conditions and to formulate an effective program to mitigate or, if possible, to eliminate, those causes. We shaped, reshaped, and refined each sentence of that measure, constantly aware of the need to balance conservation values with the needs of modern society and the rights of each unit's neighbors, visitors, and users.

It was a difficult task, but I believe we did it well. The bill before you today offers the reasonable expectation that the riches of the parks will be preserved for the many generations to follow ours. It seeks to combat the problems damaging the parks by:

First, requiring the National Park Service to prepare a "State of the Parks Report," a detailed inventory of the natural and cultural resources of each park unit and the condition of those resources;

Second, mandating that resource management plans for each unit be prepared and updated at least biennially;

Third, establishing a Federal interagency consultation process designed to identify possible threats to park resources from federally supported activities on lands adjacent to or within a park unit's boundaries and, whenever possible, to implement actions needed to avoid adverse effects on park resources;

Fourth, directing the Secretary of the Interior to provide technical assistance to any governmental unit within or adjacent to units of the park system when cooperation or technical assistance is likely to promote protection of park resources; and

Fifth, assuring an adequate number and distribution of personnel with sufficient scientific and professional expertise to conduct the necessary resource management activities.

The bill before you today also clearly demonstrates a sensitivity to and a consideration for the needs and rights of park unit neighbors and users.

It does not run roughshod over the rights of inholders. It does not entangle local governments in a new bureaucratic web from which they can never hope to emerge.

We in the Congress must finally admit that administrative assurances and ad hoc programs do not and cannot work very well. If we hope to save these natural and cultural treasures for future generations of Americans and the world we must institutionalize a process which will promote their preservation.

We cannot establish procedures which will give ironclad guarantees that no damage will be allowed to occur. The realities of modern life makes that an impossible task. But—through adoption of H.R. 2379—we can invest in a process to promote the protection of these precious resources.

Environmental protection is both an art and a science. It is an art because we cannot assure the precision and predictability which some might demand. Hard and fast formulas must, at times, give way to general reasonable adaptations. Such is the case with the definition of "adjacent." Congressional oversight, however, can assume that these general guidelines are fairly implemented. The ultimate success of H.R. 2379, therefore, will rest with the diligence of this body to protect the rights of all Americans.

The burdens and sacrifices called for by H.R. 2379 are small in comparison to the benefits hundreds of missions of people reap through the existence of a readily accessible, quality park experience. I urge your strong support for this important legislation.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish today to add my voice to those of my colleagues here today who stand in support of H.R. 2379, National Park System Protection and Resources Management Act of 1983.

The national park system is one of the greatest contributions this country has ever made to the world. The very concept of a national park is a uniquely American idea. It expresses, I think, something essential about our character as a people—that we came to this continent not only to conquer and to use its national resources, but also to cherish, to preserve, to study, and to be at peace with it. The parks are more than playgrounds, more than museums. They are living testimony of which we need to be more aware now than ever before. I think history will judge us on how diligent we are in protecting these areas as our country changes and grows.

America has changed and grown, and with it the challenge to our park system. More than a century ago when Yellowstone became our first national park, it was an isolated island in a huge sea of unofficial wilderness. The same can be said for most of our parks, even many of the most recently created. They were protected by their very isolation as much as they were protected by the laws we in the Congress have passed. But that is no longer entirely the case.

The 1980 State of the Parks Report delivered some truly startling conclusions. It told us that our parks from one end of the country are in trouble. They are being hammered relentlessly by overcrowding, air and water pollution, excessive noise, blight, and a list of threats to their continued existence that sounds like a telling of modern urban woes. And what is being lost is not so much the roads and visitor facilities and sewage systems that we hear so much about from the administration when it bemoans the "deplorable" state of parks and calls for a new era of "good stewardship" to correct it. What is being lost are the very things we created the parks for—wildlife, plant communities, sweeping vistas, geology, the soils, important archaeological, cultural and scientific resources. This is happening. It is well-documented. I doubt if you will hear a single voice to dispute this alarming, basic fact. What good does it do to invest in maintenance of a museum, when the Van Goghs and the Rembrandts are crumbling before our very eyes?

It is this spirit which has moved the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to bring this bill before the House today—and which, I might add, moved the House itself to approve very similar legislation last year by an overwhelming majority. It is, I think, a modest bill, although my colleagues will hear many an immodest claim against it. Let me state in the most emphatic terms that this bill does not create any buffer zones around the parks. It does not give the Secretary of the Interior or anyone else a veto over any decision that he does not already have. It merely requires that when the Federal Government undertakes an action that potentially could have some significant impact on the resources of a national park, that the Secretary of the Interior be apprised of that action and given an opportunity to comment on it. In many cases, probably the majority, the Secretary will be commenting to himself. In all cases, such notification and comment must take place within strict time limits and will not form the basis for any litigation. Surely this is a sensible thing to require.

I do understand the fears and trepidations of many of my colleagues who oppose this bill. I have seen many times what I call Udall's law of unintended consequences at work in our Government. Programs, laws, and policies we approve often do not work out the way we had planned or grow into things we did not foresee. And in the course of this legislation I have heard numerous expressions of what might happen under this legislation. Some of them are more far fetched than others.

I can only say to my colleagues that if that happens we have the power to change what we create. This is not a bill that could possibly institute any irreversible ills. On the contrary if we do not act favorably on this legislation we run the very grave risk of permitting, through our inaction, some of the most irreversible ills imaginable—the slow and steady strangulation of some of our most precious resources, the work of generations of the most far-sighted Americans.

I believe this is the real choice the House faces today. I think there can be no clearer choice—and no clearer time to express it—than for the House to say that it will not allow fears of the consequences of requiring our Government to make informed decisions to stand in the way of preserving one of this Nation's greatest gifts to her sons and daughters all over the world.●

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) has 30 seconds remaining.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I would like to reserve that time, please, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the last word.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I was kind of hoping I would get the last word, but I will acquiesce to the subcommittee chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

If I say anything that the gentleman finds egregiously wrong, I will be glad to yield to him.

Let me just say a couple of other things, Mr. Chairman. First of all, on pages 8 and 9 of the committee report, the term "adjacent to" is discussed at great length, and I would just like to read one paragraph. After the discussion of what would be meant, for purposes of this statute, by the words "adjacent to," it goes on to say:

The committee made it very clear that the application of the provisions of this bill to Federal actions occurring outside the park boundaries would in no way constitute the actual or implied creation of buffer zones around the park. This is clearly the case since the bill does not provide the Secretary or anyone else with any new substantive authority to protect parks or to prohibit any Federal action.

So that deals with the effect of the words "adjacent to," which is that they have no substantive effect, but only a procedural effect in requiring that the Secretary be notified.

I overspoke myself in one respect. This bill does give the Secretary new, additional authority in one case, and one case only. On page 17 of the bill, subparagraph (f)(1)(A), it says that in all cases where the proposed Federal action would occur upon federally owned lands or waters within the authorized boundary of a national park system unit, the proposing Federal agency shall comply fully with the recommendations of the Secretary.

Actually, that general authority exists already in the present laws governing the national parks. All this does is make it explicit. Before Federal actions can take place on Federal lands within a park, the Secretary's recommendations must be complied with. To that extent, if it does give any jurisdiction, it gives that to the Secretary, and I cannot imagine anybody quarreling with that, because the Secretary is charged by law with protecting the resources of the national parks and the other agencies of the Federal Government are also supposed to do that under existing law. So much for that.

I would simply say once more that there is a problem: Namely, how to protect our national parks. The problem is vaster than the subject matter of this bill, but this bill does one thing, and with the exception of what I have just mentioned, one thing only on this controversial issue: It requires that other agencies notify the Secretary and it requires the Secretary to consider the impact of his actions or other agencies' actions on a park.

That is the sum and substance of this bill.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I appreciate the gentleman from Ohio yielding.

Mr. Chairman, this report the gentleman is talking about, the first one, what is that you were reading from?

Mr. SEIBERLING. That is the committee report.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Your committee's report? Your staff people wrote this?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Your committee's report, and mine.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Our committee report, our own people, our own staff people?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Correct

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I see. I was just curious.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Approved by the committee, and dissented from by some members of the minority.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. We call that bootstrapping in some areas, do we not?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, the purpose of the committee report is to make clear and elaborate what Congress intended by language used in the bill. There is a whole page discussing how the words "adjacent to" should be interpreted.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. If the gentleman will yield further, I should probably apologize to the gentleman. I understand he has not had the opportunity to read this outside report, not from our committee, from the Congressional Research Service. Is that correct?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thought the gentleman was referring to another report. Apparently that is one I have not seen.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I apologize that the gentleman did not get that. I thought the gentleman had that in his possession.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I will try to get a copy of it and see what it says. I am, naturally, very interested.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. ROWLAND) having assumed the chair, Mr. PERKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 2379) to provide for the protection and management of the national park system, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS SPONSOR OF H.R. 555

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed as a sponsor of H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act of 1983.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks during the debate on H.R. 2379 today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

A CALL FOR REPEAL OF THE 25TH AMENDMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, this past June, I reintroduced a resolution to repeal the 25th amendment to the Constitution. This reflects a reaffirmation of a commitment that I have had for seven consecutive Congressses, ever since the first Congress after the adoption of the resolution calling for the 25th amendment, which I objected to, when it was debated as a resolution on this House floor. I was one of the 28 Members voting no, but I was the only one giving reasons in the RECORD for that vote.

I feel today as strongly as I ever have that the 25th amendment is a threat to the orderly and most importantly, the elective and democratic processes of government in this country. Of course, we value our Constitution, and should properly do so, because it assures that the Government is elected and that it is bound by fundamental law.

But laws and constitutions are only as strong as the will of the people to keep those laws. A government respects law only if the leadership is committed to law, and we know that this is not always the case.

The Founding Fathers and the authors of the Constitution also knew that that was a profound truth that had to be confronted.

In the 25th amendment we have a device that is intended to provide for an orderly succession in the Office of the President and also the Office of the Vice President. But we also have an unintended standing invitation to overthrow the Presidency through the operation of the disability clause, an integral part of the 25th amendment and one which, unfortunately, is very little realized both by Members of the Congress and by the general public, as I have found out ever since the debate on the resolution.

We have already lived through the reality of two unelected Vice Presidents and an unelected President. This, I am sure, was a thing that was most feared by those who wrote the Constitution. What they thought of the Office of the Presidency or any office similar to that is revealed by the fact that during the first 10 years of our national existence they did not even bother to provide for any such office. It was the Continental Congresses, period, and it was not until the Constitutional Convention that the concept of the Presidency was debated very, very strenuously. There were great heated arguments, many of the arguments reaching the point of stating that there was a question whether or not such an office should be created at all.

So given what has happened now, astoundingly, in light of this history—but, unfortunately, I say, because I was hoping and praying my fears and predictions would not be realized, and certainly I never expected it in my lifetime—sure enough, less than 8 years after the adoption of that amendment, the worst of those fears were realized, so that in those circumstances we have ended up with unelected Vice Presidents and an unelected President.

It was a criminal culpability or an erstwhile criminal culpability that forced the first resignation, and later it was the erstwhile criminal conduct of the President that forced him to resign under the threat of prosecution, leading to the first and only time in our history that has resulted in our having an unelected President.

What I think few of us remember is that before President Nixon resigned, it was his then Chief of Staff, together with the then Secretary of State, who contemplated using and appealing to the 25th amendment to force him out of office if he did not quit. Even though the 25th amendment was not directly invoked, the President's powers were effectively shorn, because those same two powerful individuals issued orders that they had to approve anything ordered by the President at that point.

In other words, the President might issue commands under those circumstances, but they are dead letters.

This is as close to a palace coup as this country has ever seen, even at the time of the height or influence of some of the historical figures that have interspersed our history, some even subsequently accused of treason, Aaron Burr, for example.

It is not only until our time and our generation that we have seen anything even the likes of Aaron Burr in the person of such individuals as the then Chief of Staff, later Secretary of State under this administration, Gen. Alexander Haig.

The fact was that Mr. Nixon was viewed by his staff, that is, principally those two chief staffers, as dangerous and irresponsible. They were operating outside the law and outside the Constitution by isolating him and not invoking the judgment of anyone else.

It was perhaps a well meant conspiracy in their eyes, but a conspiracy, nevertheless. They had the tool of the 25th amendment to use as a last resort, which they did not have to because Mr. Nixon acceded to the threat and resigned.

Now, I might at this point also evoke something else that happened to that first Vice President who resigned in the face of threats, for in his case, in fact, it sounds strange to even mention the name of Spiro Agnew. He is a nonperson. We like to think of ourselves as superior to that. We look down askance to the so-called banana Republics where you have palace coups, military takeovers and the like, assassinations, and do not realize that we may have that beam in our eye, as well as these neighbors with the mote in theirs; but Mr. Spiro Agnew wrote a book, which incidentally very few have bothered to review or report. The peculiar title of his book is, "Go Quietly, Or Else."

In reading the book, one sees that Mr. Agnew refers to that phrase because he was called by Alexander Haig and told in those words, "Go quietly. Get out, or else," but Mr. Agnew goes further in his book and his clear interpretation is that that threat was more than as a physical threat, that is, "If you don't quit, you're going to get hit," in good old gangster fashion in the sense that that word hit is used.

Now, that is terrible, very terrible, because the man writing that book was the Vice President of our country. Whether he ended in disgrace or not does not separate those of us who argued and debated here and by a two-thirds majority passed the resolution that created this tool or weapon, depending on the point of view, from continuing to consider the job unfinished and in constant need of review.

I think really the only thing is by repealing this most untoward amendment. The 25th amendment allows the President to be declared disabled, but by whom? By unelected officials of the Government.

This is why I was incredulous when the chairman of the Judiciary Committee then brought up that resolution. I looked at the wording for the first time here and saw those particular clauses that had to do with the criteria establishing the disability of the President and the phrases used, and I went to the chairman. As a matter of fact, by questioning, I caused him to become furious and he ended up cussing me under his breath.

I thought this was bad then, but it was just my personal experience. What it did was further anchor down my intention to pursue those questions, because that is my nature.

The questions were not answered then and they have not been answered since, only except by circumstances and events that I think show a clear and continuing danger to the stability of our form of government.

What am I talking about? Well, the questions I asked were, I said,

> Mr. Chairman, you say here that when a majority of the governing body reach the conclusion that the President is disabled or unable to discharge his duties as President, they shall then declare him unable and disabled. Then the Congress shall appoint a commission of three persons—does not say how, whether the House of Representatives will have one or the Senate two, or what. It just says the Congress.

But let us look at the words, "a majority of the governing body will govern." Where in our Constitution, where in our statutes, do we define what the majority of the governing body is?

The chairman looked at me and said, disgustingly, "Why, you know what that means. It means the Cabinet."

But I said,

> Mr. Chairman, the Cabinet is a nonconstitutional word. You do not find Cabinet anywhere in the Constitution. You are using majority of the governing body.

At that point was when he cussed me.

Now, I feel that it is just as imperative that we know exactly what those words mean.

Obviously, Secretary of State Kissinger, then Secretary of State, and Chief of Staff Gen. Alexander Haig, felt that they could muster a majority of the governing body, to-wit, the Cabinet and declare that Mr. Nixon was unable to discharge his functions as the elected President of this great country.

So that whom does this amendment give the power to declare a President disabled? Unelected officials of the Government.

I know that the men who wrote those constitutional phrases never intended that unelected individuals should have the power to unseat the elected.

The amendment assumes that all the President's staff and Cabinet are loyal to him, that they will not develop ambitions to unseat him.

As I said during the debate and it is in the record for all to see, I do not speak one way here or then any different than what I am saying now, and the scenes I had were that this was reminiscent of the old Roman Senate days of intrigue and ambitions, and as Madison said, "The bold seeking power," and all the mischief that led to, that history records.

Or as I said in 1965, more recently, the French Republic, Third French Republic, all the intrigues, all the counterintrigues, all the power plays, this is true of human government all through history. Who are we to think we are exempt from those foibles and weaknesses?

So that here in this 25th amendment is an assumption that something that has never been recorded in history is going to happen here.

We have already seen what happens when the country is in the grip of a political fire storm. And this is what I said in 1965.

Mr. Speaker, it is not now that we should think of the possibility open here for the first time in this proposal. Let us try to imagine, as we peer into the future, periods of great passion, turmoil, such as, say, the Civil War 100 years ago. Then the potential and the interpretation of this. We cannot in drafting legislation assume that the powers hereby created are going to be used by angels, but rather we should always be conscious of the fact that it would be used—could be used by devils.

But we have already seen what happens when we do have these periods of great passion, dissent, controversy, conflict. The President finds himself isolated, and then subsequently forced from office by his friends who it turns out have other loyalties, other wishes than to serve their erstwhile leader.

I am certainly not an apologist for President Nixon. But I say that it was the power and duty of the Congress to remove him if that were to be the outcome. Not the power of his staff to force him out. The Constitution gave the power of judgment to the Congress which is elected and not to Al Haig or Henry Kissinger who were not and never have been.

The actions of Haig and Kissinger were taken, they say, because they were responsible to the Office of the Presidency—more than to the President himself. That begs the issue. The fact is, they were not being loyal to the Constitution which provides a way to eliminate a President who has committed high crimes or is incapacitated, except as in these protocols in this 25th amendment for the first time.

But therein is the rub. The 25th amendment blurrs this power by delegating it to those who surround the President, by allowing the President's advisers a complete power to force him out of office in a time when he faces the judgment of Congress or of the people. This is what happened in 1974.

Let us think about what has happened and what happened the last time that a President was assaulted and almost killed. And what is the shock of so many Americans when the same individual, this time Secretary of State Haig, says, "I am in charge"?

Can we afford to overlook the fragility of this? This was the impelling reason I asked for resolutions in 1975, 1976, to pursue the 10 years of silence that impacted on our national processes, which incidentally were the reason why the 25th amendment was brought up and passed out under great and overdramatized atmosphere.

Suppose something happens today. Suppose something happens 6 weeks from now and we find ourselves in great, great emotional and political stress by untoward events happening not only domestically but internationally, and suddenly we have to worry about this.

I say we have been lucky more than what some people are saying that it proved that this did work when we had the crisis of 1973-74.

But even if you did have a case in which the President were gravely ill, this would not develop so fast or last so long that the Congress could not, in behalf of the people, make that decision. If there were a Wilson situation, Congress would have the time to make the necessary judgment of the President's ability to serve. And this was another argument I advanced at the time that the resolution was being pressed upon us. The assumption here was that there was nothing and never had been thought of by the Congress or the Constitution in anticipation of situations such as the long, lingering incapacity of President Wilson in the 1920's. And then of course after the assassination of President Kennedy, the assumption to the Presidency by the Vice President, Lyndon Johnson, leaving a vacuum in the Office of the Vice Presidency, my answer to the chairman was the ship of state sails serenely on, the Nation survived.

But you overlooked the fact that the first Congress, 1789, foresaw and passed statutory implementation for that article 2 proviso on the succession—very stark proviso. But what was that statutory implementation the first Congress passed—actually because they foresaw that there would be specific instances foreseeable by no human where something would happen and the Office of the Presidency would be vacated. And so, they provided a statute that simply said that if any such thing did happen and there remained 1½ years or more in that unexpended term of the Presidential Office, that then there should be an election so that the people could choose the leader.

What was wrong with that? Whatever happened after the Woodrow Wilson dilemma—in 1927 he had the succession law which amended that first statutory proviso which I think history will show was a terrible mistake, because it set up the succession laws that were in force, that those proponents of the 25th amendment were saying were so inadequate. And maybe they were. But not the original act. That showed clearly what the men serving our Government at the time of its initial periods and still fresh from writing the Constitution had in mind about unelected leaders of the country.

The point is the right to judge a President's ability to serve in office ought never to be given into the hands of a small coterie of unelected, undefined group of people as it is in this 25th amendment. That kind of power should never have been exercised by any but the Representatives of the people of the Congress as set forth in the other part of the article having to do with impeachment, removal from office. It is far less likely that the Congress, being large and diverse and directly accountable would ever seek to conspire successfully against a President than would a small group of ambitious Cabinet officers. And this was proven even during times of extreme stress, as during the times of the attempt to impeach President Johnson.

The best thing that can be said about the 25th amendment is that maybe under some circumstances it could work. But it is far less likely that it really protects the Constitution than it is that it endangers the right of the people to elect a President who will remain in office no matter how disgruntled his advisers might become, how ambitious they might be, or how much they want to take powers into their own hands.

I yield back the balance of my time.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 2379

By Mr. SEIBERLING:

(Amendments to the Udall amendment in the nature of a substitute.)

—(1) Page 13, strike out line 7 and all that follows down through line 13 on page 20 and substitute:

SEC. 10. (a) In any case of areas which are within any unit of the national park system, where the Secretary of the Interior is vested with any authority to—

(1) issue any lease;

(2) authorize or permit any use, occupancy, or development of such areas;

(3) sell or otherwise dispose of such lands or waters or interests therein or sell or otherwise dispose of any timber or sand, gravel, and other materials located on or under such areas.

he may exercise such authority only after he has determined that the exercise of such authority will not have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such national park system unit was established (including the scenery or the natural or cultural resources). Such determination shall be made only after notice and opportunity for a hearing on the record. The process for collecting needed information and evaluation thereof may be integrated with such planning and decisionmaking processes as are required by other law, except that the determination of the effect upon park resources shall be a separate document or a separate chapter within a document executed by the Secretary of the Interior.

(b) In any case of areas which are adjacent to any unit of the national park system, where the Secretary is vested with any authority described in Subsection (a), the Secretary may exercise such authority only after he has determined that the exercise of such authority will not have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such national park system unit was established; except that if the Secreatry determines that—

(1) any significant adverse effects on the values for which the national park system unit was established are clearly of lesser importance than the public interest value of the proposed action; and he may exercise such authority. The Secretary shall publish the record of such decision in the Federal Register and transmit copies of such decision documents to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives.

(c) This section shall not apply to inland waters except those which the Federal Government owns.

SEC. 11. (a) When a Federal agency or instrumentality undertakes or proposes to approve an action within or adjacent to a unit of the national park system which it determines may have a significant adverse effect on the natural or cultural resources of such unit, such agency or instrumentality shall—

(1) promptly notify the Secretary of the action at the time it is planning the action, preparing an environmental assessment regarding the action, or preparing an environmental impact statement under the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 for the action;

(2) provide the Secretary a reasonable opportunity to comment and make recommendations regarding the effect of the Federal action on the natural and cultural resources of the national park system unit concerned; and

(3) notify the Secretary of the specific decisions made in response to the comments and recommendations of the Secretary.

The requirements of this subsection shall be carried out in accordance with procedures established by the Federal agency responsible for undertaking or approving the Federal action. These procedures may utilize the procedures developed by such agency pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act.

(b) Following receipt of notification pursuant to subsection (a)(1), the Secretary shall make such comments and recommendations as he or she deems appropriate pursuant to subsection (a)(2) as promptly as practicable in accordance with the notifying agency's procedures established pursuant to subsection (a). In any instance in which the Secretary does not provide comments and recommendations under subsection (a)(2), the Secretary shall notify, in writing, the appropriate committees of Congress.

(c) Following receipt of the notifying agency's decisions pursuant to subsection (a)(3), the Secretary shall submit to the appropriate committees of Congress, including the authorizing Committees with primary jurisdiction for the program under which the proposed action is being taken, a copy of the notifying agency's specific decisions made pursuant to subsection (a)(3), along with a copy of the comments and recommendations made pursuant to subsection (a)(2).

(d) In any instance in which the Secretary has not been notified of a Federal agency's proposed action within or adjacent to a unit of the national park system and on his or her own determination finds that such action may have a significant adverse effect on the natural or cultural resources of such unit, the Secretary shall notify the head of such Federal agency in writing. Upon such notification by the Secretary, such agency shall promptly comply with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section.

(e) Each agency or instrumentality of the United States conducting Federal action upon Federally owned lands or waters which are administered by the Secretary and which are located within the authorized boundary of a national park system unit shall not approve such action until such time as the Secretary has concurred in such action.

(f) Except as otherwise permitted by law, nothing in this section shall be construed to require any State or local government to carry out any study or prepare any document or response to comments or recommendations made by the Secretary regarding any State or local activity supported by an agency or instrumentality of the United States which is subject to this subsection.

(g) The following Federal actions which constitute a major and necessary component of an emergency action shall be exempt from the provisions of this section—

(1) those necessary for safeguarding of life and property;

(2) those necessary to respond to a declared state of disaster; and

(3) those necessary to respond to an imminent threat to national security.

Any Federal action which pertains to the control of air space, which is regulated under the Clean Air Act, or which is required for maintenance or rehabilitation of existing structures or facilities shall also be exempt from the provisions of this section.

EXPORT OF HAZARDOUS WASTE

SEC. 10A. (a) EXPORT.—Subtitle C is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"EXPORT OF HAZARDOUS WASTE

"SEC. 3016. (a) IN GENERAL.—Beginning twenty four months after the date of enactment of the Hazardous Waste Control and Enforcement Act of 1983, no person may export any hazardous waste identified or listed under section 3001 unless—

"(1) such person has provided the notification required in subsection (c) of this section,

"(2) the receiving country has consented to accept such hazardous waste,

"(3) a copy of the receiving country's written consent is attached to the manifest accompanying each waste shipment; and

"(4) the shipment conforms with (A) the terms of the consent of the receiving country required pursuant to subsection (e) or with (B) the terms of an agreement entered into between the United States and the receiving country as provided in subsection (f).

"(b) REGULATIONS.—Not later than twelve months after the date of enactment of the Hazardous Waste Control Enforcement Act of 1983, the Administrator shall promulgate the regulations necessary to implement this section.

"(c) NOTIFICATION.—Any person who intends to export a hazardous waste identified or listed under section 3001 after the date beginning twelve months after the date of enactment of the Hazardous Waste Control Enforcement Act of 1983, shall, before such hazardous waste is scheduled to leave the United States, provide notification to the Administrator. Such notification shall contain the following information—

"(1) the name and address of the exporter;

"(2) the types and estimated quantities of hazardous waste to be exported;

"(3) the estimated frequency or rate at which such waste is to be exported, and the period of time over which such waste is to be exported;

"(4) the ports of entry;

"(5) a description of the manner in which such hazardous waste will be transported to and treated, stored, or disposed in the receiving country; and

"(6) the name and address of the ultimate treatment, storage, or disposal facility.

"(d) PROCEDURES FOR REQUESTING CONSENT OF THE RECEIVING COUNTRY.—Within 30 days of the Administrator's receipt of a complete notification under this section, the Secretary of State, acting on behalf of the Administrator, shall—

"(1) forward a copy of the notification to the government of the receiving country;

"(2) advise the government that United States law prohibits the export of hazardous waste unless the receiving country consents to accept the hazardous waste or has entered into an agreement with the United States establishing notice, export, and enforcement procedures for the transportation, treatment, storage, and disposal of hazardous waste;

"(3) request the government to provide the Secretary with a written consent or objection to the terms of the notification; and

"(4) forward to the receiving country a description of the Federal regulations which would apply to the treatment, storage, and disposal of the hazardous waste in the United States.

"(e) CONVEYANCE OF WRITTEN CONSENT TO EXPORTER.—Within 30 days of receipt by the Secretary of State of the receiving country's written consent or objection (or any subsequent communication withdrawing a prior consent or objection), the Administrator shall forward such a consent, objection, or other communication to the exporter.

"(f) INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS.—Where there exists an international agreement between the United States and the receiving country establishing notice and export procedures for the transportation, treatment, storage, and disposal of hazardous wastes, only the requirements of subsection (a)(4)(B) and subsection (g) shall apply.

"(g) REPORTS.—After the date of enactment of the Hazardous Waste Control Enforcement Act of 1983, any person who exports any hazardous waste identified or listed under this subtitle shall file with the Administrator no later than March 1 of each year, a report summarizing the types, quantities, frequency, and ultimate destination of all such hazardous waste exported during the previous calendar year.

export of hazardous wastes under section 3002 or section 3003 of this subtitle.".

"(b) PENALTIES.—Section 3008(d) is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(6) Knowingly exports a hazardous waste identified or listed under section 3001 (A) without the consent of the receiving country or (B) if an agreement has been entered into with the receiving country under section 3016(f), in a manner which is not in conformance with such agreement;".

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

HAZARDOUS WASTE

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 3, 1982

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am offering this amendment today in order to close a major loophole in the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act.

Currently, EPA has no regulatory authority to prevent the export of hazardous wastes to other countries. My amendment will provide EPA with the authority to prohibit the export of hazardous wastes if the receiving nation does not certify that it is aware of the hazardous nature of the waste, and that it is willing to receive the shipment.

This amendment does not mandate an outright ban on such shipments. I recognize the fact that there are several legitimate reasons for exporting hazardous wastes, such as for scientific testing, reprocessing, and recycling. My amendment is not aimed at these shipments.

The focus of my amendment is those wastes which are exported to avoid the stringent and more expensive requirements which govern the disposal of hazardous wastes in this country.

We must prevent the dumping of hazardous waste on unsuspecting Third World nations and we must make it very clear to other countries that we will not export our problems onto their shores.

There have been several incidences in the past few years where American companies have sought to export wastes in order to dump them in someone else's backyard. This reflects poorly on our country and harms our foreign policy interests.

In Mexico, an American citizen illegally disposed of PCB's and mercury sludge—both extremely hazardous substances—in an abandoned mine without adequate safeguards to the surrounding area.

Last year a Florida company proposed to incinerate large quantities of PCB-contaminated wastes in a Honduran facility after it had been denied an EPA permit for PCB incineration in this country. Once the Honduran Government learned of the hazardous nature of the waste, it refused to permit the activity.

In both of these cases, if the receiving country was notified of the nature of the waste, and certified it was willing to accept it, this amendment would provide no obstacle to the shipment. However, if the receiving country does not want the shipment, EPA would have the authority to stop the shipment.

Both the State Department and EPA agree that the RCRA legislation is the appropriate place to deal with this issue and I have worked with the EPA to create the least administrative burden on that Agency.

Our own country will have safeguards from the ill effects of hazardous waste upon passage of this legislation. We should take an equally firm stand on the transportation of hazardous waste bound for export to other countries. I urge you to support my amendment to insure such a clear message to the rest of the world.

EXPORT OF HAZARDOUS WASTE

SEC. 10A. (a) EXPORT.—Subtitle C is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

EXPORT OF HAZARDOUS WASTE

"SEC. 3016. (a) IN GENERAL.—Beginning twenty four months after the date of enactment of the Hazardous Waste Control and Enforcement Act of 1983, no person may export any hazardous waste identified or listed under section 3001 unless—

"(1) such person has provided the notification required in subsection (c) of this section,

"(2) the receiving country has consented to accept such hazardous waste,

"(3) a copy of the receiving country's written consent is attached to the manifest accompanying each waste shipment; and

"(4) the shipment conforms with (A) the terms of the consent of the receiving country required pursuant to subsection (e) or with (B) the terms of an agreement entered into between the United States and the receiving country as provided in subsection (f).

"(b) REGULATIONS.—Not later than twelve months after the date of enactment of the Hazardous Waste Control Enforcement Act of 1983, the Administrator shall promulgate the regulations necessary to implement this section.

"(c) NOTIFICATION.—Any person who intends to export a hazardous waste identified or listed under section 3001 after the date beginning twelve months after the date of enactment of the Hazardous Waste Control Enforcement Act of 1983, shall, before such hazardous waste is scheduled to leave the United States, provide notification to the Administrator. Such notification shall contain the following information—

"(1) the name and address of the exporter;

"(2) the types and estimated quantities of hazardous waste to be exported;

"(3) the estimated frequency or rate at which such waste is to be exported, and the period of time over which such waste is to be exported;

"(4) the ports of entry;

"(5) a description of the manner in which such hazardous waste will be transported to and treated, stored, or disposed in the receiving country; and

"(6) the name and address of the ultimate treatment, storage, or disposal facility.

"(d) PROCEDURES FOR REQUESTING CONSENT OF THE RECEIVING COUNTRY.—Within 30 days of the Administrator's receipt of a complete notification under this section, the Secretary of State, acting on behalf of the Administrator, shall—

"(1) forward a copy of the notification to the government of the receiving country;

"(2) advise the government that United States law prohibits the export of hazardous waste unless the receiving country consents to accept the hazardous waste or has entered into an agreement with the United States establishing notice, export, and enforcement procedures for the transportation, treatment, storage, and disposal of hazardous waste;

"(3) request the government to provide the Secretary with a written consent or objection to the terms of the notification; and

"(4) forward to the receiving country a description of the Federal regulations which would apply to the treatment, storage, and disposal of the hazardous waste in the United States.

"(e) CONVEYANCE OF WRITTEN CONSENT TO EXPORTER.—Within 30 days of receipt by the Secretary of State of the receiving country's written consent or objection (or any subsequent communication withdrawing a prior consent or objection), the Administrator shall forward such a consent, objection, or other communication to the exporter.

"(f) INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS.—Where there exists an international agreement between the United States and the receiving country establishing notice and export procedures for the transportation, treatment, storage, and disposal of hazardous wastes, only the requirements of subsection (a)(4)(B) and subsection (g) shall apply.

"(g) REPORTS.—After the date of enactment of the Hazardous Waste Control Enforcement Act of 1983, any person who exports any hazardous waste identified or listed under this subtitle shall file with the Administrator no later than March 1 of each year, a report summarizing the types, quantities, frequency, and ultimate destination of all such hazardous waste exported during the previous calendar year.

"(h) OTHER STANDARDS.—Nothing in this section shall preclude the Administrator from establishing other standards for the export of hazardous wastes under section 3002 or section 3003 of this subtitle.".

(b) PENALTIES.—Section 3008(d) is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(6) knowingly exports a hazardous waste identified or listed under section 3001, (A) without the consent of the receiving country or (B) if an agreement has been entered into with the receiving country under section 3016(f), in any manner which is not in conformance with such agreement;".

CELEBRATING THE GERMAN TRICENTENNIAL

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, this year, 1983, marks the 300th anniversary of the arrival of the first German immigrants to North America, and the 250th anniversary of the arrival of the first German settlers to my own State of Maryland. The many contributions which German immigrants have made, both to their adopted Nation and to my State, are substantial. Today, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a German American organization which, over the years, has made significant contributions to the Washington area and my own district in Maryland.

This organization is the Washington Saengerbund (Sang-er-bund). It was founded here in the District of Columbia in 1851, during one of the large waves of German immigration which brought so many outstanding men and women to these shores in the 19th century. Its original purpose was to foster German singing and German culture, and it was incredibly successful in this endeavor. The Washington Saengerbund sponsored the first major musical and operatic performances in the city, and it provided a center of European culture where like-minded citizens of many heritages gathered on a regular basis.

The Saengerbund was one of many German vereine (clubs) located in large cities and towns all over the United States. But unlike many that have disbanded through lack of membership and interest, the Washington Saengerbund is still active today. The Saengerbund still carries on the tradition of providing excellent German singing and music to the people of this area, and it now serves as a focal point for German culture. As the Saengerbund has done for more than 132 years, it provides a haven for the newly arrived German, and it also serves to introduce Washington area residents to many of the more worthwhile and pleasurable aspects of the best of German culture and the German homeland. It has done much to cement the bonds of German American friendship in the postwar years when the close ties of the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany were so important to free world unity.

The men and woman of the Washington Saengerbund—many now native-born Americans—sponsor one of the largest Oktoberfests in the United States. In fact, this annual event was just held last weekend just outside of Upper Marlboro in my district. The Saengerbund members may be the first to have brought this tradition to these shores, celebrating this fall event each year since 1948. More than 10,000 people attend this event each year, and they celebrate in the great joys of German music, dancing, cooking, beer, and German goodfellowship.

The Saengerbund also continues its efforts in bringing German song and German music to Washington. Over the years, in good times and bad, the members have worked diligently in their pursuit of good choral singing, fielding quite a respectable men's, women's, and mixed chorus of 70 to 80 singers at two major choral concerts each year in the hall of the German Orphan's Home in Upper Marlboro. Their music offers a good blend of the classical German composers and modern German folk and popular music. They fill the hall, and after the concert, they sponsor an excellent dance and party in the best German style.

Indeed, the Saengerbund has provided the region, the State of Maryland, and the United States with excellent music, good fun, and worthwhile recreation as a result of their own self-reliance, hard work, and civic responsibility. Naturally, many of their members are volunteering their time freely to assist in the successes of the tricentennial celebrations this year. The Saengerbund, I am pleased to add, is making material contributions to this event, and to the furtherance of good relations between ourselves and the people of the Federal Republic of Germany. On this occasion, I would like to express our thanks and wish them well in their future efforts.●

REPRESENTATIVE PORTER'S PERSON-TO-PERSON FOREIGN ASSISTANCE

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. Speaker, Representative JOHN PORTER served with me on the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations which has jurisdiction over all foreign aid funding. One of the foreign aid priorities for which we both try to provide adequate funding is in the area of medical needs, including humanitarian relief aid.

JOHN PORTER recently demonstrated this commitment in a much more personal and direct way that involved the resources of American free enterprise. In late August, when we were visiting an Afghan refugee camp at the Pakistan-Afghanistan border, we encountered thousands of refugees in need of medical assistance. One of the worst problems was the lack of antituberculosis medication. John "just happened to have" with him several boxes of antituberculosis medication provided to him by the Merrell Dow Pharmaceutical Co. to present to the camp authorities in Peshawar, Pakistan.

While the need for U.S. assistance was certainly demonstrated, the person-to-person approach can symbolize, as did the gesture of Representative JOHN PORTER, a special message of concern and support.●

THE CLINCH RIVER PROJECT: THE MOST ADVANCED PLANT OF ITS KIND IN THE WORLD

HON. SID MORRISON

OF WASHINGTON

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, every year when we debate continued funding for the Clinch River breeder reactor project, opponents raise a number of unfounded arguments designed to convince us to abandon this essential energy research project. While I suspect this to be the case again this year, I am increasingly confident that the facts will ultimately be clearly presented and that the Congress will once again vote to move the project forward.

Today I want to concentrate on the status of Clinch River components and the advanced state of its technology. Critics would have us believe either that very little progress has been made on project procurement or that the design of systems and components is out of date because the project is now more than a decade old. They are incorrect on both counts.

To date, more than $750 million worth of components have been completed or ordered. This represents about 75 percent of total procurement and major components. About $360 million worth of these have already been delivered for storage and testing. These include the first-of-a-kind and long-lead-time items necessary to support the critical path for construction.

These components not only exist—they also work, as has been demonstrated by the world's most comprehensive testing program for LMRBR components. Just this year, Clinch River's prototype steam generator was taken to full power in its test facility. These tests confirmed the unit's performance and reliability and validated the first-of-a-kind hockey-stick configuration. In a year-long series of tests, the prototype main sodium pump was shown to meet all its design specifications for normal and abnormal operating conditions.

Other major components and systems have successfully completed test programs. These include the reactor vessel closure head, primary and secondary control rod systems, electromagnetic pumps, and sodium fire suppression system. The enhanced performance of the plant's heterogeneous core configuration was also shown in comprehensive tests to be the world's most efficient in both performance and costs.

The test reactor prototype for the Clinch River project also confirms that the technology will work and is the most advanced in the world. The Fast Flux Test Facility (FFTF), a test 400 megawatt (thermal) breeder reactor located on the Hanford nuclear reservation, is the forerunner of the Clinch River Breeder and it will pave the way for future breeder development. The FFTF is designed to test fuels, materials, components, and conduct other high-performance breeder testing and evaluation.

The success of the FFTF has been nothing less than phenomenal. Since startup in 1980, FFTF tests have successfully confirmed the breeder's inherent safety features and verified operating procedures and plant performance. As of today, the FTFF has completed 88 days of continuous power operation in its current run. This test reactor is regarded as the most advanced facility of its kind in the world and represents a technological step no other nation has taken. It is another indication of the international leadership role that the United States has played and of the tremendous investment we have already made in breeder reactor development.

This investment in the FFTF and other breeder support program cannot be cashed-in unless we continue to pursue construction of Clinch River. CRBR is the crowning cap, a critical objective of our entire breeder research and development program. The breeder base program will complement the construction and operation of Clinch River. Failure to complete the project would constitute an incredible waste of the resources already expended.

The Clinch River Breeder Reactor will be a scaleup of 2½ times from the FFTF. Scientists and engineers familiar with high technology energy programs stress that a prudent scaleup on the order of three times is essential for the proper development of new advanced technologies. If we are to prepare the breeder technology for large-scale commercialization, we need to build a large demonstration plant which is roughly three times the size of the FFTF and one-third the size of the potential commercial power generator. CRBR fits this bill and is the ideal complement to the breeder base program.

We have come so far that it would be a shame not to complete CRBR. From its original inception, the project's merits were clearly apparent and the technology has remained state of the art. Today the justification for the project is even more apparent. This country will need additional supplies of domestically produced electricity; we need to maintain the nuclear option; and the breeder promises us a virtually inexhaustible source of energy. Even the Federal costs to complete the plant have been significantly reduced because of greater participation from private sources.

In the end, if we prevail and secure completion of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor, our future generations will be grateful that we exhibited the foresight to develop and commercialize this technology.●

THE DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. LaFALCE. On Tuesday, October 4, we expect to be considering under suspension of the rules the Senate-passed bill, S. 1852, to extend the expiration date of the Defense Production Act of 1950. That bill is being held at the desk.

I want to ensure that Members are apprised of the provisions of the bill, and of an amendment which I plan to offer.

S. 1852 would extend the authorities of the Defense Production Act of 1950 for 5 years, to September 30, 1988. Those authorities were terminated last Friday, September 30, 1983. In addition, the Senate-passed bill would extensively amend the authorities of title III of the Defense Production Act. When I move on Tuesday, October 4, to suspend the rules and pass the bill, S. 1852, I plan to offer an amendment which would strike all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof an extension of the authorities of the act for 2 years, to September 30, 1985.

The language of my proposed amendment follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the first sentence of section 717(a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2166(a)) is amended by striking out "September 30, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1985".●

A PROGRAM OF THE AMERICAN CHEMICAL SOCIETY, DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, the American Chemical Society, the professional society of chemists and chemical engineers, has inaugurated an information service for government to provide reliable, up-to-date information about technical aspects of chemistry and chemical engineering. This program provides a referral service to experts in technical areas and responds to requests for specific information with brief reports. The information service is described in detail in the prospectus. I commend this useful service to my colleagues.

PROSPECTUS FOR THE ACS INFORMATION SERVICE FOR GOVERNMENT

The American Chemical Society has instituted a new program, Information Service for Government (ISG), to provide scientific and technical information in the chemical sciences and engineering to governmental bodies, especially Congress. The American Chemical Society (ACS), a Congressional chartered, non-profit organization of professional chemists and chemical engineers, will provide this information as a public service.

The ISG program began formal operations in May 1983 on a two year experimental basis. The program has one full time professional staff member and is part of the operations of the ACS Department of Public Affairs (Dr. Robert G. Smerko, Director). Resources available to the ISG include the expertise of many of the ACS's 126,000 professional chemical scientists and engineers and the Society's library which includes access to a wide variety of computerized data bases.

The primary objective of the ISG program is to provide reliable up-to-date scientific and technical information to Congress and other governmental bodies to enhance their ability to make decisions based on the best available, current chemical knowledge. A secondary but important objective is to enable Congressional staff, who are often without a strong scientific background, to gain a good understanding of the scientific and technical issues involved in policy debates. This understanding goes beyond a knowledge of the technical information to encompass an appreciation of the limits of science including the uncertainty of scientific methods and the distinction between data and interpretations.

INQUIRIES TO ISG

The Information Service to the Government will respond to inquiries regarding the chemical sciences and engineering aspects of issues confronting the government. Such issues may include, but are not limited to, acid rain, chemcial hazardous waste disposal, pollution monitoring technologies, energy development and supply, environmental effects of specific chemicals, and nonproprietary information on chemical manufacturing processes. It is anticipated that most requests will fall into two categories: (1) requests for specific factual information, and (2) identification of experts on particular scientific and technical issues.

The ISG is primarily intended to respond to questions of a limited scope rather than to undertake large research projects. However, as resources permit, occasional large projects may be undertaken, but will be negotiated on an individual basis.

In general, the ISG will not respond to questions about the health effects of particular chemicals. However, health effects information may be provided, if it is required for an adequate response to a question received. Congressional requests for health effects information will be referred either to the Congressional Research Service which has expertise in that area or directly to experts in the field. Agency requests will be referred directly to experts in the field.

The ISG will not accept requests that require policy analysis, value judgments of scientific and technological alternatives, or official policy statements by the American Chemical Society. Instead, these requests will be referred to the appropriate offices within the American Chemical Society. However, it is recognized that there are 'grey areas' where experimental design and interpretation of scientific data overlap with policy analysis and societal value judgments. The ISG staff will determine whether to accept 'grey area' requests on a case by case basis.

Requests for information may be entered by telephone, in writing, or in person. The ISG may be used by Members of Congress, Congressional staff (including the Congressional Research Service and Office of Technology Assessment) and Executive Branch Agencies. Requests should be directed to: Information Service to the Government, American Chemical Society, 1155 16th Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036, Attention: Harlee Strauss, Ph. D. (20) 452-8917.

ISG RESPONSES TO INQUIRIES

Responses to requests for factual information will include the information requested and the source(s) from which the information was obtained. If the response requires information on a subject where there are multiple interpretations of available data, the major opposing interpretations will be provided. However, it is recognized that it may be impossible to present every possible interpretation. Where appropriate, the response will describe the limits of the quality and quantity of the available data. All reasonable attempts will be made to provide a balanced presentation of controversial data and its interpretations.

When names of experts are requested, a list will be provided which includes the area of expertise and the affiliation of the expert. Bibliographic information such as may be found in American Men and Women In Science will be provided if available. If requested, lists will contain names from several employment sectors and with different policy biases. Any factual information or opinion provided by an individual expert referred by the Information Service is solely that of the individual and not attributable to the American Chemical Society.

In general, responses to requests for information that are handled directly by the Information Service office will be in writing. However, requests which require very rapid responses may be handled over the telephone. Every effort will be made to ensure the response is timely.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE

The ISG has an advisory committee of ten members, appointed by the ACS Director of Public Affairs, with representatives from government, industry, academia, and public interest groups. The Advisory Committee will meet as needed to provide advice on (1) important issues toward which the Information Service to the Government should direct its resources and the appropriate methods for doing so; (2) appropriate processes for maintaining neutrality in providing information; and (3) criteria for evaluating the Information Service. The Committee will also review ISG initiated technical briefs (see below) and act as a resource regarding the overall context in which questions are asked.

CONFIDENTIALITY

Unless otherwise requested, the name of the requester, the original question and the response will be freely available. The sources of the information will also be freely available.

DISCLAIMER

All responses and reports prepared by the ISG will include the following disclaimer:

The information provided is not an analysis covering every material fact or theory associated with the subject of this report. The source of any opinion expressed is clearly indicated, and such opinions may be subject to change without notice. The information provided does not necessarily reflect any policy of the American Chemical Society, whether such policy is presently in existence or to be adopted in the future.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

Technical briefs

The ISG will select specific issues which are of current, or probable future concern to Congress and will prepare technical briefs on these topics. An example of such a technical brief might be a description of trichloroethylene (TCE) which has been found to be a contaminant in drinking water supplies around the country. The description would include the commercial uses of TCE, methods for its detection, EPA approved methods of disposal, known health effects, and methodologies used for cleanup.

Technical briefs will be prepared in consultation with the appropriate Congressional staff in order to meet their information needs and will be reviewed by the ISG advisory committee to ensure that the information provided is accurate and contains a balanced presentation of the data and interpretations.

Congressional seminars

The ISG will organize seminars on topics with chemical science or engineering dimensions which will probably confront Congress in one to five years. Speakers selected for these seminars will be experts on the scientific and technical aspects of the topic and will be able to communicate clearly the limits and the strengths of the available knowledge on the topic.●

1983—NATIONAL 4-H WEEK

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, National 4-H Week will be observed the week of October 2-8 with the theme, "4-H: Building on Experience," and once again, I am pleased to commend this program for its accomplishments during the past year.

Administered by the Cooperative Extension Service of the Department of Agriculture, 4-H assists young people in acquiring knowledge, developing skills, and forming attitudes that will enable them to become self-directing, productive members of society.

Participation in the 4-H program is open to all interested youths between the ages of 9 and 19. Nearly 5 million youths and over 600,000 volunteers participated in 4-H activities during the past year. The average time spent by each 4-H volunteer is 220 hours per year and the success of the 4-H program is attributed to these volunteers.

In my home State of Kentucky, over 235,000 youths participated in the 4-H program through the University of Kentucky's Cooperative Extension Service in 1982; and in the second district, which I have the privilege of representing, 34,170 youth participated in the 4-H program. The overall trend the past several years in Kentucky has been a steady increase in 4-H enrollment.

Western Kentucky youths have high participation records in demonstrations, State fairs exhibits, achievement records—particularly in agriculture and home economics projects—and also the teen leadership program.

The Kentucky staff has been a pioneer in working with youth in electronic technology and, since 1980, the use of computers has been an activity at Kentucky summer camp. The computer project series the staff developed has been released to pilot States.

Western Kentucky youths continue to participate in "Citizenship: Washington Focus," held in the Washington 4-H Center. In this program, youths from all across the United States visit the Nation's Capital to learn about the Federal Government. The University of Kentucky staff conducts the American Heritage Program in conjunction with "Citizenship: Washington Focus."

Again, I want to commend all of the members of the 4-H program for their achievements during this past year and wish them continued success in all their future endeavors.●

NATIONAL 4-H WEEK

HON. C. ROBIN BRITT

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. BRITT. Mr. Speaker, October 2 through October 8 is National 4-H Week, and this year's theme is "4-H: Building on Experience." It is, Mr. Speaker, an entirely appropriate theme.

Through a learn-by-doing process, 4-H assists youths in acquiring knowledge, developing skills, and forming attitudes that will enable them to become self-directed, productive, and contributing members of society.

Mr. Speaker, in my district—including Guilford, Davidson, and Alamance Counties—there are nearly 6,000 youths involved in the 4-H program and approximately 1,300 volunteer leaders. Nationwide, 4.8 million youth and more than 600,000 volunteers are taking part in the 4-H program this year.

These statistics are only part of the 4-H story. Throughout the Nation, 4-H youth and volunteers, under the guidance of the professional staffs of the Cooperative Extension Service, and in cooperation with the private sector are responding to important concerns of our youth. They are contributing significantly to priority missions of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, including increasing agricultural productivity, conserving our natural resources, expanding market programs, and improving the well-being of people and communities.

Mr. Speaker, in agriculture and elsewhere, the people in the 4-H program have made a tremendous contribution to our Nation. This week we should take special note of their accomplishments and give them the thanks they have so richly earned.●

NEW YORK CITY'S HOMELESS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, the dimensions of the problem of sheltering the city's homeless has grown rapidly in the last several years. With winter weather quickly approaching, this problem will heighten to an even greater extent. The number of homeless people in New York City alone has grown so rapidly that city and State officials estimate that they will have to provide temporary shelter this winter for more than 18,000 people, more than twice the number aided 2 years ago. This influx of people seeking shelter has transformed the problem from being a definable, predictable social issue to one of unknown costs and consequences.

On July 13, 1983, the House of Representatives passed H.R. 1, the Housing and Urban/Rural Recovery Act which contained $100 million to assist the homeless. It is vital that the Senate consider this legislation in the immediate future so that funds may be available for the winter.

As an initial warning, the Sunday edition of the New York Times ran an article on the front page revealing the potential and startling problem that New York City's poor will soon face as the winter months draw closer. I have attached a copy of the Sunday, October 2, 1983, article in hope that this article will reawaken the Congress to the necessity of passing this legislation.

The problems faced by the poor will not simply vanish, we cannot neglect their plight, especially not families with small children. In addition, without Federal assistance, State and local governments cannot meet this most pressing of needs.

[From the New York Times, Oct. 2, 1983]

COSTS TO SHELTER HOMELESS IN CITY CLIMBING SHARPLY

(By Michael Goodwin)

The ranks of homeless people in New York City are swelling so rapidly that city and state officials estimate they will have to provide temporary homes and food this winter for as many as 18,000 people, about double the number who sought assistance less than two years ago.

And despite costs that could reach $135 million this fiscal year—up from $18 million in 1978—the officials say that most of the money will provide emergency, short-term help only.

Indeed, the officials say that although they have recently embarked on an ambitious program of trying to provide permanent housing in city-owned buildings, a long-term solution to the problem of homelessness for thousands of poor people seems beyond reach. They say the best they can hope for is not to have their efforts overwhelmed.

"Actually, we're still trying to get on top of the problems," said Robert Jorgen, a deputy commissioner at the city's Human Resources Administration. "We're still trying to catch up."

"AS MUCH AS WE CAN"

In an interview, Mayor Koch echoed those sentiments. "We're doing as much as we can," he said.

Asked what the city could do other than react to the crisis, he said: "I'm happy to receive suggestions. Do you have any?"

City officials do not have specific estimates on the costs for future years, but, in general, they assume the costs will continue to rise sharply.

The city's response has prompted a good deal of criticism, primarily from social agencies that have consistently contented that the Koch adminstration is not doing enough. They have accused the Mayor of dragging his feet, of trying to discourage people from using the shelters by providing the barest minimum of services, comfort and security.

Mr. Koch has heatedly denied those charges, saying that the city has always done what is legally and morally correct. He has pointed to the soaring costs as evidence that the city is committed to helping those who have no place to live and to the policy of offering shelter, without question, to anyone who requests it.

But more recently, as the problem has mushroomed, the Mayor has received some criticism from the other end of the spectrum. Questions have been raised about the wisdom of the city's policy and about the social consequences to the taxpayer and to the people living in the hotels and shelters the city finances.

For example, Thomas J. Main, a program officer at the private Smith Richardson Foundation, has concluded that the policy, which was ordered by the courts and agreed to by the administration, may be an obstacle to rehabilitating the homeless.

"The worst possible shelter policy is one that allows clients to adapt to the 'life style' of homelessness," Mr. Main wrote in a publication called the Public Interest. "Apart from the moral questions such a position raises, the problem is that if more and more people adapt to homelessness, the demand for shelter will eventually rise to unacceptable levels.

"New York has locked itself into a policy not unlike the advocates', and which it may not be able to back away from, even as the limitations of such a policy become increasingly obvious."

While that view still seems to be the minority one, at least among those who have spoken out, it is not unlike the position Mr. Koch has taken all along. He has often argued that, in effect, the supply of housing for the homeless creates demand: Open more shelters, he has said, and people will fill them.

The Mayor has also expressed concern that New York City's policy will become a lure for homeless people across the country, much as New York's relatively generous welfare benefits were thought to have caused a migration of poor people to the city from Southern states and Puerto Rico a generation ago.

"A GOOD DEAL OF TRUTH"

Speaking of Mr. Main's thesis, Mr. Koch said, "There's a good deal of truth in that."

He added: "I'm not saying the shelters and the hotels are palaces. Obviously they are not. But they might be better than the homes people had before."

While welfare officials say there is not much evidence that the shelters have lured people from outside the city, they do point to several statistics to buttress the Mayor's position that, at least among city residents, the easy availability of the shelters has make people more willing to use them.

They cite, for example, the fact that the number of people in the shelters no longer declines significantly in warmer months, as it once did. They also say that every time the shelters are in the news, they get a new flood of people looking for a home.

Brendan Sexton, director of the Mayor's Office of Operations, said a recent dispute between state and city officials over the poor conditions in welfare hotels resulted in so many new families seeking accommodations that the "overflow" of up to 300 people has been housed in a gymnasium in Roberto Clemente State Park in the Bronx.

The city traditionally has had homeless people. To tourists and residents alike, the sight of bedraggled, downtrodden men sleeping on the Bowery and other streets often seemed as much a part of New York as Times Square, the Yankees and Broadway.

But the dimensions of the problem have grown rapidly in the last several years. The influx of people seeking shelter has transformed the problem from being a definable, predictable social issue to one of unknown costs and consequences, city officials said.

Social workers accustomed to dealing with a steady number of middleaged men troubled by bad luck and alcohol say they are now having to deal with young, able-bodied men, former convicts and mental patients, as well as women, children and infants.

When the Koch administration took office in 1978, it inherited a program that traditionally cared for about 2,000 individuals and fewer than 1,000 families. And most of those people only sought shelter during the coldest months because their regular apartments and rooms had no heat. In 1978, the city spent about $8 million to shelter individuals and about $10 million to shelter families.

Now the administration has more than 5,000 individuals in 17 shelters and more than 2,100 families scattered in run-down hotels around the city. As winter approaches, officials expect that as many as 1,300 more individuals will make use of the shelters and that the number of families could reach 3,000. The average size of the families in the shelters is just under four persons.

Moreover, a program by churches and synagogues to offer shelter to the homeless, mostly at city expense, is expected to provide beds for as many as an additional 1,000 people this winter.

The city's budget anticipates expenses of $80 million for the shelters and hotels—about half of it city money, the remainder from Federal and state grants. Officials say, however, that perhaps an additional $10 million will be needed, depending on the demand this winter.

PLANNING FOR THE LONG TERM

While the Koch administration was initially often defensive about the problem, blaming Reagan Administration cuts in housing programs and the state's policy of turning more mental patients out of hospitals, it has more recently concluded that the problem is here to stay and that it must do some planning for the long term, even as it scrambles to provide emergency care.

"This past year, it became quite apparent that we had reached a point where the things we had been doing were not enough anymore," Mr. Sexton of the Office of Operations said. "Everybody predicted we would be dealing with an increase in people, but not a waterfall, not a Niagara Falls."

One of the long-range ideas, long suggested by critics outside the Koch administraton, was to put the homeless in some of the thousands of vacant apartments in properties that the city took over through their foreclosure proceedings.

Recently the administration decided to do that and it now estimates that it will spend about $45 million this year to fix 2,000 apartments. A handful of families have already started to move into some of the apartments, and Mr. Sexton said all 2,000 should be ready by next June. An additional 1,500 could be habitable by a year from now, he said.

But officials are not confident of that course because the cost of the rehabilitation is so high—an average of about $15,000 for each unit.

Anthony B. Gliedman, the city's Housing Commissioner, who will be responsible for the families once they move in, said he had "reservations" about many of the families.

"Unless we give them strong support services, they could be a long-term detriment to the other tenants in those buildings," he said. "It would not be fair to foist them onto the people already living in those buildings without some supervision and help."

"At times, the problem appears so overwhelming, so utterly hopeless," said William B. Eimicke, Governor Cuomo's deputy secretary and chairman of the state's task force on the homeless. "But we can't just write these people off, especially not families with children 2 and 3 years old. Many of these people would just die."●

TWENTY-FIVE MERIT SCHOLAR SEMIFINALISTS

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, we have heard much lately about the quality of education in our schools, both good and bad. It is only fitting, then, that we take time out from this point/counterpoint and recognize the many students who are now achieving excellence in education, the many teachers who work long hours without adequate pay and the many public schools which are building sound academic programs and delivering to our Nation a body of enthusiastic and well-prepared youth.

Each year the National Merit Scholarship Corp. awards thousands of college grants to qualified young men and women in high school. This year, 25 students attending schools in the Fifth Congressional District were named semifinalists in the annual merit competition. I could describe these students by noting their dedication, their hard work, their creativity, and their eagerness to learn. Each of these attributes has played an important part in earning the honor of being a merit scholar. But the common denominator is that they have lived up to and surpassed the highest standards of education which they are offered. I would like to congratulate each of these young men and women for working hard and making it to the head of the class.

They are: from Bowie High School: Sharon Livingston; from DeMatha High School: Christopher Gleason; from Eleanor Roosevelt High School: Adam L. Bresnick, David M. Burtnick, Gail L. Christeson, Amy S. Espeseth, Gregory T. Fieldson, Kathleen M. Galleher, Kevin G. Gonter, John J. Jenks, Glen A. Kruse, Elizabeth J. Linstrom, Kristin A. Majeska, Carey A. O'Reilly, Bonnie J. Rippere, Richard E. Tontodonato, and Helen F. Webb; from Friendly High School: Traci A. Beilstein, Michael S. Bosco, and Ellis R. Rosenberg; from Gwynn Park High School: Sylvia A. Rutiser; from Northwestern High School: Jayne A. Meeks; and from Queen Anne School: Erik G. Ledbetter, Andrew R. Lee, and Carlos M. Nalda.

I would like to point out to the House that 15 of these merit semifinalists attend one school, the Eleanor Roosevelt High School in Greenbelt, Md. Roosevelt High first opened its doors in 1976. In a very short time it has become one of the finest schools in the Washington metropolitan area. Its students defy the negative comments spoken about American education now being delivered across the Nation. As an institution, Eleanor Roosevelt High School is an example of a school that dares to challenge its students, and, in doing so, challenges the popular belief that American education is awash in a rising tide of mediocrity. These students and this school exemplify the best of American education. Again, I offer my congratulations to all 25 students. They have earned a great honor, and I wish them continued success in their studies.●

WESTERN NEW YORK NATURAL GAS PRICES REVISITED

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, on September 23, 1983, I printed in the RECORD (p. E 4527) a copy of an article from the Buffalo News in which FERC Commissioner David Hughes is reported to have predicted a 30- to 40-percent increase in natural gas prices for western New York consumers.

I contrasted Mr. Hughes' prediction with National Fuel's announced price reduction of 4.3 percent, and asked rhetorically, "natural gas prices: up or down?"

I recently received a copy of a letter to the editor of the Buffalo News written by Mr. Hughes in which he states, "I do not believe that there will be a 40-percent increase in rates in Buffalo next winter."

In order to set the record straight, I ask that Mr. Hughes' letter be inserted in the RECORD.

Thank you.

[A copy of the letter follows:]

FEDERAL ENERGY REGULATORY COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., September 21, 1983.

Mr. MURRAY LIGHT,
Editor, Buffalo Evening News,
Buffalo, N.Y.

DEAR MR. LIGHT: Your accounts (in the News on September 16 and 17) have reminded me of the cliché that it's dangerous for public officials to mention predictions, especially about the future.

When I spoke to the press, my purpose was to state that generally, natural gas price increases have been estimated by others as high as 40 percent, and that estimates have also been made as low as 15 percent. Since we do not regulate retail rates, and given that any meaningful prediction of retail gas costs requires an ability to forecast the weather as well as local markets, a precise quantification is not possible. I do not believe that there will be a 40 percent increase in rates in Buffalo next winter. I made that clear on a 11:00 p.m. live Channel 4 newscast the night of the 16th.

As your story correctly said, I believe that under the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has more ability to predict wellhead gas price increases built into the statute than to control them. That's why I think Congressional action will be necessary to avoid another winter of higher gas costs, however slight or large they may be.

While I did not predict a 40 percent increase in retail rates, the real message I brought back from Buffalo is that any increase above 10 percent would impair Buffalo's chances for economic revival and would add more hardships to a community already hit too hard.

Sincerely,

DAVID HUGHES,
Commissioner.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. JAMES F. McNULTY, JR.

OF ARIZONA

Monday, October 3, 1983

● Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, my district in southeastern Arizona over the past 4 days has been subjected to extremely heavy flood damage resulting from unprecedented levels of rainfall. At least 10 lives have been lost so far, and damage estimates already are running well into the tens of millions of dollars. The flooding has touched practically the entire State, but the Fifth District has been hit particularly hard.

I must see what I can do about this devastating and terrible tragedy. I am therefore going back to my district to survey the damage firsthand, to report back to my colleagues on the extent of the tragedy, and to assist in seeing that the Federal Government assistance programs are implemented quickly and efficiently. Regrettably, the forces of nature pay little attention to the work schedule of the House of Representatives—and my visit to the district will require me to miss some votes. I regret this very much, Mr. Speaker, and would like you and my colleagues to be aware of that fact. I hope my mission is brief, but I will appreciate having the House's support for my efforts.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, October 4, 1983, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

SENATE—Tuesday, October 4, 1983

(Legislative day of Monday, October 3, 1983)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Father in Heaven, thank you for the return of two of our very faithful servants in the Senate. We ask Thy blessing upon them.

Though I speak with the tongues of men and angels, and have not love, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing.

Love suffereth long, and is kind; love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up. Doth not behave itself, unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Love never fails.—I Corinthians 13:1–8

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the two leaders are recognized this morning, there will be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business which will extend from the expiration of the leaders' time until 10 o'clock in which Senators may speak for 1 minute. By unanimous consent, the Senate will turn to the consideration of the Labor-HHS appropriations bill at 10 a.m.

Today being Tuesday and the day for the regular caucuses on both sides of the aisle, the Senate will stand in recess for 2 hours.

May I inquire of the Chair, has that time been ordered yet?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has already been ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Then at 2 p.m., Mr. President, assuming we have not finished Labor-HHS, and I feel sure we will not have finished Labor-HHS, the Senate will return to that appropriation bill and work on it the remainder of the day, I imagine.

Tomorrow, Mr. President, we will have a cloture vote to cut off further debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the Martin Luther King, Jr., holiday bill.

Mr. President, I would expect, barring unforeseen circumstances, today to be a fairly normal day, meaning that we will run until 6, 6:30, or thereabouts in the evening. If there is a requirement for additional time, I will consult with the managers and, of course, the minority leader and adjust that schedule, but Senators should assume for the moment that we will be out by 6 or 6:30 today.

Mr. President, this is the last week before the October break of 10 days. I urge Senators to consider that as they decide on the length of their speeches and the number of their amendments and their otherwise dedicated passion for improvement of this bill or any other bill.

Mr. President, I do not mean that Members should forgo the opportunity to speak or to offer amendments. I am simply saying it sure will get us out of here a lot easier and a lot quicker if we can save some of them for when we come back on October 17.

I would make two points in that respect, Mr. President. The Speaker, the minority leader in the Senate, Senator BYRD, the minority leader in the House, and I have all stated that we hope we can make a November 18 sine die adjournment, but that depends, Mr. President, on what we get done. I hope Senators will cooperate in trying to make that a reality. The things that must be done I will not try to list now in their entirety, but they include such things as the balance of the appropriations bills, or at least as many of them as we can pass, a continuing resolution, if we must have one—that is to say, if we have not passed all the appropriation bills—and extension of the debt limit, which I believe must be attended to before the end of October but which I do not expect to ask the Senate to turn to until after we come back from our October break.

Mr. President, in addition to that, we have one matter in which I have a long-abiding and persisting interest and that is TV in the Senate, which I expect and declare that I am going to bring up before this session is out. But some of my friends on both sides of the aisle who are equally dedicated to the defeat of that proposal should be reassured that I will not try to do it without consulting with all Members first so they are not taken unaware. However, it will not be before October 17.

Mr. President, there are a number of other things that have to be done including conference reports, reauthorizations, and the like, and we will address those things as time goes by. After our caucus today on this side of the aisle, I will confer at the pleasure of the minority leader on this subject and try to have a further statement to make in the course of the week on the program for the Senate not only for the remainder of this week but for a time after we return on October 17.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve the remainder of my time if any remains under the standing order. I further ask unanimous consent that it may be reserved for the use of the minority leader at any time during the course of this day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond 10 a.m. with statements therein limited to 1 minute each.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, since no other Senator is presently seeking recognition in morning business, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I made a rash prediction a few minutes ago that today would be a normal day and we would be out between 6 p.m. and 6:30 p.m. Fortunately, good judgment overtook my loose tongue, and I also added that I had not yet conferred with the managers and that I would do so and if there is a contrary intention, I would let the Senate know.

I have and there is.

The manager on the part of the majority advises me that he wishes to finish this bill today, which I applaud, but that to do so may require that we run past the usual adjournment hour. He mentioned the hour of 8 p.m.

Mr. President, Senators should be on notice that the Senate may very well go past the usual adjournment or recess hour today, and I urge Members to take account of that probability in making their plans for the evening.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PARAQUAT SPRAYING OF MARIHUANA PLANTS

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, 20 percent of the marihuana abused in this country is grown in the United States—in Alabama, Arkansas, Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Missouri, Montana, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oregon, Tennessee, Virginia, and Washington State. Approximately 2 million pounds of domestic marihuana is produced a year, and the cream of the crop commands more than $1,000 a pound, wholesale, on the black market; $150 will buy you 2 ounces of it on the street.

The greatest percentage of domestic market cultivation takes place on private lands. But there is an increasing tendency for growers illegally to use public lands, managed by the Bureau of Land Management, in the Western United States. Hunters, sports fishers, campers, miners, hikers, loggers, and ranchers are apt to encounter illegal marihuana fields in their use of these public lands. The illegal fields are protected by armed guards and booby traps, such as sharp steel spikes that penetrate your foot, explosives activated by trip wires, and fish hooks hung at eye level in the brush.

Mr. President, Colombia, Mexico, and Jamaica produce 80 percent of the marihuana abused in the United States, at a street value total of $28.7 billion. We have been pressuring these foreign countries to spray their marihuana crops with the herbicide paraquat, as the State of Florida did last year. But their argument was that the U.S. Government has not sprayed their own domestic fields, and so why should they.

This year, the Federal Government has demonstrated to foreign countries that we, in the United States, practice what we preach. The BLM has launched a major effort to control narcotics production on public lands. The joint eradication program involves other Federal agencies as well as State, county, and local law enforcement. Our action sends a clear message to drug-producing countries abroad that we mean to control our tragic drug problem on all fronts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a New York Times article on this subject, entitled "U.S. Plans More Spraying to Kill Marihuana."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 16, 1983]

UNITED STATES PLANS MORE SPRAYING TO KILL MARIJUANA

WASHINGTON, Aug. 15 (UPI).—The herbicide paraquat could be sprayed on marijuana fields on Federal lands in 40 states after what the Reagan Administration considered a successful trial run on northern Georgia last week, officials said today.

At the same time, however, a Federal district judge in Georgia issued a temporary restraining order preventing further spraying in the Chattahoochee National Forest, an action that could stall the Administration's plan.

Pat McKelvey, a spokesman for the White House Drug Abuse Policy Office, said the controversial herbicide might be used in all but the 10 states that are not participating in the Drug Enforcement Administration's "domestic cannabis eradication program."

Paraquat, first used on domestic marijuana last year in Florida, was sprayed on several marijuana plots Friday in the national forest near Helen, Ga. Officials privately called the effort a success.

"NOT PLANNING TO CEASE"

Judge Charles Moye today prohibited further spraying in the forest until a hearing could be held. But drug agency officials said the effort there was complete and they were considering aerial eradication elsewhere.

"We're not planning to cease spraying paraquat," said Ted Swift, an agency spokesman. "We are currently considering spraying paraquat on other Federal lands. I can't tell you when or where."

Mr. McKelvey said spraying could occur in every state except Nevada, Alaska, New York, Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey and the District of Columbia, which have not agreed to join the Federal program. Most of those states are not in the program because they do not have serious marijuana problems, He said.

Paraquat is safely used on 10.7 million acres of farmland in the United States to kill weeds, Mr. McKelvey said, accusing marijuana growers of exaggerating the health hazard.

"They've created some hysteria down in Georgia that it's going to kill people," Mr. McKelvey said.

In each case before spraying begins, officials conduct an environmental assessment "to make sure we're not spraying into streams or near livestock or human beings," he said. The spray is no hazard to anyone, he added, even marijuana smokers, because the herbicide "turns the plants into dust" within 72 hours and "you can't make a joint out of dust."

MORAVIANS ACTION SUPPORTS GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, for over 15 years I have risen daily in this Chamber to support the International Genocide Convention. I have frequently maintained that morality impels the United States to ratify this treaty—that to formally condemn and criminalize genocide is, simply, the right thing to do. I would go further today by reminding the Senate that the American people whom we represent share this view. We therefore have both a moral and a political imperative to act in support of the Genocide Convention.

That domestic political imperative was again illustrated when the recent Northern Province Synod of the Moravian Church in America passed a resolution calling for ratification of the Genocide Convention. Representatives from over a dozen States were present at this synod; their president, the Right Reverend Wilbur Behrend, summed up their views in a single statement: "It is almost unthinkable to us that a nation such as ours would be unwilling to ratify this action."

This resolution repeats several arguments for ratification which I have cited for years: The criminal nature of genocide, the U.S. leadership in drafting the Convention 35 years ago, our ongoing commitment to preserving human rights, and the concurrence of 83 other nations, including all other major Western democracies. Surely it is time to respond to the ongoing urging of our friends abroad and our citizens at home.

I hope my Senate colleagues will gain from these arguments a renewed sense of the propriety of the International Genocide Convention, and will proceed to lend their advice and consent to ratification without delay.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of the Moravian resolution which I have cited.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWELFTH PARTIAL REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CHURCH AND SOCIETY AND WORLD MISSION

Re: U.S. Senate Ratification of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

Whereas genocide—the destruction of a people for reasons of nationality, ethnicity, race, or religion—is the ultimate crime against humanity, and

Whereas based upon all the evidence of Biblical studies covering the great spectrum of Old and New Testaments, it is our Christian duty to abhor acts of genocide and declare such acts as a disgrace to our common humanity and therefore offensive to God, and

Whereas the Moravian Covenant clearly states "We view all of life as a sacred trust" and that we will also "recognize the support of worthy causes outside the church as part of our stewardship," and the Moravian Covenant makes similar supportive statements in paragraphs 19, 25, 26, 27, 28, and 29, and

Whereas the United States in 1948 led the world in drafting a convention outlawing genocide, and

Whereas the convention outlawing genocide has been ratified by 83 nations, including all the other major nations of the free western world, and

Whereas the United States, despite its long commitment to human rights, has for the past 34 years failed to ratify the convention outlawing genocide, now therefore be it

Resolved: That this Synod support Senate ratification of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

Adopted August 26, 1982.

EISENHOWER HAD IT RIGHT 27 YEARS AGO: STOP THE NUCLEAR ARMS RACE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President on September 7, David Broder wrote a column of striking significance to this Congress. Because the column appeared in the Washington Post during our August-September recess, many Members of the Congress may have missed it. The Dwight Eisenhower that had not been previously disclosed. The letter was an answer to an inquiry President Eisenhower had received calling for the United States to instigate a "crash program for long-range airpower and missiles." President Eisenhower had, we all know, devoted his life to the military. He ended his military career as the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, the heroic general who led this country to victory against the Nazis in Europe. So it can be said without exaggeration that no President—certainly in this century—has come to office with a more profound understanding of our military power, its purpose, its limitations, and its potential than Eisenhower.

How would the General-President who had won our greatest military victory respond to this proposal to go ahead full speed in the nuclear arms race with the Soviet Union? Keep in mind that this was more than 27 years ago, back in March of 1956, when our nuclear advantage over the Soviet Union appeared to be decisive, if not overwhelming. It was well before the Cuban missile crisis. It was a time when the prospect of nuclear war seemed far less threatening than today. And it was a time when a nuclear war, while immensely destructive, would have been far less devastating than a nuclear war today. What was Eisenhower's response? Mr. President, I will insert the entire Broder column at the end of this statement. And that column carries the Eisenhower response in detail. But I want to call my colleague's attention to the paragraph that Broder singled out as the heart of the Eisenhower response. Here it is:

When we get to the point, as we one day will, that both sides know that in any outbreak of general hostilities, regardless of the element of surprise, destruction will be both reciprocal and complete, possibly we will have sense enough to meet at the conference table with the understanding that the era of armaments has ended and the human race must conform its actions to this truth or die.

Now, Mr. President, can anyone doubt that we have reached that point at this very moment? With every passing month the nuclear arms race carries us further along the road to absolute destruction, a world of devastation where all that will be left of this blessed country is a massive, steaming, radioactive tomb. What Eisenhower foresaw 27 years ago has come to pass. We are indeed on the brink of nuclear destruction.

Are we at the conference table that Eisenhower called for? Do our President and the Congress "understand that the era of armaments has ended and the human race must conform its action to this truth or die"? We do indeed have arms control negotiators meeting with the Soviet negotiators discussing the prospect of limiting the deployment of nuclear missiles in Europe. We have also exchanged proposals for such arms control measures as limiting the number of nuclear warheads on both sides. But even if both of these arms control parleys should reach prompt and full agreement, we would have barely scratched the real driving momentum of the nuclear arms race. With full success for all arms control negotiations we will spend more than $65 billion on nuclear arms this year and more than $450 billion over the next 6 years. And the Soviet Union will match us in this race to nuclear oblivion. All this is assuming that the arms control agreements succeed. As we all know, the prospect of such success has rarely been dimmer. Both President Reagan and Yuri Andropov have harshly denounced each other and have all but thrown up their hands at reaching even a cosmetic agreement.

Somehow, Mr. President, we should strive to rekindle the spirit of negotiate or die expressed by President Eisenhower. Somehow we must recognize that a comprehensive agreement—like the nuclear freeze—flatly ending the nuclear race would be the one kind of policy that would fit into the Eisenhower plea for "the human race to conform its actions to this truth (that the era of armaments has ended) or die."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article to which I referred from the September 7, 1983, Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 7, 1983]

IKE ON "MAN AGAINST WAR"

(By David S. Broder)

Something has come into my hands that I think is worth sharing. Prof. Fred I. Greenstein of Princeton, author of "The Hidden Hand Presidency," a study of President Eisenhower, has called my attention to a letter Eisenhower wrote 27 years ago which he says has never been published in full.

With the permission of the president's son, retired Gen. John S. D. Eisenhower, I am giving it circulation through this column. I think it is as important a statement on nuclear war as I have ever read.

Richard L. Simon, president of the publishing firm of Simon & Schuster, had written Eisenhower on March 28, 1956, calling attention to a column by Joseph and Stewart Alsop on the Soviet military threat, and urging "that a crash program for long-range airpower and missiles" be given the highest priority, as they recommended.

This is the Eisenhower reply of April 4, 1956:

"Dear Dick:

"Thank you for your letter, which brings up subjects too vast to be discussed adequately in a letter. Suffice it to say here that I doubt that any columnist—and here I depend upon hearsay as I have no time to read them—is concerning himself with what is the true security problem of the day. That problem is not merely man against man or nation against nation. It is man against war.

"I have spent my life in the study of military strength as a deterrent to war, and in the character of military armaments necessary to win a war. The study of the first of these questions is still profitable, but we are rapidly getting to the point that no war can be won. War implies a contest; when you get to the point that contest is no longer involved and the outlook comes close to destruction of the enemy and suicide for ourselves—an outlook that neither side can ignore—then arguments as to the exact amount of available strength as compared to somebody else's are no longer the vital issues.

"When we get to the point, as we one day will, that both sides know that in any outbreak of general hostilities, regardless of the element of surprise, destruction will be both reciprocal and complete, possibly we will have sense enough to meet at the conference table with the understanding that the era of armaments has ended and the human race must conform its actions to this truth or die.

"The fullness of this potentiality has not yet been attained, and I do not, by any means, decry the need for strength. That strength must be spiritual, economic and military. All three are important and they are not mutually exclusive. They are all part of and the product of the American genius, the American will.

"But already we have come to the point where safety cannot be assumed by arms alone. But I repeat that their usefulness becomes concentrated more and more in their characteristics as deterrents than in instruments with which to obtain victory over opponents as in 1945. In this regard, today we are further separated from the end of World War II than the beginning of the century was separated from the beginning of the sixteenth century.

"Naturally, I am not taking the time here to discuss the usefulness of available military strength in putting out 'prairie fires'—spots where American interests are seriously jeopardized by unjustified outbreaks of minor wars. I have contented myself with a few observations on the implication of a major arms race.

"Finally, I do not believe that I shall ever have to defend myself against the charge that I am indifferent to the fate of my countrymen, and I assure you that there are experts, technicians, philosophers and advisers here, who give far more intelligent attention to these matters than do the Alsops.

"With warm regard, sincerely, Dwight D. Eisenhower."

The letter was marked "personal and confidential." But if ever there was a message that echoes across the decades to our own time, it is this one.

In eight short paragraphs, the remarkable man who led the Allied armies to victory over Hitler and served the nation as its last two-term president, distilled a lifetime of wisdom.

There is one sentence which deserves to be carved in stone, or better, imprinted on the mind of anyone who occupies the Oval Office. Just read it slowly—clause by clause—and think about it:

"When we get to the point, as we one day will, that both sides know that in any outbreak of general hostilities, regardless of the element of surprise, destruction will be both reciprocal and complete, possibly we will have sense enough to meet at the conference table with the understanding that the era of armaments has ended and the human race must conform its actions to this truth or die.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, we have a long road to travel before the infection of racism is finally eradicated from the United States. The fact that we have come as far as we have is largely due to the vision of one man, Martin Luther King, Jr. He understood that no nation could claim to be free if it continued to suppress the aspirations for equality of any minority.

As a nation, it is the force of our ideas and our ideals that have altered history. Two hundred years ago, a small band of colonists living on what was then the frontier of the Western World wrote an end to British tyranny. In so doing, they changed the course of history forever with the radical notion that sovereignty belongs to the people. The civil rights movement led by Dr. King was, in a profound sense, a second American revolution, founded upon the dream that as a nation of law, we must judge men and women not by the color of their skin, but by their talents as individual human beings.

In commemorating Dr. King's birthday, we will be honoring not just the man, but also his vision of an America truly free.

In honoring the vision, we will be committing ourselves to a yearly rededication to his ideals of nonviolence, the rule of law, and the intrinsic equality of all people.

And finally, in making that yearly rededication through the celebration of Dr. King's birthday, we will be looking to the future and the fulfillment of his dream, leaving behind the racism, hatred, and violence of the past.

In sum, Mr. President, this legislation is a fitting tribute to Dr. King, to the principles and ideals for which he stood, and to our Nation's perpetual effort to assure equality of opportunity to every citizen. I urge its adoption.

FCC RULES

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I was troubled to read this morning in the Washington Post that the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission was recently summoned to the White House by the President to discuss a matter currently pending before the agency. I was even more deeply troubled by one report that, indeed, it was a trip to the woodshed and not to the Oval Office.

Today a White House spokesman acknowledged that the President asked for the meeting with Chairman Fowler, but that the White House would take no public position on the issue. If this suggests that there is a private position, then clearly an inadmissible form of intervention is in prospect.

At issue are two 12-year-old FCC rules which restrict the business practices of the networks and, thus, have consequences for the quality of television viewing for each of our constituents and for the television program businesses in States such as New York. It is an important and controversial matter which has been the subject of scholarly and governmental study for nearly 6 years. Yet just as this laborious and careful process of reconsidering, refining, and improving Government regulation of a dynamic industry is reaching its natural conclusion, an independent regulatory agency faces the possibility of Presidential intervention.

The FCC rules to which I refer are the so-called financial interest and syndication rules. The financial interest rule prevents networks from investing risk capital in network television program production in exchange for profit-sharing rights. The networks become mere lessors of the product which is their life's blood. The syndication rule prevents the networks from selling either original or off-network programs to individual television stations on a nonnetwork basis. They were adopted in 1970.

I have taken a close look at the issue. I find that the television marketplace of the 1980's is much different than that of the 1970's and that these rules are quite deserving of reconsideration. I find that the process of reconsidering them has been deliberate and thorough and conducted by some of the best experts in the field of telecommunications policy, economics, law and the practical aspects of the businesses affected. And I find that the FCC has issued a tentative decision which is not a complete victory for either side in this debate, but a decision which is supported by the independent analysis and conclusions of the Brookings Institute, the American Enterprise Institute, a specially appropriated congressional/FCC task force, the New York Times, the Wall Street Journal, and most notably, the Federal Trade Commission and the Departments of Commerce and Justice of this administration. Indeed, it is remarkable to note that both the Department of Justice and the Department of Commerce in pleadings filed recently with the FCC as a part of this rulemaking took the FCC somewhat to task for not going further to eliminate what they clearly believed were unjustified Government regulations.

President Reagan assuredly has a natural interest in this matter. After all it does affect a business in which he spent the better part of his life. His position as President does entitle him to be fully informed of the policies and actions of the Federal regulatory agencies. But it would be completely improper in my judgment for his personal interest to go any further. Briefings are one thing; Presidential interference in the functioning of an independent regulatory agency—which after all is a creature of this Congress—is an entirely different matter.

I believe it is imperative for the integrity of all regulatory processes that the President unequivocally declare that he will express no view on the matter and that he will do nothing to intervene in the work of the FCC as they proceed diligently to complete their required work.

Under law and precedent the President can have but one position, public or private, which is that he supports the position of his Departments of Justice and Commerce—which departments support the tentative finding of the FCC—and that he awaits the final outcome with equanimity and impartiality.

JOHN A. LUKE AT THE SOUTH CAROLINA INTERNATIONAL TRADE CONFERENCE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, recently, I received a copy of a speech delivered to the South Carolina International Trade Conference held in Charleston, S.C., by Mr. John A. Luke, president of Westvaco Corp.

This speech provided me with an interesting insight into present U.S. trade policy and how it affects our domestic industry. In order that I might share Mr. Luke's thoughts on this issue with my colleagues and others, I ask unanimous consent that especially relevant portions of his speech appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA'S COMPETITIVE POSITION—A MATTER OF SPIRIT AND DETERMINATION

(John A. Luke)

I share with you a very great concern over America's present position in world trade. Our exports are not sufficiently robust, and we are having difficulty competing with others for major portions of our own domestic market. The country needs the most skilled and most imaginative attention that can be brought to bear on this situation. We have to become more competitive producers and more effective traders. These are skills we once had and which we have since let slip away. The dimensions of our difficulty are that, in 1960, the United States accounted for 18 per cent of the total world merchandise trade; twenty years later, in 1980, it had only 12 percent—a mammoth one-third drop in world market share. These figures represent our world trade report card. It is not a good one, and it is not up to our potential even though we remain the largest trading nation in the world. Our collective task is to put in place the necessary programs to regain that share of the growing world market which we have lost.

In addition to regaining the country's overall world market share, I join in the determination of this conference that every possible additional export leave the country through the Port of Charleston. I am genuinely impressed by this Port's outstanding growth in recent years, and I can only predict more of the same for the future. How could any objective analyst feel differently when faced with the fact that while the United States as a whole was losing position in a growing world market, the unit volume of exports through Charleston increased by 500 percent.

We all know what has happened to some of America's basic industries—ones that only a few years ago were the world leaders in cost, efficiency, and product quality. To be a harsh judge, and the world is, it has to be said that these basic industries overlooked the reality of the threat of foreign competition until it was too late. Major parts of the domestic market were gone—along with many, many jobs filled by other workers in other lands. The business disciplines which should have earlier been brought to bear simply were not. Costs rose, plants became obsolete, and product quality fell. It almost appears the assumption was made, consciously or unconsciously, that whatever the additional cost, or whatever the level of quality, the American consumer would accept it.

Some analysts find it tempting to rationalize American industry's present distress and blame it all on the higher wage rates in this country compared with those in other lands. Surely in some industries these have had a powerful impact. It has to be recognized, however, that wage rates differ throughout our domestic industry. Some industries have done a better job of managing wage levels and of increasing productivity than have others. Some look to an erosion of product quality and design as the cause. These have fallen, but not uniformly across all industry; rather, symptomatically, in industry's most troubled sectors. Some make the case that American industry suffers unduly because of environmental requirements and from the adversarial nature of the relationship which has existed between industry and government. These are clear, competitive handicaps, but even though applicable to all industry, they have not had uniform impact. Each industry has also had world and alternative product competition in varying, but intense fashion. These have not taken the same toll from all industry.

It is just not accurate to generalize and put all basic industry into the same category of competitive distress and smokestack obsolescence. There is a range of competitive performance and all basic industry cannot be judged by the competitive position of a few.

To me, it is first and formost a matter of competitive spirit and determination, over time, on the part of all of those involved in a given industry. No country has more resource, more technology, or a larger market than the United States. Each industry and the country as a whole have to be sufficiently determined to do what is necessary to really compete for the markets and jobs to which it aspires.

Our economy and our basic industry have been jolted and bruised enough so that there is a distinct and growing awareness of the reality of the industrial situation throughout the land. This is the first step to effective response. Beyond awareness, important progress in terms of competitive position has been made in the last year or so by American industry. Very significant strides in efficiency, process automation and productivity are underway, costs are being reduced, products are being redesigned, and sound work is being done in product quality. Employee involvement, or worker participation programs, are also making major contributions. American industry, having invested a massive $26 billion last year alone in factory automation, is emerging from the recession much stronger and with a great deal more competitive will than it has had for some time. By way of clear example, manufacturing productivity in the first quarter of this year surged ahead at an annual rate of 7.1 per cent. The requisite spirit and the determination are increasingly in place, and in depth, in many sectors of industry. We can, we will, we are about to earn back a bigger share of our own market while also increasing our share of the world market.

In retrospect, it may be very fortunate that the recession, which so clearly defined the areas of American industry's competitive vulnerability, occurred when and as forcefully as it did—when there was still the opportunity to reaffirm our basic industrial strength, rather than at some future date when, in fact, it might have been too late to recover.

The competitive progress American industry is making will become very apparent as economic recovery occurs throughout the world. This will be most helpful in the near term, but there is a long competitive road to journey. Therefore, I would like to suggest specific areas to which we all need to direct our spirited concern and our determined efforts. Each of these areas is fundamental to our longer term social and economic health.

I support the President's proposal for a cabinet level Trade Department as a sign of our government's spirit and determination to support the economy in ways the private sector on its own simply cannot. The country needs an ongoing, firmly coordinated, and clearly articulated world trade policy that speaks to both market access and product subsidy.

Through greater emphasis on product planning and design, American industry needs to call on its technological leadership to turn more of its commodity products into distinctive, innovative, finished designs which have special market value. While this is the way we need to go, it is a route hardly free of able competition. For example, a few years ago the best machinery for the paper industry was produced in the United States. Now, much of it is not, and we are looking to other industrialized countries for this equipment. Consider, also, that last year imports accounted for almost 30 per cent of our nation's total machine tool spending, up from 10 per cent a decade ago. There are forecasts that imports of these tools will reach 34 per cent this year. Other countries have earned this business by applying their skills and technology and by designing superior products—not because they had better or lower cost raw materials from which to make them. This is exactly what we have to do more of in this country—efficiently convert our natural resources several steps beyond the commodity level into products of superior quality. This will let the world's most advanced industrial nation, and the world's technological leader, compete in its area of greatest strength. It is the best way, and perhaps, the only way to protect our domestic market and to regain world market share.

We must keep the promise of High Tech in its proper perspective. We must not be lulled into believing that our future salvation will be a glamorous High Tech economy with basic American industry a thing of the past. High Tech is wonderful and all its computers and chips and electronics are as exciting as can be. But as exciting as it is, High Tech is not a world unto itself. It is simply an extension of the world's industrial scene. High Tech will never replace basic as the bulwark of our economy, but synergistically it will strengthen and extend basic's competitive position. High Tech will create many new jobs on its own, but it will do the most for the American economy by enhancing the competitive position of a major customer—basic American industry.

America needs a national commitment to Research and Development—one which is fully equivalent in importance to the role it will play in our technologically competitive future. The government should take a strong lead in such programs as defense and space, but the country must also count heavily on growing research and development activity by private industry in its own competitive interest. Investment in R&D has to be recognized as an ongoing and imperative part of doing business, even at the expense of some short-term profitability. And, this requires a certain spirit and determination about the future. It is the course which will move more and more of America's products beyond the commodity level of raw material conversion and into the distinctive and innovative ones which fill genuine market needs.

We must face the fact that America's educational system is not adequate. It appears to be afflicted with the same illness as certain of our basic industries—at least its symptoms are the same—noncompetitive productivity and noncompetitive design and quality. While it is accurate to say that today America is the world's technological and industrial leader, there needs to be genuine concern about our ability to preserve this leadership. It is of high concern to me, for example, that the count of engineering programs receiving full accreditation has dropped since 1978 from a very mediocre 58 percent to a shocking 38 percent. It is of equal conern to me that far too many colleges admit marginally literate high school graduates and then, after four years of minimal expectations, reward them with degrees which in fact hold no substance. This is unfair to the student and his life expectations. It is a clear extension of what has been happening in our public schools. It is also a flagrant devaluation of the educational standards we have held in prior years.

I believe deeply in America and in its potentials, and I see clear signs of major competitive progress. I believe just as deeply that America's competitive position in the world fundamentally depends on its spirit and determination, the willingness, of all—government, industry, and citizens—to face reality and do those things that are required to secure it.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I believe the time for morning business has expired, and I ask the Chair to proceed under the order previously entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

DEPARTMENTS OF LABOR, HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, AND EDUCATION APPROPRIATIONS, 1984

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We will now proceed to the consideration of H.R. 3913, which the clerk will state by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 3913) making appropriations for the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education, and related agencies, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I have no opening statement because I think that my statement on this bill will depend on what we do here today. I hope we so comport ourselves today so that the product that leaves this floor is capable of passing through both the conference and the White House, otherwise all the gestures and all the posturing does little good.

For the first time in 5 years the Senate of the United States, the Congress of the United States, has an opportunity to make a very important statement on natural priorities relating to health, education, science, and training.

If we do our work correctly we will continue to make those statements for the future. If we do not, the matter once again will go out of our hands.

So I will now refrain from any further comment to see what develops and, hopefully, have a very encouraging idealistic and promising closing statement.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Labor-HHS-Education bill we take up today could serve as an excellent example for those who define politics as the art of the possible. Although the discretionary programs funded through the bill would receive $4 billion more than the President requested, the Appropriations Committee has provided $2.5 billion less for these programs than they were allocated under the first budget resolution.

This means that the bill completely satisfies no one. It is too costly for those who support the President's budget strategy and it is too miserly for those who support a strong Federal presence in domestic social programs. However it has this virtue—it has a fighting chance of gaining the President's signature and a fighting chance of being passed by the House as well as the Senate. For the first time in 5 years we could have an act in place funding the bulk of our people programs instead of being forced to chart our social spending course through the murky seas of a continuing resolution.

Here are a few highlights.

The committee has pretty well gone along with the administration's requests for employment and training funds with one notable exception. It has recommended $2.9 billion in forward funding for the Job Partnership Training Act as required by the authorizing statute while the administration requested no support for this purpose.

Another significant change in the administration's request is in the account providing advances to the unemployment trust fund. Because of the improved employment situation the committee has been able to recommend a $4 billion reduction in the total included in the President's budget for this entitlement program.

State employment service funding is increased above the budget request by about $563 million because of the 9 month forward funding requirement that applies to job training but the vast bulk of these dollars are from unemployment trust funds.

The committee has also proposed an increase of $42,350,000 for community service employment for older Americans.

Substantial increases above the budget request have been recommended for the many social programs funded through the Department of Health and Human Services for instance, funding for low-income energy assistance would exceed the President's request by $575 million, the committee has provided $341.7 million for a community services block grant program the administration wanted to zero out, an increase of $90 million has been recommended for maternal and child health, the committee has added $235 million to the President's request for the social services block grant program and funding for the National Institutes of Health would increase by $386 million.

Other budget increases include $270.8 million for work incentives, a program proposed for termination; $108 million more than the administration wanted for community health centers; a $39 million add-on for the alcohol, drug abuse and mental health block grant program; $50.1 million more for the aging, primarily for feeding activities; $28.9 million for runaway youth and Head Start; $22.9 million above the budget for developmental disabilities; a $30 million increase for child welfare programs; and $21.5 million for mental health clinical training, another program the administration wanted to end.

The committee did not endorse any of the President's proposed reductions in education. The committee has included $1.7 billion for activities deferred by the House such as vocational rehabilitation and impact aid. Compensatory education for the disadvantaged—chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act—would be increased by $466 million over the budget estimate and would serve 518,000 more youngsters than during the past fiscal year. Vocational and adult education would receive $388 million more than the budget request. The committee has recommended that the various library programs be continued at a cost of $83.4 million. The administration proposed that funding for these activities be terminated.

In the area of student financial assistance, the committee has proposed an increase of $437 million over the President's budget. Most of this increase will be used for Pell grants which would be raised to a total of $2.8 billion. The committee has also recommended an increase in the maximum allowable award from $1,800 to $2,000. The committee has recommended an increase of $209 million above the budget request for guaranteed student loans and added $192 million to the President's higher and continuing education budget.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to commend the chairman of the Labor, HHS Subcommittee, Senator WEICKER, who has had the thankless job of shepherding this bill through the Senate Appropriations Committee. I think he has done a remarkable job.

Now there is nobody in the Senate—nobody in the Congress, as far as I know—who has crusaded more fervently and sincerely for assistance for those who need assistance, the handicapped, the disadvantaged. He has a great deal of compassion, and he has demonstrated his determination to fight for those who need assistance more than anyone I know.

On the other hand, he also recognizes the practical fact that we do little good for these people who need assistance if we cannot get a bill enacted that is not going to be vetoed. Senator WEICKER has negotiated hard and long with the administraiton and with the House, and I think he has done a remarkably good job of getting a bill that I think has a real practical chance of being enacted, as he says, for the first time in a number of years.

I urge my colleagues to keep that in mind as they consider amendments to increase the amounts endorsed by the Appropriations Committee to a level that may make it impossible for us to get that Presidential signature.

(Mrs. HAWKINS assumed the chair.)

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I thank my good friend and colleague and ranking member, Senator PROXMIRE. Nothing that is before us today would have been possible without his help. He, likewise, comes from a tradition of understanding and compassion for all the elements of this particular appropriation, from education, to science, to various social problems.

Certainly, he has always been a watchdog of the Treasury. There is no question about that. But he combines that fiscal responsibility with a conscience excelled by few. I thank him very much for having brought us to this point.

Madam President, before making the usual motion to adopt the committee amendments, I am informed there is a printing error in connection with the amount on page 24, line 4.

I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be modified to correctly show that the committee deleted $62,744,000 as provided by the House and inserted in lieu thereof $67,744,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments, as modified, be agreed to en bloc and that the bill, as thus amended, be regarded as original text for the purpose of further amendment, providing no points of order shall be waived by reason of agreement to this request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I would like to use this occasion to alert my colleagues, and I know that I also speak for the ranking Member, that I intend to finish this bill today. Indeed, it would be my hope that we can finish it before lunchtime. If there are Senators who have amendments, I suggest they come to the floor. Otherwise, I will not hesitate to proceed to third reading. And even though sometimes that threat is used around here, I think it is also understood by my colleagues that I am radical enough to just go ahead and do that.

So if anyone has an amendment, I would appreciate it if they come to the floor and have their amendment debated and voted on up or down. The sooner we do that, the sooner we will get out of here.

As I said before, under any circumstances, we intend to finish the bill today.

AMENDMENT NO. 2270

(Purpose: To provide fiscal year 1984 funding for the ACTION Agency)

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) proposes an amendment numbered 2270.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 57, after line 1, insert the following:

ACTION

OPERATING EXPENSES

For expenses necessary for ACTION to carry out the provisions of the Domestic Volunteer Services Act of 1973, as amended (42 U.S.C. 4951 et seq.), $140,061,000, of which $15,000,000 shall be available to carry out Title I part A of said Act; and of which $18,016,000 shall be available to carry out Title II Part C of this Act and of that amount $6,000,000 shall be available to carry out Home Health Care Programs under part C of said Act

Provided, That none of the funds appropriated under this heading may be used to close State or regional field offices or to reduce career personnel of the ACTION Agency.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, this amendment provides an appropriation of $140,061,000 for the ACTION Agency. The committee deferred consideration of this appropriation because reauthorization had not been considered by the Senate in time for the committee to study the reauthorization bill. This amount is $30,331,000 more than the administration request and $10,740,000 more than the fiscal year 1983 level.

For title 1 the amendment provides an appropriation of $15 million for VISTA, $1.8 million for the service learning program and $1.9 million for volunteer citizens and demonstration programs.

For title 2, the amendment provides $27,445,000 for the retired senior volunteer program and $48,400,000 for the Foster Grandparent program. $18,016,000 is recommended for the Senior Companion program. This includes $6,000,000 which will be used to begin the in-home health care activities of that program.

I am also recommending $27.5 million for program support. In addition, I have included bill language—which is similar to that in the 1983 appropriations bill—to prevent the Agency from closing State and regional offices and I am recommending that the Agency maintain a full-time complement of not less than 525 full-time employees.

We are certainly aware that in many communities it is the volunteer efforts that enable the community to address the problems of poverty. This program utilizes the skills of the necessary numbers of elderly citizens to meet these needs. I recommend that we fund these worthwhile efforts and I move the adoption of this amendment.

I ask unanimous consent that the following explanatory statement be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACTION APPROPRIATION EXPLANATORY STATEMENT

This amendment proposes an appropriation of $140,061,000 for the ACTION Agency. This is $30,331,000 more than the administration request and is $10,740,000 more than the fiscal year 1983 comparable appropriation of $129,321,000. The increase in funding will permit VISTA to maintain not less than 2,000 volunteers and allow the Senior Companion program to begin its newly-authorized in-home care program.

My amendment includes language which prohibits ACTION from closing any State offices or reducing career personnel in the regional and State offices. In addition, I am concerned by the large number of ACTION State Director positions that are vacant, and it is my intent that the agency fill these positions on a permanent basis as soon as possible.

I am also concerned about the reduction of on-site inspections over the past several years; the agency had reviewed projects on a bi-annual basis. It is my intent that ACTION maintain proper monitoring and audit procedures of the volunteer projects in order to ascertain their effectiveness and financial regularity and furthermore, I expect the agency to resume bi-annual reviews of projects.

VISTA

My amendment provides an appropriation of $15,000,000 for VISTA. This is $14,810,000 more than the administration request and is $3,200,000 more than the fiscal year 1983 comparable appropriation of $11,800,000.

It is my intent that VISTA volunteers in service be increased to, and maintained at, a level of not less than 2,000 volunteers through the fiscal year 1985. Furthermore, because the VISTA program has been reauthorized through FY 1986, the ACTION Agency shall undertake recruitment and public awareness efforts to provide the opportunity for persons from all walks of life, age groups, geographic areas and economic levels to serve as VISTA volunteers.

SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAMS

It is my intent that $1,800,000 of the funds appropriated be used for the service learning programs. This is $50,000 less than the budget request, and $30,000 less than the fiscal 1983 level.

OLDER AMERICANS VOLUNTEER PROGRAMS

It is my intent that $98,861,000 be used for the Older Americans Volunteer Programs. This is $6,000,000 more than the administration request and the fiscal year 1983 comparable appropriation of $87,861,000.

I believe that local control of non-federal funds for the Older American Volunteer Programs is to be encouraged, but the use of such funds must be consistent with the purposes and intent of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act and published federal guidelines.

RETIRED SENIOR VOLUNTEER PROGRAM

I have included $27,445,000 for the Retired Senior Volunteer Program (RSVP) which is the same as the budget request and the fiscal year 1983 level. This program provides part-time volunteer service opportunities for persons 60 years of age and over. Volunteer recruitment, development, and placement is provided through grants awarded to local sponsoring organizations.

FOSTER GRANDPARENT PROGRAM

I have also included $48,400,000 for the Foster Grandparent Program. This is the same as the administration request and the fiscal 1983 funding level. This program provides meaningful assistance for two groups—older Americans and disadvantaged youths. The program provides service opportunities for low-income persons over 60 who assist children with special needs in a variety of settings.

SENIOR COMPANION PROGRAM

My amendment provides for an appropriation of $18,016,000 for the Senior Companion Program, which is $6,000,000 over the budget request. It is my intent that the first $12,016,000 of the appropriation be used to maintain current project activity levels.

This program provides a vehicle for persons 60 years of age and over to assist elderly persons with physical, mental, or emotional impairments in a variety of private and institutional settings. The $12,016,000 is for 76 existing projects and 4,850 volunteers.

I note that the Senate has passed S. 1129, which reauthorizes the ACTION Agency programs, and which contains Section 213(c) under Part C of Title II, authorizing the in-Home Health Care program. It is my intent that the appropriation above the 412,016,000 level be utilized to add to the number of Senior Companion programs in order to assist homebound elderly to remain in their own homes and to enable institutionalized elderly to return to home-care settings.

CITIZEN PARTICIPATION AND VOLUNTEER DEMONSTRATION PROGRAMS

It is my intent that $1,900,000 be used for the Citizen Participation and volunteer programs. This is $99,000 more than the requested level, and $84,000 more than the fiscal 1983 appropriation.

PROGRAM SUPPORT

I also have provided $27,500,000 for program support, which is $16,163,000 more than the budget request and $1,685,000 more than last year. It is my intent that the Agency maintain a full-time employee equivalent of 225. In addition, I intend that training and technical assistance for the newly-authorized Senior Companion Program/home health care be absorbed in the Program Support budget.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, I think that some who view this amendment may look at it superficially as being a very big increase. I think we should realize what the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee is doing is simply continuing the agency. If we follow the House, which did not have a chance to fund the action program, it would mean the end to an agency that serves a very useful purpose.

So I support the chairman of the subcommittee. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER).

The amendment (No. 2270) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2271

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) proposes an amendment numbered 2271.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 24, strike out line 12 and insert the following: "ation for Saint Elizabeths Hospital: Provided further, That during fiscal year 1984 and thereafter the superintendent of Saint Elizabeths Hospital may reside off the premises of the hospital, notwithstanding section 4839 of the Revised Statutes (42 U.S.C. 165)."

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, currently in 42 U.S.C. 165, the basic enabling legislation for Saint Elizabeths Hospital, there is a provision concerning the duties and responsibilities of the superintendent of the hospital which mandates that "he shall reside on the premises".

This is an archaic provision in law that dates back to the 19th century and was appropriate for an era when modern communications systems, available today, were nonexistent or scarce.

The superintendent and other physicians and psychiatrists critical to the operation of the hospital are accessible and on call through telephones and "beeper" contact 24 hours a day.

Also, the hospital follows an administrative rotation procedure where the superintendent and chief hospital administrators share, on a rotation basis, weekend and holiday assignment coverage.

The continued requirement that the superintendent must reside on the premises is no longer justified. With the arrival of new superintendent, this archaic provision needs to be rectified.

Therefore, at the request of the Department, this amendment is offered which states, again, repeating the amendment as it was read:

during fiscal year 1984 and thereafter the superintendent of Saint Elizabeths Hospital may reside off the premises of the hospital, notwithstanding section 4839 of the Revised Statutes (42 U.S.C. 165).

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER).

The amendment (No. 2271) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, what is the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Regular order would be the third reading.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I fully support the chairman of the subcommittee in his desire to get action on this bill. There are some 25 amendments that are pending. I think he is certainly correct in pressing for action on these amendments.

However, I do hope that the authors of these amendments will come to the floor and offer them. If not, I think the chairman of the subcommittee is absolutely right, to press for the third reading as he indicated.

For the time being, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2258

(Purpose: To provide funds for preventive health service programs for tuberculosis)

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 2258 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), for herself, Mr. HATCH, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. THURMOND proposes an amendment numbered 2258.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 20, line 1, strike out "$367,396,000" and insert "$378,396,000"

On page 20, line 3, insert before the colon a comma and the following: "and of which $11,000,000 shall be available for grants for preventive health programs for tuberculosis under section 317 of the Public Health Service Act".

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I rise to offer an amendment to fund the Center for Disease Control and tuberculosis control program at $11 million for fiscal year 1984.

I am joined in this amendment by Mr. HATCH, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. KENNEDY.

This amendment also saves money because it lowers the costs we will incur under medicaid and medicare in a way that all will cheer, by lowering the number of people who contract a preventable deadly and disabling disease.

That TB can be controlled and prevented in a cost-effective manner is why the Congress agreed that this program should remain in a categorical program, authorized to be funded at the level of $11 million in fiscal year 1984. Yet, the bill before us today authorizes no funds for this program.

Perhaps, it is because for years now tuberculosis has been considered a "dead" disease. I wish I could stand before you today and say that TB is dead, vanquished from this Nation forever. But I cannot. Thousands of new tuberculosis cases are reported each year. In 1982 alone, 25,522 new cases of TB were detected. In just Miami there were 269 instances of tuberculosis in that year.

Health departments throughout the Nation have reported to CDC that only about 60 percent of new active cases have been converted into remission. One major reason for this low cure rate is that it takes from 9 months to a year to treat TB patients. Many patients do not follow the therapy required when they are left unsupervised. The reason is simple. Once the symptoms disappear temporarily, patients think they are cured although they remain ill and contagious.

It is not only the common strains of TB that are spreading throughout the country. With the spread of drug-resistant strains of tuberculosis our war against this desease is taking an ominous turn for the worse. Almost 7 percent of new, previously untreated cases are found to be drug-resistant tuberculosis bacteria. The Center for Disease Control (CDC) reports that there have been community outbreaks all across the country in Mississippi, New York, and Montana—all caused by drug-resistant strains of TB.

We can fight back successfully, however, provided we make an investment now in stopping TB from spreading. Dr. William Foege, Director of the Center for Disease Control, has informed me of very encouraging projects that are being funded by the CDC. In 1980, the Center contracted with Miami, New York City, and Los Angeles to fund a demonstration study. Under the study outreach workers were hired to provide directly therapy to tuberculosis patients who were either unwilling or unable to complete self-administered therapy.

The experiement worked. In Los Angeles, hospitalization of noncompliant patients was reduced by more than 50 percent, resulting in a savings of close to $1 million over a 2-year period. In Miami, program managers claim that savings equaled $3 for every $1 spent. Similar results were also observed in New York City. It is no coincidence that the number of reported tuberculosis cases in these three cities dropped dramatically after the TB outreach program was instituted.

Based on the success of this experiment, CDC chose to target its funding for tuberculosis control activities to cities and States with a high incidence of tuberculosis, where outreach workers could be most effective. The increase in funding to $5 million in 1983 enabled CDC to expand its funding to other areas with high incidence rates. However, eligibility criteria excluded 13 States from applying for grants, and the eligibile grantees were told to confine themselves to modest requests because of the limited funds available. Even with the modest requests, which did not fully reflect need, a total of over $7.5 million in requests was received. Although many jurisdictions were not permitted to apply, CDC officials say that 75 outreach workers had to be disapproved for fiscal year 1983 because of lack of funds. Any many more justifiable requests would have been granted if additional funds had been available.

Mr. President, additional Federal funds for tuberculosis control are needed for fiscal year 1984. Since the elimination of special tuberculosis project grants almost 10 years ago, many States have placed a lower priority on tuberculosis control. Local health departments today often cannot depend upon State health departments to provide leadership, oversight, consultation, and evaluation assistance. Yet, effective tuberculosis control programs cannot be implemented unless all States provide effective direction and leadership of tuberculosis control programs at the local level.

And while my colleagues are considering this request they should consider this. Right now, 15 million Americans are infected with a dormant strain of the disease according to the Center for Disease Control. Decreased immunity is all that it takes to make carriers vulnerable to otherwise dormant infections. Furthermore, the symptoms associated with reactivating TB are often ignored or attributed to other ailments. That means we can easily have another epidemic at any time unless we take steps to prevent it.

If local leadership were working, then we would not have the serious problem we do now. The committee, by relying on States and localities to fund TB control efforts through funds received under block grants, is repeating past errors. And it does not make good budget sense, either. The indigent and the elderly who are most likely to get TB are covered by medicaid and medicare. It is literally a case of pay me now or pay me later.

Mr. President, I urge my fellow colleagues to join me in supporting an increase of Federal funding for tuberculosis control of $11 million for fiscal year 1984 to its authorized level of $11 million.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, nobody is going to deny the substance of what my good friend, the Senator from Florida, has brought to the attention of the U.S. Senate, for the correctness of it. She articulately and eloquently states the case. The difficulty with the amendment as it has been proposed is not the worthiness of the objective but, rather, the matter of dollars. What I would propose is that we might arrive at some figure that would enable the chairman to negotiate with the House. I have discussed this with the ranking Member. That type of procedure seems to be amenable to him; he can speak for himself.

I just received the following letter from a messenger. This is a good time to read it because I think it describes the real problem we have before us today. In other words, the letter is not addressed to the Senator from Florida; it is addressed to the chairman. Maybe it will help everybody understand what is going on. The letter comes from the Executive Office of the President, the Office of Management and Budget.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET,
Washington, D.C., October 3, 1983.

Hon. LOWELL P. WEICKER,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Labor/HHS/Education, Committee on Appropriations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Labor/HHS/Education and Related Agencies Appropriations bill for fiscal year 1984 is scheduled for Senate Floor consideration this morning. The purpose of this letter is to advise you of the Administration's position on the bill that has been reported by the Senate Appropriations Committee.

For several years, the Congress and the Administration have not been able to agree on a timely basis on regular annual appropriations for the programs financed by this bill. As a consequence, the management of these programs has been disrupted for a significant part of each year. We hope that a repetition of this experience can be avoided this year.

The Administration is encouraged by the restraint shown thus far by both the subcommittee and the full committee with respect to this bill, and by your willingness to work to reduce excessive levels of spending. Nevertheless, we are concerned about a number of features of the fiscal year 1984 bill, including:

The inclusion of $400 million above the benchmark for Labor/HHS annually funded discretionary programs, and

The funding of health block grants in separate Public Health Service accounts rather than in a consolidated account, thereby requiring unnecessary administrative funds and personnel.

In addition, the bill leaves open a number of issues about which the Administration has serious concerns. Amounts that may be subsequently provided for program requests not considered by the Committee must be evaluated on their own merits. Moreover, language in the Committee report would bar the imposition of any quality control penalties on States for erroneous entitlement payments in fiscal year 1984 pending completion of a study by the Department of Health and Human Services on the methodology used to determine error rates. State accountability for the costs of erroneous payments is an important aspect of the Administration's efforts to reduce waste, fraud and abuse. Costs for the AFDC and medicaid programs can be expected to increase significantly with the repeal of error rate targets and sanctions.

While the Administration recognizes that serious efforts have been made to limit further increases in the Senate version of the Labor/HHS/ Education Appropriations bill, this bill does provide an additional $400 million for annually funded discretionary programs other than Impact Aid above the House Committee version of H.R. 3913. As reported, the House Committee bill represents a more responsible level of funding for the important programs covered. Should such a bill be presented to the President at the appropriations level contained in the House Committee bill, I would recommend that he approve it.

The Administration believes that the bill reported by the House Committee demonstrates that valid Congressional concerns about spending priorities can be accommodated within the levels provided. I would not hesitate to recommend disapproval of a bill that exceeds, by even a small amount, the levels proposed by the House Committee.

As we both know, considerable work needs to be done to ensure that a Labor-HHS bill reaches the President's desk that meets the standard established. I hope that when this bill is considered on the Senate Floor you will use your influence and leadership to make sure we achieve our mutual objective. Please do not hesitate to call on me if I can assist you in any way in reaching this goal.

Sincerely,

DAVID A. STOCKMAN,
Director.

I might say to my good friend, Senator PROXMIRE, the bottom of this letter states: "Identical letters sent to Hon. MARK O. HATFIELD, Hon. WILLIAM PROXMIRE, and Hon. HOWARD BAKER."

Now, Mr. President, there is the problem. There is the problem. I can assure my colleagues that I will fight for every nickel that we have in our bill. I am not here today to accept a House bill. I shall fight for every nickel that we have in the Senate bill. It is a good bill. It was a good bill as reported out of the subcommittee; it is a good bill as reported out of the full Appropriations Committee. But I need my colleagues' help.

Anybody who thinks it is going to be a free ride as far as add-ons are concerned, can also forget about having this bill signed. Believe me, I will have enough of a fight on my hands with the administration just on the bill that we now have before us.

There is not one of you who is going to stand up there today that I do not agree with as far as substance is concerned—not one of you. In some ways, that is why it is much more fun being in the minority—you can go ahead and support all of these programs at higher levels and you do not have the responsibility of having them come so adopted. That is my responsibility now, but it is also the responsibility of all of us.

For 5 years—for 5 years—we have been dragged along by the continuing resolution process rather than setting our goals or setting the goals of the Nation for health care, science, education, and so on. If that is what you want, if you want a sixth year of that, fine. It seems to me that is the wrong way to run a business—continuing resolution, a little increase for inflation, a little increase for cost of living, a little adjustment here, a little adjustment there. I do not think we, as U.S. Senators want that.

So I am asking for the help of all of my colleagues. I am asking you to give me the necessary tools to effect a version of our bill, which admittedly is higher than the House's, higher than the administration's, and one Mr. Stockman says the administration will have to oppose if there are increases—even small ones—I have enough confidence in the eloquence of the ranking member and the chairman so that if we pass a bill pretty close to what we now have before us, I think that is not the final word on the subject as we have it written by David Stockman.

But if we add large amounts out here, I can make no such promise. As I said earlier, I made no opening statement. I shall save that based on what the result is, because if the result is a big bill that is not going anywhere, then, indeed, I have failed and the Senate has failed.

Sure, we can go back to our constituents and say, "I got out there and I fought for this extra money for education, for science," or for whatever the interest happens to be. I am not interested in just fighting for it. I want to pass an appropriation bill something for the people who will benefit from it. They are out there and they have been left out for 5 years.

This is not directed, I repeat, to the distinguished Senator from Florida, but the arrival of the letter coincided with the first amendment and I think that it was a good time to lay before my colleagues what the real problem is for the bill's managers. We will carry your message loud and clear in the conference and we will fight for it down at the White House; but please, do not put me in a ridiculous position where there is little I can do to effectuate a bill.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I have an inquiry of the distinguished Senator who is manager of the bill. I also commend him for the tortuous stewardship he has in guiding this bill through the Senate. I must say, I have served 3 years of those 5 with the distinguished Senator on Labor-HHS. It is not an easy job. Each special interest really needs special consideration. I particularly plead for a program that has a 3-for-1 payback. If we had other programs like that, I would be here constantly.

Mr. President, this is not the first time I have disagreed with David Stockman. I would like that to be on the record, also. I commend the Senator for guiding this this far. I am hopeful, also, that we shall have a bill that is not simply the continuing resolution.

I ask the Senator if he will accept a lesser amount than the amount I have proposed, merely for the reason that zero funding on the Senate side sets a precedent, I think, that is unacceptable when we go to conference.

Mr. WEICKER. I agree with the Senator from Florida. Might I suggest that thanks to her effort we do put the Senate on record as being in favor of this program. I might recommend a figure half that of the House in order to give negotiating room with the House, which obviously is going to be necessary in light of the communications I have just read.

But at least the important first step will have been taken by virtue of the direct effort of the Senator from Florida, and I would be more than willing to accept a figure half that of the House.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I thank the Senator for his consideration and concern and for his willingness to accept that lesser amount.

I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be modified to provide $2.5 million for tuberculosis which would be a total of $369,896,000 for this center for disease control, and I urge that Senator WEICKER and Senator PROXMIRE continue to give favorable consideration to the high level of the House amendment as they march forward to conference.

Mr. PROXMIRE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I think that the manager of the bill and the Senator from Florida have worked out a very reasonable compromise, and I am happy to support the compromise figure of $2.5 million.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is so modified.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor the modified amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, Senator HAWKINS, which would add $2.5 million to H.R. 3913 for tuberculosis control grants awarded by the Centers for Disease Control.

The Senate Appropriations Committee indicates in their report that no funds are provided for this program based on the fact that the incidence of tuberculosis has dropped by 6.5 percent last year. At the same time, the report indicates that 25,700 cases were reported in 1982.

Mr. President, tuberculosis remains a priority health concern in a number of States, including South Carolina. The Centers for Disease Control recently released data showing South Carolina has the sixth highest tuberculosis rate of all the States.

While this amendment does not bring the tuberculosis control grant program up to the authorized level, this proposal is fiscally responsible and represents a reasonable compromise between the original committee position and the House allowance of $5 million. Furthermore, a $3.6 million increase in funding is being provided in the preventive health and health services block grant, and it is expected that significant funds will be available to the States for tuberculosis control activities through these block grant awards.

Mr. President, I encourage my colleagues to support the amendment offered by Senator HAWKINS. I would also encourage the conferees to adopt a reasonable level of funding for this program. The funds provided in fiscal year 1984 will permit the Centers for Disease Control to continue sharing their expertise and training on tuberculosis surveillance, assessment, and control methods with State and local health departments. While it is encouraging that there has been a drop in tuberculosis cases at the national level, it is obvious from the thousands of cases newly reported that much work remains to be done to eradicate this terrible disease.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am very pleased to be a cosponsor of this important amendment to provide continued funding in fiscal year 1984 for the Centers for Disease Control to help restrict the spread of tuberculosis. The existence of extensive knowledge about tuberculosis and its treatment make it a controllable and eradicable disease. Yet, because of funding shortages and inadequate personnel resources, TB remains a major health problem in the United States, taking a heavy toll in disability and death.

Tuberculosis has been a major problem in my own State of Maryland, especially in Baltimore, the largest city in the State. As recently as 1975, Baltimore ranked first in the Nation among cities in the occurrence of TB. However, Federal funding for TB control project grants has enabled our State to make progress in fighting this disease. Baltimore City, the first jurisdiction to receive a grant from the Centers for Disease Control for TB programs, was able to make effective use of the funding by hiring three community outreach nurses. Their function is to supervise and administer treatment for TB patients during the course of therapy, and to prevent the transmission of TB in the community through intensified patient contact and follow-up. Such community outreach has been recognized by the American Lung Association as a relatively inexpensive strategy which can significantly reduce TB.

As a result, the overall number of tuberculosis cases in Maryland, which had risen from 1980 to 1981, dropped by 13 percent in 1982. Baltimore City also dropped from 5th to 10th nationwide in occurrence of TB. The continued funding of the tuberculosis control grant program will enable the continuation of the effective programs begun in the past fiscal year and can have a major impact on the incidence of TB in the United States. The encouraging progress that has been made over the past year in reversing the disturbing increase in the number of new cases of tuberculosis is threatened by the committee's failure to provide any funding for this invaluable program in this bill. Baltimore City still has a tuberculosis rate that is nearly three times the national average, and the continuing number of cases of TB among children clearly indicates that further attention in this area is essential.

Tuberculosis is a preventable disease. The fact that people in the United States continue to die from it because of inadequate diagnosis or treatment is deplorable. Tuberculosis strikes most often at the elderly and children in low-income families who depend more on government health care program. By investing in the prevention and control of TB, we also achieve long-term savings in the already over-burdened medicare and medicaid programs, and prevent the future expenditure of funds on more severe resulting illnesses.

As one who has been a longtime supporter of preventive health care programs, I urge my colleagues to join with me in approving this amendment to insure that adequate health care is made available to the many Americans who now needlessly suffer from tuberculosis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified.

The amendment (No. 2258), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mrs. HAWKINS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2272

(Purpose: Making $500,000 available out of existing funds for construction of a vocational rehabilitation center)

Mr. DECONCINI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) proposes an amendment numbered 2272.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 44, line 23, before the period, insert the following: ": Provided, That of the funds appropriated for service projects, $500,000 shall be available for construction of the Garden Park Enterprises Rehabilitation Center in Phoenix, Arizona, in accordance with the provisions of Section 311 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, as amended."

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the amendment I am sponsoring to the fiscal year 1984 appropriations measure for the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education does not add any new money to the bill. It does, however, insure that a small portion of the funds for rehabilitation services contained in H.R. 3913 are available for the long-awaited construction of permanent facilities for a highly regarded rehabilitation center in Phoenix, Ariz., Garden Park Enterprises.

Specifically, Mr. President, my amendment designates $500,000 of the estimated $37.5 million for rehabilitation services in the Labor/HHS measure, for the Garden Park Enterprises Rehabilitation Center. This $500,000 represents less than one-third of the total projected cost for construction of more suitable facilities for this center which provides vocational rehabilitation training for handicapped adults. Garden Park Enterprises was established in 1975 after parents of handicapped adults got together to create some type of program to provide educational, vocational, and work adjustment services for their adult children—services that were not available to these handicapped individuals in the Phoenix metropolitan area. Since that time, Garden Park has blossomed into a vocational rehabilitation center with a proven success rate, a quality reputation for delivery of services, and a much desired center for other parents with handicapped adult children. For the past several years, it has operated out of a temporary modular structure. Consequently, the demand for its services has grown to a point where its potential for future success cannot be realized unless more adequate and suitable quarters for these essential services is provided. The center has received the largest share of its operating funds from private and corporate sources and has received numerous pledges of financial support for completion of construction if the intitial dollars can be found. The center has the potential for obtaining many contracts with industries in the Phoenix area for the manufacture of such items as wire harnesses and automobile components—the work on which is all done by the handicapped clients who receive a wage for their labor. Contracts for future work can only be negotiated if the proper facilities are available.

The Garden Park Rehabilitation Center is not just another rehabilitation facility. It is unique in that it provides education, vocational, work adjustment, and job placement services for its clients. Students who have been the recipients of social security disability insurance and food stamps have been able to provide their own means of support and form better images of themselves as productive members of society through the expert help offered by the center. The facility presently serves 137 students—it will accommodate up to 200 once the construction of expanded workspace and classroom areas is completed.

Mr. President, many individuals have donated many hours of their own time to the support of Garden Park's future because they believe the services provided are more than worth the cost. There is so much we can continue to gain in the arena of vocational rehabilitation through efforts such as these. I do not believe it is too much to ask for the Federal Government to provide a share of the financial support for such worthy goals. This is a one-time only appropriation—the remaining costs will be provided through other sources.

I urge both the chairman from Connecticut and the ranking member to accept my amendment. I do want to thank them for their willingness to work with this project.

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator has talked with me about this amendment. I understand that it is an unusual situation, as matching funds are currently available, and I have no objection to passage of the amendment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have no objection to passing the amendment.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the distinguished chairman and minority member. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2272) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DECONCINI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. WEICKER. What is the regular order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Third reading.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2273

(Purpose: To add funds for the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act)

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER) proposes an amendment numbered 2273.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 32, line 13, strike out "$1,845,361,000," and insert "$1,848,861,000, of which $25,000,000 shall be for the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act, and".

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, this amendment is designed to add $3.5 million for the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act, which will bring the total sum to $25 million. It is an increase which I think is urgently needed.

I have discussed this matter with the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of the subcommittee, and I believe that the ranking minority member, the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, has been apprised of this amendment and that it is acceptable.

I shall state briefly for the RECORD the reasons for this increase.

Approximately 1 million youths become runaways or throwaways each year. The numbers continue to increase due to the high rate of unemployment and divorce which in turn is associated with an increased incidence of child abuse/neglect and abandonment.

The likelihood of criminal activity and victimization by pimps and child pornographers rises sharply with the length of time away from home. About 90 percent of female and 70 percent of male prostitutes have a history of running away from home.

The Runaway and Homeless Youth Act (RHYA) was designed to provide temporary shelter care and counseling services to deal with the immediate needs of runaway and homeless youth and their families outside the framework of the law enforcement and juvenile justice systems.

Increase in fiscal year 1983 RHYA funding from $18 million to $21.5 million maintained 157 programs and provided for an additional 69 (total=226). An estimated 70,000 youth received shelter care, 180,000 benefited from one-time counseling or referral services, and 300,000 were served by the national runaway switchboard.

An additional increase to $25 million would provide shelter care to an estimated 100,000 youth and similarly expand the counseling, referral, and communications services.

A recent GAO report dated September 26, 1983, concluded that youths, parents, staff, and community service personnel all agreed that the RHYA programs were important and offered valuable services. A need for expanded outreach, skills training, and aftercare services was also cited which could be achieved with additional funding.

Mr. President, in the overall scheme of the budget, this is a relatively small amount of money. In my judgment, it is a minimal amount, a minimal add-on, to try to accommodate this major national problem.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, the subcommittee recommended last year's level of $21,500,000 for runaway youth.

However, last year, the full committee agreed to $25 million, but ended up with $21,500,000 after conference.

We could agree to $25 million and take the issue to conference again.

These projects help reunite troubled youth with their families, and provide emergency shelter in the interim.

I might add that this has been an issue of special concern to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, and he has done an outstanding job on this issue. We all have to rely on the varied expertise that exists on this floor, and I think everyone will concede his leadership role in this matter.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, Senator WEICKER, for his kind words. I hope the amendment will survive in the conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2273) was agreed to.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2274

(Purpose: To add funds for clinical training for mental health professionals)

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER) proposes an amendment numbered 2274:

On page 23, line 20, strike out "$835,581,000," and insert "$836,081,000, of which $22,000,000 shall be for clinical training for mental health professionals, and".

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, for the following reasons, I propose that an additional $500,000 be accepted for the mental health clinical training program under the National Institute of Mental Health. The House has recommended $20 million for this purpose, and the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Health and Human Services has recommended $21.5 million.

First. There continues to be an overall present and projected shortfall in the numbers of needed psychiatrists which has been attested to in a number of recent studies: Heritage Foundation, Rand Corp., and the Graduate Medical Education National Advisory Committee.

Second. A recent NIMH study reveals that for every dollar invested by the Institute in psychiatric education, there is a twentyfold return in treatment provided to populations otherwise unlikely to receive treatment. Failure to fund this program will cost society far more than the amount requested.

Third. There is a shortage of geriatric and child mental health professionals, as stated in the House language. The elderly are a rapidly growing proportion of the population, with many identified mental disorders. Few practitioners are trained to work with this age group. Children also have many mental health problems which may develop into lifelong illnesses if untreated, yet there is a shortage of child mental health specialists.

Fourth. There is a need to improve the knowledge and skills of nonmental health providers through enhanced education of medical students and of trainees in the primary care specialties. Personnel trained in the area of health and behavior and consultation/liaison can markedly reduce the cost of health services, improve patient compliance with therapy, reduce stress and anxiety, and speedup recovery from physical illness.

Fifth. A critical concern of the mental health field is the misdiagnosis of our elderly as having dementia, when their mental health problem is depression and they could, therefore, benefit from mental health treatment which they might not otherwise receive.

Mr. President, I am submitting this amendment and have reduced the figure I originally wanted to offer because I realize there are many competing demands faced by this subcommittee.

In my judgment, given the scope of our budget generally and the NIMH budget, there is a relatively small amount of money allocated for mental health clinical training. I have participated in this matter in hearings held by the subcommittee. I think it should be funded more substantially, but I am submitting this limited amendment because I realize the budgetary constraints which are faced at this time.

I thank the distinguished chairman for his assistance on this issue.

I have discussed this matter with the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of the subcommittee, and as I understand it, he is prepared to accept it; and I hope it will fare well in the conference as well.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, no funds were requested for this program by the administration.

This amendment will send a signal to the administration that we believe there are shortages of personnel—particularly psychiatric nurses.

I will be glad to take this matter to conference. I have expressed to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania the difficulties under which we are operating, and I hope he will consider that. We will try to do our best.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2274) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPECTER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2275

(Purpose: To appropriate funds for the construction of a new building for the University of Pennsylvania School of Dental Medicine)

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER) proposes an amendment numbered 2275:

On page 18, after line 23, insert the following:

For the construction of a new building for the University of Pennsylvania School of Dental Medicine under section 720(a)(1) of the Public Health Service Act, $9,000,000, to remain available until expended: Provided, That notwithstanding any other provision of this or any other Act, such amount shall be made available without regard to the provisions of sections 702(b) and 722(a)(1) of the Public Health Service Act.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am offering this amendment for $9 million for the construction of a new building for the Dental School of the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia.

I do so because of the uniqueness of the programs which are projected by the university and realizing full well the difficulty of having an amendment of this sort adopted, and the difficulty of having such an amendment surviving the conference. But I think it is important to do so at this time and to establish some legislative history on this subject.

As a leading dental school in the United States and one which enjoys an international reputation, Penn has pioneered several dental education thrusts in recent years. In an experiment of mobile and school-based dental service units in a rural underserved area, Penn started with a population almost universally infected with dental caries and reduced the infection and tooth loss in 5 years. This work prepared the way for Penn to experiment with serving urban, underserved areas. It created a new design for a dental education unit in placement in such areas to attract patients who had never before received dental care. At the same time, this provides Penn students with a wide variety of dental medicine problems which they might not see in other types of clinics.

Penn is ready to answer a national need for reducing the scope, while maintaining the quality of dental education. In conformity with the nationally determined health manpower, the university is prepared to cut its school of dental medicine enrollment by half. The goal of the university is to create a smaller but stronger school with a new curriculum which would include a 5-year family practice residency program and the adoption of a preceptor-ship model of clinical instruction. With this kind of program, it would no longer be necessary to have it housed in the overly large and highly inefficient building where it is now located.

This new building will not only house the educational, clinical, and administrative functions of the school of dental medicine, but it will also be the cornerstone of a new health center. The health center is a fascinating concept of blending the strengths of the various institutions which will participate while maintaining the singular identity of each institution. The Children's Seashore House, the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, the Veterans' Administration and a long-term care hospital are presently all working together with the school of dental medicine to develop this site and coordinate their needs.

The $9 million which I am offering as an amendment, is only one-half of the expected cost for the construction of this building. The University of Pennsylvania is prepared to raise the additional $9 million necessary. The project will go ahead without Federal money but will seriously be delayed and that delay could be costly. The present target date for completion is in autumn of 1986. This appropriation could be made available under section 720(a)(1) of part B of title VII of the Public Health Service Act.

As a final note, Mr. President, I should like to add that an estimated 1,200 new long-term jobs will be created by the construction of this health center. Approximately 250 construction jobs until the time of completion will be generated. In an economy such as ours, new jobs are always a welcome sight and needless to say, benefit the Federal Government as well in the long term.

I thank the distinguished chairman for his assistance in this matter.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I think the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania has correctly stated both the cause which gives rise to the amendment we are considering, and the description of the tactical situation in which we find ourselves vis-a-vis both the House of Representatives and the administration.

In the sense of establishing the first word on this subject for the record, I think a good purpose has been served.

However, I will never try, as long as I chair this subcommittee, to hold out false promise or hope. This is not going to be an easy item to hold in the conference, and I think that should be made clear as we establish the record on this amendment.

I support the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee.

I realize that it is not easy to hold this kind of an amendment, and I believe that it is a unique experiment in dental education and will perform a very unique role at a very distinguished institution.

I, of course, come to this issue with a predilection in favor of the University of Pennsylvania, coming from my State, and I do believe it has national implications.

I thank the chairman of the subcommittee for his kind consideration of this matter, and I move the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment (No. 2275) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished Senator from Connecticut for his consideration.

I yield the floor.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, what is the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Third reading.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2276

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE), for Mr. INOUYE, proposes an amendment numbered 2276.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 43, line 10, delete the period and insert the following: : Provided further, That Section 5(c) of the Act of September 30, 1985 (Public Law 874, 81st Congress), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "In the determination of amounts of payments made on the basis of entitlements established under section 2, 3 and 4 after October 1, 1983, by reason of any provision of law other than this Act which places any additional restriction on payments based on the concentration of children counted under subsection (a) or (b) of section 3 in the schools of the local education agency, such restriction shall be applied, in the case of any State (other than a territory or possession of the United States) within which there is only one local educational agency, by treating each administrative school district within such State as a local educational agency (solely for the purpose of computing the amount of such payments).".

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am offering this amendment on behalf of Senator INOUYE who is unavoidably absent and is not able to offer the amendment himself.

It is an amendment that addresses a peculiar situation in Hawaii. It does not add any money in the bill.

Hawaii is the only State in the Nation which has only one statewide school district. As a result, even though one of the administrative districts, Central Oahu, has 36 percent "A" students; that is, students who live on a Government base and whose parents work on the Government base and, therefore, make no property tax payments toward their schooling, and those are obviously the schools that have to have impact aid, Hawaii gets no impact aid because on a statewide basis they have only 10.2 percent "A" students.

In effect what this amendment would do would be to recognize Central Oahu as in effect one school district and, therefore, qualify it for impact aid.

There are few people in the Senate who have a deeper understanding of this than the present Presiding Officer, the distinguished Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABDNOR) who has been a crusader for fair treatment for people who are in this plight.

Mr. President, I hope under the circumstances the distinguished manager of the bill will be able to accept the amendment.

As I say, it adds no money. It simply permits this peculiar situation in Hawaii to be met equitably and fairly.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin for the senior Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of this amendment which affects the distribution of impact aid funds in Hawaii, I rise to urge my colleagues to act expeditiously on this matter.

Mr. President, this amendment will allow Hawaii to be treated on equal terms as all other States with respect to impact aid funding. Hawaii is the only State in the Nation with a single statewide school system. We in Hawaii feel that this system provides many benefits to the students in our State.

However, because of this centralized State system, Hawaii is often at a distinct disadvantage with respect to impact aid allocations. In particular, the State is hurt when "Super A" districts receive favorable funding treatment. "Super A" districts are those districts with 20 percent or more category "A" students in daily attendance.

While the Central Oahu District has 36.4 percent category "A" students in daily attendance—well above the figure necessary to qualify as a "Super A" district—this high concentration of "A" students is completely disregarded when the allocation formula is based on statewide statistics. Since the State as a whole has only 10.26 percent category "A" students in daily attendance, Hawaii does not receive any impact aid funds at the "Super A" reimbursement rate, and thus, is severely penalized for having a centralized statewide school system.

This amendment will allow States with a single statewide school system to treat the several administrative units within that system as school districts, only for the purposes of the impact aid formula. This does not mean that Hawaii will be granted any special treatment. It will merely allow Hawaii to receive exactly the same consideration as all other school districts in the country.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to act favorably on the pending amendment.

Mr. WEICKER. I concur with the statements made by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin and I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment (No. 2276) was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2277

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) proposes an amendment numbered 2277.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill insert the following:

No funds appropriated in any act to the Department of Education for fiscal year 1983 and 1984 other than those appropriated by section 111 of Public Law 98-107 shall be available to fund the consent decree of 1980 between the United States and the Board of Education of the city of Chicago.

Mr. WEICKER. It is our understanding, from the Department of Education's General Counsel, that this language is needed to unfreeze the appropriately $50 million in fiscal year 1983, and an undetermined amount in fiscal year 1984, that a Chicago Federal judge has frozen in order to satisfy the Federal obligation in the desegregation case, U.S. against the Board of Education of the city of Chicago.

The continuing resolution includes a provision which appropriates $20 million for this purpose from unobligated guaranteed student loan funds. My concern in offering this amendment is for those education programs which are being denied funding because their funds have been frozen pending the outcome of this case.

Such programs affected are: Follow Through, women's educational equity, civil rights training, aid to the Virgin Islands and territories and the secretary's discretionary fund.

According to the Department, these frozen funds would remain available beyond fiscal year 1983 by virtue of their being held over by the judge.

If additional funds are required to satisfy this case beyond the $20 million available, we will certainly do whatever we can to provide these funds at the appropriate time.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I support the amendment enthusiastically. It is a necessary amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment (No. 2277) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no further amendment——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to move to third reading, too, and I am delighted to see us moving along this rapidly. But we do have Members coming to the floor who will be here momentarily. So I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold——

Mr. PROXMIRE. I withhold my request.

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator has been gracious to his fellow Senators, his colleagues, in the sense of putting in these quorum calls, and as I intend to do.

I think it should be known that when the Senate is in recess between 12 noon and 2 p.m. I will consult with my good friend from Wisconsin with the hope that when we reconvene at 2 p.m., and for the remainder of the afternoon, neither the Senator from Wisconsin nor anybody else will provide that service. I intend to move toward final passage of the bill.

So I think everybody should be put on notice that the courtesy is being extended now. To some extent it is understandable since many Members are attending committee meetings. But after 2 p.m. it is not likely to happen, and we are going to go to third reading. There is no reason why we should not have this bill finished in a reasonable time, but we are not going to do it on this same basis we are doing it now.

I thank my friend from Wisconsin for the fact that he takes a more kindly attitude toward the Members than does the chairman. But everybody should be put on notice that after 2 p.m. this is not likely to happen again.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2278

(Purpose: To appropriate funds for the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation)

Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE), for Messrs. BAUCUS, BAKER, BYRD, INOUYE, MELCHER, BENTSEN, DOLE, and SASSER, proposes an amendment numbered 2278.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 49, line 14, after the period insert the following:

For providing financial assistance to the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation, $5,000,000.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I offer this amendment on behalf of Senator BAUCUS who, unfortunately, cannot be here today. He will be here later today but we may have finished with the bill.

Mr. President, this amendment provides $5 million for the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation. The Senate agreed to authorize this expenditure in the Federal supplemental compensation extension bill.

Mr. President, this amendment is cosponsored by Senators BAKER, BYRD, INOUYE, MELCHER, BENTSEN, DOLE, and SASSER.

The Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation was established to raise funds for two important organizations: The Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs and the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana.

Together, these two centers will honor the career of Mike Mansfield, the longest serving majority leader in the history of the U.S. Senate. Mike Mansfield, currently the American Ambassador to Japan, is truly an American statesman and a world leader.

The Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs, to be constructed at Flathead Lake in northwestern Montana, will bring leaders in business, government, and cultural affairs from nations of the Pacific to participate in conferences and seminars on the developing economic and cultural ties in this region. We expect that the center will host more than 60 such meetings each year on subjects ranging from agricultural trade to educational exchange programs.

The Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana will conduct academic programs related to Pacific area studies and ethics in public affairs. The university programs will open new opportunities for research and study, and attract leaders from academic and public life. The Maureen and Mike Mansfield Library at the university, which contains Mike's congressional papers, will also be important to researchers.

These two centers will sponsor cooperative programs designed to build upon their complementary relationship, such as hosting major conferences on Pacific area political, cultural, and trade relations.

I hope the distinguished manager of the bill will accept the amendment.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, this amendment provides for the appropriation of $5 million to establish the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation. Last week, the Senate agreed to my amendment to S. 1887, the Federal supplemental compensation extension bill, to authorize this expenditure. That amendment was cosponsored by Senators BAKER, BYRD, INOUYE, MELCHER, BENTSEN, DOLE, and SASSER. The bill is still in conference with the House of Representatives but I understand that the conferees have agreed to accept my amendment.

The Maureen and Mike Mansfield Foundation has been created to support two important organizations: The Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs and the Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana.

Together, these two centers will honor the career of Mike Mansfield, the longest-serving majority leader in the history of the U.S. Senate. Currently the American Ambassador to Japan, Mike Mansfield is truly an American statesman and a world leader.

The centers also honor the contributions of Mike's wife, Maureen Mansfield. As Mike said upon his retirement from the Senate:

> My conclusion has been reached in this instance with my wife, Maureen Hayes Mansfield, who has been with me through all these years and whose sensitive counsel, deep understanding, and great love have been so much a part of whatever may be the sum of my contribution.

The Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs, to be constructed at Flathead Lake in northwestern Montana, will bring leaders in business, government, and cultural affairs from nations of the Pacific to participate in conferences and seminars on the developing economic and cultural ties in this region. We expect that the Center will host more than 60 such meetings each year on subject ranging from agricultural trade to educational exchange programs.

The Center's progress is keyed to the unparalleled growth which has characterized trade in the Pacific Basin during the past two decades. This growth is expected to continue into the 21st century. The Center will work to foster economic growth through trade, and will also be a leader in improving international understanding and in eliminating cultural barriers which have impeded exchanges across the Pacific.

The Maureen and Mike Mansfield Center at the University of Montana will conduct academic programs related to Pacific area studies and ethics in public affairs. The university programs will open new opportunities for research and study, and attract leaders from academic and public life.

These two centers will sponsor cooperative programs designed to build upon their complementary relationships, such as hosting major conferences on Pacific area political, cultural, and trade relations.

The State of Montana has appropriated $1 million to the Mansfield Foundation, which will coordinate fundraising activities for these two centers. This amendment appropriates an additional $5 million, as a one-time appropriation to help establish the centers.

The Foundation will seek additional funds from individual donors, and we expect substantial donations from Japanese and other Pacific sources once Ambassador Mansfield retires from his post in Japan.

I believe it is fitting and proper that the United States should honor Mike Mansfield in this way. These two centers will honor his career by supporting and continuing his lifelong efforts to achieve close relations with Pacific nations in every sense.

Mr. President, many friends and colleagues of Mike have joined in this effort. The majority leader, Mr. BAKER, and the minority leader, Mr. BYRD, served on the Founding Committee for the Foundation, along with Senator DANNY INOUYE, the late Senator Scoop Jackson, and House Speaker TIP O'NEILL.

Stan Kimmitt, former Secretary of the Senate, served on the initial planning group and is a member of the Board of the Mansfield Foundation. The Foundation is chaired by Hon. Ted Schwinden, Governor of Montana.

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will support this amendment. I am sure the Senate will want to support this effort, to honor Mike Mansfield and to continue the important work he has started.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, there is no man with whom I have been privileged to serve since I came to the Senate in 1971, nor one that I admire more than Mike Mansfield. He was a credit to this institution, to his State, to our profession. I think it is a worthy amendment and I hope it passes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2278) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2279

(Purpose: To appropriate $50,000,000 for the purpose of section 6 of the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act of 1980)

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON) for himself and Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. SASSER, Mr. FORD, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. KENNE-DY, and Mr. MITCHELL proposes an amendment numbered 2279.

On page 40, line 24, beginning with "1978" strike out through "$528,367,000" in line 2 on page 41 and insert in lieu thereof: "1978; section 6 of the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act of 1980; and Public Law 92-506, $577,286,000".

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to be offering this amendment today with Senators MOYNIHAN, SASSER, FORD, SARBANES, and KENNEDY.

It adds $50 million in funding to help schools faced with costly asbestos removal problems. I believe this amendment is necessary if the Federal Government is to continue its commitment to the school districts across the country to help rid them of this potential health hazard.

The extent of the problem is very evident in my home State of Kentucky. State officials have estimated that it may take up to $26 million to solve the asbestos problem.

To provide a few examples, the superintendent of Henry County schools has stated in a recent letter that removal of asbestos would cost $265,000. The Barren County schools are also facing a bill of $250,000 for the removal of asbestos in six of their seven schools. The Harlan County school district has found that the cost of asbestos removal for one school alone could run anywhere from $528,000 to over $1.5 million.

These are not isolated incidents. A large number of school districts in every part of my State are facing this problem.

Congress passed the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act in 1980 to insure that all schools would be inspected for possible asbestos contamination and to provide them with some assistance in removing it if asbestos was found.

The Environmental Protection Agency required that all school inspections be completed by June 28, 1983. While these inspections have been completed in many of our schools, the school districts are finding that they do not have the resources available to remove any hazards that are found.

Since Congress passed the asbestos removal legislation in 1980, no funds have ever been appropriated for either the grant or loan program authorized by the act. Many school districts are experiencing severe budget problems, and have no funds available to remove the asbestos. Others are having to use funds originally intended for instructional purposes to pay for asbestos removal.

Mr. President, I believe we have a responsibility to follow through on our intent to help those most severely affected by this problem. The $50 million in funding offered in this amendment will be used to provide 20-year, no-interest loans for asbestos abatement. This is the same action that was taken by the House in their version of the Labor-Health and Human Services-Education appropriations bill.

The Senate Appropriations Committee did not include any funding because a report requested by Congress documenting the extent of the asbestos problem has not yet been received from the Department of Education.

This report was supposed to be completed by September 1, but the Department requested an extension of 1 month. However, the October 1 deadline has come and gone and the report is still not available. I understand from the Department that it will be another week or so before it will be in hand.

While the report has not yet been printed, officials at the Department of Education have told us it will show that approximately 14,000 schools across the country have some form of asbestos contamination. The contamination may range from severe to slight; however, some type of remedial action will be necessary for all of those schools at some time in the future.

Additionally, the cost of removal is estimated to be approximately $100,000 per building. Thus, if we assume that the Federal Government would pay half the cost of the removal, as the asbestos legislation authorizes, $700 million would be needed to deal with the problem.

We need to do something now about this situation and I do not believe it is prudent to await a final report that we know will show a substantial asbestos problem. I believe this amendment is a modest beginning that will benefit many school districts that are already having financial difficulties. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. President, I reiterate that we are dealing just with the loan portion of the authorization act. The money provided here would be for loans, 20-year, no-interest loans for the school districts to deal with an actual problem that has been determined. That is, a potential contamination by asbestos and the health hazard that causes the students, who must attend school.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

MR. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise reluctantly to oppose the amendment of my good friend from Kentucky because again this is a matter that has been of concern to him over a period of time. He has been responsible for the various asbestos inquiries that have been launched. On the other hand, I have a budgetary problem. It is hard enough to live with, never mind situations where the necessary reports and conclusions are yet to be in hand.

I note that the House bill does include the $50 million for the startup of the asbestos hazards control loan program as authorized by section 6 of the Asbestos School Hazards Control Act of 1980. The committee is also deeply concerned about potential health hazards posed by the incidence of asbestos in our Nation's schools. Several months ago, the committee requested that the Department of Education submit a report by September 1, 1983, on the extent of the problem confronting school districts that must remove asbestos, where it has been identified, as well as the cost of removal, number of districts affected and the availability of any Federal support for such purposes. Although the report had been requested to be submitted no later than September 1, 1983, the Department recently has requested a 1-month extension in order to obtain the full information requested. Accordingly, the committee believes it would be prudent to await the report in order to study the full magnitude of this problem before considering possible funding of a major new asbestos removal program.

I might suggest to my good friend from Kentucky that with the report in hand, once we have an assessment of the extent of the problem, we should review its connection with the supplemental, since that is what supplementals are meant to encompass, if indeed the occasion so demands. So I rise to oppose the amendment. But very frankly, I point out that in a short period of time, we may all be together on this issue. I hope that the Senator from Kentucky would see his way clear to having the report in hand and then consider exactly what financial requirements are required by that report and I suggest that we can move together on the problem at such time.

Mr. PROXMIRE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I reluctantly oppose the amendment. It is true it is a loan but it is a no-interest loan, and with interest rates at the level they are now, that means that the cost could be very, very substantial over the life of the loan—perhaps more than the principal amount of $50 million.

The fact is that the funds are provided in the House bill, so that there is negotiating room with the House. Unfortunately, Mr. President, the Senate is already $400 million over the House, and the negotiating room for the manager of the bill will be very, very seriously eroded if this amendment should be adopted.

In fact, one calculation is that over its total life, the program could cost as much as $1.4 billion with the Federal share being $700 million.

So, Mr. President, as I say, I am very reluctant to oppose the amendment because I have great respect for the Senator from Kentucky, but I think that under the circumstances, the subcommittee and committee would be in a very difficult position if this amendment is adopted. I am sure that the manager of the bill, and certainly I, will look with considerable favor on the House position if we are given this discretionary room by denying the amendment.

Mr HUDDLESTON. Mr President, in response to the comments that have been made by the distinguished floor managers of the bill, let me say that we are dealing with a problem here that very well could be of very substantial proportions. If we do not move quickly to provide some assistance for the local school districts who, after all, will be trying to comply with a Federal mandate placed upon them, we are going to see a massive transfer, in my judgment, of funds originally intended and needed for educational purposes, instructional purposes, program enhancement purposes, and many other things that our school districts are confronted with, to try to meet this particular problem. Recent reports about the state of our educational system and the effectiveness of it should give us some pause as to whether or not we should be willing at this point to see these funds transferred away from instructional purposes to deal with the asbestos hazards purposes.

I do not think delaying action is going to improve the situation by one whit. Even though we do not yet have the report in hand from the Department of Education, I think it is pretty obvious by looking at those areas where the inspections have been made, that there is going to be a high incidence of asbestos contamination throughout the country. I know of school districts that already have had to delay the opening of their schools for the current semester because of the asbestos problem and because they were not able to deal with it very rapidly. I point out again that we are talking about loan money. While the Government would bear the cost of borrowing the money, that is a small amount to pay compared to the potential hazard that we are trying to address.

I hope that we would go ahead and put this issue to rest as far as the conference is concerned. There will be many others that we can negotiate over in order to get the figures somewhere closer to where we would like to have them, and I think this is one that is so critical that it would be prudent to move ahead now and to eliminate it from the conference.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I have stated my opposition to this matter. I might add, as has already been pointed out, this is the potential beginning of a $100 million program. I repeat to my colleagues, you have the same decision to make that BILL PROXMIRE and myself and MARK HATFIELD and every member of the Appropriations Committee has had to make: Do you want a bill or not? We can accommodate within narrow limits here and we have tried to do that and we will continue to try to do it. When we talk $20 million, $50 million, $100 million, $700 million, $800 million, that is it. So every person has to put a dollar amount on the value of once again having the matter of health, education, and science back into the Senate ballpark or whether we want to continue to be dragged along by continuing resolutions. If that is the way you want it, fine; you have given away most of your power as a U.S. Senator and certainly as a member of the committees that are affected by all this legislation.

I hope that the amendment will be defeated not because of its substance, because I recognize that there is a problem and I recognize that big money may have to be spent to solve it, but at least let us have the final reports in hand and let us have a measured response. To add to this bill at this time, believe me, assures defeat of the matter before us.

Mr. PROXMIRE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is now 10 minutes to 12. I understand that at 12 o'clock, the Senate will go into recess for 2 hours.

We have the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Rhode Island, and the Senator from New Jersey on the floor. Would the manager of the bill and the Senator from Kentucky be willing to have the rollcall vote take place after the caucus?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not object.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, it would be my intention to have the Senator from Ohio present his amendment. We expect to support that amendment. However, there will not be time for a major amendment such as that of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WEICKER. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY. Is it the intention of the Senator to go to my amendment immediately after——

Mr. WEICKER. I would like very much to go ahead immediately to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to setting aside the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, so that we may have it clear, has the unanimous-consent request been agreed to with respect to setting aside the Huddleston amendmnent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has.

AMENDMENT NO. 2280

(Purpose: To add $3,500,000 for the establishment of not more than five specialized research centers for research on Alzheimer's disease and related disorders)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY) proposes an amendment numbered 2280.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 22, line 9, strike out "$108,584,000" and insert "$112,084,000, of which $3,500,000 shall be available for the establishment of not more than five specialized research centers for research on Alzheimer's disease and related disorders".

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the amendment which I have sent to the desk will provide $3.5 million to establish, through the National Institute on Aging, up to five specialized research centers on Alzheimer's disease. These centers will provide a solid base of multidisciplinary research, clinical training, and community education. My amendment matches the appropriation for these centers agreed on the House side and is consistent with the recent action taken by the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee to increase Alzheimer's research by $4 million under the NIH reauthorization bill.

Alzheimer's disease is becoming an increasingly devastating health problem for older Americans. This pervasive disease exacts a staggering toll, both psychologically and financially, on the victims and their families.

Alzheimer's presently afflicts 1.2 million to 4 million older Americans. Experts estimate that 120,000 deaths every year are associated with the disease. Alzheimer's results in expenditures of more than $26 billion annually and accounts for nearly half the country's nursing home admissions.

With the rapid increase in our elderly population, the problem is expected to reach epidemic proportions by early in the next century.

Alzheimer's imposes severe financial, medical, and emotional hardships on families. Today, American families pay for almost half of all long-term care out-of-pocket. Costs are extraordinarily high with a full diagnostic evaluation alone costing $300 to $2,000. The financial difficulty is usually compounded by the fact that costs increase at the same time as income is lost to pay for it.

Besides the obvious human factors involved in finding the causes of Alzheimer's disease, there are these fiscal facts to consider. In 1979, the annual cost of nursing home care for persons with Alzheimer's was approximately $6 billion—or one-half of the cost of all nursing home care for the elderly. It is estimated that these costs will rise to $30 billion by the end of this century, eight times the total amount now spent on all medical and mental health research.

In the face of this enormous future financial burden, it is imperative that Alzheimer's disease research be a top priority of Government funding.

Although grants from the National Institutes of Health for research on Alzheimer's disease and related disorders were in the range of $18 to $20 million in 1982, less than $4 million was spent on basic scientific research relating directly to Alzheimer's disease.

And yet there are promising research leads and an excitement in the scientific community concerning the real possibility of discovering the cause of this disease in the next decade.

The creation of specialized centers on Alzheimer's would bring together investigators from various scientific disciplines to work on projects of mutual interest that could speed progress toward finding a cause and possible treatment for this devastating illness. The center approach will be instrumental in building a strong base for this multidisciplinary research. Since a number of potential high-quality research sites already exist, it is imperative that funding be made available promptly so that the National Institutes of Health can move quickly to establish these centers.

There may be some opposition to the targeting of $3.5 million specifically for Alzheimer's research. However, I again remind my colleagues that the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee did accept my amendment, under the NIH reauthorization bill, to increase funds specifically for Alzheimer's research.

I feel strongly that we need to continue this approach now that we have reached the appropriation stage, by targeting this $3.5 million for the establishment of specialized research centers on Alzheimer's disease.

We must also remember that Alzheimer's is not an inevitable consequence of growing old. It is a pathological disease that can be investigated, and hopefully, cured.

My amendment will help insure that the Federal Government, more and more, takes an active role in the battle to conquer this devastating disease.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I support the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to increase the appropriation for research into Alzheimer's disease through specialized research centers established for that purpose.

In a hearing I held as chairman of the Subcommittee on Aging of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources on May 16, 1983, I learned that this illness is ranked as the Nation's fourth leading killer, responsible for an estimated 100,000 to 120,000 deaths a year in the United States.

Furthermore, this disease is enormously costly both to families and to the public. Family members care for the majority of demented and frail individuals in the home. Victims usually need a constant caretaker. Constant means 24 hours a day, since one of the characteristics of the disease is a restlessness that leaves the victim unable to sleep and causes him or her to wander aimlessly. In 1979 the annual cost of nursing home care for persons with Alzheimer's disease was approximately $6 billion or one-half of the cost of all nursing home care for the elderly in that year. It is estimated that these costs will rise to $30 billion by the end of the 1990's.

In the past decade, scientists around the world have made great progress in the understanding of Alzheimer's disease. This increase in funding for specialized centers of research on Alzheimer's disease could ultimately result in major progress in the treatment and cure of this debilitating disease, thus reducing both the human anguish of victims and their families, and the great public costs associated with it.

Mr. HEINZ. I rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Ohio, Senator METZENBAUM. This amendment would add $3.5 million to the National Institute on Aging for the establishment of research centers for Alzheimer's disease and related disorders. These funds were appropriated in the House measure but were not included in the Senate version.

Just last month, I chaired a hearing of the Senate Special Committee on Aging that focused on Alzheimer's disease. Dr. Robert Butler, former Director of the National Institute on Aging, testified on the pressing need for specialized centers around the country for Alzheimer's research. Like existing centers for cancer, stroke, and arthritis already set up by the National Institutes of Health, these centers would bring together the critically needed funding source with a stable population base in an environment that can thrive with the advantages of computer capabilities, specially trained professionals, and the most advanced forms of technology. These centers will be uniquely effective in generating a significant amount of support and visibility to the scientific community's ongoing efforts to uncover the cause and cure for this most insidious of diseases.

Mr. President, between 1 and 3 million persons currently suffer from Alzheimer's disease, a disease which leads to the death of over 120,000 persons over age 65 each year. We spend over $20 billion a year caring for persons with Alzheimer's disease, yet we still know neither its cause nor cure. This additional $3.5 million for a research center will, without a doubt, be a prudent investment. I urge your support for this amendment.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I have discussed this matter with the distinguished Senator from Ohio. I concur with his analysis of the problem, and I compliment him for his leadership as it relates to Alzheimer's disease.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I support the amendment.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am interested in this situation. How much have we talked about?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I point out to the Senator from Rhode Island that in the Committee on Labor and Human Resources the committee approved it. This amendment is for only $3.5 million. It is less than the authorizing committee had proposed.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Ohio and the committee on this amendment. It is an area that is of interest to me. I hope something constructive can come from these funds.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I appreciate the support of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2280) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am concerned with the level of appropriations for the maternal and child health block grant.

Under the current year, there is being spent the $373 million that was appropriated with the block grant last year and $105 million which came under the supplement, which makes a total for the maternal and child health care of $478 million.

As I understand the appropriation that is before us now in this area, it is $425 million, which is some $60 million less than what has been appropriated for the current year.

So it would be my inclination—but I should like to hear from the distinguished manager of this bill—to seek additional funds for the maternal and child health, to bring it up to the neighborhood of $490 million that we have appropriated in the current year. I wonder whether the distinguished manager could give me some assistance or enlightenment on this matter.

I feel that this is an extremely effective program. Basically, it is a preventive health program. It is trying to keep the mothers and the children of the poor healthy, before they catch any potential illnesses early, so that they can receive the services under this program, whether it is immunization or medical care, so that the disastrous illnesses or the debilitating effects that might follow can be forestalled.

I know of the great interest of the manager of the bill in this area, and I would appreciate his thoughts on additional funds for this matter.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I appreciate the concerns of the Senator in this area.

Again, I have to repeat that the appropriation is $425 million for fiscal year 1984, and the carryover was $68 million, and we will have a 1984 program level of $493 million. This is well above the appropriation for fiscal 1983. I hope it would meet with the approval of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. That is reassuring. I was not aware of the carryover. I presume that is from the supplemental.

As the Senator has said, the carryover is some $68 million, which makes a total of $493 million that can be spent in the current year if this appropriation is approved. That is satisfactory. As the Senator has mentioned, that is in excess of what we appropriated this year, even including the supplemental.

This is a cost-effective program. A recent study in Texas shows that for every dollar spent in preventive care for children, $8 was saved in long-time costs.

So I am satisfied with the explanation of the distinguished manager of the bill, and I commend him for his efforts.

Mr. WEICKER. I thank by good friend from Rhode Island. I very much appreciate his support in these matters. It has been consistent support over the years.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is pending.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I have done my best to get a rollcall vote before the recess on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. I have been told by various Senators that this is not a good time for that. I think he deserves a vote and deserves it now, and after 2 o'clock there is not going to be very much time on this floor. People had better be here to present their amendments and vote on them. I apologize to the Senator from Kentucky. He will have his vote at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Would the floor manager be willing to allow 10 minutes to a side at 2 o'clock?

Mr. WEICKER. Of course.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. To be followed immediately by the vote?

Mr. WEICKER. That is perfectly agreeable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator withhold for a moment?

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be set aside so that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, would the Senator's amendment be acceptable? Would it be concluded now?

Mr. WALLOP. It would be.

Mr. BRADLEY. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICE. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2281

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) proposes an amendment numbered 2281.)

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 33, line 22, after the word "such" add:

Act, except that the Secretary of Health and Human Services may waive this requirement for any State applying for such a waiver if—

(1) the State obtained a waiver of the requirements of section 138 of Public Law 97-276 with respect to appropriations for fiscal year 1983; and

(2) the State submits, prior to October 1, 1983, an application for fiscal year 1984 under the Community Services Block Grant Act, containing provisions for the use of assistance under that Act by political subdivisions.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, in 1981, Congress authorized the community services block grant program to replace the last remnants of the Office of Economic Opportunity. The block grant would allow each State to decide the method for allocating community services antipoverty funds within the States. Basically, the two options are to continue to distribute funds to existing Community Action agencies, or to disburse funds directly to local jurisdictions. Some States, such as my own State of Wyoming, do not have Community Action agencies operating in all counties. In Wyoming, the agencies covered only 7 of the 23 counties. Most of the State was not served by this program.

Under the new block grant, Wyoming would be able to distribute antipoverty funds to all 23 counties. In 1982, the State was prepared to implement the block grant. However, a provision was included in one of the continuing resolutions adopted that year which would suspend the new block grant, and mandate that 90 percent of community services funds be passed through to existing Community Action agency grantees. Wyoming had prepared a State plan for distributing the funds to all counties, and had submitted the plan to the Department of Health and Human Services for final approval. The language in the continuing resolution effectively blocked this plan.

Senator ARMSTRONG sponsored an amendment to a later continuing resolution which would allow States, such as Wyoming, that had a State plan and were ready to implement the new program to do so. Funds would be distributed according to the State plan rather than going directly to existing grantees. The amendment was adopted, and my State of Wyoming was able to distribute the funds to all counties.

Once again, we are forced to deal with the passthrough requirement. The continuing resolution passed last week did contain a waiver of the passthrough. The waiver allows the States to continue to fund community services according to the State plan. The Labor-HHS appropriations bill, as approved by the House of Representatives also contains a waiver. But, the Senate version of this appropriations bill does not contain a waiver. The Senate amendments to the Labor-HHS appropriations bill has struck the waiver language which had been included by the House of Representatives. I offer an amendment to maintain the House language.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter dated September 7, 1983, to me from the Governor of the State of Wyoming, Ed Herschler, explaining the need for a waiver.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Cheyenne, Wyo., September 7, 1983.

Hon. MALCOLM WALLOP,
U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WALLOP: The House Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services and Education Appropriations recently voted to extend for still another year the so-called "Grandfather Clause" which requires states to give 90% of it's Community Services Block Grant funds to "eligible entities," i.e., community action agencies. Last year, Wyoming, along with several other states received a waiver of such 90% rule because under that rule only seven of it's counties would have received services under the program. The waiver enabled Wyoming to provide services in all of it's twenty-three counties during FY 83. The language of the proposed legislation by the subcommittee would also negate the possibility of another waiver for FY 84.

I am deeply concerned that Wyoming will have to regress and back-track relative to it's major policy of local decision-making by local elected officials if the subcommittee's recommendation is accepted. It appears that whatever language the House approves will become law, as it seems unlikely that the Senate will act on this issue. It has taken Wyoming a substantial amount of funds, time and effort to place the concept of local decision-making into the hands of local elected officials. I strongly support this kind of flexibility for states in the administration of block grants.

Wyoming has made significant progress during the past year in the administration of the Community Services Block Grant Program, particularly in terms of developing sound planning systems in local areas, in extending the program's services to counties previously unserved, developing coordinative systems among local private and public programs, and in the area of involving communities as a whole into the localized planning systems.

The response from local governments regarding their flexibility in planning for their own unique needs has been very positive. Many of the programs that have been implemented by local government during FY 83 have been exceptionally innovative, pragmatic and cost-efficient.

Anything that you can do to assure our continued use of the concept of localized planning will be greatly appreciated.

Yours sincerely,

ED HERSCHLER.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, very briefly, I discussed this with the manager of the bill and what it would do is reinstate the waiver provision in the House bill for States such as mine who do not have community action agencies operating in every jurisdiction.

It has no revenue effect whatsoever on the bill.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I recognize the same need that has been identified by the Senator from Wyoming exists in four States.

Based upon the assurance of the Senator from Wyoming, I am prepared to agree to the amendment which will permit Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, and Nevada to recieve a waiver in 1984.

Mr. WALLOP. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have no objection.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I appreciate the assistance of the manager of the bill, the Senator from Connecticut, in adopting this amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, last year a decision was made by the Senate Appropriations Committee to mandate a pass through of 90 percent of the community services block grant funds to eligible entities within the States. This pass through provision not only negated the congressional intent of the legislation authorizing the community services block grant program, but seriously thwarted efforts under way in many States—including my State of Wyoming—to develop funding distribution formulas which would be more responsive to the needs of their communities.

During our consideration of the continuing appropriations resolution for fiscal year 1983 the Senate subsequently accepted an amendment which provided that the pass through provision would not apply in those States which had submitted an application to the Secretary of HHS prior to October 1, 1982, or which were operating their own community services block grant program at some time during fiscal year 1982. This allowed several States, including Wyoming, to proceed with community services block grant programs which had been developed in accordance with the requirements of the new community services block grant approach authorized by Congress.

The waiver provision in last year's bill enabled Wyoming to provide services in all of its 23 counties—as compared to only one-third of the counties served under the old system. If a waiver of the 90-percent pass through provision is not included in this bill, 16 counties in Wyoming will effectively lose community services block grant funding. My State will be forced to regress from a policy which fosters flexibility and local decisionmaking—a policy I might add which is authorized by Congress—but superseded by the Senate Appropriations Committee with no explanation whatsoever in its report on this bill.

We are not seeking special treatment. We are only asking the Appropriations Committee to allow the congressionally approved authorizing legislation for the community services block grant program to be fully implemented in those States which have sought to comply with the provisions of that law.

I urge the Appropriations Committee to accept the waiver language of existing law as it relates to community services block grant funding distribution.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I move the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment (No. 2281) was agreed to.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

TIME LIMITATION AGREEMENT

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes at 2 p.m. there be 10 minutes of debate equally divided on the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON) and immediately upon conclusion of those 10 minutes we proceed to a rollcall vote on the matter.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I do not have any objection except the inclusion of the words "rollcall vote." Could it not be by unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. WEICKER. I beg the Senator's pardon?

Mr. BYRD. We could order the rollcall vote.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It has already been ordered.

Mr. BYRD. It has?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes.

Mr. WEICKER. The rollcall has already been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BYRD. That is all I wish to know.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, at this time I also reserve the right, and I have not decided on this, to table the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. I want that as part of any agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, could the Senator amplify that request to say that at the conclusion of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky we be able to proceed to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. WEICKER. That I could not do.

I am only trying to make accommodations for the recess period required by a previous agreement. I am not prepared to go ahead and guarantee Senators time in this Chamber to present their amendments.

I have been here for 2 hours this morning. We have almost moved to third reading five different times. No one has been here.

Indeed, I assure the Senator from New Jersey that I wanted his amendment to be considered as the first amendment this morning because I think it may be the most important amendment before us today.

I can assure him that I would hope, and I would work mightily hard to assure that as soon as we dispense with the matter of the Senator from Kentucky we move right to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

I have no problem with that sequence. However, I do not want to formalize it.

Mr. BRADLEY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate stands in recess until 2 p.m. today.

The Senate, at 12:02 p.m., recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. QUAYLE).

AMENDMENT NO. 2279

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment pending before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. There are 10 minutes remaining. Those 10 minutes will be equally divided.

Who yields time?

The Senator from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I just reiterate the funds that we are asking to be provided are in accordance with an authorization that has been in existence now for some 3 years.

This is not a new program. It would be the first time that we have appropriated any funds for the operation of that program, and the funds that we are asking in this amendment are for the loan portion of that program. They do not represent a grant to the school district but merely a fund from which they can draw a 20-year no-interest loan to deal with the problem that is already in existence.

We have found that some school districts have had to delay the opening of schools in order to eliminate this potential health hazard and have had to divert funds originally planned for instruction and other educational purposes to deal with the question of asbestos hazards.

All school districts are required to make a determination as to whether or not there is within any of their buildings a potential asbestos hazard. And, of course, finding such, they have to deal with it.

No school district can place school children in a known hazard. So they have no choice except to deal with it and deal with it immediately and use whatever funds are available to them.

This is a Federal program. The inspections were mandated by Federal law and the Federal Government has a responsibility, in my judgment, in assisting those school districts and to avoid utilizing money that should be going for the education of our children for this specific purpose.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of whatever time remains.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to my colleague from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Kentucky, my distinguished colleague, Senator HUDDLESTON, and I commend him for introducing this important amendment. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of it and I urge my colleagues to join in supporting it.

Mr. President, for approximately 30 years, between the 1940's and the 1970's, asbestos materials were used extensively in school buildings for fireproofing, insulation, soundproofing, and other purposes. Asbestos is known to cause cancer in humans and, since the mid-1970's, there has been a great deal of concern about the presence of asbestos in our schools and the health risk it presents to school faculty, personnel, and especially our young people. In May 1980, Congress passed the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act. This act established a program to inspect schools for asbestos-containing materials, to contain or remove such materials, and to replace them with other suitable building materials. The act authorized funds for grants and interest-free loans for up to 50 percent of such project costs. Regrettably, Congress has never appropriated funds for this program.

The severity of the asbestos problem in our schools only recently became evident with the implementation of regulations by the Environmental Protection Agency. In May 1982, EPA published regulations which required local education agencies to inspect schools for friable asbestos-containing material. Under this rule, inspections were to be completed by June 28, 1983. The EPA rule did not require reporting to EPA, nor did it require treatment or removal of the asbestos once it was found. The rule did, however, mandate recordkeeping and notification of employees and parent associations if asbestos was found. And once the word was out that cancer-causing asbestos was found in the schools, parents, teachers, students, and school boards rightfully began calling for its removal.

The amendment we are offering today takes the first step toward helping those school districts which have found asbestos to remove or contain this hazardous material. The amendment appropriates $50 million for 20-year interest-free loans under section 6 of the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act of 1980. This is the same amount provided for in the House-passed version of H.R. 3913, the Labor/HHS/Education appropriations bill. It is imperative that the Senate join the House in providing these funds to school districts that are already hard pressed to meet basic education program budgets, much less deal with extensive and expensive renovation of school buildings.

While it is true that the Department of Education is currently completing work on a study of this problem aimed at assessing the potential cost of such a Federal program, I do not believe that we can wait to act. Already schools across this Nation are faced with the possibility of having to spend millions of dollars to renovate and contain asbestos already found in school buildings. To delay action any further would only send a message to those school districts that Congress does not consider this to be an imminent danger. I do not believe that the Senate can afford, nor do we want, to send such a signal, Mr. President.

I have heard from many school superintendents, parents, teachers, and students concerning the hazards of asbestos in our schools. Just last week, I received a petition from the Henry County School District signed by over 200 concerned parents, teachers, students, and citizens, calling on the Federal Government to assist them with the removal of this material. The Henry County School District found asbestos in four locations and the removal and replacement of this material is estimated to cost $265,000. Although this would not be a large amount to some, it is more than the rural-based school district can absorb. The recessed farm economy and this summer's droughts make it impossible for the Henry County School District to raise additional revenues to fund asbestos removal.

Other school districts, such as Harlan County, Ky., have received preliminary estimates of up to $1.6 million for asbestos removal. Statewide, Kentucky superintendent of public instruction Raymond Barber estimates that Kentucky schools are faced with a possible $26 million cost for asbestos removal. Nationwide, the cost is estimated to be an average of $6 per square foot, for a total cost of approximately $1.2 billion.

Mr. President, the $50 million provided by our amendment is a very modest amount in light of the tremendous need for these funds. But it is a responsible beginning and will send a positive message to those school districts who are trying to remove this hazardous material that the Senate recognizes both the seriousness of the situation and the urgent need to act. Without these Federal funds, school districts will have to dip into educational program funds to remove asbestos, or be faced with closing their doors until funds can be found.

Mr. President, we cannot wait to act on this issue. I commend my colleague, Senator HUDDLESTON, for offering this amendment and I urge its adoption.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Louisville Courier-Journal of August 28, 1983, describing the situation of asbestos in Kentucky schools.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal, Aug. 18, 1983]

STATE FACES $26 MILLION BILL TO RID SCHOOLS OF ASBESTOS

(By Carol Marie Cropper)

HENDERSON, KY.—Five-year-old Yvonne Wahl was ready to start kindergarten at Niagara elementary this year. But the school wasn't ready for her.

Because a half-million-dollar project to remove cancer-causing asbestos from schools in Henderson County is not completed, Niagara and two other Henderson elementary schools are closed.

Children are being bused to different schools, and parents of kindergartners—like Betty Wahl, Yvonne's mother—are driving 40 minutes round-trip to pick them up. Students at one school are eating cold sandwiches trucked in in boxes instead of the usual hot lunch.

Despite the inconvenience, parents like Mrs. Wahl say they understand. "It's something that has to be done. I'd rather they remove that from the school."

Henderson County's is one school system out of thousands throughout Kentucky and the nation now facing the problem of asbestos. The material was used in 4 of the county's 17 schools.

In the '50s, '60s and early '70s, asbestos was widely used for insulation in schools and public buildings—on ceilings, walls, pipes and in boiler rooms.

In 1973 the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency declared it a hazardous material and banned further use of it for that purpose.

Last spring the EPA notified school systems throughout the country that June 28 was their deadline to implement tougher guidelines to inspect for asbestos, and, if it is found, to warn employees and parents' groups and post notices in the schools.

The EPA regulation does not require that the asbestos be removed or sealed. No federal or state money is available for that purpose.

"We didn't want the darn signs on our buildings—I didn't—saying we had asbestos," said Henderson County Superintendent Bill Rideout. "It was our position that if you have to do these things (posting and notification), and if it's that dangerous, . . . that would create a lot of fear and anxiety in our people. And if it is dangerous, I don't think we need to subject our youngsters to being housed in a system that has asbestos."

In 1979 Kentucky health departments, using less stringent testing guidelines, found asbestos in 150 schools, said Jim Judge, manager of property insurance with the state Department of Education.

Prestonsburg High School removed it that year.

This year, Judge said, at least 29 of Kentucky's 120 counties removed asbestos from schools—and he said there may be others he doesn't know about.

School systems in Hopkins, Franklin, Bullitt, Henderson, Daviess, Jackson, Union, McCracken, Oldham, Carroll, Trigg, Marshall, Warren, Barren, Metcalfe and Hart counties, and in the cities of Greenville, Glasgow and Bowling Green are among those that removed asbestos from their schools this summer, Judge said.

Fayette and Rockcastle counties removed asbestos last year, he said, and Jessamine County sealed the material, thus preventing it from getting into the air.

(Asbestos crumbles easily, allowing fine particles to get into the air, where it is breathed into the lungs.)

Other school districts say they plan to take action when the schools are empty again next summer.

State school officials estimate it will take three to four years and $26 million to solve the asbestos problem in Kentucky schools, Judge said.

Here are the costs already incurred or estimated at some schools:

Union County schools spent $407,000 to remove asbestos from ceilings and wrap asbestos-covered pipes, Superintendent Neal Tucker said.

Henderson County's project was to have cost $499,535, but Rideout said that because the contractor, Spinazzolo Systems Inc., of Newport News, Va., did not meet its July 31 deadline, $1,000 a day is being deducted from the contract amount until the work is done.

Daviess County has spent about $350,000, and still has some asbestos in Apollo High School and Maceo Elementary School, said Superintendent Glenn Ducan. The system hopes to get grant money to complete the work next summer, he said.

Harlan County school officials say it could cost $1 million to remove asbestos from schools there, said Harold Patterson, the school board chairman.

"We're looking for some federal grants, and I've been writing to Washington," he said.

Such expenses come at a time when school systems across the nation are already strapped for funds. "Anybody who spends money on it is financially hurt now," Tucker said.

Time and money spent to remove asbestos in Union County will mean a delay in replacing a middle school lost to fire last summer, he said.

Larry LaMour of the U.S. Department of Education, said there are no definite numbers on how many schools in Kentucky or the United States have asbestos in them. LaMour is coordinating a national effort to remove asbestos and is to report to Congress Thursday.

A study by the Service Employees International Union, headquartered in Washington, estimates that 10 percent of the nation's schools contain asbestos and are doing nothing about it, said Margaret Peisert, a union research analyst.

That would mean 3.24 million children and 648,000 school employees and teachers are being exposed to asbestos, according to the study.

Several Kentucky school superintendents said they have received no backlash from parents concerned about the danger asbestos may present to their children.

"I haven't heard any reaction about it. I was surprised," Patterson said.

Dessie Fuquay, who lives next to the Maceo Elementary School in Daviess County and has three children attending it, said she did not know anything about the asbestos.

Duncan said notices have been posted on the school's bulletin boards. But Ms. Fuquay's children said they hadn't read them. "We don't pay that much attention to the board in our class," said her son, Charles, 12.

Doctors have known since the 1920s that asbestos particles damage the lungs of those who work with it, LaMour said. Evidence since then has shown there is a danger to those with less direct contact, he said.

"There have been studies where they've found children with asbestosis (scarring of the lungs caused by asbestos particles) living four blocks from an asbestos plant," he said.

Particles of asbestos, a non-biodegradable material, can be so small that they can enter a person's body through the skin and can puncture the walls of the white blood cells the body sends to fight them, LaMour said. But the most common entry is by breathing the particles into the lungs, he said.

Tiny particles of asbestos can drift down from school ceilings to the children sitting below.

"One of the real big questions is the question of low-level exposure," LaMour said. "To what extent is that a danger? Nobody has an answer on that."

LaMour compared the reaction to asbestos to an allergy. "Certain people are highly allergic to asbestos fibers and will most likley develop a cancer in one year, five years or 15 years."

The likelihood increases with time, he said, and with age, as the body's immune system wears down. Generally, it takes 15 to 25 years for symptoms to show, he said.

Besides asbestosis, asbestos can cause lung cancer, tumors of the lung or abdominal lining, and cancer of the esophogus, stomach, colon and rectum, LaMour said.

The U.S. Department of Education is trying to gather information on the extent of the problem, but, so far, has been having trouble doing even that.

Kentucky was one of a majority of states that sent no specific information on schools containing asbestos, LaMour said.

The Asbestos Detection and Control Act of 1980 provided for no-interest loans to remove asbestos and for grant money for detection, LaMour said. But Congress never funded that act.

Efforts are under way to find the money during the next session, he said.

Meanwhile, Ms. Fuquay's children will continue going to Maceo despite the asbestos, she said. Her 4-year-old daughter will join the others there next year.

"It kind of makes you think about what it will do to the kids." Ms. Fuquay said. "It'll make me think."

Mr. FORD. I thank my distinguished colleague.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON). His amendment will appropriate $50 million for schools nationwide to detect and remove asbestos.

There is not one among us who would deny that quality education is a national priority. We have all received numerous letters and phone calls from concerned constituents urging us to improve the curriculum offered by our States' schools. There have been no fewer that eight major recent studies reporting on methods to improve our Nation's education system. It is pointless, however to enter into discussions of curriculum when parents across the country are afraid to send their children to schools because the facilities present serious health hazards.

In 1980, Congress recognized that the prevalance of asbestos in school buildings presented a problem of paramount concern. We enacted the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act. Under this law, thousands of schools across the country were to be inspected for asbestos according to regulations published by the Environmental Protection Agency. Each school was required to report its findings to the EPA. Also mandated in this law was the formation of a task force, to include members from seven Federal agencies and four members-at-large. The task force was to monitor the effectiveness of the Asbestos Act and make this information public. Sadly, Mr. President, this task force has not met since 1980.

Despite the failure of the task force to carry out its duties, many schools across the country have attempted to inspect for asbestos. According to two sources, every State in the country contains schools with hazardous levels of asbestos. It is estimated that 72,000 school buildings need to be inspected or reinspected. It is further estimated that as many as 3.24 million school children are currently potentially exposed to hazardous asbestos.

Oddly enough, Congress authorized funds to be used in this inspection and removal process, but has failed to appropriate funds to assist local school agencies in their detection programs. Mr. President, we have ignored this issue far too long. We have failed our school children for too many years. It is high time we accept our responsibility and assist our colleagues on the State and local levels in removing this hazardous material from education facilities. Let us begin to eradicate this problem so we may move forward in the continuous effort of establishing a superior program of educational excellence.

Mr. President, the problems associated with asbestos have been identified and medically proved. We know that exposure to "friable material" often causes lung cancer. We also know that persons contacting this material may develop a serious lung disorder known as asbesteosis. Mr. President, we are all too profoundly aware that small children are most at risk from asbestos exposure.

With these facts at hand, how can we turn our backs and continue to ignore children and parents in each of our States? In my own State of Tennessee, at least 318 schools have been found to contain hazardous asbestos. At least two schools have closed, and I hear reports that several more are on the brink of closing. I have been contacted by several school superintendents. They ask me what happened to the money Congress appropriated in 1980 specifically for the purpose of removing and detecting asbestos in our schools.

But, as I have pointed out we have failed to appropriate such money even though we have authorized it. We have established a national plan of detection and removal. But we have not required that our schools comply and we have not given them incentive to do so. Until we provide local school districts with the necessary resources to undergo thorough inspection and removal procedures, we are not properly confronting this national problem.

The amendment offered by Mr. HUDDLESTON matches the House sum of $50 million for the asbestos program. We would be wrong and irresponsbile if we fail to appropriate the needed moneys. I have been advised that because a mandated report from the Department of Education has not been completed, we should wait to appropriate such funds. But, my friends, the evidence is clear. We have before us a national health hazard, one that we can detect and remove. We are not faced by a mysterious plague. We have the responsibility of protecting our school children from disease. And we must provide the resources to do so.

Let me close by sharing with you a passage from a letter I received from one concerned mother.

> The past damage to our children's health will not be repaired. It can't be repaired. The lost school time can't be returned. • • • is there something we can do to halt our loss of health, money, and pride in our town? Please help if you can.

Mr. President, I submit to you today that we are able to help, indeed, we have the responsibility to help. Let us show that we accept this responsibility by voting in favor of this amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to support Sentor HUDDLESTON'S amendment to provide funds for cleaning up asbestos hazards in the Nation's schools.

The Environmental Protection Agency has found that it is highly likely that exposure to asbestos in schools may increase the risk of developing numerous types of cancer, most notably asbesteosis and lung cancer. The Department of Education, in a soon-to-be-released study, found that 14,000 schools in the United States have asbestos-related hazards which seriously threaten the health of the Nation's children. The DOE estimates that it will cost approximately $100,000 per school to either remove or contain the toxic asbestos in public schools—at a total cost of $1.4 billion.

New York State alone has 691,000 square feet of asbestos hazards in its schools; 203 schools in 70 school districts outside of New York City have reported hazards, and New York City has reported 41,000 square feet of asbestos hazards. To remove the asbestos altogether would cost $100 million, and to simply contain it, by building a barrier around it, would cost between $5 to $6 million.

Senator HUDDLESTON'S amendment, therefore, would simply provide a minimal amount of much-needed assistance to the local school agencies and private schools to clean up asbestos hazards. The House of Representatives has appropriated $50 million in loans for this purpose, so it is not too much to ask the Senate to provide an equal amount. Considering the total cost of removing all of the toxic asbestos in the Nation's schools, $50 million seems almost insignificant. But it is highly significant to the local communities that will benefit from a safer school environment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I rise in support of this amendment and am pleased to be a cosponsor. I commend the Senator for his recognition of this important problem.

As the Senator made clear in his statement, his amendment provides funds pursuant to legislation enacted in 1980. That legislation was passed in response to the growing dangers that asbestos in our schools posed to the students and teachers in this country. Pursuant to that legislation, each school conducted an investigation for asbestos problems. That study was completed in June of this year and indicated that the problem permeated the entire Nation.

In my own State of Massachusetts, half of the schools reported the need for action to alleviate the dangers posed by asbestos according to a recent Massachusetts Department of Education survey. However, the total cost of these repairs would be only about $16 million.

The problem may however be much more serious than the recent study indicated. The EPA recently announced that as many as 80 percent of the schools systems have not complied with the survey required by the 1980 legislation. It is not hard to understand why. After all, if these schools reported asbestos dangers, the Federal Government was providing no aid in alleviating them. Already strapped local school budgets left little room for this effort. And if nothing was done, the danger to the students and teachers would remain or the school would be closed. The school systems are left with a dilemma: A shortage of schoolrooms or endaangering their students and teachers.

This amendment is designed to help some of the systems out of this dilemma. It is not a bailout or a handout. It goes out to the schools as a loan—low-cost to be sure—but a loan nevertheless. There is no reason why the Federal Government should not contribute a small amount to a nationwide effort to alleviate the asbestos problem.

This amendment will help the school systems in the Nation end the dangers that our students and teachers face everyday with asbestos. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Huddleston amendment which adds $50 million to the Labor-HHS-Education appropriations bill for fiscal 1984 to help school districts remove asbestos from their structures.

I commend my colleague from Kentucky for offering this amendment. It is an important and meritorious response to a problem that is of significant dimension in the United States. Pursuant to an act of Congress in 1980, all schools were required to survey their buildings to ascertain the presence of asbestos. As we know, asbestos is a substance that poses grave health hazards for those who are exposed to it, even in small amounts. It has been known since the 1930's that exposure to the substance causes severe lung scarring. More recent scientific evidence reveals that it has a direct cause-and-effect relationship with lung cancer and mesothelioma, or cancer of the pleural lining. A study concluded in 1980 by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health concluded that evaluation of all human data offers no evidence of a safe level of asbestos exposure.

The school study, which will be submitted to Congress shortly, will as I understand it show that 14,000 schools in this country have some degree of asbestos contamination, from severe to slight. Yet, school budgets are strained to the breaking point after reductions in Federal funds and have little prospect of assistance at the State level.

Mr. President, it seems only right that Congress provide a small amount of money to help schools begin the task of removing this hazardous substance from their facilities. The total cost of such an effort may amount to $1.4 billion nationally. Surely, the provision sponsored by my colleague is a modest attempt to begin remedying a problem which could in some cases pose severe health hazards for the children of this country.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I will be very brief.

I think it is important for my colleagues to understand that a new program is being created here. We are talking about startup costs. Total estimate costs could be anywhere from $700 million to $1 billion.

We asked for a report from the Department of Education which was due on October 1. In fact, Senator HUDDLESTON urged us to extend the report deadline so that we could have complete information at our disposal. That report is due within a week or so. I think we should examine the issue once we have the report in hand.

Finally, I add that we are going to have a difficult enough time persuading the administration to sign a bill with $4 billion in increases in discretionary programs without adding funds for new programs.

I commend the Senator from Kentucky for what he is trying to achieve. I am sure we are going to be working on the same side of the street on this particular issue.

Without the requisite knowledge in hand, I have to urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment and when the time comes, without trying to foreclose any debate, I will be moving to table the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I support the manager of the bill and oppose the amendment. I do so very reluctantly. It certainly is a worthy program. It is for an excellent purpose.

The difficulty is that this is a new program which could eventually cost $1.4 billion of which the Federal Government would have to pay 50 percent or $700 million.

Now, we are waiting on a report on the need for these funds from the Department of Education and that should come momentarily.

Obviously, the best solution it seems to me would be to go to conference with the $50 million in the bill as an open issue, which we will do, because the House of Representatives has approved $50 million. We would add nothing. And then if the report is favorable, we would accept the House position or at least consider that very seriously and probably accept it. If the report is unfavorable, we might want to wait.

At any rate, this is such a big commitment and I think it is so obviously out of line with what the administration has asked for that it might very well result in a veto of the bill and then we would lose all the compromises that we have been able to work out with the Office of Management and Budget in many other areas.

So I support the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, the manager of the bill.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I see no one in the chamber at this point wishing to speak. We yield back the remainder of our time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time have been yielded back, the question is one agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Not on the tabling motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been ordered on the amendment.

Mr. WEICKER. All time has been yielded back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I now move to table the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG) and the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) are necessarily absent.

Mr. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN) and the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE), is absent because of illness in the family.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE), would vote "Nay".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 35, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 279 Leg.]

So Mr. WEICKER's motion to lay on the table Mr. HUDDLESTON's amendment (No. 2279) was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will come to order.

The Senator from New Jersey.

AMENDMENT NO. 2282

(Purpose: To increase appropriations for certain education programs)

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY), for himself and Senators PELL, BENTSEN, LAUTENBERG, STENNIS, CHILES, BIDEN, KENNEDY, BYRD, MOYNIHAN, RIEGLE, DIXON, BINGAMAN, MATSUNAGA, DODD, LEVIN, EAGLETON, SARBANES, RANDOLPH, BURDICK, and SASSER, proposes an amendment numbered 2282.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Hearing no objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 40, beginning with "$3,480,000,000" in line 4, strike out through "$56,978,000" in line 7 on page 51 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$3,830,000,000 to become available on July 1, 1984, and remain available until September 30, 1985: Provided, That no funds shall be used for the purposes of section 554(a)(1)(B), $5,760,000 shall be available for purposes of section 555(d) to provide technical assistance and evaluate programs, $260,304,000 shall be available for the purposes of section 554(a)(2)(A), $146,520,000 shall be available for purposes of section 554(a)(2)(B), and $32,616,000 shall be available for purposes of section 554(a)(2)(C).

"For carrying out section 418 of the Higher Education Act, $7,500,000.

"SPECIAL PROGRAMS

"For carrying out the consolidated programs and projects authorized under chapter 2 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981; title IX, part C of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act; title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; the Follow Through Act; sections 1524 and 1525 of the Education Amendments of 1978; and Public Law 92-506, $528,367,000: Provided, That $450,655,000 to carry out the State block grant program authorized under chapter 2 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act shall become available for obligation on July 1, 1984, and shall remain available until September 30, 1985: Provided further, That $28,765,000 for the purpose of subchapter D of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act shall become available for obligation on October 1, 1983: Provided further, That $1,500,000 of the amount appropriated above for the purpose of Public Law 92-506 shall become available on July 1, 1984, and shall remain available until September 30, 1985.

BILINGUAL EDUCATION

"For carrying out, to the extent not otherwise provided, title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act and part B, subpart 3 of the Vocational Education Act, as amended, $139,000,000 of which $3,686,000 for part B, subpart 3 of the Vocational Education Act shall become available on July 1, 1984, and shall remain available until September 30, 1985.

SCHOOL ASSISTANCE IN FEDERALLY AFFECTED AREAS

"For carrying out title I of the Act of September 30, 1950, as amended (20 U.S.C. ch. 13), 565,000,000, of which $20,000,000 shall be for entitlements under section 2 of said Act, $10,000,000 shall be for payments under section 7 of said Act and $535,000,000 shall be for entitlements under section 3 of said Act of which 477,000,000 shall be for entitlements under section 3 (a) of said Act: Provided, That payment with respect to entitlements under section 3 (a) to any local educational agency described in section 3 (d)(1)(A) of said Act shall be at 100 per centum of entitlement except that payment to such agency attributable to children who reside on property which is described in section 403 (1)(C) of said Act shall be limited to 15 per centum of entitlement: Provided further, That payment with respect to entitlements under section 3 (a) to any local educational agency not described in section 3 (d)(1)(A) shall be ratably reduced from 100 per centum of entitlement except that payment to such agency attributable to children who reside on property which is described in section 403 (1)(C) shall be ratably reduced from 15 per centum of entitlement: Provided further, That payment with respect to entitlements under section 3 (b) of said Act shall be ratably reduced from 100 per centum of entitlement: Provided further, That no payments shall be made under section 3 to any local education agency whose payment under that section fails to exceed $5,000: Provided further, That the provisions of section 5 (C) of said Act shall not apply to funds provided herein: Provided further, That no payments shall be made under section 7 of said Act to any local educational agency whose need for assistance under that section fails to exceed the lesser of $10,000 or 5 per centum of the district's current operating expenditures during the fiscal year preceding the one in which the disaster occurred: Provided further, That payments under section 5(b)(2) of said Act shall not exceed 50 per centum of payments under sections 2 or 3 for the prior fiscal year: Provided further, That section 305 (b)(2) of the Education Amendment of 1974 shall not apply to funds provided herein.

"For carrying out the Act of September 23, 1950, as amended (20 U.S.C. ch. 19), $20,000,000 which shall remain available until expended, shall be for providing school facilities as authorized by said Act: Provided, That with the exception of $8,500,000 for section 10 of said Act and $8,500,000 for section 14 (a) and (b) of said Act, none of the funds contained herein for providing school facilities shall be available to pay for any other section of the Act of September 23, 1950, until payment has been made of 100 per centum of the amounts payable under sections 5 and 14(c) of said Act.

EDUCATION FOR THE HANDICAPPED

"For carrying out the Education of the Handicapped Act, $1,241,420,000, of which $1,071,850,000 for section 611 and $26,330,000 for section 619 shall become available for obligation on July 1, 1984, and shall remain available until September 30, 1985: Provided, That of the amounts appropriated $21,100,000 shall be for early childhood education; and $5,000,000 shall be for regional, vocational, adult and postsecondary programs: Provided further, That of the amounts appropriated $6,000,000 for secondary education and transitional services for the handicapped shall become available upon the enactment of legislation authorizing such activities: Provided further, That of the $3,100,000 appropriated for special studies $2,600,000 shall become available upon the enactment of legislation expanding existing requirements under this activity.

REHABILITATION SERVICES AND HANDICAPPED RESEARCH

"For carrying out, to the extent not otherwise provided, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, as amended, and the International Health Research Act of 1960, $1,111,400,000 of which $991,028,554 shall be for allotments under section 100(b)(1), $2,871,446 shall be for activities under section 110(b)(3), and $2,000,000 shall be made available for evaluation activities under section 14.

"VOCATIONAL AND ADULT EDUCATION

"For carrying out, to the extent not otherwise provided, the Vocational Education Act, and the Adult Education Act, $933,314,000 which shall become available for obligation on July 1, 1984, and shall remain available until September 30, 1985, except that $7,678,000 for part B, subpart 2 of the Vocational Education Act shall become available for obligation on July 1, 1984, and shall remain available until expended; Provided, That $6,500,000 for State advisory councils under section 105 of the Vocational Education Act shall first be used to provide to each State, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and Northern Mariana Islands an amount at least equal to the amount it received in the previous fiscal year: Povided further, That not to exceed $99,590,000 shall be for carrying out part A, subpart 3, of the Vocational Education Act: Provided further, That $2,243,100 shall be made available for the National Occupational Information Coordinating Committee.

"STUDENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

"For carrying out subparts 1, 2, and 3 of part A, and parts C and E of title IV of the Higher Education Act, $4,044,360,000 which

"EDUCATIONAL RESEARCH AND STATISTICS

"For necessary expenses to carry out sections 405 and 406 of the General Education Provisions Act, as amended, $63,978,000".

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD).

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, at this time, I ask unanimous consent that my name be added as a cosponsor of the amendment to be offered to the education appropriations bill by my colleagues, Senator BRADLEY and Senator HOLLINGS.

Their initiative gives substance to the action this body took in May when it approved the higher education budget ceilings contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. HOLLINGS, and this Senator.

I am proud to be associated with this amendment as a cosponsor and urge its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator's name will be added as a cosponsor.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD), and I rise to offer an amendment to add $559 million for elementary and secondary and higher education programs. This increase in funding will insure that we will be providing minimally adequate funding for these high priority programs. Joining us as cosponsors are Senators PELL, BENTSEN, LAUTENBERG, STENNIS, CHILES, BIDEN, KENNEDY, BYRD, MOYNIHAN, RIEGLE, METZENBAUM, DIXON, MATSUNAGA, DODD, LEVIN, EAGLETON, SARBANES, TSONGAS, RANDOLPH, BURDICK, BINGAMAN, and SASSER.

Our amendment provides increases over the levels included in the Senate-reported Labor/HHS/Education appropriations bill for the following programs: $350 million for chapter 1 compensatory education programs for the disadvantaged, $102 million for vocational and adult education, $17 million for research and graduate assistance, and $90 million for campus-based student aid, including the national direct student loan program, supplemental education opportunity grants, and college work-study.

Mr. President, the Senate is clearly on record for increased Federal aid to education. On May 6, 1983, after nearly 2 days of debate, the Senate voted 55 to 32 to add $1 billion for education in fiscal year 1984 above the levels approved by the Senate Budget Committee. The House-Senate conferees added an additional $0.2 billion for education. It is now time for us to deliver on the promises made this spring; the fiscal year 1984 appropriations for education should reflect the consensus reached on the first budget resolution.

It is my understanding that the Labor-HHS-Education appropriation bill reported out by the Senate Appropriations Committee falls far short of the levels of funding included in the budget resolution. Our amendment provides adequate funding for these vital programs but does not bust the budget. In fact, if this amendment is adopted, there will still be room in the budget for a supplemental later in the year for the science and math legislation which has not yet been enacted.

Mr. President, over the past 3 years, almost all of these programs have undergone significant spending reductions. We are attempting today to reverse that trend—to restore funds to the proven programs and to restore some stability and certainty to their operation.

The bulk of the funding is aimed at chapter 1, compensatory education programs for the disadvantaged, which has sustained a 22-percent real dollar reduction during the 1980 through 1983 period. At the present time, only 47 percent or 5.2 million of the 11 million eligible chapter 1 children are being served. Funding chapter 1 at the $3.48 billion level now in the Senate Appropriations Committee bill would provide for approximately 51 percent or 5.6 million of the eligible children. The modest funding level sought in this amendment is $3.83 billion and would allow 56.7 percent or 6.2 million of the eligible children to be served.

The amendment also increases aid for vocational and adult education programs. The additional $90 million for vocational education would enable States to reinstitute badly needed training programs for unemployed youth and adults. As a result of cuts in Federal funds, States report an estimated 600,000 students have been turned away from these programs.

The additional $12 million for adult education would increase the annual enrollment of adult basic education clients by over 200 million individuals.

Mr. President, $90 million is also included for need-based college student aid programs, including $40 million for college work study and $35 million for direct student loans—to bring funding to the same levels as the fiscal year 1983 appropriations—and $15 million for supplemental grants to rectify formula imbalances to assure that no higher education institution will have its allocation reduced because of the addition of some 700 schools to the program in recent years.

Finally, Mr. President, the amendment provides $17 million for research and graduate assistance, including $7 million for NIE and funds for international and graduate education. Also included is $1.95 million for graduate fellowships—which we rename the Jacob Javits Fellowship in honor of the Senator from New York. Javits Fellowships will be for graduate study in the arts, humanities, and social sciences. Funding for this program would provide a powerful public signal that we, as a society, value poetry as well as power. It also would serve to attract some of our best students to these fields. National graduate fellows represents an opportunity to support excellence and scholarship in areas currently not served by Federal aid programs and to assist outstanding students with substantial financial need.

Lastly, we provide $8.1 million for international education. The additional $8 million will raise funding for this program to $29 million in fiscal year 1984. This level of funding would merely restore the support originally available in this program which was level funded at $17 million from 1974 to 1980. International education is a very important program. The program currently supports over 90 national resource centers throughout our country, 700 individual fellowships for U.S. doctoral students, a variety of research projects, and outreach services for American businesses, schools, and the general public. I think it is worth noting that after the administration proposed the elimination of this program in fiscal year 1984, Secretary Weinberger wrote to Secretary Bell urging not only the restoration of the funds, but strongly recommending an increase in support. Rarely has our Nation been more dependent on expert research and training in the history, culture, languages, and policies of other nations. Additional funds for international education are urgently needed.

Mr. President, in March the Senate overwhelmingly adopted a resolution that I introduced opposing any further cuts in education programs. Adoption of that resolution was the first step in reversing the decline in Federal education aid. In May of this year, the Senate, by a vote of 55 to 32, voted to add $1 billion for education programs to the budget resolution. It is now time to press ahead and actually restore funding for high priority education programs.

Mr. President, the Bradley/Hollings/Stafford amendment is a step in the right direction, a step this country must take in order to maintain our position in the world. We need adequate funding for education in order to compete effectively in an increasingly competitive world environment.

In addition, I think the assistance for education for all of our children is essential to our own self-concept—how we think about ourselves. Should we say "no" to handicapped students? Should we say "no" to the student who happens to be growing up in the inner city, where the tax base is insufficient to support local revenues?

Mr. President, education has been the means in our society for at least the past 50 years, if not longer, for moving up the ladder of success. It is time to put some meat back on the bones. We need to restore funding for these valuable programs. We need to insure that future generations can successfully compete in the marketplace by assuring that students receive an adequate education.

Mr. President, I urge support of this Bradley-Hollings-Stafford amendment.

I yield to my distinguished colleague, cosponsor, and leader on this issue from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS).

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I am delighted to join with the distinguished Senator from New Jersey and the chairman of the Education Subcommittee, Senator STAFFORD, of Vermont, in trying to keep the commitment that we made earlier this year on the budget resolution. It was a fully debated matter relative to our investment in the human infrastructure. The distinguished Senator from New Jersey has touched a very sensitive point with respect to that investment. Title I for the disadvantaged is just another governmental program to many, perhaps most. But to me it is vital in providing education to all. Most of all it works.

I remember back some 20 years ago. We had the highest rate of dropouts in our own State of South Carolina. Among disadvantaged students some 87 percent were not completing the high school course.

With the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, we moved into this with a vanguard effort and provided at the Federal level—incidentally, without Federal control and all of the other particular alarms regarding Federal Government involvement and its responsibility—we moved in at the Federal level with a categorical grant program, title I for the disadvantaged.

That commenced in 1966, and some 16 years later we were able to measure the results in South Carolina. Last year, we found that rather than 87 percent dropout rate for disadvantaged students we found 67 percent were completing the high school course. This was at a time when, incidentally, the cry of the Reagan administration was to "stay the course." Here they were, telling everyone economically, "stay the course," stay the course in America. But to the little kids, the disadvantaged in the schools of America, the administration was telling some 2 million to quit the course. That was the impact of their budget cuts. Across the board—program after beneficial program aiding needy and disadvantaged students was cut. Fortunately Congress was able to hold back on some of the reductions, but the thrust of the Reagan education program policy cuts was realized.

Myself, Senator BRADLEY, Senator STAFFORD, and others have been very much alarmed about this particular trend. We realize that had we been able to maintain or stay the course, rather than an appropriation of some $15.2 billion now in this particular bill, actually the appropriation would be some $22.1 billion if fiscal year 1980 policy had been carried forward. The Carnegie Commission has found in its study and report on high schools, where the teachers have been cut some 22 percent, similarly at the Federal level spending for education has been cut some 22 percent. The result we face is a very, very diminishing return.

Perhaps even more significant than all the several education reports, is the report of the New York Stock Exchange which came out over 1 year ago, ahead of all of the educator-type reports. In it the blue chip corporations of America were trying to give the answer to the question, "Why the high productivity in Japan?" And the one-line answer the report concluded was, "elementary and secondary education."

Currently there is much ado and excitement about industrial policy in this country. Everyone immediately, ipso facto, goes running to high tech and money for "winners" and nothing for "losers" and "let us wait on the coming service economy."

On the contrary, and right to the point, the best industrial policy, Mr. President, to be launched right here on the Senate floor would be an overall bolstering of the quality of education in America. That is the best industrial policy. We will never increase the economic level of any until we first increase the education level of all.

So I am delighted to put in an amendment adding $559 million for elementary and secondary and higher education programs that is fiscally in step with the budget resolution yet much, unfortunately, behind in this Nation's commitment to the future. Look at the defense budget. At the very same time that we are putting in, Mr. President, millions of dollars for remedial education, the field manuals now are coming out in the form of funny books. We will not provide funds for the Department of Education. We will not give it to the disadvantaged. We will just wait for the disadvantaged to apply to the Volunteer Army. Then we give them an education. It is a rather cynical and ironic way to treat the problems of America in my judgment, and rather than putting it into the Defense Department we ought to be directly investing in the human infrastructure of this Nation by going along with this particular amendment.

Mr. President, today, Senator BRADLEY and I, along with many of our Senate colleagues, offer an amendment to increase funding for elementary, secondary and higher education. Specifically, the amendment will provide increases for ESEA Chapter I, vocational and adult education, the National Institute of Education and college student financial assistance. The funding increase for these programs is imperative in light of action taken by the Senate Appropriations Committee reporting the fiscal year 1984 Labor-HHS-Education bill with funding levels for education far short of the levels allowed in the first concurrent budget resolution.

Mr. President, by now, all are familiar with the current education crisis facing the United States. We have been repeatedly provided in-depth analyses of the problems in U.S. education: The National Commission on Education Excellence, the New York Stock Exchange, the Carnegie Foundation and other prominent groups have all submitted reports outlining the severe nature of the circumstances. As the National Commission accurately concluded, the United States has become a nation at risk with its very future threatened because of the steady decline in educational achievement over the past two decades.

This U.S. Senate has twice this year been given the opportunity to help stem the tide of educational decline in America—and twice it has risen to the occasion. During consideration of the first concurrent budget resolution in May, the Senate voted 55 to 32 to increase the funding levels for education in fiscal year 1984 by $1 to $15.9 billion. Again in June, the Senate approved 51 to 43 the conference report on the budget resolution which included an increase in funding for education of $0.2 to $16.1 billion. Thus, the Senate has recognized the paramount need to address the educational dilemma confronting America and it has recently displayed the will to correct the educational funding inadequacies that currently exist. However, we must not allow these recent gains to be silently forfeited; what we have provided in the budget resolution must be allocated at the appropriations level. We cannot afford to lose our momentum in support of U.S. education.

The amendment we offer today is a modest first step in the long-term investment we must make if we are to restore excellence to our system of education. The problems we face in education did not occur over night, nor will the solution we devise enable us to cure the problems over night. Instead, a gradual restoration of funding and a demonstrated commitment to the goal we all desire for our education system is the best course to take. We must be steady in our approach. The Bradley-Hollings amendment, Mr. President, is one positive step we can take now.

It is responsive and fiscally sound. In fiscal year 1980, the Federal Government spent a total of $15.6 billion for education programs. In fiscal year 1981, that figure was $15.2 billion. In fiscal year 1982, we spent $14.6 billion. And, in fiscal year 1983 the figure was $15.1 billion. If we were to provide funding for education programs at the fiscal year 1980 level adjusted for inflation, the figure for fiscal year 1984 would be $22.1 billion. I know and you know, that that sum is out of the question at this time. But, with the pressing needs we all must admit to, the $15.2 billion provided in the committee-reported Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education appropriations bill for fiscal year 1984 is inadequate and will delay us further in obtaining our goal of quality education for every child. Mr. President, the amendment before you will increase the level of funding for education programs in the bill to $15.7 billion—a level below the amount approved by the Senate in May during consideration of the Hollings-Stafford education amendment to the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1984. And, the increase Senator BRADLEY and I propose today is even lower than the amount approved when the conference agreement on the budget resolution was passed in June. Of course, I believe we should invest still more in these vital education programs, but am resigned to the realities of the time and the amendment we present, targeted for need-based, proven and beneficial programs for higher education and elementary and secondary education, will at least allow us to move forward in meeting some of the more immediate needs of our children. Our amendment meets the fundamentals, and it is realistic.

Mr. President, let me explain in a little detail just what this additional funding will mean for many needy and deserving students at both the elementary and secondary and higher education levels:

TITLE I

The title I program provides financial assistance to school districts with concentrations of children from low-income families. Its focus has been to provide compensatory educational programs that address the special needs of educationally deprived children—primarily for instructional services in reading, math and language arts. This Federal assistance is badly needed. The Department of Education reports that only 3 percent of the total moneys spent across the country for elementary and secondary education are title I moneys. But, they have accounted for almost one-third of per pupil expenditures in some of the Nation's poorest school districts. And, the title I program works. Recent studies by the Department and the National Assessment of Education Progress give the program glowing marks for upgrading math and reading achievement scores. The shortcoming of the program is, while it serves over 5 million children, it is available to less than half the students who are eligible for its valuable service. And, adjusting for inflation, the estimated constant dollar funding level for title I has fallen 21 percent between fiscal year 1980 and fiscal year 1983. Mr. President, the Bradley-Hollings amendment would provide a funding level in fiscal year 1984 of $3.830 billion—an additional $350 million over the committee-reported level of $3.480 billion. Funding title I at the committee recommended level of $3.480 billion would provide for approximately 51 percent or 5.6 million of the eligible students, while the modest increase we seek of $350 million will fund about 56.7 percent or 6.2 million of the 11 million eligible students. A vote for our amendment will provide an additional 600,000 needy children with an opportunity to move ahead.

NATIONAL DIRECT STUDENT LOAN (NDSL)

The additional $35 million provided in the Bradley-Hollings amendment for the national direct student loan (NDSL) program will restore the committee cuts in this program to last year's level. Mr. President, this program was created to stimulate and assist in the establishment and maintenance of revolving funds at institutions of higher education for the purpose of making low-interest loans to needy students. By providing long-term, low-interest loans to financially needy students, this Federal-institutional matching program has offered a system of credit to those persons who have difficulty securing loans from commercial lenders. Undergraduates may borrow up to $6,000 and graduate or professional students may borrow up to $12,000. In academic year 1982-83, 810,000 direct loans were made. If we do not act to restore funding for NDSL's to last year's level, Mr. President, 44,000 loans will not be provided to needy students.

SUPPLEMENTAL EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY GRANT (SEOG)

The supplemental educational opportunity grant program is targeted on undergraduate students with substantial financial need. It is especially critical for students attending higher priced public and independent institutions, and for single parents who are resuming their higher education or seeking retraining. Approximately 70 percent of the SEOG funds are awarded to students with family incomes of less than $15,000 per year. The committee recommendation increased SEOG funding to $370 million, serving 617,000 students. However, an appropriation of $385 million, serving 642,000 students, is necessary to rectify formula imbalances and to assure that no institution would have its allocation reduced because of the addition of some 700 schools to the program in recent years. Mr. President, the Bradley-Hollings amendment provides the additional $15 million necessary to meet this shortfall in funding and maintain basic equity in this program: 25,000 needy students will receive benefits.

VOCATIONAL AND ADULT EDUCATION

As a result of cuts in Federal funds, States report that an estimated 600,000 students have been turned away from vocational education job training programs. Approximately 7,000 teachers and 2,000 administrative positions have been cut and almost 2,000 job training courses eliminated. Mr. President, with unprecedented long-term unemployment and the need for specialized skills in the emerging high tech industries we cannot afford to weaken the Federal commitment to vocational education. Voc ed is working effectively with business, labor, and government to help meet training needs. While we see evidence of improvement in the economy, unemployment lags dangerously behind. In this environment, we can ill afford to weaken the business/labor/government network. The $90 million provided for vocational education in the Bradley-Hollings amendment will give the States the $825 million needed to reinstitute vital training programs for unemployed youths and adults.

Adult education programs assist adults in completing their secondary education and provide services or instruction for adults whose inability to speak, read, or write constitutes a substantial impairment to their ability to get or retain employment. The potential target population of adults who have not finished high school or its equivalency is in excess of 53 million, and the number of adults who lack basic skills to cope with the everyday demands of society is more than 20 million. Mr. President, how can an administration that promotes with such public relations fanfare the elimination of adult illiteracy propose such a paultry sum for adult education? The additional $12 million proposed by this amendment would increase the annual enrollment of adult basic education clients by over a quarter of a million individuals and bring the national enrollment total to 2,457,000 adults served. This is a long way from the 20 million potential, but it is a significant improvement.

The world of work is changing rapidly, and it is absolutely essential that people be prepared with skills that will enable them to compete and succeed in the job market. Vocational and adult education programs yield positive results that more than compensate for their cost to the Federal Government.

COLLEGE WORK STUDY

Mr. President, the purpose of the college work-study program is to provide part-time employment opportunities for students with financial need. The college work-study program, a Federal-institution cost sharing partnership, is popular both with students and the higher education institutions they attend. Not only does the program help students meet their college expenses, but participants also receive training and experience in their selected course of study through their part-time jobs. Still other students are employed under the program to support various campus services and activities that the institutions might not otherwise be able to provide. The college work-study appropriation for fiscal year 1983 was $590 million, including the $50 million in supplemental funds contained in the jobs bill, serving a total of 983,000 students. The committee-reported level of funding for fiscal year 1984 has been reduced to $550 million, serving only 917,000 students. The Bradley-Hollings amendment before you provides the same level as last year, $590 million, and will enable us to provide work-study opportunities to 66,000 more needy college students. This will allow us to serve the same number of students as last year.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF EDUCATION

The national commitment to educational excellence requires that we retain our support for educational research. The National Institute of Education is ready to meet this challenge and assist in finding ways to improve the quality of education in America. The Bradley-Hollings amendment provides the institute with sufficient funds to meet its continuation costs for ongoing research projects, center and laboratory support, and information clearinghouses. Given the eight major national studies, including the Excellence Commission report, it is critical that we have sound research based information to assist school improvement. Now is not the time, Mr. President, to reduce Federal support in this effort. I urge my colleagues to support the restoration of funding for NIE to last year's level of $55.6 million—a modest $7 million increase in funding over the committee-reported bill.

NATIONAL GRADUATE FELLOWSHIPS

The Bradley-Hollings amendment would add $2 million for national graduate fellowships for study in the arts, humanities, and social sciences. The 1980 Education Amendments authorized creation of up to 450 fellowships modeled on the highly successful National Science Foundation fellowships. Though we agree that emphasis on math and science education is needed, we also value the humanistic and artistic disciplines. National graduate fellowships represent an opportunity to support excellence and scholarship in areas currently not served by Federal aid programs.

INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION

Title VI of the Higher Education Act, which constitutes the entire Federal effort in international education, currently supports over 90 national resource centers throughout our country, 700 individual fellowships for U.S. doctoral students, a variety of research projects, and outreach services for American businesses, schools, and the general public. The addition of $8 million would merely restore the support originally available in this program. After the administration proposed the elimination of this program in fiscal year 1984, Secretary Weinberger wrote to Secretary Bell urging not only restoration of the funds, but an increase in support.

In conclusion, Mr. President, what we are doing today with the Bradley-Hollings amendment is honoring a pledge we made earlier when we passed the Senate budget resolution. The pledge we made to improve funding and improve access to equal educational opportunity for all the Nation's young people. The pledge we made to the many needy and disadvantaged students that they would not be forgotten and that we would make the commitment to insure their opportunity for an education and a chance to move ahead in life.

Mr. President, the lion's share of the Bradley-Hollings amendment would provide for a significant increase in title I funding over last year. Also included are substantial increases for vocational and adult education over last year's funding levels. At the higher education level, the money we add to the appropriations bill for work study, campus based loan programs and research and graduate assistance programs, only insures that they will be funded at the same level as last year. Our amendment is modest, but it is important. Mr. President, those in this body who state their commitment to education and the valuable benefits it confers on our society have the opportunity today to demonstrate their commitment. Those who believe that education is the wisest investment we can make will join with me in passing this amendment.

Senate reported level for education: $15.2 billion.
Bill with Bradley-Hollings amendment: $15.7 billion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, there is a commitment constructive in nature which has often been expressed by votes in the Senate in behalf of those realistic and necessary efforts to strengthen the educational system at various levels in this country.

I believe strongly in what is being attempted through the Bradley-Hollings amendment. I am gratified that I can be an ardent cosponsor of this measure. I shall not at this point, because of the time element, repeat that statement which has been so well given by those two principal sponsors, Senators BRADLEY and HOLLINGS.

I will take only just 2 or 3 minutes to turn to the $90 million set-aside for college work/study, direct loans, and the supplemental grant programs that serve the poorest of the poor.

There are 26 2- and 4-year colleges in West Virginia, 10 are private, 16 are public. There are more than 65 educational institutions in West Virginia counting business, nursing, and other proprietary schools. Eligible students at all these schools will be served by these funds. Work/study funds go to partially reimburse the colleges for wages paid to financially needy students up to 80 percent for part-time employment. Over the past year there has been an inevitable increase in the number of students eligible for these funds due in West Virginia, but also in other States, to the continuing high unemployment rates among the parents as well as among the college-age students themselves.

Mr. President, there is no disagreement among Members of Congress concerning the effectiveness of the college work-study programs. Students employed are helping to assure a pool of subsidized labor in support of a wide variety of campus and off-campus employment activities—and these jobs often provide students with training and experience in their selected course of study.

Mr. President, during my practically 40 years of service in Congress—14 in the House and 25 in the Senate—I have been a member of the Education Committees or the subcommittees, and I know that Senator BYRD understands the problems within West Virginia, just as I understand them, and other Senators understand them.

Supplemental grants, Mr. President, go to students who, for lack of financial means of their own or their families, would be unable to go to college at all.

Supplemental grants, above all, provide some measure of choice to those needy students whose aspirations and abilities direct them to higher-priced public and independent colleges and universities.

During the 1982–83 school year, Mr. President, West Virginia's institutions of higher learning received $4.369 million in college work-study funds. These dollars were allocated among public 4-year and 2-year; private 4-year and 2-year schools; and proprietary schools in West Virginia. The demand for additional college work-study funds was greater than the amount allocated to West Virginia, and many students were not served in my State.

Mr. President, I also support this amendment's provision making additional funds available for graduate programs.

Under the committee reported bill, I note with thanksgiving an increase for public service fellowships under title IX, but I note with regret a reduction in funding for other graduate programs. I deeply regret these cuts, for graduate fellowships and professional study. And, Mr. President, I particularly lament the defunding of both our law and education programs.

The law school clinical experience and the training for disadvantaged cost a mere $1 million each. Neither are budget-busters.

I just want the record to show that I object to the loss of these programs, not that the amendment will restore those funds. It is my hope that the House conferees will prevail in restoring the law and education funds.

I applaud this effort to increase funds for vocational and adult education as separate and distinct programs, with emphasis on funding existing categorical program set-asides. These set-asides for special programs for disadvantaged, consumer and homemaking, national significance programs and the like are more urgently needed than ever today.

The need for additional money for our title I programs is self-evident, and a proposition that should not be resisted by caring men and women in the Chamber today.

This coming year title I funds will be distributed according to the 1980 census data. Accordingly, many States will lose money, including West Virginia. Yet many more children are eligible today because of a long recession and high unemployment since 1980 census data was gathered. They have not been counted among the poor and poverty-level children of school age who should also be served under title I.

It is my hope that title I and its formula will be the subject of hearings soon, so that we can find some equitable way of serving all of our disadvantaged children.

Today's title I children are in their early and most formative years. If we leave them out now—they may never join their peers as high school and college graduates, in future years.

Mr. President, in the overall, this is a well-reasoned measure. This is an amendment which I hope will be adopted by the Senate and by the House and will be signed into law by the President.

Again, I commend Senator BRADLEY and Senator HOLLINGS and others who have given me the opportunity to join them in speaking and working for something that is highly important to the future of this country.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the Bradley-Hollings amendment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am a cosponsor of this amendment. I congratulate Mr. BRADLEY and Mr. HOLLINGS for leading the way with respect to the amendment. They are the chief sponsors.

Mr. President, the President of the United States tells us there is a crisis in education in our country. His commission and other prestigious commissions and foundations also tell us there is a crisis in education. These commissions and foundations also tell us that it will cost money to implement needed programs to cure this crisis. We must be willing to spend the money. As the President's commission so succinctly put the situation: "Excellence costs. But in the long run mediocrity costs far more."

Despite the clear need for support for education at all levels of government, the President has not sent us an education budget reflecting this. No; he sent us a budget this year, in fact every year since he has been in office, which makes deep cuts in Federal education programs. The Congress has not "bought" all these cuts. This year, in particular, the Senate, under the leadership of Senator HOLLINGS and Senator BRADLEY, not only refused to make the cuts the President requested, but also voted to add $1 billion in very needed funding for educational programs. Mr. HOLLINGS spearheaded that amendment to a vote in June, when we passed the budget.

Today, we are voting to fund that budget, and the programs included in this Bradley-Hollings amendment, programs such as chapter I, vocational and adult education, campus-based student aid, educational research, and graduate assistance, are all needed. They are all programs with good track records. They are programs that work. In the case of chapter I, the President's Secretary of Education tells us that chapter I works. He says that Department of Education studies show that low-achieving children who participate in chapter I programs do significantly better in school than similar children who do not participate.

So I hope we will vote today to fund these programs at the level we have already supported. I ask my colleagues to support this much-needed amendment.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, first of all, let me commend my friends, Senator BRADLEY, Senator HOLLINGS, Senator BYRD, and Senator RANDOLPH for articulating their commitments to the various programs contained in the amendment.

Let me say, also, that it is not at all out of character for them to speak as they are speaking. Indeed, let the record show that most of the time, if not all of the time, we have been on the same side of the issue.

However, we have the possibility of achieving a small historical victory here this afternoon—nothing major, but significant, in the sense that if this bill is passed, and if we are able to achieve accommodation with our friends across the way in the House, and then prevail upon the President to sign our work product, we will, for the first time in 5 years, have a bill that addresses itself to matters of education, health, science, and job training. And, let me add, we will have acted in a manner that is far preferable to the continuing resolution process.

I know the temptations, as well as anybody else, in terms of adding to appropriations bills in order to highlight and accentuate our commitments to various national priorities. But no Senator can take any satisfaction from the fact that the work of the U.S. Senate, in effect, is being dictated by the executive branch or by our inability to make the process work.

There is abortion language in this bill. It is the language proposed by Senator EAGLETON in committee. In effect, it reiterates the present law, or what is referred to as the Hyde language.

When this bill was passed on the other side, abortion language was added which eliminated even the exception for saving the life of the mother if it is endangered by a pregnancy.

For the last week, I have explored the possibilty of reinserting, as an exception, rape and incest, which I thought was a travesty when it was deleted on the floor of the Senate. My latest vote count shows that I can probably have that exception for rape and incest reinserted into the bill language.

However, I have to discipline myself conceptually, no matter how strong my feelings, just as I ask everyone here to discipline themselves monetarily if we are to reassert our authority in the legislative process.

I disagree with nothing that has been said by the proponents of this amendment. Maybe I even could rise to the occasion and make as good a speech.

Mr. BYRD. Better.

Mr. WEICKER. But the fact is that we are standing on the threshold of achieving legislation whereby the Senate of the United States is a full partner and an independent partner in setting the funding priorities of this Nation.

That must have some sort of a dollar value, also.

I have talked with my friends in education as they have tried to persuade me to support this amendment and indeed they have been good to me, both in terms of their advice with respect to my legislative duties and in terms of their political support. But I asked them the same question about whether or not the time has come for us to be in a position where we can examine the needs of our times and act upon them, or whether or not we can meet the needs of our times with legislation that is 5 years old.

Mr. President, the appropriations process as it deals with education, science, and health is 5 years old. It has been brought up to date by cost of living or inflationary increases, not by addressing itself to the substance or the priorities. It may be that some of the ongoing programs should not be included on our national priority list. Maybe other matters have now come to the forefront which deserve added emphasis.

For example, maybe it is that the battle over polio was won but a new battle over AIDS has begun, and yet—I refer to this in a figurative sense—we are stuck with a prior allocation for polio so that we cannot do what needs to be done for AIDS. Again this is just a hypothetical situation, one that illustrates what is wrong with the continuing resolution process.

In any event, I read the letter in this Chamber to Senators this morning describing what the administration thinks of the Senate bill. It is almost a veiled threat that implies unless we in the Senate reach the House level, the administration is not going to accept this bill. The administration simply will not accept the additional funding that has been allocated to many of these areas described by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey. The House wants to stick to its level.

And now there are those who want to add on to programs here on the Senate floor. And those of us who are trying to once again set the process and the priorities back on track—and I will get to that in a minute—are caught in the crossfire and so nothing logical, practical can be achieved.

Both in the funding sense and in a conceptual sense I deeply believe that so much more needs to be done in the areas of health, science, education, and so on. Yet, I have been held at bay by a coalition of Republicans and Democrats on these issues who thought the strength of the Nation was its weaponry rather than the minds of its people. I along with a handful of other Senators have been held at bay by both sides of the aisle.

So no one can take sole credit for blocking anything or having been responsible for not achieving our national priorities. Everyone can take a little share of it, but now we have a chance to bust out of the ring.

The full Appropriations Committee last week—briefly let me just tell the Senate what we did—reported out the bill. In it, we provided $1.7 billion over the budget request, more than half a billion dollars in increases over the fiscal year 1983 level, about $80 million more than the House for comparable programs.

The bill just reported out of our committee is, for the most part, very generous to education. However, it may not be as generous as many of us would like, or as generous as we ultimately will be when fiscal 1984 is completed. However, I think we have provided important increases in the large majority of programs under the jurisdiction of the Department of Education.

For example, our bill increases funding for chapter 1 education for the disadvantaged by $280 million over last year. It is the same as the House level and $466 million over the President's request. It is also the full amount authorized by law until such time as the law is changed. The amount requested in this amendment for chapter 1 is well in excess of the current authorization.

For student financial assistance, based on our discussions with students and families and college and university officials, we determined that the Pell grant is a high priority program because it removes the economic barriers to post secondary education. Accordingly, we provided $2.8 billion for Pell grants, which is $381 million over last year's level, $181 million over the House recommendation for fiscal 1983. And we have also raised the maximum award allowable by $200 per eligible student for total student assistance programs that exceeds last year's level by $336 million—the budget request was for $437 million—and the House level by $141 million.

So, I do not make any apology for the Appropriations Committee's education recommendation.

Let us understand one thing, that if the proponents of this measure succeed and it becomes a part of the bill and the bill is then vetoed and we are back to the continuing resolution, then we are at levels lower than what is now being proposed in this Senate bill.

Who wants to take on this responsibility? Who wants that one on their head? Continuing resolution levels will be lower.

My job is to deliver, not to talk about, assistance to the retarded, to the disabled and disadvantaged and the young kids going to college. I have to deliver. I have not delivered and our colleagues have not delivered on this matter in this Chamber for 5 years. That is what is at issue here with this vote, not whether or not a particular Senator is committed to education. What are Senators going to deliver? What will they have to show for it after we finish with this process—a veto confrontation? If so, hooray for the politicians from both sides, and for the year 1984 we will roll up a 6th year in the continuing resolution.

I suppose one thing I have always been blessed by is the fact that Connecticut is such a small State that to me these have never been numbers or programs. Rather, I look into the faces of the people of my State, and after I do I come back down in this Chamber and speak as I do.

Mr. President, I hope that we will be able to support the committee on this issue and be proud in the work product.

Any man of woman who has not been to the State legislature can sit out there and raise cane. But, this is the top of the profession. That is what differentiates the man who has been around 15 and 20 years from the rookie, that he can deliver. The rookie can talk. But can he deliver?

So I hope that we just do that, deliver, because there are an awful lot of people out there who have been left standing for an awfully long time and everywhere they look, everyone is playing the political game. Everywhere they look there is a lot of philosophical rhetoric.

I am not referring now to the average man. I am just talking about the general conduct of this matter. I might add with 5 years of being on a continuing resolution I think the matter is ipsa loquitur. It speaks for itself. And I do not think it speaks in the best traditions of the Senate or the ideals of the Nation.

Mr. President, I do not want to cut off any comments. I also wish to lay my cards on the table, and I will do this in a way so as not to cut anyone off. However, Mr. President, I will make a point of order that the pending amendment is in violation of rule XVI, paragraph 1, in that it increases appropriations already contained in the bill which does not carry out the provisions of any existing law, treaty, resolution passed by the Senate this session or budget estimate.

I repeat I do not in any way want to cut off additional comments by my friends but as soon as that comment is forthcoming I would appreciate it if we could get on with the many other priorities that are contained in this bill.

(Mr. COCHRAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, was my good friend finished?

Mr. WEICKER. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I am not going to speak for very long. I want to commend the distinguished Senator who just spoke, the chairman of the subcommittee that produced the appropriations bill that is before us, and make these three or four points.

The fact that we have been operating on a continuing resolution for 5 years would be enough of a subject for a couple of hours of debate here this afternoon in terms of what that continuing resolution process has done to good programs and to the normal legislative process that is understood by most Americans.

But I am not going to do that. I am not going to talk about the need to get a full appropriations bill that the President will sign—that will once again establish program priorities in a meaningful way and permit the management of programs in an orderly manner.

It is obvious that we are on the threshold of doing that, but it would not be enough to stand here and make that argument when we are discussing some of the most desirable and needed programs—education programs—for our people. In this instance it is not enough to stand here and argue as a matter of procedure that the committee bill is a good thing. Senator WEICKER would not be here doing that, Senator HATFIELD would not be in support of that, and I can assure you the Senator from New Mexico would not be on his feet arguing if that was the only argument.

Let me also tell you that, in addition, we are on the threshold of getting a 9-percent increase in these programs in a year where inflation is averaging 2.6 percent. That is not bad. There are some around who say that is not enough. Well, it is pretty hard to say what is enough. I ask, is 9-percent growth with less than 3 percent inflation enough in a year when we are only going to have a $200 billion deficit? I think so.

But when you take all the education programs that the distinguished floor manager brings to this Senate for our adoption, one might also ask what did the House do? For those who are worried about how they might be ranked or rated by some outside groups looking at this let me tell you that those groups are going to have to rate the U.S. House very poorly because this bill, without the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, Senator BRADLEY, and his cosponsor, Senator HOLLINGS, is $1 billion higher for education programs than the House, without the amendment of $559 million in budget authority that they ask for. The Senate bill is higher in budget authority for education programs than the U.S. House. How can people argue, "We are not committed enough to education," if we add $1 billion more in educational programs and are on the brink of getting a bill through conference which is very probably going to be signed for the first time in 5 years and add a bit of order to the processes of the Congress.

As a matter of fact, if the American people understood how we have messed up the authorizing, appropriating and budget processes in terms of adding confusion instead of certainty, they would probably find that sufficient to throw some of us out of office, and they would be justified. Each process blames the other one around here. Appropriations Committee blames the Budget Committee and the authorizing committees blame both. But the truth of the matter is that we are on the brink of getting appropriations bills in each of the 13 areas of Government for the first time in a decade.

I support the committee bill for this area of Government which has been 5 years without a bill. The bill that is before us is $1 billion more than the House, allows 9 percent growth in education programs, will go to conference and change—presumably the distinguished Senator from Connecticut will fight for the full billion; in each category he will argue in conference for the higher figure rather than the lower figure. I note that many times that lower figure is in the House bill and not the Senate bill.

I have a statement that summarizes this matter and a schedule of the major portions of this bill and I ask unanimous consent they be made a part of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POSSIBLE FLOOR AMENDMENT TO H.R. 3913, THE DEPARTMENTS OF LABOR, HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, AND EDUCATION, AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1984

SPONSOR

Senators Bradley and Hollings.

DESCRIPTION

The amendment would add $559 million in budget authority and $46 million in outlays for a variety of education programs, including: $350 million for Chapter I; $102 million for vocational and adult education; $90 million for campus-based student aid; and $17 million for NIE, international education, and graduate fellowships.

BACKGROUND

Senators Bradley and Hollings argue that the Congress supported substantial increases in funding in the FCR for education and that this money should be included in the Continuing Resolution.

BUDGET IMPACT

This bill would increase spending under H.R. 3913 by $559 million in budget authority and by $46 million in outlays. H.R. 3913, as reported by Committee, exceeds the 302(b) outlay ceiling by $0.1 billion.

Passage would delay conference and jeopardize enactment of the bill.

The Senate Labor-HHS-Education Appropriation bill as reported from Committee increased the appropriations for discretionary elementary and secondary education programs by $940 million over the amount appropriated in the fiscal year 1983 continuing resolution.

The levels recommended by the Appropriations Committee represent a 9 percent increase over the fiscal year 1983 continuing resolution. Inflation from August 1982 to August 1983 has been only 2.6 percent. Education programs will be funded at a rate of 2½ times better than inflation.

COMPARISON OF EDUCATION FUNDING LEVELS: 1983 CONTINUING RESOLUTION AND H.R. 3913, THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR–HHS–EDUCATION APPROPRIATIONS BILL

[Dollar amounts in millions]

	Fiscal year—		Percentage growth	Dollar difference
	1983 continuing resolution	1984 Senate bill
Impact aid	$480	$585	+22	+$105
Education of the handicapped	1,110	1,241	+12	+131
Vocational and adult education	824	831	+1	+7
Chapter I, compensatory education	3,168	3,488	+10	+320
Chapter II, State block grant	534	528	−1	−6
Bilingual education	138	139	+1	+1
Student financial assistance	3,568	3,954	+11	+386
Higher education programs	398	396	−1	−2
Total	10,220	11,162	+9	+942

Mr. DOMENICI. My last comment refers to an argument that has already been made and will probably be made again by others that because the targets in the first budget resolution are higher than the budget authority appropriated by the Appropriations Committee bill which is before us, we have some almost automatic responsibility to go up to the budget target numbers.

This issue does not need a lot of discussion because time after time we have been reminded on the floor of the Senate, and rightly so, that a budget resolution is not a mandate, it is a target; that certainly because the Senate votes on the target numbers in a budget resolution it is in no way binding this institution or the Congress or even more directly the Appropriations Committee; that all we are doing is saying that these are the outside spending limits, and that after the Appropriations Committee has divided the money we are really saying that the budget is binding only as far as the totals of the whole budget, not the specific program levels.

We have been reminded of that argument by those who would spend more. If you seek to use the budget to say "Don't spend more than is targeted," I would merely say it applies both ways—as a matter of policy, as a matter of precedent, and as a matter of interpretation—it applies both ways. It means if you want to spend somewhat less than was targeted there is nothing substantively and legislatively binding about our having had some votes heretofore on the issue earlier in the budget process.

So I want to commend the distinguished Senator from Connecticut. This is a difficult issue for him. I think if he had his druthers he would be for adding almost anything that anybody could offer on this bill because he likes the programs, is that not so, Senator? I note for the record he is nodding his head affirmatively. He has been a staunch supporter of most of them, and he would like to add $500 million and maybe $1 billion to the bill, but he also understands what has been said here today eloquently by him and hopefully in some small way by the Senator from New Mexico that we ought to do something for the education programs, increase their appropriations and at the same time produce a bill that the President will sign to give some congressional authority and direction to those programs. We ought to do that and we ought not to throw this opportunity out the window.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, let me just say to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut that we have been in a lot of battles together on these exact same issues and he has always been in the trenches fighting for the programs that are embodied in this amendment. I hold great respect for his efforts and for his toughness when it came to the battles on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

Let me also say that the Appropriations Committee bill before us does well in a number of education areas, as the Senator from Connecticut just pointed out: In Pell grants, in vocational rehabilitation, and in handicapped education. Let me salute him for what he has managed to already include in this appropriations bill.

Let me also say that I understand what he is saying about continuing resolutions. Although I do not serve on the Appropriations Committee, I have seen these continuing resolutions move through here over the last several years, and I do understand the point he is making about his desire to get a regular appropriations bill passed and signed by the President. I empathize with the instutional frustration that he feels because we have not gotten an education appropriations bill over the last several years. Let me tell the Senator from Connecticut that I not only salute him as an advocate over the years but that I also respect his sensitivity to our institutional prerogatives.

But these reasons do not outweigh the need for additional educational aid. Let me at this point begin to disagree with the Senator from Connecticut and say that the children are important, too, and I think that $350 million for chapter 1 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act is an important national priority that this body has gone on record supporting even in the most difficult budget times.

Chapter 1 is an important national priority. This program money goes to districts that cannot afford to pay for teachers and aids to provide remedial services to children who are falling behind. The question is, are we going to deny disadvantaged children the right to the same education or at least the chance to get that education? Are we going to say to them, "No, you cannot climb up the ladder of upward mobility because we could not provide sufficient money for a remedial teacher to come into your class"? Are we going to say, "We will pass over you for a few years and hope that you can catch up when you are in the seventh or eighth grade"? We know, Mr. President, that by that time it is simply too late.

Let me say that while I respect the Senator's comments about institutional prerogatives and about his historical commitment to education issues, I offer this amendment because of my commitment to the children who are in those schools and who need our attention, our support, and our recognition.

Let me also say that some portray these budget battles as a battle between parties. This is not the case. This is a bipartisan amendment cosponsored by the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) and an amendment that some Republicans will support because they recognize the need.

I am not saying the Senator from Connecticut does not recognize the need for increased education aid. I say he is caught in a fight with the administration.

Mr. President, the people in my State are telling me to act for what is best for our children and the children of the next generation. Of course people are saying that they want higher standards, they want to get back to the basics, but they are also saying they want adequate funding for education.

The Senator from New Mexico asked, "What is enough?" Indeed, if this amendment is not adopted we will be funding education at the exact same level that existed in 1981. In real terms we have witnessed a significant cut in funding for education.

So, Mr. President, I urge that we move to adopt this amendment and respond to our better instincts and not get caught up in institutional prerogatives. While I respect the Senator from New Mexico and his comments about the budget resolution, the fact is that even if our amendment is adopted, education funding will still be under the level in the budget resolution. Why is the budget resolution only an iron law when we are over it but when we try to fund programs at the levels in the budget it is no longer viewed as relevant to the discussion?

Mr. President, I would say that we should act on this amendment and express clearly that we are interested in the education of our children. Do we face the prospects of a veto? We do not know. Perhaps. If that is so, then we know where the President stands on this kind of issue.

Mr. President, I do not think the President would veto this, and I would urge us to take that chance because it is in the interest of the people in our country and certainly our children.

Mr. CHILES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRADLEY. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I want to associate myself with the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey and his remarks.

There is an urgent need to get on with the conference on the vocational rehabilitation bill. The budget resolution has ample room for moving the authorization celings for chapter I, handicapped education, voc ed, and other key programs upward. The House has increased those ceilings in its voc rehab bill. We are leaving everything in limbo so long as we delay the conference.

Education has the public focus we need to put our public schools back on top where they should be. We should be willing to stand up and make the tough decisions about the investment we are willing to make for education, through the appropriations process.

I have been particularly concerned about the bind we are in on vocational education. We are right up at the $735 million ceiling under current law and on the 1984 bill. This is a program that got no increase under the jobs bill package earlier this year. Here we are with over half the black youth in this country unemployed, overall unemployment at 9.5 percent and we did nothing in the package for job training programs for this program. That is like having a three-legged stool with only two legs.

We are going to have to get the authorization ceilings raised. But there is no more time to waste in following through on the commitment we made to education in the budget resolution.

It is important to remember that the programs we are talking about in this amendment are the education programs that are working—chapter I for disavantaged students, vocational education, campus-based student aid. They are targetted in on the students with the greatest needs and the most important national priorities in education.

We ought to fish or cut bait and be willing to vote up or down on this issue.

Mr. PELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. BRADLEY. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I would like to congratulate and commend the Appropriations Committee for their leadership and foresight in recommending the $2.8 billion appropriations for the Pell grant program and the maximum award of $2,000. I am well aware of how well we fared in the overall bill. All that I ask in regard to this program is that we allow the current law to stand regarding college costs as is provided for in the Bradley amendment.

Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment sponsored by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY). I am proud to be a cosponsor of this amendment, for it provides critically important increases in a series of key education programs.

The modest increase of $350 million in the chapter I program of educational aid to children from economically disadvantaged families, for instance, would enable this highly successful and nationally acclaimed program to serve another 600,000 young children.

The $12 million sought for adult education would mean that an additional quarter of a million men and women would receive basic skills instruction. With adult illiteracy of very severe proportions, this increase is an absolute necessity.

The $90 million increase for vocational education would permit reinstitution of programs that have been eliminated as a result of Federal budget cuts—cuts that have resulted in an estimated 600,000 students being turned away from needed education and training programs.

The increases sought in the campus-based student aid programs—programs such as work study, supplemental grants and direct loans—would provide help to another 169,000 students nationwide.

In addition, there is small provision in the Bradley amendment that is of very considerable importance to some 577,000 public college students throughout America. If the Bradley amendment does not pass, these 577,000 students will receive no benefit whatsoever from the otherwise very encouraging increases provided for the Pell grant program in the committee bill.

In other words, the advantages would go to those who attended more expensive colleges, the better-off youngsters. The very people who the committee wants to help are the kinds who could not be helped if they are in public colleges.

The committee bill would limit the college costs that can be covered by Pell grants to 50 percent, even though current law as provided in section 411(a)(2)(B) of the Higher Education Act of 1980 provides that college costs covered by Pell grants should rise to 55 percent when the maximum award is between $1,900 and $2,000. The provision in the Bradley amendment would simply retain the language of the Higher Education Act of 1980, and would permit the cost of attendance to be pegged at 55 percent.

This is very important for students who normally would be eligible for a maximum Pell grant award, but who receive less because they attend a relatively low-cost institution of higher learning. A student, for example, who would be eligible for a maximum award, but who attends an institution that cost only $3,000 a year, can receive a maximum of only $1,500 under the committee bill. Under the provisions of current law, however, that same student would receive a grant of $1,650. In this period of everincreasing educational costs, I would content that that $150 could be very important to a needy student's educational plans and pursuits.

Mr. President, I want to commend the members of the Appropriations Committee for their leadership and foresight in recommending a $2.8 billion appropriation for the Pell grant program and a maximum award of $2,000. All I would ask in regard to this important program is that we allow the current law provisions regarding college costs to stand, as is provided in the Bradley amendment.

I urge my colleagues to support the Bradley amendment. It is a prudent step toward strengthening the small, but crucial Federal role in education at a time when strengthening education at every level should be a top national priority and concern.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

I commend those who work here year after year, including the chairman of the authorizing committee and those on the Appropriations Committees, who work on this problem. I know it is cared for and they know the facts. They have made known the facts today. I know that this amendment applies to many at the local school levels where the problem is in our States, because I have been there. I went for the purpose of finding out the need, the extent of that need, and what could be done about it. Several of us this year have made a special effort to cover this particular field and I regret exceedingly that we were not able to sustain—I hope we can yet—the amount that we ourselves put in the budget for these very subject matters here, these divisions of vocational education and title I and others that go right to this school level.

Mr. President, when we pass this amendment, as I am told, and it is not for a great sum of money, although it sounds like it—when you divide it among the needs of these 50 States and apply it to these children, it is relatively small—we are merely reiterating what we have already done in passing on the budget level of these various subjects here.

We have worked around where it did not reflect itself in the appropriations bill, and no one is to blame for that. But here is the chance and this is the time to bring about that remedy. It is certainly overdue, Mr. President.

I come from a State that is interested greatly and has recently greatly improved its program. I guarantee that they will carry their part of the load with this money that is in here. I thank the Senator for yielding me time. I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment of Senator BRADLEY and am pleased to be a cosponsor. This amendment does one quite simple thing—it increases the funding level of several important education programs to the levels accepted by this Congress in the bipartisan budget resolution for fiscal year 1984.

This amendment is not a budget buster. In our budget resolution—accepted by a bipartisan majority—we included $16.1 billion for education. That amount would have permitted Federal education programs to adjust to inflationary increases over the last 3 fiscal years as well as to recover from the cuts imposed in the 1981 Budget Reconciliation Act.

Those of my colleagues who take their cues for the fiscal 1984 education budget from the President's budget may consider this a budget buster. I would remind them that this Congress overwhelmingly rejected that budget, just as it overwhelmingly rejected his budget last year. This Congress, in fact, has repeatedly rejected the President's recommendations on education and rightly so. They would mean a disaster for the American public education system.

The numbers do not lie. Let us look at those numbers for a moment. The President proposed a budget for Federal education programs of $12.6 billion in 1982—a cut of 16 percent. He proposed a budget of $10.5 billion in 1983—a cut of almost 30 percent. He proposed a budget of $13.2 billion this year—a cut of almost 13 percent. In each and every case, including this year in the first budget resolution, Congress has rejected those figures.

I would emphasize that in no way would this amendment return all these programs to their pre-Reagan budgetary levels. According to the Congressional Research Service, that would require at least $1 billion more for these programs.

If we look at the individual programs included in this amendment, its need becomes obvious. The chapter I program, which provides compensatory education for disadvantaged children, has been reduced in real terms by over 20 percent since 1980. Between 5 and 6 million children depend upon this program for important educational services. Study after study has demonstrated its success in meeting the needs of these students. Yet its services have been cut by almost one-quarter during the Reagan administration. With this amendment we could minimize the impact of Ronald Reagan's draconian budget cuts on the disadvantaged students.

A recent report by the American Federation of Teachers and the AFL-CIO dramatically illustrated what these budget cuts have meant to cities and towns across the Nation.

Mr. President, if this amendment is rejected, we are asking the schools of this Nation to survive on hollow promises and empty words. That does not buy new schoolbooks. That does not provide students with access to computers. That does not provide teachers or other school employees the pay they deserve.

In the first budget resolution, we promised the students, the parents, the teachers, and the administrators of our schools more financial help. It is time for us now to put our money where our mouth was.

I recognize the desire of the leadership in this body and in the House to pass a bill that will not be vetoed by the President. I particularly sympathize with the position of the manager of this bill in negotiating his way through the minefield that this appropriations bill generally represents. But I also believe that we have an obligation to meet when it comes to education. And I believe that this obligation can only be met on this bill.

I also understand the desire of my colleagues on the Appropriations Committee to keep legislation off appropriations bills. I stand ready to follow an alternate approach. I have waited for over 3 weeks for the Republican leadership to appoint conferees to meet with the House on the differing versions of the vocational rehabilitation reauthorization bill. The House version of that bill includes a title which would increase the authorization ceilings for a number of education and domestic programs. The Senate should have the opportunity through its conferees and through floor consideration of the conference report to work its will on that title. However, members of the majority party in this body apparently have decided to prevent that.

Mr. President, I would prefer to follow that route in considering increases in authorization levels for these programs. I firmly believe that a majority of this body will join the House in supporting increases in the authorization levels of these programs, as I hope that a majority of this body will support the increases in this amendment. They will do so because I believe this body has come to recognize the importance of programs such as chapter 1, WIC, and low-income energy in the lives of so many Americans across this Nation.

It is important, too, that we not forget that handicapped Americans depend upon the rehabilitation programs. These Americans need action on this legislation, not further delay. To force this action, I and 8 other members of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, which has jurisdiction over this bill, were joined last week by 14 other Senators in a letter to the majority leader. We asked him to name conferees on this bill, but as yet we have received no positive response. This situation leaves us with no real alternative—we must reluctantly offer the amendment to this bill.

Before I close, Mr. President, I would like to draw my colleagues' attention to another provision in this amendment. This amendment would increase the maximum percent of college costs that could be paid by a Pell grant from 50 percent to 55 percent. The appropriations bill already includes a provision raising the maximum Pell grant award from $1,800 to $2,000. Without an increase in the percent of college costs, however, millions of Pell grant recipients enrolled in colleges and universities would not receive the benefit of the increase in the maximum Pell grant award. About 1.2 million students have their Pell grants reduced by the half-cost provision. These students need an increase in their Pell grants due to the rising costs of college just as much as those attending private schools.

Mr. President, I sympathize with the desire of the distinguished floor manager to pass a bill that can be signed by the President. Like him, I am tired of running this Government by continuing resolution. But let us not place form before substance. Let us not allow our desire for a bill to cloud our understanding of the needs of our schools. I urge my colleagues to set aside their doubts about this procedure. We will have no other opportunity to fulfill the promises that we made in our budget to this Nation's parents, teachers, and students. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY) in support of this amendment to restore funding to a number of educational programs and to add funds to others.

Our educational system has been the subject of major national attention in the past few months. Clearly there is much that needs to be done to improve the quality of education in this country.

At the same time there is much about our educational system that deserves praise. Unfortunately one program which exemplifies the Federal effort in education is threatened by the proposed level of funding in this appropriation bill; the National Institute of Education (NIE).

In my home State of Michigan several projects funded through NIE have added significantly to the body of knowledge concerning teaching and learning. One, the Institute for Research on Teaching at Michigan State University, was singled out by Secretary of Education Terrel H. Bell for a special certificate of excellence in May of this year. The certificate of excellence recognizes the institute for its many accomplishments, including conducting research that addresses the most significant problems of contemporary teaching; bringing educators and researchers together to collaborate; encouraging scholars from diverse disciplines to study collectively the problems of classroom teaching and learning; and describing and sharing new research on teaching.

Without this amendment this program along with others may well be lost; as NIE is one of the areas slated for cuts in fiscal year 1984.

This is only one of the many excellent programs included in this amendment, all of which deserve our support. I urge my colleagues to join in voting for these additional funds.●

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor of the Bradley amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the Hollings/Bradley amendment to add $599 million for education programs, I rise to urge my colleagues to adopt this amendment which is vital to our national education system.

Mr. President, this amendment would, in effect, bring the fiscal 1984 education appropriations provided in this bill closer to the level already approved by this very body during consideration of the first budget resolution earlier this year. I urge my colleagues not to backtrack now on the positive action we took just 6 months ago, but instead to continue to give education the national attention it needs and deserves.

We are all aware of the findings of the National Commission on Excellence in Education, a Commission appointed by Education Secretary Terrel Bell. This report, and subsequent widely publicized reports, warn us that American education has deteriorated so drastically in the past two decades that our very future as a nation and a people is threatened. It points to a rising tide of mediocrity which has swept over our national educational system and reveals startling statistics about illiteracy in this country. I am convinced that the facts revealed in these several reports were largely responsible for the Senate vote in May to add $1 billion to the budget resolution targets for education spending.

Mr. President, these facts are still threatening our Nation; it is still true that some 23 million American adults are functionally illiterate by the simplest tests of everyday reading, writing, and comprehension. It is still true that college board achievement tests show consistent declines in recent years and it is still true that about 13 percent of all 17-year-olds are functionally illiterate. In other words, it is still true that we must provide adequate national leadership to reverse the dangerous academic trends which threaten not only our educational system, but our political and economic security as well.

The amendment we are offering will add funding for education programs for the disadvantaged, for vocational and adult education, for student assistance programs and for research and graduate assistance. It will bring education spending more in line with the already approved budget targets. I believe that the budget targets are premised on a minimum funding level necessary to make a start toward restoring to America a top quality educational system. Indeed, it is my hope that national attention will continue to focus on this crucial area this year, next year, and in years to come. We cannot again turn our backs on this issue and be swept by a rising tide of mediocrity. This amendment is a step in the right direction.

I urge my colleagues to adopt this amendment which represents a responsible investment in our youth and our future.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to express my strong support for the Bradley-Hollings-Stafford amendment. This amendment increases the Labor-HHS-Education appropriations bill by $559 million to provide additional funding for education programs, including ESEA chapter 1, vocational and adult education, the National Institute of Education, international education, national graduate fellowships, and college student financial aid assistance. As you know, I have a long history of involvement with educational matters, and am pleased to be a cosponsor of this amendment.

Time and again, I have stated my unflagging support for the Federal Government's role in education. Our colleges and universities derive a great portion of their income from Federal sources. Our elementary and secondary schools look to Washington as the source of support for dozens of programs. Millions of students, particularly at the college level, finance their own educations with the help of myriad Federal aid programs.

Earlier this year, on March 9, the Senate rejected President Reagan's proposed cuts in education for fiscal year 1984 when we overwhelmingly approved a resolution opposing further reductions in education funding. Then, on May 6, the Senate passed, by a vote of 55 to 32, an amendment to the first concurrent budget resolution that added $1 billion for education programs. The House-Senate conferees later added an additional $0.2 billion, raising the total budget authorization for education to $16.1 billion. Today, we offer an amendment to increase appropriations for education from $15.2 billion to approximately $15.7 billion—well within the budget resolution ceiling. In so doing, we simply ask our colleagues to fulfill the commitments made earlier by this body.

The bulk of the additional appropriations we seek, or $350 million, would increase funding the chapter I compensatory education programs. In the last 3 years, basic grants in that program have fallen by 22.7 percent in real dollar terms, meaning that 53 percent, or 5.8 million, of the eligible children are not served under the program. The amendment would also supplement the resources of these important educational initiatives:

Vocational education $90 million increase.

Adult education, $12 million increase.

National direct student loans, $35 million increase.

Supplemental education opportunity grants, $15 million increase.

College work-study, $40 million increase.

International education, $8 million increase.

National Institute of Education, $7 million increase.

I would also call particular attention to the $1.95 million Jacob Javits fellowship program, which would award grants for meritorious graduate study in the name and spirit of our distinguished former Senator from New York. Clearly, this amendment provides necessary support to many valuable programs.

I must emphasize also the importance of this amendment to education in New York State. In the following ways, New York would benefit from the increased funding:

Chapter I compensatory education, $33 million, enough to include an additional 54,000 eligible children.

Vocational education, $6 million increase.

National direct student loans and college work-study, $3 million increase for each program.

Supplemental educational opportunity grants and international education, $1 million increase for each program.

Overall, New York State would receive a much-needed boost in Federal educational funding of between $45 and $50 million.

I would urge all of my colleagues to support this amendment. Often, we reduce these legislative efforts to mere money. I would ask that we judge the Bradley-Hollings-Stafford amendment instead on the basis of children: 5.8 million children assisted under chapter I compensatory education, 600,000 students in vocational education, and hundreds of thousands of others in the many fine programs that this amendment assists.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WEICKER. Yes, Mr. President, I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I know the distinguished Senator from Connecticut is about to make a point of order. Before he does, I would like to make one final statement, and that is to remind Senators that the Labor/HHS appropriation is over $2 billion under the budget resolution. We do not bust the budget by adding one-half billion in education.

I also would like to say that, while we applaud the work of the Senator from Connecticut on adequately funding handicapped education and vocational rehabilitation, what we are saying is this: Let us carry everybody to the higher ground; let us carry the disadvantaged students in our cities as well as the handicapped; let us carry the vocational education students as well as the people served by vocational rehabilitation; let us carry those who are receiving a variety of campus-based college aid programs as well as Pell grant recipients. That is what this amendment is about. I hope the Senate will support our position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, it is very unusual for the Senator from Connecticut to try to keep his temper in check, but I do not want to hear about the vocational rehabilitation bill. I do not want to hear it because it represents 1 year's worth of work and was passed by the U.S. Senate. It is a fine piece of legislation. It is a year's worth of work. We considered the old law and changed it, properly, to adjust to changing circumstances. We then passed it in the U.S. Senate. It went over to the House and they loaded it up with education and other amendments because they figured, it is a must bill.

It sure is a must bill. But it was wrong to load up the vocational rehabilitation bill with these new authorizing levels so as to put their burden on the backs of the disabled. And let me add, that there are no compliments to be paid to the administration, which refuses to allow me to go to conference.

Shame on both Houses. Talk about truely worthy people standing and waiting for Congress to act—there is a good example of what politics has done in an area of crucial legislation. No thanks to either party.

In any case, I make the point of order that the pending amendment is in violation of rule 16, paragraph 1 in that it increases appropriations already contained in the bill which do not carry out the provisions of any existing law treaty, or resolution passed by the Senate this session, or budget estimate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. The amendment is out of order.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I appeal the ruling of the Chair and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to table the appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. WEICKER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay the appeal on the table. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), is necessarily absent.

Mr. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Ohio (Mr.

GLENN), and the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE) is absent because of illness in the family.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE), would vote "nay".

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 45—as follows:

So the motion to lay the appeal on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I would appreciate it if those Senators who do have additional amendments might be prepared to offer them and to discuss the matters with the Chair and the ranking minority member so that we might dispense with them.

I think there is a good possibility if my colleagues will stay in the Chamber that this matter can be wrapped up within the next hour. I certainly hope so.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from New Jersey.

COSPONSORSHIP OF AMENDMENT NO. 2282

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of Senators METZENBAUM and TSONGAS be added as cosponsors of the previous amendment and the name of Senator EVANS be deleted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I yield so that the distinguished Senator from Georgia may present his amendment.

AMENDMENT NO. 2283

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

(Purpose: To reduce by 10 per centum funds available in the Department of Health and Human Services for management and consulting services)

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY) for himself, Mr. PRYOR, and Mr. ABDNOR proposes an amendment numbered 2283.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 39, between lines 22 and 23, insert the following:

SEC. 210. (a) Of the total amount of budget authority provided for fiscal year 1984 by the Department of Health and Human Services Appropriation Act, 1984 that would otherwise be available for consulting services, management and professional services, and special studies and analyses, an amount equal to 10 per centum of the amount requested for such purposes in the budget submitted by the President pursuant to section 1105 of title 31, United States Code, for 1984, as amended, for any agency, department, or entity subject to apportionment by the President shall not be available for obligation or expenditure. This subsection shall not apply to any agency, department, or entity whose budget request for 1984 for the purposes stated in this section does not equal or exceed $5,000,000.

(b) Within 60 days of the date of enactment of this section, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall report to the Appropriations Committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives on the indentification and reduction of available funds required by the section.

(c) For the purpose of this section, the term "consulting and related services" shall have the meaning given such term in the 1983 Report of the Office of Management and Budget to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate on administrative expenses.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, the amendment that I have sent to the desk on behalf of myself, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), and the distinguished Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABDNOR), represents a modest attempt to reduce the funds available to the Department of Health and Human Services for consulting and related services by 10 percent or approximately $13 million.

According to figures provided by the Office of Management and Budget, funds for consultants in the HHS budget have grown from $103.5 million in fiscal year 1982 to $130.5 million in fiscal year 1984. This represents a 26-percent growth over 1982 levels. At the same time, the HHS budget itself has grown less than 5 percent.

Most of my colleagues are probably familiar with the efforts that have been made in the past several years to control the costs of consultants. Senator PRYOR has been particularly effective in highlighting the need for Congress to examine this issue. Several statutory requirements have been enacted by Congress in an attempt to have specific information provided by the agencies on the amount of funds requested for consultants and related services. Much of the problem in controlling these spiraling costs has been brought about by an inability to define exactly what types of services fall within the consultant definition. Although OMB, largely as a result of congressional prodding, has taken some steps to identify and control these costs, it is my opinion that a 10-percent reduction can be made without impairing program requirements or mission effectiveness. Such a reduction will not only save the beleaguered taxpayers $13 million, it will also signal the executive departments the firm intent of Congress to gain control of these costs. Statutory directives to the agencies and departments have failed to produce the budget data that is needed for oversight of these activities.

The amendment applies only to title II of the bill, the HHS section. An examination of the consultant expense levels in the Departments of Education and Labor reveals that they have remained relatively constant over the past several years. Therefore, the amendment does not affect those agencies. Nor is the amendment intended to imply that the vast majority of consultants and professionals who render valuable service to the Federal Government are anything other than dedicated people doing the very best job that they can. It does represent a moderate effort to have Congress more directly control an area of Federal spending that thus far has escaped appropriate oversight.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator NICKLES be included as a cosponsor of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, in addition, I wish to say that this is not the first bill to which we have added a consultant reduction amendment. As subcommittee chairman, I included it in the military construction appropriations bill and it also was adopted as a provision of the Treasury, Postal and general operations appropriations bill.

Mr. President, all this is nothing more than a modest attempt to try to restrain an area of Federal expenditures that has grown out of proportion to the need for such services.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

I yield to the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I sincerely thank my distinguished colleague, Senator MATTINGLY, for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate today.

Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY) to reduce appropriations for consultant services at the Department of Health and Human Services by 10 percent of what would have otherwise been available in fiscal year 1984.

I commend the Senator for his efforts to bring accountability into an area which I have found during my tenure in the Senate so prone to Government abuse. We in Congress have little idea, because we have been provided so little information, about how and why billions of agency dollars find their way to what has been referred to as the unelected government. This is true despite the fact that Public Law 97-258 requires that all agency heads supply to Congress certain budget information on the procurement of consultant services.

Senator MATTINGLY and I are hopeful we will have support for this amendment from Senators who believe Congress has a right to expect full information from agencies and compliance with the law, as well as from those who simply want to reduce the budget deficit in every reasonable manner.

Expenditures for consultant services at HHS in 1984 are estimated to be about $130.5 million, up 26 percent since 1982. Our amendment would only require that this amount be reduced roughly $13 million, which in a budget the size of HHS's—over $64 billion—is an extremely modest reduction. Nevertheless, it is significant that we demonstrate that the often inexplicable costs of consultant services, in this department and in others, will not be blindly accepted by Congress.

Mr. President, the need for this kind of amendment could be lessened in the future if agencies would simply make publicly available and report to Congress the extent, nature, costs, and rationale for the procurement of such services. It has been my experience, that in many cases, the extent of consultant use is overbroad, the nature is inappropriate, the costs are noncompetitive, and the rationale is nonexistent.

I have been concerned about this area for some time, and because of my frequent expressions of this concern, I have been asked time and time again why I oppose the use of consultants. I do not oppose the use of consultants. I realize in many instances, the use of private sector advice can be both economical and effective. What I do oppose, and oppose strongly, is congressional support for the expenditure of taxpayer dollars which flow to areas about which Congress has little or no knowledge, and about which agencies cannot or will not provide information; and the great majority of these consulting contracts are contracted for by noncompetitive bids. In fact, a General Accounting Office report filed with Congress concluded that 67 percent of those consulting contracts were awarded without any competitive bid whatsoever.

Mr. President, furthermore, the General Accounting Office in other studies has indicated to the Congress, that approximately 54 percent of all consulting contracts are awarded in the last 90 days before the end of the fiscal year.

I would like to ask this question—I do not know whether anyone has the answer—how many consulting contracts were awarded in the past 90 days before the end of the fiscal year which has just closed, Mr. President?

It is my desire and, I think, the desire of the distinguished Senator from Georgia to bring some sunshine into the area. It has been long neglected. This has been my goal with the Consultant Reform and Disclosure Act, which I have attempted to steer through the Senate over the past two Congresses.

I also intend to support reductions in expenditures for such services in an effort to force agencies to justify these expenses.

When we talk about deficits, when we talk about runaway expenditures, one thing I firmly believe is one ingredient which adds to those deficits is that this Government today is spending $10 million a day, Mr. President, for consulting services, and it is my opinion that a great portion of this expense is wasted.

Once again the Congress has little control, little knowledge, and little information provided by the agencies as to where these taxpayers' dollars are truly being expended.

Mr. President, I do not want to single out HHS as the lone culprit in this matter. The problems are Governmentwide, but there must be a place to begin cuts.

What I do want to do is to focus attention in an area where Congress can legitimately achieve budget savings, significant savings, without disruption of agency services to the taxpayers.

It is critical that we make it absolutely clear that agencies are responsible for all funds which Congress appropriates. The time for rhetoric about administrative remedies has long since passed. These remedies have not worked, and they are not going to work. It is going to take the Congress to do something by statute to make them work.

If agencies have legitimate needs for outside assistance—and many of them do—let them devlop realistic and documented evidence of those needs and submit them to congress.

Finally, Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to bind together to support this important precedent-setting amendment. In the purest sense it is a bipartisan effort to achieve budget savings and, at the same time, to promote agency accountability. These are goals the taxpayers demand that we must advance on their behalf.

Mr. President, I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I do not believe in standing here and making speeches for appearance's sake, so I will tell you exactly what my feelings are with respect to the amendment of the distinguished Senators from Georgia and Arkansas.

I understand fully the problem to which you are directing your energies and your cuts. I would like to examine it. You have my word that I will. But I think that it has to be done in a more judicious way because I do not believe that you really mean to achieve that which will be achieved under terms of this amendment.

This amendment will strike directly at the National Institutes of Health, the National Cancer Institute, the Heart and Lung Institutes, the National Institute on Arthritis, Diabetes, and Digestive and Kidney Diseases, alcohol and mental health programs, and the centers for disease control. Much of their work is being done by consultants. I cannot believe that is what you want to accomplish with this amendment.

I have no problem with a well-directed amendment relative to consultants. I do not like them any better than you do. So, in a sense of giving the chairman a message, you have done that.

I hope the amendment will be withdrawn on my assurance that I will work with you in achieving an amendment which we will put on an appropriations bill in this regard.

In the absence of that—and I hope that is the way we can dispose of the amendment—yes, I can take it to conference. Since I have already expressed my opinion on the amendment, you can take it from there. I really do not have much further to say about this subject. I compliment both sponsors of the amendment. Again, I repeat, you make a valid point, and as long as we can rifle-shot it instead of having a shotgun approach, I have no problem dealing with this problem in a positive way in the next appropriations bill.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Is the Senator willing to take this amendment to conference?

Mr. WEICKER. Well, let me put it this way. It depends on how long a life you want to give this concept. It can enjoy a life between now and the conference or it can enjoy life between now and the next appropriations bill.

I hope since it is a good concept—I am not being critical in that sense—it is something we can work on, but it is not something I can properly do in a matter of 2 days.

I was informed this afternoon that Chairman NATCHER wants to meet in conference in 48 hours. I cannot handle this matter in the positive manner it deserves in the next 48 hours.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I would hope that you take it to conference because first, the Mattingly-Pryor amendment serves as a strong signal, and second, let me just say that as a former member of the Governmental Affairs Committee I saw Senator PRYOR's work to try to reduce expenditures for consultants. We were told then that the wrong place to reduce it was the Governmental Affairs Committee, and that the right place to do so——

Mr. WEICKER. Senator——

Mr. MATTINGLY [continuing]. Just a moment—was the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WEICKER. I have always been appreciative of the fact that everybody loves the Appropriations Committee. We are the most loved committee, and this subcommittee is the most loved subcommittee. Everybody wants to achieve their legislative objectives within this committee.

So without any further ado I would be delighted to go ahead and accept the amendment.

Mr. MATTINGLY. We thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WEICKER. Let us see where we go from here.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I thank the Senator. This will give Senator PRYOR and me an opportunity to work on the House conferees.

Mr. WEICKER. The question is on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment (No. 2283) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator from Utah has been very patient.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WEICKER. Yes.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Let me just state for the RECORD that this issue has been placed on this weeks agenda of the Presidents Cabinet Council on Management and Administration.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an exchange of letters on this subject from the chairman of the Administrative Conference of the United States, and the Counsellor to the President, Ed Meese.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADMINISTRATIVE CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., September 20, 1983.

Senator MACK MATTINGLY,
Dirksen Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MATTINGLY: I am happy to enclose herewith a copy of Ed Meese's reply of September 10, 1983, to my letter of July 28, 1983, regarding the problem of excessive and inefficient uses of consultants in the Executive Branch.

I am especially pleased to note that the issue has been placed on the agenda of the Cabinet Council on Management and Administration, of which I am a member. I look forward to developing possible solutions with the other members of the CCMA and I will be giving special attention to the "Model Control System" presently being tested by OMB.

Your future cooperation in this enterprise will be most helpful. I applaud your continuing efforts to reduce the sums appropriated for consultants. However, we must work together to develop means of controlling the quality of consultant programs, so that we may ensure that these cuts come at the expense of wasteful uses instead of efficient ones.

We at the Conference hope to continue to work with you and your staff to solve these problems. We will be delighted to do what we can to ensure that any further proposals that you and your colleagues may develop are given serious consideration within the Executive Branch.

Sincerely,

LOREN A. SMITH,
Chairman.

THE COUNSELOR TO THE PRESIDENT,
September 10, 1983.

Mr. LOREN A. SMITH,
Chairman, Administrative Conference of the United States, Washington, D.C.

DEAR LOREN: Thank you for your letter of 26 July 1983, containing proposals for improving the oversight of consulting contracts by the Executive Branch. I support your efforts and those of Senator Mattingly to find ways to restrain the use of consulting services by executive agencies.

As you may know, OMB has been striving for some time to cut costs in this area. They have, for example, been working with the agencies on an experimental "Model Control System for Consulting and Related Services" that would provide a more critical review of proposed consulting procurements. Early results of this system are promising, but not yet conclusive.

Your suggestions in this area are appreciated and, along with OMB's efforts, will serve as a basis for further planning and improvement. I have asked Ralph Bledsoe to place this matter on the CCMA planning agenda as soon as possible.

I look forward to your assistance in making the consulting contracts matter another manisfestation of our efforts at management reform within the Executive Branch.

Sincerely,

EDWIN MEESE III,
Counselor to the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is recognized.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise today to discuss an issue of great concern. The Labor/Health Services appropriations bill report contains language to transfer title X family planning programs from the Assistant Secretary for Health to the Health Resources and Services Administration. I feel strongly that my colleagues should not endorse this transfer.

The family planning programs are currently being administered under the Office of Assistant Secretary for Health through the deputy assistant Secretary for Population Affairs. This conforms with the statutory provisions for the responsibilities of the Deputy Assistant Secretary who is to:

> Administer all Federal laws for which the Secretary has administrative responsibility and which provide for or authorize the making of grants and contracts related to population research and family planning programs.

I am concerned about this as chairman of the labor and human resources committees, let me state the following.

First. The administrative change in no way jeopardizes the continuation of the title X family planning program. This change was made to improve the Federal family planning programs through administrative and organizational consolidation.

Second. The new responsibilities given to the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Population Affairs (DASPA) were envisioned in the orginal Family Planning Act. The DASPA office was specifically created "to direct and coordinate all government family planning research and service programs."

Third. Both the General Accounting Office and the Congress have supported efforts to strengthen the role of the DASPA. For example, the 1978 House Select Committee on Population Affairs concluded:

> It is the Select Committee's belief that the DASPA/OPA (Office of Population Affairs) should be responsible for all population-related services and research.

Moreover, in 1981, the GAO concluded that:

> The (DASPA) position should be strengthened by clarifying the Deputy's responsibilities and authority in order that the incumbent could more effectively coordinate and evaluate all the competent agencies' administration of family planning program.

To further amplify my view, I ask unanimous consent that a "Dear Colleague" letter on this subject sent by me on June 30, 1983, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HATCH. As chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, I would like to say that I believe Secretary Margaret Heckler deserves support on this matter. She has written to us and asked for support on this issue, and I believe we should give it to her.

EXHIBIT 1

COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND HUMAN RESOURCES,
Washington, D.C., June 30, 1983.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: On January 7, 1983, the Secretary of Health and Human Services reorganized the administration of family planning programs by placing them under the authority of the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Population Affairs. Opponents of this reorganization introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 21 as a part of an effort to reverse the Secretary's actions. S. Con. Res. 21 would express the sense of the Congress that the family planning program under Title X of the Public Health Service Act should be administered once again by the Health Resources Administration of the Department of Health and Human Services.

As Chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee which has jurisdiction over these issues, I would strongly urge you to oppose this resolution for the following reasons.

First, the administrative change in no way jeopardizes the continuation of the Title X family planning program. This change was made to improve the federal family planning programs through administrative and organizational consolidation.

Second, the new responsibilities given to the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Population Affairs (DASPA) were envisioned in the original family planning act. DASPA office was specifically created "to direct and coordinate all Government family planning research and service programs."

Finally, both the General Accounting Office and the Congress have supported efforts to strengthen the role of the DASPA. For example, the 1978 House Select Committee on Population Affairs concluded, "It is the Select Committee's belief that the DASPA/OPA (Office of Population Affairs) should be responsible for all population-related services and research." Moreover, in 1981, the GAO concluded that, "the (DASPA) position should be strengthed by clarifying the Deputy's responsibilities and authority in order that the incumbent could more effectively coordinate and evaluate all the component agencies' administration of family planning program."

In short, the Secretary's efforts to reorganize the administation of family planning programs are in keeping with past bipartisan calls for an increased role for the DASPA.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to oppose the Resolution and to allow the Secretary to utilize fully the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Population Affairs consistent with Congressional intent and administrative efficiency. If you have any further questions, or would like copies of the supporting documents, please contact Nancy Taylor (4-4433) of my staff.

Sincerely,

ORRIN G. HATCH,
Chairman.

Mr. HATCH. I would like to turn to the distinguished Senator who is chairman of the Family and Human Services Subcommittee, Senator DENTON, and ask him what is his view of this particular report language.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I would like to agree wholeheartedly with the distinguished chairman of the full committee of which my subcommittee is subordinate. I disagree completely with that portion of the committee report accompanying H.R. 3913 ordering the retransfer of the title X family planning program.

The title X family planning program was transferred in January 1983 by the Secretary of Health and Human Services to the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Health under the Direct supervision of the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Population Affairs (DASPA). The intent of the language of the report appears to be to reverse this transfer. By this language, the Appropriations Committee is trying to undo what the authorizing committee mandate for good reason. As chairman of the subcommittee that authorizes the title X program, I am today stating that such a direction by the Committee on Appropriations report is nugatory.

Mrs. Heckler, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, wrote to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee on September 27, 1983, explaining her protest regarding the language of the committee report.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that her letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
September 27, 1983.

Hon. MARK O. HATFIELD,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations,
U.S Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: There is a provision which is a matter of concern to me in the House Appropriations Committee report on the Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education, and Related Agencies Appropriation Bill (H.R. 3913) regarding the family planning program.

The House report states: "The Committee is aware that the Department has transferred the family planning program on an interim basis to the Assistant Secretary's [for Health] Office. The Committee does not support this transfer and directs that the personnel responsible for this program be transferred back to the Health Resources and Services Administration as soon as possible but no later than October 1." (House Report 98-357, page 23.)

The family planning grant assistance program was transferred in January 1983 by then Secretary Schweiker to the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Health under the direct supervision of the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Population Affairs. The resulting organizational arrangement conforms directly with the statutory provisions for the responsibilities of the Deputy Assistant Secretary who is to:

"Administer all Federal laws for which the Secretary has administrative responsibility and which provide for or authorize the making of grants and contracts related to population research and family planning programs." (The Family Planning Services and Population Research Act of 1970, Public Law 91-572, Section 4(1).)

The reasons that this organizational arrangement was established and should be maintained are that it will lead to a number of efficiencies and improvements in policy coordination as follows:

It will consolidate related Public Health Service programs in adolescent family life, population affairs and family planning; and

It will improve management efficiency and coordination by providing consistency and minimizing administrative costs.

I strongly believe that the current organizational arrangement is working well and is necessary and appropriate to a strong family planning program.

Thank you for your consideration in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

MARGARET M. HECKLER,
Secretary.

Mr. DENTON. The relocation of the family planning program to the Office of the Assistant Secretary conforms directly with the statutory provisions for the responsibilities of the DASPA.

Secretary of Health and Human Services Margaret Heckler, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, expressed that same view in explaining her concern with the language of the committee report. Previous administrations, over the objections of Congress, I might add, had allowed the authority of the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Population Affairs to deteriorate despite an expressed intent in the title X act to make that office a focal point within HHS with authority to direct family planning activities. A June 1981 report by the Comptroller General to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources pointed out that:

The (DASPA) has not assumed the leadership role in administering, planning, and directing family planning services and population research intended by Congress.

In 1978, Senator CRANSTON, the former chairman of the Subcommittee on Child and Human Development, the membership of the House Select Committee on Population Affairs, and Senator Edward Brooks, former ranking minority member of the Labor, HEW Appropriations Subcommittee, all expressed the belief that Congress intended the DASPA to play a larger role in the administration of family planning programs.

In January of this year, then-Secretary of HHS Richard Schweicker, acting within the scope of his authority to organize the Department, reasserted the vital role of the DASPA. He did so not in expectation of the creation of a block grant for family planning, but to "provide consistency in management for the interpretation and direction of administration policy." (Federal Register, Tuesday, Jan. 11, 1983, p. 1231.) His actions were in keeping with original congressional intent in creating the DASPA position and in fulfillment of urgings by later congressional leaders.

In short, Mr. President, the Secretary's decision to consolidate the family planning program under the direct line authority of the DASPA should be a welcome step for those who truly support voluntary family planning.

Therefore, Mr. President, I question both the ability and wisdom of an attempt to reverse that new organizational arrangement. The responsible authorizing committees have not altered the title X act, the Secretary has not acted outside of the scope of his authority, nor has the Appropriations Committee sought the enactment of any legislation that would mandate such a change. I hope that we realize that the language adopted by the committee does not have the force of law, but is a statement of preference or hope.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I would like to take a couple seconds more. I think it is important that we support Secretary Heckler in this matter. She has taken time to get involved in it and, of course, feels very strongly about it.

In that regard, I would like to make a couple of comments about what was said about Mrs. Heckler in U.S. News & World Report last week. It was a fairly uncomplimentary appraisal of the few months she has had as Secretary at Health and Human Services.

I think generally U.S. News & World Report is very accurate in the things it does. I find very little fault with it as a weekly magazine.

But I was particularly upset over what I read in U.S. News & World Report. I will not put it into the RECORD at this point, but there was an indication that Mrs. Heckler had not quite accomplished what she should have accomplished in that job.

Well, I can tell you they did not consult me as chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee. I have not seen any Cabinet Secretary grab a job and run with it as she has done in the short time she has had at Health and Human Services. That has become an almost overwhelming job. I do not know very many people who can handle it. She is not only handling it; she is mastering it. She is doing a job like I have never seen before. Of course I personally feel Secretary Schweiker did a very good job down there as well.

I would like to compliment both of them. I will just say for the record that I think Secretary Heckler deserves commendation for the short time she has had to work in that area. I know she is doing a good job. I think she is one of the best Secretaries we have in this administration. I think she deserves more than she received in that U.S. News & World Report article. This is one way we can help her. She has stood up in this decision. She wants to enforce the law. She has written to us. I think the Members of the Senate ought to support her. Certainly, I recommend that course to the members of the Senate Appropriations Committee as well as to the House.

Mr. DENTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. DENTON. I concur with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Utah.

I would like to mention to him and to the Senate that this morning at a subcommittee hearing Ms. Betty Friedan, the author of "The Feminine Mystique and the Second Stage," which recently came out, discussed and agreed with me that the U.S. News & World Report on family life, published about a month ago, was not very accurate.

It extrapolated from the present form of family life to a supposedly ideal age, when the average person, by the time he or she reaches 30 or 35 years of age, will have been married five or six times. The feature discussed how the children would have as many as 32 grandparents in the extended family, and so forth.

So if their commentary on Margaret Heckler is any indication of that magazine's view of family life, it means they disagree with Ms. Friedan as well as with the chairman of the Labor Committee.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the chairman.

Mr. WEICKER. Let me say, Mr. President, Margaret Heckler is a hard worker. She is trying to learn about every aspect of the executive branch. She is already well schooled in the legislative branch. I want to say I do not doubt her integrity. And I do not doubt that she is trying to become a spokeswoman for many across the Nation.

I do not want anything in terms of what the committee did to reflect any disapproval of the Secretary.

I also want to say to my good friend, the chairman of the authorizing committee, I am very sensitive to the problems that have been raised here. It is a matter that the committee will take into its consideration. I want to emphasize to the chairman that we did not try to trespass on his turf.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator. I appreciate this colloquy and this opportunity to get the matter on record.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I want to express my disagreement with the views of two of my colleagues earlier today regarding the administration of title X and to express my support for the action taken by the Appropriations Committee, transferring the family planning program back to the Health Resources and Services Administration (HRSA).

As many of my colleagues know, in March of this year, I introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 21 together with Senators HOLLINGS, BRADLEY, and PACKWOOD. This resolution calls on the Department of Health and Human Resources to reverse the January reorganization of the Federal family planning program (title X of the Public Health Service Act), restoring the administration of the program to career public health professionals in the Department's Health Resources and Services Administration (HRSA).

It is a pleasure to report that a fifth of the Senate has cosponsored Senate Concurrent Resolution 21. In addition to the original sponsors, Senators DECONCINI, GLENN, HEINZ, HUDDLESTON, LEAHY, LEVIN, MATSUNAGA, METZENBAUM, MITCHELL, PERCY, PROXMIRE, RIEGLE, SPECTER, TSONGAS, STAFFORD, and WEICKER have cosponsored the measure. In the House, 126 Representatives have cosponsored an identical resolution.

As one of the original sponsors of this resolution, I am very pleased by the action taken by the Senate Appropriations Committee to place the funds for title X under the Health Resources and Services Administration and directing the Department to transfer the personnel responsible for administering the program back to HRSA.

Although it may be viewed as somewhat out of the ordinary for the Congress to feel so strongly about what could be seen as an administrative matter, I believe there are several reasons which justify the committee's action.

Despite the family planning program's broad base of support in Congress and its accomplishments over the years, it has been attacked in the past few years. To cite a few examples: Family planning agencies have had to resort to the courts to prevent implementation of the so-called squel rule, a regulation requiring parental notification when teenagers obtain contraceptive care; there have been an unreasonable number of audits, many of them duplicative; there were attempts to abolish the service delivery improvement component of the program which would have resulted in the loss of several critical functions, including data analysis, which in the past has insured the program's accountability to the American public; and Congress has repeatedly been obliged to block efforts to bury the program in a block grant to the States. It was in the context of developments such as these that many Members of Congress, including myself, became concerned about the well-being of the program when it was moved.

A major reason for requiring title X's transfer back to HRSA is that the administrative arrangement that was in effect prior to January of this year simply made good sense. There are obvious benefits to be derived from locating the administration of our major health service delivery programs in a single bureaucracy, where they can be run in a coordinated fashion and in accordance with a single set of management principles. This arrangement has the added benefit that it leaves the Department's Deputy Assistant Secretary for Population Affairs (DASPA) free of everyday administrative burdens to attend to policy matters, such as how the title X program might be more effective in meeting the needs of those it was designed to serve and coordinating the family planning activities of the various Federal programs that provide these services. There probably was a time, in the program's infancy, when it would have benefited from some high-level attention to assure its well-being among better established programs. However, after 12 years, that argument hardly holds. By the late 1970's, the program had taken root in the bureaucracy. To cite just one example, family planning figured prominently in the Surgeon General's report outlining a health agenda for the 1980's.

It is perhaps worth pointing out that Congress has, for many years, stood by the old administrative arrangement. Even though the original 1970 legislation does, technically, allow the DASPA to administer family planning services, he/she has never done so, prior to this year. The DASPA has always had a policymaking role in the Department. Fully aware of this situation, Congress has repeatedly reauthorized the program without ever specifically directing that the DASPA manage the program. To me, this means that it was satisfied with the status quo. The House Select Committee on Population, in 1978, made its intentions even clearer. The very first recommendation in its report on fertility and contraception in the United States stipulated that title X should be administered by DHHS's Office for Family Planning which, until January, was lodged in the Health Resources and Services Administration. The select committee also recommended that the DASPA be responsible for the coordination of reproductive health and family life education programs. A 1981 General Accounting Office report came to similar conclusions, suggesting that Congress rely on the DASPA to coordinate and evaluate family planning programs, rather than to administer them.

The Appropriations, Committee's action is clearly consistent with congressional intent, not to mention with sound management practice and the best interests of the program and the individuals it is designed to serve.

FAMILY PLANNING SERVICES

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, earlier this year a bipartisan group of 19 other Senators and I introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 21. The same resolution was filed in the House by 125 Representatives. What we said was that family planning services are important health care services and have been recognized as such by every President—both Republican and Democrat—since Federal support for this program began. That is every administration prior to the current one.

Our resolution seeks to reestablish that fact by returning jurisdiction of family planning services back in the Health Resources and Services Administration of the Department of Health and Human Services. This means it will be administered by health professionals in the Public Health Service instead of by political appointees in a newly created Office of Family Planning within the Office of Population Affairs—an arm of the Assistant Secretary for Health.

Some have inappropriately maintained this is a debate over abortion. That is not true. Title X of the Public Health Services Act, the authorization for Federal family planning assistance, contains a specific prohibition against abortion as a method of family planning. In fact, in 1980, 4.6 million women, including 1.5 million teenagers, received family planning services under title X, making it the Nation's major program to prevent abortions.

What Senate Concurrent Resolution 21 and House Concurrent Resolution 93 are about is preserving important family planning services. Unfortunately, they have been under direct attack by this administration. In July 1981, President Reagan sent Senator ORRIN HATCH a letter stating, in part, "I regret that we do not have the votes to defeat the family planning program." He added that administrative changes would be made as an alternative. Indeed, in 1981 budget cuts of 23 percent were recommended for title X but were rejected by Congress. In 1982, the administration sought to repeal title X and include it in a block grant to the States. That, too, was rejected by Congress. Later that year the reorganization of family planning services into the Office of Population Affairs was first announced. After widespread opposition from Congress, it was deferred only to reemerge in January of this year when it was put into effect. During that same month, new efforts were announced by the administration to repeal title X.

Mr. President, that is a sorry record on a program that has been instrumental in lowering infant and maternal mortality rates and preventing millions of your girls from the trauma of an unwanted pregnancy. Fortunately, the Members of this body and in the House of Representatives have been forceful in support of these services.

And I am pleased that the Senate Appropriations Committee exercised that same resolution in drafting the labor and HHS appropriations bill. The committee directed title X programs—

> Henceforth • • • restored to the responsibility of HRSA, formerly the Health Services Administration • • • The committee directs that personnel responsible for administering the family planning program be transferred back to the Health Resources and Services Administration as soon as possible, but certainly no later than October 1, 1983.

The Appropriations Committee in the House was equally clear in its intentions stating, in part that "the Committee • • • directs that the personnel responsible for this program be transferred back to the Health Resource and Services Administration as soon as possible but no later than October 1, 1983."

I am pleased that we in Congress can assure the women in search of health care that we do not intend to abandon them. I welcome the inclusion of the thrust of Senate Concurrent Resolution 21 in the appropriations bill.

AMENDMENT NO. 2284

(Purpose: to increase appropriations for certain education programs, and for other purposes)

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

> The Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) proposes an amendment numbered 2284.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

> On page 48, line 7, strike out "part B" and insert in lieu thereof "parts B and C".
> On page 48, line 16, strike out "$396,316,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$398,266,000".
> On page 56, between lines 22 and 23, insert the following:
> "SEC. 308. Section 923(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965 is amended by inserting '(1)' after the subsection designation and by adding at the end thereof the following:
> "(2) Students receiving an award under this part shall be known as 'Jacob K. Javits fellows'.".

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, some 3 years ago, in 1980, Congress established, as a Javits amendment to the education amendments of 1980, this program which would provide for a number of fellowships to promising first-year graduate students in the humanities and arts, chosen on a competitive merit basis by a panel established by the Department of Education. The program has never been funded in the past. This amendment would fund it to the extent of $1.95 million. It would support 150 fellows in the first year.

The program is necessary, since there exists no Federal program to support graduate students in the humanities and the arts, through the endowments or elsewhere. The demise of the Ford, Woodrow Wilson, and Danforth fellowship programs has resulted in a reduction of 66,000 fellowships annually in these disciplines.

The amendment further would name the program the Javits National Graduate Fellowships, after the distinguished former Senator from New York, who originated the program. Mr. President, I urge the managers of the bill to accept this amendment. I am prepared to yield to them for that purpose if they wish to do so.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, this is a matter that came to this subcommittee from the Appropriations Subcommittee on the Interior. It is something that I feel strongly about, as I believe many of our colleagues do, in the sense both of what is being accomplished by the program and with respect to the outstanding and distinguished individual for whom it is named. I accept the amendment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am happy to support the amendment, particularly as it is an amendment in honor of one of the greatest Senators who has served in the last 25 years, a truly great man, Senator Jacob Javits.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2284) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MODIFICATION OF AMENDMENT 2277

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment adopted this morning, No. 2277, be modified to read as follows:

SEC. 308. No funds appropriated in any act to the Department of Education for fiscal years 1983 and 1984 shall be withheld from distribution to grantees because of the provisions of the order entered by the U.S. District Court for Northern District of Illinois on June 30, 1983; Provided, That the court's decree entered on September 24, 1980 shall remain in full force and effect.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, this is a modification of my earlier amendment regarding the frozen education funds. It will insure that the money is used for its intended purposes; that is, follow through on civil rights training and education. At the same time, it does not release the Government from any further liability in the case. What we have tried to do is work with the administration and those who have a sense of special interest, in the sense of representing the State of Illinois and Chicago. I think the amendment does just that.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have had an opportunity to discuss this with Senator DIXON and Representative YATES. I am very grateful to the Senator from Connecticut for making this modification. It certainly improves the amendment and makes it serve the purpose it was meant to serve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The amendment is so modified.

The amendment (No. 2277), as modified, follows:

On page 56, after line 22, insert:

SEC. 308. No funds appropriated in any act to the Department of Education for fiscal years 1983 and 1984 shall be withheld from distribution to grantees because of the provisions of the order entered by the U.S. District Court for Northern District of Illinois on June 30, 1983; Provided, That the court's decree entered on September 24, 1980 shall remain in full force and effect.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

AMENDMENT NO. 2285

(Purpose: To provide funds for a program of health care for unemployed workers)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk for myself and others and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), for himself and Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. METZENBAUM, and Mr. CRANSTON, proposes an amendment numbered 2285:

On page 27, between lines 10 and 11, insert the following:

HEALTH CARE BENEFITS FOR THE UNEMPLOYED

For payments for health care benefits for the unemployed, $900,000,000, to be available only if a program is enacted into law providing for such benefits under the Social Security Act or under the Public Health Service Act.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator RIEGLE in offering this amendment to provide $900 million in fiscal year 1984 for health care for unemployed Americans.

I believe that it is essential to act today to assure that money for this vital program will be available as soon as Congress completes work on authorizing legislation. Unemployed workers and their families have already lived far too long with the fear and anxiety that they will not be able to afford needed medical care because they lack health insurance. Further delay would be unconscionable.

The Senate is already strongly on record in support of this program. In the spring, the Senate voted 90 to 9 in favor of including health care for the unemployed in the budget resolution. Last June, we voted 75 to 23 for a supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1983. Both the Labor Committee and the Finance Committee have reported legislation to the floor of the Senate, and intensive discussions are underway to assure that a bill can be brought to the floor by the end of the month.

I know those discussions are taking place between the chairman of the Finance Committee (Mr. DOLE), the chairman of the Subcommittee of the Human Resources Committee (Mr. QUAYLE) and others. The House has also adopted legislation to provide for health care for the unemployed.

With this strong bipartisan commitment in both Houses, I believe that enactment of this crucial legislation is possible within a few weeks. By adopting our amendment, we can assure the prompt implementation of this much-needed program.

The dimensions of the problem are enormous. The United States has just suffered through the worse recession since the Depression—unemployment remains at over 9 percent.

One of the worst consequences of this deep recession is the loss of health insurance that too often compounds the tragedy of unemployment.

The Congressional Budget Office estimates that over 10 million Americans and their dependents have lost their health insurance because they lost their job. Millions are forced to go without essential health care because they face the cruel choice between paying the bill for food and rent, or paying the doctor's bill. Infant mortality is rising in hard-hit States, where the number of women who receive no prenatal care has tripled.

But these are only the bare statistics. The real human tragedies are even more compelling.

In our Human Resources Committee hearings, we heard from a widowed mother of five in Turners Falls, Mass., who could not afford the doctor and the medicine her daughter needs to treat her rare form of arthritis. We heard from a father in Baltimore, whose 6-year-old child cannot get an operation because the hospitals want them to pay $600 up front. We listened to the story of a family in Flint, Mich., staggering under the burden of $60,000 in debt as a result of the complicated birth of their premature baby.

These are Americans who worked hard to help to build America. They are out of work through no fault of their own. It is unacceptable that these families should have to pay such a terrible price for the administration's wrongheaded economic policies that fight inflation with unemployment and human suffering.

The surest way to address this problem is to put America back to work. Only by reversing the administration's reactionary economic policies can we truly offer hope to the struggling families of America.

But it is not enough to wait for the recovery. Health care is too important to be sacrificed on the altar of supply-side economics. No pregnant woman should be denied prenatal care because she and her husband are unemployed and cannot pay the doctor's bill. No workers should lose their health insurance because they lost their job. No families should lose their access to health care because they have become casualties of the administration's unfair war against inflation.

The amendment before us would provide $900 million for fiscal year 1984, the same amount in both S. 242, the Human Resource Committee bill, and S. 951, the Finance Committee bill. It is well below the $2 billion authorized by the budget resolution. I urge my colleagues to adopt this amendment.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I say to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, no one feels more strongly than this Senator on this matter. I might add that it was the subject of some rather intense questioning when the Secretary of the Health and Human Services appeared before the Appropriations Subcommittee. It was the subject of some rather intense followup letters requesting the reappearance of the Secretary before the subcommittee. It was at that time, as the Senator well knows, that the administration indicated that it had a plan on this matter. The administration indicated that it was expecting to agree upon a health plan for the unemployed. It was only on that assurance that the subcommittee withheld any action.

Of course, the plan that came forth from Mr. Stockman a little later on—that is, that the unemployed should go ahead and pay their own health premiums—was not exactly what was envisioned by this Senator or, I am sure, by the Senator from Massachusetts. So, insofar as the problem is concerned and the attention that should be devoted to it, those thoughts expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts have the complete concurrence of the Senator from Connecticut.

I would hope that the matter would not find its way onto this bill only in the sense that I gather there still is work to be done on it. Senator DOLE and others with authorizing responsibility are obviously going to have to be part of the scenario of a solution. And, again, I can only implore my good friend not to jeopardize the passage of this bill, the first in 5 years, but, rather to try to work it out in the regular process. I assure the Senator he is going to have my full support on any matter that comes to this floor along these lines.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Connecticut. I know very well his strong commitment in this area. It does seem to me, that there is a broad consensus on this program as we are working out the authorization legislation—I see the chairman of our subcommittee, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE), who has been strongly committed to this concept, on the floor at the present time. I had talked to Senator DOLE about it as well. I know of his strong commitment.

There are important differences between the two bills but I think they are resolvable. The advantage of adding it on this bill is to give assurances to the States that when we finally work out the authorization there will be resources available to move right ahead. My concern about delay is that if in the next couple of weeks we are able to work out the differences on authorizing legislation then we will still have to wait a longer period of time to get the funds to actually move ahead.

What we are doing is talking about several months instead of perhaps just a few weeks.

I want to cooperate with the Senator from Connecticut. I know my colleague from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE) has been extremely active in this area, has been strongly committed, has worked very hard both in the committee and also on the floor on this issue. I am just wondering if the Senator could give us some assurance that we would have the opportunity, if we are not able to get a vote today, to have an opportunity to get a vote on this issue up or down with the Senator's support in the very near future so at least we can send a very clear message to the States, and I think most importantly to the unemployed, that we are not going to wait an unreasonable period of time before action will be taken for the unemployed who have lost their health care benefits.

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator has the assurance of this Senator, in whatever role he plays, that I would support him in getting that kind of an up-or-down vote. The Senator is also going to have my support not just to have an up-or-down vote, but against any proposal that calls for the unemployed to pay their own health premiums. That is unacceptable. It is to me, it is to the Senator from Massachusetts, so the Senator can also rest assured that on the substance of the matter he is going to have the support of this Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. I appreciate the comments of the Senator. I am wondering whether he felt that, at least on the supplemental, we would be able to give consideration to this particular proposal?

Mr. WEICKER. My only problem with that is that I do not know if the authorization is going to be ready. I really cannot respond with an assurance that I am not in a position to deliver.

Mr. KENNEDY. The only problem that we are facing on this issue is that if we do not get it on the supplemental, we may very well not have another vehicle on which we are able to get the funds. That is what we are dealing with. As I said, I do believe that those items of difference will be worked out. I do not want to see the session go by at least without having had an opportunity on the floor for us to address the issue. I want to accommodate. I know the good faith of the Senator from Connecticut. I am not trying to press him unduly. He knows the way the clock runs, he knows the workings of the Appropriations Committee, and he also knows that we only have a limited number of vehicles on which we are going to be able to address this issue.

Mr. WEICKER. I am not the majority leader, nor will I ever be the majority leader so long as I am in this party. There is no way I can give that kind of definite assurance. The Senator has my assurance, that in whatever role I play in the process, he will have my vote.

Now, that is as much as I can do. I cannot speak for anyone else.

Mr. KENNEDY. Fine. With those assurances, Mr. President, being what they are—and I believe they are serious and important ones—I will indicate now that I would offer this with Senator RIEGLE on the supplemental, and hopefully with the support of the Senator from Connecticut, the Senator from Indiana, and the Senator from Kansas. I hope that we are going to be able to work out the differences in those authorizing bills prior to that time and that we can have the support of the Senator from Connecticut.

I hear what the Senator is saying about a vote. I must say I know the Senator is well aware of the very strong vote in favor by three-quarters of the Senate on this issue several months ago on an amendment that was offered by the Senator from New York, who I see on the floor at the present time. The will of the Senate is clear on this issue, and I think it would be a real travesty if we should recess this year without addressing it.

I thank the Senator from Connecticut, and I ask if the amendment could be put aside temporarily so that my cosponsor, the Senator from Michigan, would be able to make a brief comment on it before withdrawing it.

Mr. WEICKER. I wonder, since we are almost at the point of concluding the bill, if the Senator would be good enough to withdraw the amendment. I assure the Senator I will keep things open as long as I can for the Senator from Michigan, but I do not want to delay the entire process.

Mr. KENNEDY. Would the Senator permit us to leave it that way? If the time comes for the final passage, I would certainly respect the actions of the floor manager on it and withdraw it.

Mr. WEICKER. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. So I would ask that it be temporarily set aside.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KENNEDY. I withdraw that request for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, one of the most dire consequences of the recent recession, the Nation's worst in postwar years, has been the loss of health care coverage for the families of millions of unemployed Americans. According to the Congressional Budget Office, nearly 11 million Americans found themselves without health care coverage by the end of last year, as a result of prolonged high unemployment. With unemployment projections at 9 percent or more through the end of 1984, this state of affairs will not soon improve.

By a vote of 90 to 9, this body endorsed the proposal of the distinguished Senator from Kansas, my colleague on and chairman of the Finance Committee, Mr. DOLE, to authorize $225 million in fiscal year 1983 and $900 million in fiscal year 1984 for health care benefits for the unemployed. Mr. President, this was one of the more emphatic displays of bipartisanship in this Congress. When the fiscal year 1983 supplemental appropriations bill came before the Senate for consideration, however, it failed to provide the funds for the remainder of fiscal year 1983. I offered an amendment providing the $225 million in actual funding to the States for the remaining months of fiscal year 1983, to help fund their efforts to provide basic health care to unemployed Americans and their families. My amendment was approved by this body by a vote of 75 to 23.

This commitment must be sustained in 1984. Without it, the families of America's jobless are in danger of being denied the most basic health care. Hospitals, health centers, and other health providers will not—indeed, cannot—continue to absorb the costs of health care for the unemployed who are unable to pay their bills.

Estimates in this area are, at best, somewhat tenuous. The Congressional Budget Office, however, has reported that more than 10.7 million Americans lost their health insurance since December 1982. Of that number, 7.4 million had lost their jobs. Of these 7.4 million, 5.3 million lost health insurance coverage as a direct consequence of their being involuntarily discharged, without fault, for their jobs. Such are the wages, the harsh wages, of the cruel recession of 1981–82.

This legislation, this amendment, is necessary. It is timely. The program has the strongest support in this body. I hope that this simple amendment—insuring that the funding will be available when the final legislation is enacted on a permanent basis—will be approved.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as the Senator from Kansas has indicated repeatedly in the past, every effort is being made to work out the differences between the health benefits bill agreed to by the Senate Finance Committee and the one agreed to by the Labor and Human Resources Committee. Progress is being made and we are hopeful that the product of those discussions will be a better proposal.

However regardless of the specifics of the bill it is vital that we find a way to finance these new costs.

A spending program, no matter how laudable, must not simply add to the deficit.

The Senator from Kansas has every intention of working with his colleagues to find a method we can all agree to that will provide the financing necessary. In addition to this, it will of course be necessary to make provision for the appropriations that will also be necessary should a program be enacted.

It is my understanding that the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut, Mr. WEICKER, has agreed to work with us to assure that the appropriated funds will be made available.

There is certainly a great deal of interest and support demonstrated by a number of Members of this body in a program of health benefits for the unemployed. When the time comes I am sure that agreement can be reached by both financing and appropriations. The supplemental appropriations bill is certainly one option we can consider for any appropriations provision.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be temporarily set aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Is there objection to temporarily setting the amendment aside?

Mr. WEICKER. Reserving the right to object, I was not privy to what just transpired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is there objection to setting aside the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Without objection, the amendment is temporarily set aside.

AMENDMENT NO. 2286

(Purpose: To appropriate funds to the Public Health Emergency Fund)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) proposes an amendment numbered 2286.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 25, between lines 9 and 10, insert the following:

PUBLIC HEALTH EMERGENCY FUND

For the Public Health Emergency Fund established under section 319(b) of the Public Health Service Act, $30,000,000, to remain available until expended.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, this is a simple and direct matter which I hope the Senate, in its wisdom and indeed in its compassion, will find itself able to accept.

The amendment provides the public health emergency fund with its full authorization of $30 million. The Secretary of Health and Human Services would have this money available for health emergencies. The legislative history is a simple one. Congress approved authorization for the public health emergency fund without opposition on July 28, 1983.

President Reagan signed the measure into law on July 13. The bill approved was that of Representative HENRY WAXMAN of California, a distinguished Member of the House. In the Senate, Senator CRANSTON and I had cosponsored a companion measure.

The need for these emergency funds is as evident as the need for similar funds in similar areas. We had this experience before, in the outbreak of the infectious disease known as legionnaire's disease, a wholly new phenomenon not theretofore encountered, mysterious, threatening, baffling, and associated with a particular group of persons, a particular place, a fine hotel in the city of Philadelphia, as the distinguished Presiding Officer, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER), will recall. It was an event which led, I believe, to the hotel being closed.

In order to find funds with which to respond to the emergency, to the epidemic, the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta was forced to divert money from typhus fever research, from the development of new drugs for leprosy, from hepatitis and brucellosis vaccine trials, for research on Lassa fever and Ebola viruses, and a whole range of scientific matters then in progress.

There were many problems of a kind that required continuity and that could not be stopped halfway and picked up at a later time, as one might stop building a house or a bridge. These are ongoing studies in living organisms, and to break them is frequently to lose much of the research.

We have an exactly comparable situation today in the current epidemic of acquired immunity deficiency syndrome, which has struck the Nation with an edge of terror, some communities more than others, some groups more than others, but this is characteristic of an epidemic. It is equally characteristic of one to arouse in the public great anxieties, especially in those early stages of a fatal ailment from which there appears to be no recovery, as indeed for the moment there does not appear to be any known recovery—certainly no recovery that could be associated with treatment—from this particular syndrome.

I think it does not defy the gods in such matters to suggest that in the normal course of science, our doctors, our epidemiologists, and our researchers will find the nature of the disease and find a way to block it, prevent it, or cure it. What they need are the resources to do so.

They are even diverting resources from other programs which, if not as urgent, are certainly important and valid; and they would not have to do so if we did no more than fund the public health emergency fund at the level authorized, which is $30 million.

Mr. President, Mr. James Bloom, Executive Officer of the Centers for Disease Control, argues:

> The Public Health Service needs a new way to deal with emergencies such as Legionnaire's disease or AIDS, because * * * supplemental appropriations take too long.

This is a responsible public servant, in the Public Health Service, asking us to do what we have done in authorizing and passing H.R. 2713 earlier this year. I now ask that we fund it, and I hope I might have the support of the distinguished managers of this measure.

I do not know that I need continue this discussion, save to state that I have submitted the measure in response to a "dear colleague" letter that is signed by Senators CRANSTON, KENNEDY, TSONGAS, GLENN, and HOLLINGS. Since they have joined me in the letter, I am sure they wish to be listed as cosponsors of the amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that their names be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the "dear colleague" letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., October 3, 1983.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: This week, the Senate will consider appropriations for the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education. We intend to offer an amendment to provide the Public Health Emergency Fund with its full authorization of $30 million.

Congress established this fund this past summer to improve the nation's ability to respond to public health emergencies, by creating a permanent fund of $30 million to be allocated by the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Both Houses approved the legislation without opposition, and the President signed it on July 13. The need for the fund has not diminished since then.

For too many years, the Federal Government has reacted to crises such as Legionnaire's disease, toxic shock syndrome, and AIDs by asking a range of agencies to monitor, research, and eradicate the disease. None of these agencies—the Food and Drug Administration, the Center for Disease Control, the National Institutes of Health, and the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration—has a discretionary budget adequate to deal with a full-scale public health crisis. Therefore, agency heads must divert funds from other important, if only slightly less immediate, research projects.

The actions of the Center for Disease Control in 1976, when Legionnaire's disease frightened the country, demonstrate this problem. In order to respond swiftly to the outbreak, the CDC was forced to Delay typhus fever research two years.

Delay development of new drugs for leprosy for two years.

Cancel hepatitis and brucellosis vaccine trials.

Discontinue permanently a birth defects monitoring program.

Delay research on deadly Lassa fever and Ebola viruses for five months.

Curtail a maternal-child meningococcal vaccine study.

During that and similar crises, other agencies have been forced to practice such forms of triage.

We recognize the need to utilize resources where they are most needed, but we nevertheless oppose the practice of pitting vital public health programs against one another. Sudden cutbacks in ongoing research programs create great inefficiencies associated with high shutdown and start-up costs. The Public Health Emergency Fund obviates the need to divert funds from ongoing programs by creating a pool of resources to be distributed expeditiously in times of emergency. James Bloom, Executive Officer of the Center for Disease Control, put it this way: "The Public Health Service needs a new way to deal with emergencies such as Legionnaire's disease or AIDS, because . . . supplemental appropriations take too long."

We certainly hope that you will join us in supporting this much needed appropriation for the Public Health Emergency Fund. If you have any questions or wish to cosponsor this amendment, please contact Bob Gilbert of Senator Moynihan's staff at x4-4451.

Sincerely,

ALAN CRANSTON.
PAUL TSONGAS.
FRITZ HOLLINGS.
D. P. MOYNIHAN.
EDWARD M. KENNEDY.
JOHN GLENN.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to continue a discussion which I believe has met with a certain favor on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, and I should like to hear his response.

Mr. President, the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), an original cosponsor of the earlier amendment which was accepted by our distinguished managers on the public health and emergency fund, is absent today. He has asked me to have printed in the RECORD the following statement that he would have made had he been present. I ask unanimous consent that this statement be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the author of S. 1226, legislation that I, joined by my distinguished colleagues from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) and Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY and Mr. TSONGAS), introduced on May 5, 1983, to create the public health emergency fund, I urge support of this amendment offered by Senator MOYNIHAN to appropriate the full authorized level of $30 million in fiscal year 1984 to implement the fund. I am delighted to join as an original cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. President, the bill enacted to establish the public health emergency fund, H.R. 2713—to which S. 1226 was a companion bill—had very strong bipartisan support in the Congress. On June 13, 1983, it was passed by the House without opposition. In the Senate, the bill was cleared by the majority and minority leaders for expedited action, and on June 28, 1983, it was passed without opposition. On July 13, 1983, at the urging of Members of Congress from both sides of the aisle and despite prior opposition by the Reagan administration, President Reagan signed the measure into law as Public Law 98-49. This law authorizes the creation of a permanent contingency fund in the Treasury to be available for research and investigation into the cause, treatment, and prevention of diseases or conditions which the Secretary of Health and Human Services determines present public health emergencies.

This measure was critically needed in order to help remedy a serious and dangerous inadequacy in our Nation's health system—the lack of any coordinated Federal mechanism for dealing expeditiously and effectively with large-scale public health emergencies that occur suddenly and require immediate action. The need for our Government to be better prepared to protect the public's health against new and sudden disease outbreaks is a lesson that the Nation has finally learned the hard way, through the current AIDS crisis and other recent emergency situations. Let us not, by failing to provide the appropriation necessary actually to establish the fund, reveal an inability to learn that lesson.

Mr. President, a public health emergency cannot be planned for. The cost for its control, which can be substantial, cannot be calculated in advance and incorporated into an agency's fiscal year budget. Without a contingency fund and coordinated efforts to respond to such emergencies, the only way for the Department of Health and Human Services to react to these problems is the same way it has continually proposed to react to the AIDS crisis—by siphoning off resources from other research areas and public health programs to which the same immediacy may not attach but that are equally important in protecting the health of our Nation's citizens. When those other resources cannot be found and diverted quickly, we experience dangerous delays in our efforts to stop the spread of diseases that can rapidly cause widespread suffering and death. The kind of immediate Federal response that would be made possible by the fund could help us to control future public health emergencies much faster and more effectively than we have been able to deal with AIDS and, hence, save more lives and spare more individuals and families great suffering.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this amendment in order to help insure that our Government will be better prepared to deal with situations such as the AIDS crisis has presented, by providing standby contingency funding to be used for research and investigation necessary to protect the public in times of public health emergencies.●

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, the fact remains that the bill includes a total of $41.6 million, which is slightly more than the House level for AIDS. I can go right down the checklist as to what has been provided in this legislation.

Obviously, nobody wants to be placed in the position whereby, given an amendment such as that offered by the distinguished Senator from New York, they would be on record as voting against any of the emergencies which can occur from time to time.

I appreciate the efforts of the Senator from New York and in no way look upon his objective negatively. I have asked the Senator from New York, as I have asked everybody else on this floor, to please make it possible for us to have a bill. The very area that the Senator from New York is concerned with is one of those areas where we in the Senate have fashioned amounts much larger than the administration requested and larger than the amounts included in the House bill.

I do not want to pretend to the Senator from New York that this is something that stands a good chance in conference, in light of what is already in the Senate bill. As a matter of fact, what is going to happen, first of all, is that the House is going to shoot at me, and then the administration is going to shoot at me, just on what we already have in the bill.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I have never seen the Senator from Connecticut in the least perturbed by that prospect.

Mr. WEICKER. It is not the prospect of being shot at that bothers me. It is just that I concur with the substance and sentiments as eloquently expressed by the Senator from New York; but in taking this amendment, which I am prepared to do, I do not want to give the impression that it is something on which I will prevail.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I do not ask anything more than a good-faith effort by the Senator from Connecticut. That is entirely satisfactory to me. I thank him for his generosity. We will try.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment (No. 2286) was agreed to.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2287

(Purpose: To appropriate $16,000,000 for special projects relating to excellence in education under subchapter D of chapter 2 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981)

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) for himself, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. TSONGAS, and Mr. MOYNIHAN, proposes an amendment numbered 2287.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 41, line 2, beginning with "$528,367,000" strike out through line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$544,367,000: Provided, That $466,655,000 to carry out the State block grant program authorized under chapter 2 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act shall become available for obligation on July 1, 1984, and shall remain available until September 30, 1985: Provided further, That $44,765,000 for the purpose of subchapter D of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act shall become available for obligation on October 1, 1983: Provided further, That notwithstanding the second sentence of section 563(a) of the Education Consolidation Improvement Act of 1981, $16,000,000 of the amount appropriated under this heading for subchapter D of chapter 2 of such Act shall be available for projects relating to excellence in education under which (1) individual elementary and secondary schools with a demonstrated commitment to pursuing excellence in education may carry out programs of excellence in conjunction with school principals, school teachers, parents, and business concerns in the locality; and (2) not to exceed 500 socioeconomically and geographically representative local educational agencies are selected for awards not to exceed $40,000 to carry out individual school excellence programs, based on the potential of such schools to experiment with standards of quality and their ability to carry out successful innovative activities:".

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, this amendment is based on a bill I introduced earlier this year which was the subject of a Dear Colleague letter that we sent to all of the Members. It is an amendment which will enable the Secretary of Education to award grants to up to 500 individual schools for the pursuit of excellence in education.

The bill I introduced on June 29, 1983, the Excellence in Education Act, was introduced at the same time in the House by Congressman GOODLING, the ranking minority member on the Education Subcommittee of the committee of jurisdiction in the House.

The bill is designed to give us in Congress the opportunity to maintain the momentum that was created by the report of the National Commission on Excellence in Education. That report, "A Nation at Risk," clearly stated that we need to address the shortcomings of our educational system.

What I have in mind in introducing this amendment, Mr. President, is to recognize and reward those school districts across America that are working to eliminate excessive electives, like bachelor living, to toughen high school graduation requirements; those principals that improve their disciplinary procedures; those teachers that incorporate new technologies into the curriculum and demand more home work; and those students who are striving to achieve excellence.

The report of the National Commission on Excellence in Education, "A National Risk," was released 5 full months ago. To date, I must tell you,

Mr. President that we in Congress have done next to nothing in response to the challenge issued to us by that Commission. The Nation is still at risk. Young people have entered another school year and we are still just talking about doing something—no programs have been authorized; and no money has been appropriated; and no other action is anticipated in the near future.

This amendment, which I offer on behalf of myself and Senator CHAFEE, Senator TSONGAS, and Senator MOYNIHAN is, I believe going to put Congress on record as taking an important step to maintain the momentium for improving our schools.

Let me point out to my colleagues that this is not a budget-busting amendment. The total authorization for this amendment is just $16 million. I ask the Senator from Connecticut, the distinguished manager of the bill, therefore to accept this amendment.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania insofar as the attention that he has paid toward education in all of its aspects, I might add.

I only hope that in this situation, which is not authorized, we could continue to work together to get the maximum number of dollars, and the Senator is absolutely correct. We can have report after report out there, but unless there are dollars to do something about what the issues of the report raises, then it has all been to no avail.

The Senator has been a leader in the cause of education, and I truly mean that in the sense of our own party where sometimes the going is not that easy on this particular issue. He has always been a valued ally.

These are rather large moneys again, and I hope again that he will continue his interest. They will have my support.

I hope that this matter would not be resolved at this particular time in this bill.

Mr. HEINZ. I gather that what my friend from Connecticut is saying is that he is tired of making the same speech about add-ons to this bill that he has been making all day.

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator is correct, and indeed my patience is wearing thin, not in the sense of the Senator's amendment but just to the fact that an awful lot of Senators here have been very decent on both sides of the aisle in subordinating their particular interest to the overall good of getting a bill, and indeed the Senator from Pennsylvania himself on other amendments which he wanted to offer has played in that role.

I hope he could continue to do this and give us a shot at coming forth with an original work product.

So I do not mean to be short at all with the Senator. And believe me I believe just as strongly as he does in the subject matter he has placed before the Senate.

Yet I hope that he would back off.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this debate much further. I do want to say that I understand exactly the position of the Senator from Connecticut. He has a very difficult job here trying to make sure that we in fact enact an appropriation for Labor and HHS for the first time in 5 years, and I wish to help him do that. I am not going to insist on any amendment that is going to get in the way of doing that. I want him to understand that.

As a matter of fact, I expect we are going to have another opportunity in the very near future to debate this amendment and vote on it. That opportunity should arise when we take up the supplemental appropriations bill, the early supplemental appropriations, which I am told the House is marking up today.

Would the Senator agree that that would be an appropriate time to take up this amendment?

Mr. WEICKER. I just cannot wait for this famous supplemental to come down the road.

No, I do not know what is going to happen. I have a feeling it could very well be bigger than the bill itself that we have on the floor of the Senate right now.

Mr. HEINZ. I say to my good friend from Connecticut that I do not know anything about the size of that supplemental, but I do know that our leadership has stated its intention of bringing that bill up immediately after we return on October 17.

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HEINZ. I repeat that as far as I know that is a definite plan of the leadership and that it is not the intention of the leadership to back away from it.

Is that not his understanding as well?

Mr. WEICKER. That is true.

I would hope that the Senator would now direct his attention, however, to getting the authorization through on this and hopefully that they will come together at the time the supplemental is here and be supportive of the Senator.

Mr. HEINZ. Of course, this amendment as drawn carries with it the authorization.

Mr. President, I hope that when this issue next comes before the Senate, and I suspect it may very well be on the supplemental, that this will be an amendment that they can support. I put my colleagues on notice in that regard and I solicit their support.

I hope the Senator from Connecticut at that time will be in a position to support it.

Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DANFORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be continued to be laid aside.

AMENDMENT NO. 2288

(Purpose: To provide training, relocation, and job search funds under the trade adjustment assistance program)

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself and Senators MOYNIHAN, HEINZ, BRADLEY, SPECTER, GLENN, LEVIN, TSONGAS, RIEGLE, and METZENBAUM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH), for himself, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. GLENN, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. METZENBAUM, proposes an amendment numbered 2288.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 4, line 25, after "$22,500,000," insert the following: "together with $29,700,000 which shall be available only for sections 236, 237, and 238 of the Trade Act of 1974 and for necessary related administrative expenses,".

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, on Friday, Congress enacted the extension of the coffee, international coffee agreement and a part of that bill was an amendment which extended for 2 years the authorization for the trade adjustment assistance program.

The estimated cost of the trade adjustment assistance program for this fiscal year is about $100 million.

The trade adjustment assistance program consists of a program for firms impacted by imports and also a program for employees.

The employees program consists of benefits paid to the employees and also a training component.

The training component is an entitlement program.

Mr. President, I propose an amendment to this bill relating to the trade adjustment assistance program. At one point I had intended to offer two amendments that will no longer be necessary. The first amendment would have provided $40 million to fund benefits for trade impacted workers under the TAA program. This amount was the level estimated by the CBO, based on congressional reauthorization of the TAA program for fiscal year 1984.

Mr. WEICKER. I do not believe that amendment is necessary at this time. Once the extension of the trade adjustment assistance program is signed into law, the administration will be obligated to seek a supplemental to cover these mandatory benefits.

Mr. DANFORTH. I understand from the distinguished chairman that prior to the time that additional funds are specifically appropriated for the benefits portion of the TAA program, there will be no break in the payment of these benefits under terms of the continuing resolution.

Mr. WEICKER. That is correct.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the second portion of the employee part of the trade adjustment assistance is the training portion of the program. The estimated cost of the training portion is $26 million for this year and then an additional $3.7 million for administration of the program.

So this amendment is for $29.7 million for training and for administration of the trade adjustment assistance program.

I might say, Mr. President, that the reauthorization was worked out last week after considerable discussion within the Finance Committee and also between myself, Senator DOLE, and Mr. Stockman, and Mr. Stockman said at that time that if the reauthorization was at present level he would recommend that the President sign the bill. It is my understanding that the President either has already signed the bill or will sign the bill. Therefore, this appropriation of $29.7 million is simply to provide the funds to do what we agreed to do last Friday.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise as an original cosponsor of the amendment of my friend and colleague from Missouri, Senator DANFORTH, to call to the attention of the Senate the importance of trade adjustment assistance. We are asking for $29.7 million for worker retraining associated with loss of jobs due to imports. Need I mention that in recent years, we have lost a great deal of jobs because of imports. Last year, we registered the highest merchandise trade deficit in history, a staggering $36 billion. According to Martin Feldstein, the Chairman of the President's Council on Economic Advisers, the merchandise trade deficit will soar to over $70 billion for 1983, and to $100 billion for 1984.

There is a rough rule recently stated by Alfred Eckes, Chairman of the International Trade Commission, that for every billion-dollar increase in the trade deficit, 25,000 job opportunities are lost. If the trade deficit increases to $100 billion for 1984, it will mean that 1.5 million U.S. job opportunities will have disappeared over the period 1982-84. At its peak in 1980, trade adjustment assistance provided $1.6 billion in benefits to 530,000 workers. Today, we debate whether or not to increase funding by $29.7 million. I argue that the least we can do for workers who lose their jobs because of U.S. trade policy is to appropriate this $29.7 million for retraining.

Mr. President, the Tokyo round of the multilateral trade negotiations, the last great achievement of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, took place because the American labor movement kept its long commitment to trade matters by supporting a lowering of tariff barriers. The labor movement agreed to the expansion of trade, knowing that their individual members would be protected from the consequences of governmental trade decisions by the trade adjustment assistance program.

We pledged to American workers that we would help trade adjustment assistance. With the support of labor, we negotiated and later passed in law the Tokyo round of trade negotiations. We have scarcely kept our side of the bargain. TAA is a shell of the program it once was.

But at least some modicum of good faith must be shown. We must insure that the funding for retraining is provided. I am happy to join the Senator from Missouri in sponsoring his amendment. I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mr. HEINZ addressed the Chair.

Mr. WEICKER. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I rise as a cosponsor of this amendment. A comprehensive and effective trade adjustment assistance program is an essential element of a free trade policy. As I have said on numerous occasions in the past, any healthy, growing economy is going to produce change, and our competing in an international free market environment will accelerate such change by exposing domestic producers to foreign competitors. Sometimes such foreign competitors have unfair advantages—their products are dumped in this country or they benefit from government subsidies. Sometimes their government, as in the case of Japan, helps them by effectively preventing our access to their markets, denying us reciprocity. Sometimes we are faced with foreign producers that have a comparative advantage.

Of course in cases of unfair advantage we should fight for our free market principles and for reciprocity. The Senate has passed a reciprocity bill, and the House is presently working on a trade law reform bill. But in all cases, whether the competition is fair or unfair we must also recognize the change it will induce in the United States and the victims it will create in the form of lost jobs, closed factories, and displaced workers. I continue to believe that the Government has an obligation to such victims—both business and workers—because it is our trade policy that has produced them and because it makes good economic sense to help them either adjust to the competition through revitalization or find new jobs through retraining.

It is no secret that the adjustment assistant program that has been in place for the last several years has not been as effective as we would like. In part this is due to deficiencies in the statute, in part to deficiencies in program administration, and in part due to the inherent difficulties of promoting successful adjustment. Qualifying industries tend to be old, severely import-impacted, poorly located, and in dire straits economically. Affected workers frequently have few other local employment options but also have family ties and commitments that discourage moving to other locales. In some sectors, such as steel, pride in a difficult, demanding job and the pay that goes with it are also disincentives to adjustment.

All these factors have combined to produce a full-scale attack on the program over the past 2 years, led primarily by the administration. Unfortunately, in its zeal to reform the program, it not only has reduced its cost by well over 80 percent—which would have fallen substantially anyway due to the decline in auto worker petitions—they so narrowed eligibility as to prevent almost everyone from qualifying. Several of us, led by Senators DANFORTH and MOYNIHAN, succeeded in postponing the implementation of the worst of these requirements but numerous other changes were implemented.

Last week the Finance Committee saved this program by reporting legislation to extend for two additional years. The Congress has sent that bill to the President, and I hope he will sign it. We were given every reason to believe that he would prior to our action last week.

On the merits I would have preferred an expanded program. I have been fighting for such a broader program since 1977 when I first introduced legislation to reform trade adjustment assistance. One of my frustrations over the past 6 years has been the regular failure of the Congress to provide basic, elemental justice to those who lose their jobs because of imports. Unfortunately, last week the administration made clear once again its determination to veto any program other than a simple extension of current law. I regret that decision and oppose it as much now as I have for the past 6 years. Nevertheless, it is a reality that must be acknowledged, and I supported the Finance Committee's decision to obtain as much as it could with this program because it is so important to my State.

Over the years over 124,000 Pennsylvanians have received benefits under the trade adjustment assistance program since 1975, more than any State except Michigan and Ohio. At present, due to the continuing crisis in the steel industry—just under 100,000 people in the steel industry are still laid off—this program provides significant benefits in Pennsylvania. Its continuation is essential. And so is a sufficient level of funding to make the program meaningful. While the benefits part of the program is an entitlement, training money is not, and we need to insure that adequate funds are available to provide retraining for all those that apply for it under this program. In past years, particularly 1982 and 1983, some participants in the program eligible for retraining have been denied it because of insufficient funds. CBO estimates that $66 million will be needed in fiscal year 1984 to meet the demand for benefits and training money under this program, and this amendment, therefore, is offered to insure that the necessary funds are appropriated.

Finally, Mr. President, let me close with a comment on an argument we have been hearing lately with regard to this program—that it should be eliminated because workers who lose their jobs because of imports should not be treated differently than those who lose their jobs for any other reason. This is an argument that ignores both history and economic reality and needs to be attacked vigorously.

From the standpoint of history, the adjustment assistance program exists as an integral part of our country's free trade policy. Implicit in every trade bill we have considered since 1962 has been the tradeoff between a free trade policy of lowered barriers and the costs that policy creates in increased unemployment in industries that cannot survive the foreign competition. In order to obtain support for a free trade policy—the only policy that over the long term makes sense for any economy—the Congress has consistently opted to provide funds to help the victims of that policy. To do otherwise at this point is to renege on that bargain, and, in fact, to give America's workers nothing to ask for but pure protection and nowhere to go for it but the Congress. Those who would destroy this program ignore the likely consequences on our trade policy as well as the difficulty of reducing unemployment.

From an economic standpoint, there are often special characteristics of the import-impacted unemployed. They are more often than not victims of structural rather than cyclical change, meaning that training is more important because the original job is less likely to return. They are also often in sectors heavily represented with women and minorities or located in semirural areas without other nearby job opportunities. Aside from the huge influx of auto workers in 1980 and 1981 and the current reliance of steel workers on this program, much of its benefit over the years has gone to workers in industries like textiles and apparel and footwear, where the job loss is clearly due to imports and the opportunities for new employment in the same industry slim.

In short, the very circumstances that led to the job loss make adjustment more difficult and this program therefore more important. That is particularly so since the process in the first instance was begun by the Government's trade policy. As I said earlier, Mr. President, I would prefer a larger program with a greater emphasis on retraining. The administration, unfortunately, would not support what is needed. Accordingly, the Finance Committee has compromised. I hope that now this compromise will not come to nothing because of an absence of funds, particularly in such a modest amount. I urge all Senators to support this amendment.

The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from New York have ably stated the case for it. It is absolutely true that the liberalization of our trade laws in 1974 and then again in 1979 has been contingent upon an agreement between ourselves and the people whose jobs are at risk that we will protect them. Without our maintaining our part of that commitment what happens is that we give those workers no place to go but to ask for pure protectionism, and we give them no place to go but to this body to ask for it.

Those in the Senate who decry protectionism, as we all do, and the administration, which also decries protectionism, should recognize it is through giving short shrift to programs like trade adjustment assistance that it fans the fires of protectionism. Those fires, if let loose, could consume us and a lot of other people as well.

So, Mr. President, I again urge the adoption of the Senator from Missouri's amendment.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I would like to note the role that Senator HEINZ played in putting together the compromise agreement which was enacted into law last Friday. I can say to the Senate that, but for Senator HEINZ and his effort, trade adjustment assistance would not have been reauthorized. Some of us felt that the trade adjustment program should be expanded somewhat from what it was in the International Coffee Agreement bill, but that was not really a realistic alternative, and in reaching the compromise, which was essential in putting this together, Senator HEINZ played the key role and, therefore, for what remains of trade adjustment assistance, I am sure not what Senator HEINZ would like nor what Senator MOYNIHAN would like, but at least something, but for Senator HEINZ would not have been done.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from West Virginia, Senator BYRD, be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise only to thank my colleague from Missouri for his kind comments.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, might I join the Senator from Missouri in expressing my appreciation to the Senator from Pennsylvania, without whom there would not be even this budget measure which is at least a partial measure of compliance if not full compliance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I appreciate the good faith efforts on the matter being raised before the Senate.

On the other hand, I have to point out that this matter has not been raised before the full Appropriations Subcommittee or indeed the subcommittee which has jurisdiction.

It is my understanding that the matter was raised before the Office of Management and Budget and the Administration, and they indicated negatively toward having this amount on this bill.

I am not anxious to get here and subject my colleagues to a rollcall vote which I think would be very unfair in the sense of my demanding from them or asking them for cooperation in trying to get a bill, and have that across, if you will, from the merits as presented by the distinguished Senator from Missouri. It would be unfair indeed.

I think all of us if we can get administration agreement, if it goes through the process, would support what is being asked. There would be no question about it. So why get bogged down and make it difficult for the colleagues on both sides of the aisle in the sense of this particular request?

So I want to make it clear, as I have on items—maybe even set a new trend in the Senate—you pretty well know what is coming out of conference and what is staying in the bill, and I will go ahead and take this amendment and I am going to say it publicly, I am plagiarizing my good friend RUSSELL LONG, I have a feeling it is going to get lost between here and the House.

Mr. HEINZ. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WEICKER. Yes.

Mr. HEINZ. I have had a lot of experience with that. I claimed proprietary interest for an amendment on one of our earlier appropriations bill, the emergency jobs bill, which involved general revenue sharing. Almost everybody in the Senate voted to accelerate revenue sharing by one-quarter, all except one person, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator HATFIELD. And, by golly, the Senator is right, the amendment did drop out. It dropped out in large part because the administration did not support it.

But let me say to my good friend, with all seriousness, one of the more difficult votes I have had to cast, I cast on Thursday. It dealt with whether we are going to have a program which I wanted on trade adjustment assistance—an expanded program that dealt with worker retraining—or whether we would have a straight 2-year extension. My vote was cast in favor of the 2-year extension because the administration, after several of us called up Mr. Stockman, promised to support a 2-year extension of the trade adjustment assistance program. And, hence, I thought it was better to have a program than a vetoed bill and no program at all.

Now, I do not really address this remark to my friend from Connecticut, I say it really for the benefit of people downtown. If they do not support Senator DANFORTH's amendment between here and the conference, they will be breaking faith with this Senator and a number of other Senators, I think, as well. So I want them to hear loud and clear—I say this not for my friend's benefit but for theirs—that they will have at least one Senator, this one, to settle with if they back away from an arrangement that I think in good faith was made last Thursday.

I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. WEICKER. Well, I think that is a pretty clear statement. I hope the Senator has better luck against David Stockman than he does against me on the tennis courts.

Mr. HEINZ. If that is the kind of luck it will take, I am in good shape.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment to provide $29 million to fund the trade adjustment assistance program.

Last week, the Senate and House agreed to reauthorize this program for an additional 2 years. I understand that the President will momentarily sign this bill into law.

The money contained in the amendment before us, however, is urgently needed if we are to actually fund the retraining, job search, and relocation portions of this important program.

It is extremely important that we take such action.

More than 70 percent of all goods produced in this country must compete with foreign-made products. Unemployment has not dropped below 9 percent since February 1982. Unemployment in the U.S. steel and auto industries—two basic industries which have been extremely vulnerable to foreign competition—has been between 30 and 40 percent for the same period. Many of the jobs in these industries are simply gone forever.

Mr. President, as a nation we have an obligation to help these people who have been adversely affected by U.S. trade policies and a changing international economy. We must provide them the tools that will help them fill the jobs of the eighties and beyond.

The amendment before us contains the funds which will enable us to fulfill our obligation to a great many American workers.

I urge its adoption.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I have indicated what should be done with this amendment. Let me say this: I wish the Senators that are its sponsors good luck in their quest. The authorization is there. The administration supported the authorization. Now, if you are going to do that, obviously you support the appropriations.

It would be my hope, however, that this is something that can be worked out with the administration and with the chairman of the subcommittee and we could get the necessary funds there. So I accept the amendment. Unless there is any further debate on it, I move the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH).

The amendment (No. 2288) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEINZ. I move to lay that motion on the table. The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2289

(Purpose: To provide appropriations under part B of title VII of the Education Act of 1965 for the construction of academic facilities)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will continue to be set aside.

The clerk will report the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI), for himself and Mr. KENNEDY, proposes an amendment numbered 2289.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 49, between lines 14 and 15, insert the following:

For part B of title VII of the Higher Education Act of 1965, $38,300,000, to remain available until expended, $18,200,000 of which is provided for construction and related costs of a model sciences engineering facility at the University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, New Mexico, and $20,100,000 of which is provided for construction and related costs of a model high technology science and engineering center at Boston University, Boston, Massachusetts, except that the provisions of section 721 (a)(2) and (b) shall not apply to the funds appropriated under this heading, and the amount of the grants paid from funds appropriated under this heading shall not be subject to any matching requirement contained in section 721(c) of such part and shall be used for three facilities of the type mentioned in section 713(g).

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, of the $38,300,000 appropriated under part B to title VII of the Higher Education Act, the committee directs that $18,200,000 be provided for construction and related costs of a model sciences engineering facility at the University of New Mexico, that $20,100,000 be provided for construction and related costs of a model high technology sciences and engineering center at Boston University. The provisions of section 721 (a)(2) and (b) shall not apply to the funds appropriated under this heading, and the amount of the grants paid from funds appropriated under this heading shall not be subject to any matching requirement contained in section 721(c) of title VII and shall be used for three facilities of the type mentioned in 713(g).

The committee affirms its understanding that the designation of the institutions as recipients of these funds controls their allocation. The Secretary is directed to waive section 721(a)(2), relating to the interstate distribution of funds, and is also prohibited from requiring that the University of New Mexico or Boston University make matching contributions or from holding the Federal share of the project to 50 percent. The Secretary is also directed to waive section 721(b), which requires that grants be made in accordance with the advice of a panel of experts, because no such panel currently exists and its establishment would unduly delay the disbursement of the funds. Finally, the Secretary is directed to use these funds for combined graduate and undergraduate facilities as provided in section 713(g) since, while the University of New Mexico and Boston University projects are the type envisioned by part B, each project has an undergraduate component.

Mr. President, this amendment that I offer on behalf of myself and Senator KENNEDY has been cleared with both floor managers on the majority and minority side. I understand it may very well not clear conference, but I have cleared it and I understand it is acceptable.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, it is and I move the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI).

The amendment (No. 2289) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

COSPONSOR OF AMENDMENT NO. 2280

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor to the Metzenbaum amendment agreed to earlier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be recinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

AMENDMENT NO. 2290

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be temporarily set aside.

The clerk will report the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE) proposes an amendment numbered 2290.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following:

Provided further, That out of the funds appropriated herein for use under the trade Adjustment Assistance Program, or from other available funds, sufficient funds shall be available to complete currently ongoing Trade adjustment Assistance training and relocation projects for those eligible displaced workers who became totally or partially separated from employment on or after December 1, 1981, and before September 1, 1983, and who were determined to be eligible on or before June 14, 1983.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, this amendment does not add any funds. It simply allows that, out of existing funds, there will be enough money spent to continue the existence of one program that is in midstream now and would otherwise lapse on October 1. If we do not get it done in this bill, we will have to come back in a couple of weeks, but there will be a gap in that training program in the meantime. I think it has been cleared on both sides and I do not know of any objection. I hope the amendment can be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho (Mr. McCLURE).

The amendment (No. 2290) was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2291

(Purpose: To increase appropriations for the Job Training Partnership Act)

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be temporarily laid aside and the clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE), for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. CHILES, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. COCHRAN, proposes an amendment numbered 2291.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 2, line 15, strike out "$2,793,810,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,843,810,000".

On page 2, line 24, strike out "$3,605,198,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,919,148,000".

On page 3, line 10, before the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That amounts available for part A of title II and part A of title IV, of the Job Training Partnership Act shall not be less than the amount available for fiscal year 1983 for each such part or the period July 1, 1984 to June 30, 1985.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I know the hour is late, that we will vote on this amendment and then vote on final passage. At least, that is the way I understand it.

Before I proceed, I do want to compliment in all sincerity and candor the chairman of the Subcommittee on Labor-HHS Appropriations Subcommittee for the cooperation we have had on this issue. We have communicated for a long time, from day one when we knew this would be a questionable item in the budget. I do appreciate the continued communication. I regret the fact that we could not work something out. I understand his responsibilities and I hope he understands where I am coming from because this issue of the Job Training Partnership Act is very, very important, not only to me, but also important to a number of other Senators who are consponsoring this amendment.

The cosponsors are Senators HATCH, HAWKINS, KENNEDY, CHILES, RIEGLE, and COCHRAN.

This issue will be on what is going to be the funding level for the new Job Training Partnership Act.

Under this amendment, we will be accepting under title II of the Job Training Partnership Act, which is the part that goes to the economically disadvantaged and primarily the young people, a reduction of approximately $200 million for the next fiscal year. That is a reduction, Mr. President, of about 15 percent for a new program that is just getting off the ground.

The President referred to this in his radio address last week. That is why I do not fear a veto a fear which has been hanging over us all day as we considered amendments. I do not fear a veto on this particular amendment because the President in his weekly radio address hailed this as a bold and historic program.

If we are going to have a bold and historic program, we are going to have to give it a chance.

Mr. President, what has happened in the way the Job Training Partnership Act has evolved in the funding is a very unfortunate aspect because what we have done in this program is to take money out of title II, which is the economically disadvantaged, primarily the young people, and put it into title III, which is the dislocated worker provision and increased that funding.

What we are doing is pitting one group of people against another.

Not only is this socially divisive but it is simply wrong policy.

I certainly know the restraints of the budget, having served on the Budget Committee. This is well within the budget. As a matter of fact, it is $200 million below the authorization for appropriations in the budget—$200 million in savings in this amendment over the current funding.

But we are not satisfied with $200 million; we want $319 million. What this does is to restore a little bit of money, about one-third from the reduction from current funding that took place in the Job Training Partnership Act.

Mr. President, the Job Training Partnership Act passed this Chamber last year 95 to 0. It passed going to conference on a unanimous vote and passed coming out of conference on a unanimous vote.

I believe that if we are serious about giving this program ample time and ample consideration that the cut should not be made, particularly to the economically disadvantaged people. Those are who you are going to be cutting. I hope that message is loud and clear, that you are cutting $319 million from current funding from these people and they are primarily the young people.

We still have in this country an unemployment problem and we have a training problem. Believe me, according to the recent Governors task force recommendation, Governor Thompson of Illinois said that it is going to cost money to train. As a matter of fact, the costs of training are not going to decrease. The costs for training are not going to decrease and we certainly have an ample, sufficient need for training and retraining in this country.

Look at some of the inner cities and some of the teenage unemployment, where black teenage unemployment have pockets of 15 percent. These are the people who are going to be the recipients of these cuts. These are the people who are not going to have the opportunities that everybody on this floor voted for just a year ago, voted by a unanimous vote to fund the new program to get it off to a good beginning.

One of the new features of this program is to give the responsibility to the Private Industrial Council which will be composed of at least 51 percent from the private sector. They are now full partners with the public sector in making the decision on who are going to administer these programs, who are going to be the deliverers of the services of these programs. If we sit and make a dramatic cut before we even start this program, it is going to send a very cynical message to them that, really, what the Congress does and says is not followed up by what the Congress is willing to afford.

Over the last 3 years our subcommittee has cut about $4 billion from the training and employment programs. We have saved $4 billion over the last 2½ to 3 years in employment and training programs. We are not going back to the 1981 level. We have reduced that.

But I can tell you, Mr. President, that to make these cuts at this particular time for this program is not giving this new program a chance.

I understand, and can be sympathetic with, the problems the subcommittee has. They cannot answer everybody's request for funding for additional programs. But there are a lot of programs in this bill that got pretty good increases. I will not name them. There are groups out there that have very well financed apparatuses, who are able to make sure their programs are taken care of.

Well, they are not doing it to people that go out and have the financial organization or the political organization to come in and really get the message across on how important training is for the economically disadvantaged. The training constituency is not a large constituency, unfortunate as it may be. It ought to be a larger constituency; much larger than it is now. It takes a few of us to stand up on the floor here and offer these amendments, to say that it is wrong, that we disagree with it, we understand what was done, but try to take some corrective measures in this program. If the Senate was serious, which I believe that it was, when it voted unanimously to give this program a new push, get it off the ground, then it will go for this very modest amendment to try to restore approximately one-third of the cuts that have been recommended.

We are not asking to go back to the current level. We are not going to go back to current level. We have already accepted defeat, that we are not going to get there—at least we are not going to get there in the first 6 months. We hope that we can get there beyond. But if we are going to see this program succeed, it is going to have to be financed at an adequate level.

There can be much debate on what is an adequate level. That is why this amendment says we will go ahead and accept those reductions on a modest basis until July 1, which is the beginning of the program year. After that, we would like to see it restored to 1982 funding.

This is not an increase. We are not asking for the whole boat. We are not even asking for a half boat. We are asking for a restoration of one-third of the funds for title II of the economically disadvantaged, primarily the young people in this country who so desperately need our attention.

We make a lot of speeches about industrial policies. Everyone has an industrial policy these days. Reach in your pocket and you have another industrial policy. But every one of them talks about training the young people, giving the opportunities to the structurally hard core unemployed and retraining the dislocated workers.

Mr. WEICKER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. QUAYLE. I shall always yield to my chairman on this matter or other matters in which we have a mutual interest.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I noticed he is representing this as a small amount being added to the bill. I wonder if the Senator will tell me what this adds to the bill in budget authority and what it adds in outlays.

Mr. QUAYLE. In outlays, which are of critical importance, particularly outlays in the next fiscal year, it adds $115 million for 12 years.

In budget authority, it is $364 million.

Mr. WEICKER. $364 million in budget authority and $115 million in outlays.

Mr. QUAYLE. Those are the figures, and I again state that we are looking at the outlays of $115 million for a fiscal year, which is reducing outlays of about $200 million from current funding. We are asking to restore one-third of the cuts from current funding. This is the point. This is not an increase. We are going to reduce, even under the Quayle amendment, by approximately two-thirds, outlays for a 12-year period of time from current funding. Yet this is a new program that the Senate unanimously supported a year ago.

I yield to my good friend from West Virginia.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, is the Senator yielding for purposes of a question?

Mr. QUAYLE. I yield for purposes of a question.

Mr. WEICKER. I want to say I intend to yield to my friend.

Mr. QUAYLE. If he does not wish to yield for the purpose of a question, I shall finish and yield the floor.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I want to commend the Senator. I want to ask him if I may be a cosponsor of the well-reasoned amendment he has offered. Several Senators have joined him in that effort. This is an approach that we should support, and I am just asking if I may be a cosponsor with some others.

I say to the Senator that I think his request is reasonable and I think this is something that we should approve.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I shall conclude in 30 seconds.

This amendment goes to title II, the Job Training Partnership Act. It is restoring one-third of the cuts from current funding. We will still be, even if this amendment is passed—which I anticipate and hope will happen, because this has strong bipartisan support, we have cosponsors on both sides of the aisle—at $200 million below current funding. In fiscal year 1982 dollars it will be $232 million.

We are asking for help and support. These kids need our help. I have heard speeches on training and training opportunities and the idea that we have to help the hard-core structurally unemployed, this is an opportunity to put our votes where our speeches have been. We have made a lot of good speeches. Now, here is a chance to make a small but, I think significant, corrective measure and will not do violence to the new Job Training Partnership Act that is just beginning.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I want to lend my support to the amendment offered by my friend and colleague from Indiana. It is no secret that I do not often agree with my colleagues on the other side of the aisle.

But on this issue, Senator QUAYLE, Senator HATCH, and I are together.

Last year this body voted unanimously to support the Quayle-Kennedy job training bill. October 1 marks the beginning of that new program and with it a fresh start in training the unemployed for jobs.

Unfortunately, the success of this new program is threatened by the funding levels in the bill.

All of us have worked hard to persuade Governors, mayors, and business to take on the difficult task of training the jobless. We have spoken to them of a new era of partnership and cooperation. Washington would provide the resources and business and local government would provide the ideas—the energy and the innovations needed to train and educate those out of work.

But the bill before us reneges on our part of the bargain. We promised that these programs would be judged on performance but, even before the program has a chance to get off the ground, we are cutting the fund by as much as 30 percent.

This amendment would help keep the promise we made. It restores $50 million for this year's program. It will fund next year's program at the current level. I would like to see us do more, but I know the Quayle amendment is the most we can get.

I know there are those who will say that this year we can do more with less, since 70 percent of the funds in title II must be spent for training. But it cannot be done. I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by the Massachusetts Department of Manpower Development, which explains why fewer unemployed will be trained if funds are cut, be printed in the RECORD.

I urge my colleagues to support the Quayle amendment.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM

SEPTEMBER 19, 1983.

To: Patricia Wright for Jack Lew, Office of the Speaker.

From: Kim Kennedy, Massachusetts Dept. of Manpower Development.

Subject: Fiscal Year 1984 Appropriation for the Job Training Partnership Act.

It is my understanding that the House Appropriations Committee, in an effort to avoid a presidential veto of the Labor, HHS appropriations bill, has recommended, among other things, $1.886 billion for JTPA's Title II A. This level of funding, they believe, will ensure the same level of services to participants as provided by CETA funding in FY 1983.

The above assumption is based upon information received from the Reagan Administration indicating that the "unit cost per service year" will be significantly reduced under JTPA. This reduction, it is believed, will result from policy changes that eliminated stipends and placed a strict limitation on the amount of money that can be paid to participants in the form of needs-based payments and other supportive services. Under this assumption, the same number of participants could be served for less money. Hence, a recommendation of $1.886 billion for Title II A of JTPA.

The Massachusetts experience in implementing JTPA, however, provides evidence that this assumption is faulty and that the average cost per participant is, in fact, remaining fairly stable or even rising slightly. In fiscal year 1982, the average cost per participant for Massachusetts CBTA programs was $2,007. While fiscal year 1983 is not yet complete, it is estimated that the average cost per participant will fall between $2,200 and $2,300. Furthermore, local service delivery area job training plans for fiscal year 1984, as approved by the Private Industry Councils and local elected officials, reflect a planned cost per participant of $2,294.

A number of reasons can be cited for this phenomena. First and foremost among them is a change in the type of intervention strategy utilized at the local level, necessitated by policy changes resulting from the transition to JTPA. The following are a few examples of the types of wide-spread changes that are occurring as a result of new JTPA policies:

(1) The new emphasis on performance standards and more rigorous measures of program outcomes, coupled with requirements to serve greater numbers of youths, welfare recipients, and high school dropouts, has meant that longer-term and more costly intervention strategies must be used;

(2) The strict limitations on the cost allocation of expenditures for work experience programs have meant that this program activity, when not coupled with more intensive skills training, will be virtually eliminated. Yet this program was an inexpensive and widely used activity under CETA: and

(3) Because more rigorous program outcome measures have been imposed for in-school youth programs, a return to school will no longer be sufficient to earn a positive outcome. As a result, the non-placement oriented activities most often provided to this population (career employment experience and world of work programs) will be de-emphasized. Unfortunately, these were among the least expensive programs options available under CETA.

In addition to new JTPA policies that have led to more expensive intervention strategies, other policies have placed severe constraints on the SDAs' ability to reduce participant costs. For example, JTPA has imposed a 15 percent limit on expenditures for administrative purposes, reducing the ceiling from the 20 percent allowable under CETA. When writing the legislation, Congress anticipated a consolidation in the number of local service delivery areas. It was assumed, therefore, that these larger areas, each with a greater share of state funding, could support their administrative entities with a smaller share of their allocation.

Unfortunately, this consolidation did not occur. Furthermore, because a threshold level of funding is needed to support basic administrative and programmatic staff, the viability of many areas is threatened by reduced funding. To some extent. SDAs have become increasingly conscientious about apportioning staff costs among the appropriate cost categories (charging the time spent on providing training and supportive services to those activities) instead of simply charging staff time to administration. While this practice may enable them to survive, it is yet another factor that prevents participant costs from declining.

I hope that this information has provided some insight as to why participant costs are not likely to decline under JTPA. The full range of policy changes resulting from the transition to JTPA, not only those relating to the payment of stipends and the provision of supportive services, must be examined to realistically assess unit cost changes. If I may be of further assistance in clarifying this matter, please do not hesitate to contact me at (617) 727-8442.

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues as a cosponsor of this amendment which would add funds to the Job Training Partnership Act.

The Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) which on October 1, 1983, replaced the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act as this Nation's major Federal training program, provides training for disadvantaged individuals, dislocated workers, unemployed youth, the elderly, and others who face barriers to employment.

At a time when 10 million Americans are unemployed and millions more are underemployed, we cannot afford to underfund programs that will provide necessary job skills.

One of the greatest tragedies we face today is that of youth unemployment; a problem especially severe among minority and disadvantaged youth. One program has proven to be especially effective in meeting needs in this area—the Job Corps. Nearly 80 percent of those who remain in the program 1 year or more successfully gain employment and others return to school. The Job Corps program also provides counseling and has meant a second chance for more than 800,000 disadvantaged and discouraged young people. This amendment would insure a more adequate funding level for this highly successfully and much needed program.

Another section of JTPA addresses the needs of dislocated workers—those workers whose former jobs have been permanently lost due to plant closing or technological changes. This amendment would provide additional and necessary funding for what may become the single most important problem facing workers in the next two decades.

Finally, this amendment adds funds to programs which meet the needs of special populations such as migrant and seasonal farmworkers and Native Americans.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this amendment. Although this amendment does not completely meet the tremendous need in this country for training and retraining it represents a further step in the right direction. I thank and commend the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) for his leadership on this vital issue.●

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) has been touted by the Reagan administration as the centerpiece of a renewed effort to assist unemployed disadvantaged adults and youth. This new program encourages the close involvement of the business community as a full partner in employment and training programs. States have a greater say in the types of services provided. An emphasis is placed on actual training.

Now we are implementing the Job Training Partnership Act. It took effect on October 1. Yet the administration has recommended a 30-percent cut in funds compared to current levels. This program—the administration's handiwork—is not even off the ground, but funds are already being cut. Mr. President, when faced with this fact, I must seriously question the administration's commitment to effective job training programs.

The Job Corps is a program that works. The return on investment of this program has been estimated to be approximately 46 percent with a calculated payback period of only 3 years. Unless funds for the Job Corps are maintained at at least current levels, we are throwing away a rate opportunity to prevent thousands of young people from living a tragic life of poverty.

Corps members are youth who are clearly disadvantaged, from poverty backgrounds, and who have not completed high school. The past work histories of most participants are typified by high unemployment, few work hours, low wage rates, and low earnings. The Job Corps gives these young people a chance to leave deprived environments. It provides them with the skills necessary to obtain and hold a job. The Job Corps experience demonstrates that those who are the most disadvantaged can be helped.

Carefully designed evaluations of the program have shown the following:

Approximately 85 percent of Job Corps graduates are placed into jobs and at wage rates averaging $4.65 per hour;

Corps graduates earn substantially more than young people of similar backgrounds who did not participate in the program, and they work more weeks per year;

Future earnings ability of participants in the program were enhanced as a result of obtaining a high school diploma, more attendance at vocational or technical schools, and more enrollments at college.

At a time when the Nation's unemployment rate for all young people is 23 percent and the rate for black teenagers exceeds 53 percent, we should be expanding successful programs to allow greater numbers of people to benefit. At the very least, we should not cut services to needy people.

As the ranking minority member of the Senate Subcommittee on Employment, I am very disturbed by the administration's decision to cut funds for JTPA and Job Corps. I urge the Senate conferees to restore these vital funds, and to maintain the highest possible funding level for these job training programs.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, Saturday, October 1, is not just the beginning of a new fiscal year, it is the official birth of the Job Training Partnership Act. This act, enacted by Congress a year ago and signed by the President on October 13, represents a fresh new start in employment and training policy. At a time when our Nation is working to overcome high structural unemployment among those who are economically disadvantaged, those who face artificial barriers to employment, such as a handicap, and those who have become displaced by changing technologies or international competition, the Job Training Partnership Act is a necessary and potentially effective system for helping people help themselves.

The transition year from CETA to the JTPA has now passed. All of the major components of the new system are falling into place. Business organizations, State, city and county governments, labor unions, and community-based organizations have all rallied their memberships to a cooperative and enthusiastic send off. I do not believe I have ever known a program to inspire such support from such diverse interest groups.

The immediate problem is that Congress is about to drop the ball. Everyone else involved with the new program has been holding up his end, but we are about to pull the rug out from under them to the tune of $350 million the first year. How can we expect local governments and private industry councils to tackle this problem effectively when their funding to do the job has been cut.

Now, I hope there will be a time when I am able to stand on the floor of the Senate and support reductions in these programs because they are no longer needed, or the problem has subsided sufficiently to justify a lower level of spending. Unfortunately, I do not think this is the time. This is a time to renew our commitment to job training.

Job training funds were cut when we enacted the JTPA. Most service delivery areas will already have fewer funds to work with than they had previously under CETA. We anticipate that because 70 percent of the funds must be spent for direct training and the strict 30-percent limitation on administrative and supportive services costs, we will have a fighting chance to maintain some consistent level of service in the transition; however, this will obviously not be possible if we reduce the funding level this year.

The Job Corps, for example, is already pressed to maintain a 40,500 slot capacity as well as make necessary repairs and improvements to the physical plants and facilities of some Job Corps centers. Some safety and health hazards cannot be overlooked any longer.

The Job Corps has been shown time and time again to be one of the most effective programs we have for dealing with unemployed, discouraged youth. The unemployment rate for youth is 23 percent. For minority youth it is nearly 50 percent. The Job Corps provides a unique and effective mix of residential, counseling and job training services to help young people find their place as full, contributing citizens in our society.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment on behalf of economically disadvantaged youth and adults in each of your home States. We must seize this opportunity to make JTPA's first year a successful one, as well as to sustain the 106 Job Corps centers capacity to educate and counsel our Nation's troubled, though hopeful, young people.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the qorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, one of the most difficult jobs I find in trying to lead on this side of the aisle is that, occasionally, I must do things that perhaps I do not agree with personally and certainly I do not like to do because of personal relationships which exist.

I cannot think of a single person in this Chamber whom I admire more than I do the Senator from Indiana. He is not only a bright young Senator; he is destined to be a Senator for a long time, in my opinion, and he fights tenaciously for his point of view. But it is my responsibility and duty to try to support the committee system that has been designed to carry on the business of the Senate.

In this case I find it essential, therefore, that I move to table the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Indiana, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) is necessarily absent.

Mr. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), and the Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) would each vote "Nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). Are the any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 44, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table Mr. QUAYLE's amendment (No. 2291) was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Madam President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I yield for 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from Michigan who is a cosponsor of an amendment with Senator KENNEDY which they kindly have agreed to pull down, but I guaranteed him a right to speak his piece and am pleased to do so.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator.

Madam President, I am pleased to have Senator KENNEDY, who has demonstrated much leadership in the area of health care, join with me as the principle cosponsor of this amendment and to offer this amendment for me. This amendment is designed to provide $900 million to provide payments for health benefits for unemployed workers and their families. This amendment is worded so that funds will only be available if the authorizing legislation we have been considering both in the House and the Senate is signed into law.

As many Senators know there is a critical problem facing millions of Americans who have lost their health insurance when they lose their job. Many times this affects not only the worker, but also his or her family members who relied upon the employment-related health insurance policy for protection against the devastation of illness without access to health care.

Madam President, we have been working very actively to iron out the differences in the various approaches that have been proposed to deal with this critical problem. I have introduced a bill, Senator KENNEDY has introduced a bill, Senators DOLE, HEINZ, QUAYLE, and others have all proposed specific remedies for this national problem. Our staffs have been meeting, and as was announced last week on the Senate floor, we are very close to agreement. It has been a give-and-take situation, but I am confident that we will soon be voting on authorizing legislation designed to address this national tragedy.

The reason why an amendment is needed on a appropriations bill is to assure that the funds will be immediately available to the States as soon as the President signs the bill into law.

Even though the Senate has gone on record two times in the last 4 months demonstrating its overwhelming support for meeting the health care needs of unemployed workers, we have yet to enact legislation in this body. It now looks like legislation will be enacted before the 1st session of the 98th Congress and it is essential that we have funds in place and available as soon as this legislation becomes law. Let us not find ourselves creating the situation where we enact legislation only to fail to provide funds to implement it.

It is important to reiterate that the issue before us today does not relate to how we should deal with this critical problem. Rather the amendment before us today is simply to assure that when we finally agree on a method of meeting this urgent need, that funds will be immediately available. It is also important to restate that the amendment we are offering today is contingent upon the enactment of authorizing legislation and that no funds can be spent until such authorizing legislation has been signed into law.

Madam President, I believe it is clear that we will soon have a bill creating the authorizing statute before us sometime this month. The House has already passed authorizing legislation with a 78-vote margin of 252 to 174. We need to assure that adequate funds will be available upon enactment and, therefore, I urge all of my colleagues to join us in supporting this amendment.

Madam President, I understand that the amendment, the health insurance benefits for unemployed workers, has been set aside at the desk, and it is my understanding that the Senator from Connecticut has indicated earlier in the colloquy with the Senator from Massachusetts that it is his intention to help us see to it that in the supplemental we will provide the $900 million of funding. At that point we should have an authorization for these health care benefits coming down the line.

I assume that that means that not only will we be working together in that regard but it will be a joint effort that if the authorization comes at some point before the supplemental the Senator would help in any way possible to see to it that we get the funding available once the authorization is in place.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I gave those assurances to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and gave it to my friend, the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I wonder if the Senator would also at this time complete it. As I understand it, does not the amendment have to be withdrawn? I think it is still at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, the amendment is pending.

Mr. RIEGLE. Madam President, on the basis of the colloquy and understanding, I ask that the amendment be withdrawn at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT BOARD STUDY

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, it has come to my attention that the "last person service" provision of the railroad retirement system needs examination.

It is my hope that the following colloquy between the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee and myself will suffice as legislative history to indicate that from the appropriations provided to the Railroad Retirement Board by the bill being considered today the Board is to conduct a study.

"Last person service" means that an individual must cease working for his current employer in order to receive his railroad retirement pension. This same person could work somewhere else with certain earnings restrictions. He or she simple could not work for the "last person" for whom he or she worked when applying for railroad retirement benefits.

I would ask that the Board study the problems and cases resulting from this law and examine the fiscal implications of putting an alternative $2,500 earning limit on the last person service requirement. It is my understanding from the Railroad Retirement Board that this study can be done with no additional appropriation necessary.

In addition, Mr. President, I would like to point out to my colleagues that a similar colloquy between Chairman NATCHER and Congressman BILL GOODLING took place on September 22, 1983, and that Chairman NATCHER expressed his committee's support for such a study.

Mr. WEICKER. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for bringing this to our attention. The Railroad Retirement Board has informed me that it is interested in conducting such a study and that it will incur no extra cost. Therefore, the committee intends that this study be carried out.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the chairman for his assistance in this matter.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the distinguished chairman, how much has been set aside in this bill for the migrant student record transfer system and interstate coordination?

Mr. WEICKER. As indicated in our report the committee level for migrant programs includes $7 million for the migrant student record transfer system.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. Chairman, could we get an agreement that this amount be set aside specifically for the MSRTS and interstate coordination program.

Mr. WEICKER. That is the intent of the committee.

Mr. BUMPERS. I thank the chairman for his assistance in resolving a problem created by the Department of Education's failure to make available the full amount needed to adequately administer this program. It is a very worthwhile program. It has been responsible for the graduation from high school of over 6,000 migrant students each year. This is quite an increase over the less than 200 migrant students who graduated each year before this program was initiated.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the committee-approved Labor-HHS and Education appropriations bill. I applaud the efforts of the committee leadership, particularly those of the distinguished chairman and ranking member of the subcommittee, Mr. WEICKER and Mr. PROXMIRE, in expediting consideration of this important legislation. For the first time in a number of years, we have the opportunity to enact a Labor-HHS and Education bill.

Mr. President, the task which faces this subcommittee is a most difficult one. The programs under the subcommittee's jurisdiction have a direct impact on the quality of all our lives. As a member of the full committee, I can assure my colleagues that the Senator from Connecticut has bent over backward to address the concerns raised not only by the members of the subcommittee, but also those brought to his attention by the members of the full committee and the entire Senate.

Mr. President, I wish especially to commend the chairman of the subcommittee and his excellent staff, for the help and cooperation they have extended to this Senator. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 3913, as reported by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and to oppose add ons which may jeopardize enactment of this well-balanced measure.

COLLOQUY REGARDING AMENDMENT NO. 2272

Mr. DECONCINI. I would like to clarify the chairman's interpretation of the committee's intent regarding fiscal year 1984 funding for part D, section 130 of the Rehabilitation Act which enables Indian tribes to provide rehabilitation services on Indian lands.

Indian rehabilitation projects are identified as being eligible for funding by appropriations through section 100(a)(3). I understand that it is the committee's intention to make available $700,000 under section 100(a)(3) of the Rehabilitation Act for all Indian tribes to deliver rehabilitation services on their reservation.

The need for rehabilitation services in Indian county is tremendous because historically Indians are an underserved group. I would appreciate knowing of the chairman's views on this matter.

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator from Arizona is correct in his interpretation of the committee's intent. He may be assured that $700,000 will be available in this measure for Indian tribal rehabilitation projects. I will be happy to communicate with the Department on this very subject.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator very much for his support and commitment to resolving this problem.

CORPORATION FOR PUBLIC BROADCASTING

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I address my question to the distinguished floor manager of the bill, Senator WEICKER. It is my understanding that the fiscal year 1984 appropriation for the Department of Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies contains $130 million in advance funding for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, is that correct?

Mr. WEICKER. The Senator is correct. There is $130 million in this bill to be made available to the Corporation in fiscal year 1986. This is the same amount as was provided in last year's bill, and it is the authorization ceiling as well.

Mr. BYRD. I believe that for fiscal year 1982 the Congress appropriated $172 million and that this amount was cut to $137 million for fiscal year 1983 and further reduced to $130 million for each subsequent fiscal year through 1986. So, with inflation, the fiscal year 1986 funding will probably purchase only one-half of what the appropriation for fiscal year 1982 did.

Even on its limited budget, I believe that the Corporation for Public Broadcasting is doing a splendid job of providing high quality program material to the American viewing and listening public. This belief is confirmed by the four Emmy Awards recently won by programs sponsored by public television. So, Mr. President, I am proud of the job being done by the Corporation, and and I believe that many of my colleagues are as well.

Now, I understood the chairman of the subcommittee to say that the $130 million included in this bill represents the full amount authorized to be appropriated. Considering the broad congressional support for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, would the Senator from Connecticut be willing to work with me to try to raise the authorization ceiling and to subsequently increase the appropriation level for the Corporation to at least cover those additional costs due to inflation.

Mr. WEICKER. I wish to assure the Senator from West Virginia that I share his interest in the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and will work with him on this matter to raise the funding level.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise in support for increasing appropriations for the Senior Companion programs

(SCP) which are administered by the ACTION Agency. The additional $6 million will increase the number of programs which will serve elderly citizens in their homes and increase their independency. The Senior Companion volunteers are provided an opportunity to assist others and feel they are providing a worthwhile service. It is projected by the ACTION Agency that in fiscal year 1984 the Senior Companion programs expect to fund 3,900 volunteers in 76 projects and serve 16,975 clients daily. The program has demonstrated the value of Senior Companions in facilitating early release from institutions, deferring institutionalization, and the benefits of one-to-one, in-home care in helping older people achieve and maintain the highest level of independent living.

S. 1129 passed by the Senate on September 14 includes a provision to increase the number of SCP programs and strengthen the training component. Especially those States which currently have only one Senior Companion program will benefit from this additional appropriations. I encourage my fellow Senators to support the proposed increase.

JOB TRAINING BLOCK GRANT

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I share the concern of many of my colleagues here about the fact that the continuing resolution extends the job training block grant at a level almost $300 million below 1983 funding.

There are, of course, many programs that are funded at lower levels under the resolution. While this is a concern, and a good incentive for us to pass a 1984 appropriations bill, it is a particular problem in the case of the block grant for job training.

The States and private industry are geared up to go forward with the new block grant. A smooth transition from CETA to the new block is best achieved by a steady flow of funds. We risk a disruption and a shaky start if we put a squeeze on the flow of dollars in the first quarter, then gear back up or flood the pipeline later.

Even more important is the signal we send the States by any reduction in funds for the new program.

Like other members of the Appropriations Committee, I looked into things like carryover funds from 1983 and the projected lower unit costs for the new program. We are kind of working in the dark in these areas, because we are talking about a new program.

However, we are talking about high intensity, longer term job training. We know the Governors will have new responsibilities for developing performance standards and labor market information. Factors like these can eat up carryover funds and raise unit costs above our estimates.

The real issue here is that we should not be talking about cutting it thin at all. Unemployment is still 9.5 percent nationwide. Joblessness for blacks is 20 percent and among black youth is 53 percent. There are over 10 million people out of work.

Here we have a new program designed to train the disadvantaged and dislocated workers for private sector jobs. Its success depends on confidence and involvement of the private sector and the States. It is an investment in productivity and the future. We owe it to the unemployed, and the States and the private sector, to make the same commitment we are asking them to make in the program.●

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I support the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education, and related agencies appropriation bill as reported by the committee.

H.R. 3913 provides $92.5 billion in budget authority and $80.8 billion in outlays for programs of the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education, and related agencies.

With adjustments to reflect, first, outlays from prior year budget authority, second, possible later requirements, and third, mandatory program adjustments to the first budget resolution levels, the bill is $2.1 billion below the subcommittee's 302(b) budget authority allocation and $0.1 billion in outlays over its outlay allocation under the first budget resolution.

With respect to the credit budget, the Senate-reported bill provides $0.6 billion in new direct loan obligations and $6.9 billion in new primary loan guarantee commitments. The total for direct loan obligations is $54 million below the level assumed in the first budget resolution. The Senate-reported total for new primary loan guarantees is $11 million under the first budget resolution level.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two tables showing the relationship of the reported bill, together with possible later requirements, to the congressional spending and credit budgets and the President's budget request be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Madam President, I had given considerable thought to introducing a sense-of-the-Senate amendment to this bill which would call on President Reagan to request the resignation of Mr. Watt.

I saw in the wire today the following, which is an excerpt, and I shall ask unanimous consent later to have the entire wire story printed in the RECORD.

A White House spokesman said Tuesday a congressional resolution calling for Interior Secretary James Watt's resignation will not influence President Reagan, because "the case is closed."

And Watt spokesman, Douglas Baldwin, repeated "We see nothing" that indicates the Secretary will step down.

Madam President, I had a colloquy last week with the distinguished majority leader. I indicated to him that it was not my intention to attempt to amend the unemployment compensation bill because that bill had an expiration date on it of Friday midnight.

At that time I also indicated that it would not be my desire to attempt to attach the amendment to the continuing resolution because that also had an expiration deadline of midnight on Friday.

Furthermore, I indicated I would not offer it to the intelligence authorization bill or the Martin Luther King bill.

But I made no such promises with respect to this appropriations bill, and I thought it only fair to the majority leader that I alert him to the fact that it was my intention to offer, or at least I was considering offering the amendment to this measure.

I called him and so informed him, and he indicated to me his hope that I would not offer it to this measure.

I have a very, very high respect for the majority leader, and I do not have to state my fondness for him. But I do recognize that he has to lead the Senate. He has to make sure that the legislative program goes forward. So based on his request in this instance, I do not intend to offer this sense-of-the-Senate amendment to this bill.

Subsequently to my telling the majority leader, I told the manager of the bill, Mr. WEICKER, that I had an amendment and had intended to call it up to this bill but that I was not going to because the majority leader has kindly requested me not to do so at this point.

So I am not going to go forward today with this amendment which I hold in my hand.

Now, the majority leader and I know that at some point I intend to offer this resolution or I will take my chances on it when the State authorization bill comes back before the Senate. That bill has been displaced, I believe, by the majority leader's motion to go to this appropriations bill, but when it comes back to the Senate it will have my amendment pending.

As a matter of fact, I would much rather have offered it to this appropriations bill than to wait, but I will wait as I told the majority leader I would in this instance.

So I yield at this point most respectfully to the majority leader but I ask that I may retain the floor for the time being.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, the unanimous-consent request of the minority leader was granted, I believe, that he retain the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. Thank you.

May I say to the minority leader and all Senators that I am grateful to him for his decision not to offer the Watt amendment to this appropriations bill. I suppose in addition to the spirit of cooperation that exists between the two of us in trying to do the business of the Senate his experience as majority leader may even dispose him to be more considerate than most because he does understand the difficulty we have in trying to make things come out even, and one of the things we have to make come out are appropriations bills. So I freely acknowledge, as the minority leader has already stated, that I lodged with him a request that he not offer a Watt amendment, the Watt amendment previously offered to this bill. I have no incentive to offer him, I have no quid pro quo I can give him, but I feel the interest of the Senate in the furtherance of our effort to pass as many appropriations bills as possible was justification for me to do that, and he quickly assented and I wish to express my gratitude and appreciation for it.

Let me say one other thing, and the reason I wanted to make sure the minority leader retained his right to the floor pursuant to the unanimous-consent request he put, is this: There is not the slightest doubt on Earth that he can get an amendment up on Watt at just about any time he wants to because it is a sense-of-the-Senate resolution and therefore declarative and not legislative, it can go on an appropriations bill because under the precedents of the Senate only after the majority leader he is entitled to priority of recognition as he has just demonstrated, and very properly so.

So I have no illusions about that. As I said a day or two ago in the well of the Senate on the floor and to the press who were here, in dugout chatter as we say, one of these days he can do that, the minority leader can get that up if he wants it up, and I assume he does, he sure does act like it, and I do not blame him for that. But I want it clearly understood by my colleagues on this side of the aisle, and certainly I am sure it is understood by his own, and by the administration downtown, that we are not having to deal with the Watt amendment on this bill because the minority leader chose not to do so, not because I could prevent him or anybody else could prevent him, and one of these days I suppose we will probably have to deal with that. But I think it was a great contribution to the efficiency and efficacy of the Senate's action that the minority leader has decided against offering his amendment at this time.

He knows I am opposed to this amendment, that I will vote against it, and when the time comes I will try to defeat it, but that time has not come because of the good grace of the minority leader, and I thank him.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader. I am under no illusions that I can have an up or down vote. A motion to table would probably be made and I understand that. But in this instance I am very willing to accede to the request of the majority leader. He has been very kind to the minority, he has indulged a lot of requests from this side, and I am very understanding of his duties and problems.

That having been said, Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the news wire I hold in my hand be inserted in the RECORD in its entirety at this point, and in making this request I do not give up the floor.

There being no objection, the wire was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHITE HOUSE: SENATE VOTE WILL NOT DECIDE WATT'S FUTURE

WASHINGTON (UPI).—A White House spokesman said Tuesday a congressional resolution calling for Interior Secretary James Watt's resignation will not influence President Reagan, because "the case is closed."

And Watt spokesman Douglas Baldwin repeated "we see nothing" that indicates the secretary will step down.

Watt has made no public appearances since the flap arose over a remark he made last month, when he described his advisory coal leasing panel as consisting of "a black . . . a woman, two Jews and a cripple."

"He has a lot of work to catch up with," Baldwin said in a telephone interview, and he has not been seen in public recently only because he "travels in spurts."

Republican leader Howard Baker has promised a Senate vote on a resolution proposed by Democratic leader Robert Byrd calling for Watt's ouster, but he said it probably will not come up until after next week's Columbus Day recess.

When deputy White House press secretary Larry Speakes was asked Tuesday if Reagan would be "influenced" by passage of the resolution, he replied, "No."

"The case is closed and the matter is behind us," he said.

Asked if Watt would resign if the Senate resolution is approved, Baldwin replied at the Interior Department, "That's one we can't respond to, because it's an 'if' question."

He added, however, that the secretary "serves at the pleasure of the president."

Baldwin declined to say whether Reagan has had any personal comment. Speakes has said on several occasions that Reagan has not talked to Watt personally in the aftermath of the flap.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, will the Senator yield to me without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., HOLIDAY BILL

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, may I say to the minority leader this is a separate and distinct issue and maybe this is not the right time to bring it up but I cannot resist.

Since it appears we are going to get final passage on this bill the question naturally comes back on what do we do next, and as of this moment, we have a vote on cloture on the motion to proceed to consideration of the Martin Luther King holiday bill tomorrow 1 hour after we convene and after the establishment of a quorum.

I have reason to think there is some chance we could vitiate that and that we could even set a time certain for final passage, the vote on final passage of the Martin Luther King bill. I have instructed the staff on this side and cloakroom to circulate a unanimous-consent request, which I will not now make, and I am saying this so that all Senators would be on notice, which would provide that when we return not on the 17th, when many Senators will be necessarily absent, but on Tuesday, the 18th of October, the Senate convene at an early hour, say at 10 o'clock in the morning, and that provision be made for a motion to commit, which I understand the Senator from North Carolina wishes to make, and a time limitation and that a time limitation then be applied to amendments, without specifying amendments but generally to amendments, and that a time certain for final passage on Wednesday in the afternoon, I would suggest at 2 o'clock.

I say to my friend, the minority leader, I think I can clear that on this side, and now, having said that, I will sit down and await patiently the reply from my cloakroom, but mostly I will await the reply of the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader and that was why I wanted to retain the floor briefly. I wanted to inquire of the majority leader as to what his plans may be with respect to the remainder of the week, and as far into next week as he could see, and in the meantime I, of course, am attempting to run this request through this side of the aisle. A good many Senators are on the floor so we take for granted if we hear no objection from them, as far as they are concerned, the matter is cleared. But each of us will run the cloakroom, as the majority leader has already indicated he is doing.

I yield the floor.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Madam President——

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Let me say one other thing, if I may, and I should have included it in the previous statement to the minority leader: On tomorrow, if the unanimous consent in respect to vitiating the cloture vote is agreed to, it would be my expectation that we would try to go to a farm bill which Senators HUDDLESTON and HELMS and DOLE have indicated would be in stripped-down form, and is essential to the intelligence authorization bill, and then of course there is another appropriations bill that might be reached later in the week.

I do not anticipate that the Senate can get out earlier than the close of business on Friday but if that unanimous-consent agreement is entered into I think the odds are good that we could make our Friday request time in good time.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Let me yield first to the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I just wanted the majority leader to state again the parameters of the unanimous-consent request dealing with the Martin Luther King bill so we can really get down to business on this side to see if we can agree to a time limitation.

Mr. BAKER. Why do I not just read it as I have dictated it to our staff and as it is now running our hotline procedure for clearance. The request, which I am not now making, would be as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that at 10 a.m. on Tuesday, October 18, the Senate proceed to the consideration of H.R. 3706, the Martin Luther King, Jr. holiday bill, and at that time the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) be recognized to offer a motion to commit the bill to the Judiciary Committee.

I further ask unanimous consent that on the Helms motion debate be limited to 20 minutes equally divided between the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee or their designees.

Further, I ask unanimous consent that if the Helms motion fails, the bill be open to amendments to be limited to 1 hour each equally divided between the mover of the amendment and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee or their designees.

Mr. President, I would add in that a provision for second-degree amendments and that would be—I will put half of the time, 30 minutes equally divided, on second-degree amendments, points of order or appeals if the same are submitted to the Senate.

Finally, I ask unanimous consent that the final passage of H.R. 3706 occur on or before 2 p.m. on Wednesday, October 19.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, I see one hole in this, in that there is nothing in the agreement to guarantee against amendments that are not germane.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, that is correct. I will include that no amendments be in order except amendments which are germane to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. BYRD. That is all right with me. If we could have a few minutes to run the request through our cloakroom.

Madam President, I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Madam President, will the majority leader be good enough to advise all of us about the joint meeting or the joint session of the House and the Senate tomorrow at 10:30 a.m. and whether, under those circumstances, all committee hearings scheduled for that hour are expected to go forward? I am just asking as a point of information, really, where we should be.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I thank the Senator for his inquiry. That was going to be part of my wrap-up announcement. While so many Senators are on the floor, may I begin by urging Members—most earnestly urging Members—to be present to form up as a body to march to the hall of the House of Representatives to hear the address of the President of West Germany in a joint meeting—not joint session, but a joint meeting—of the House and the Senate.

The provision I will make later, or attempt to make, would be that the Senate will come in at 10 o'clock and at 10:10 o'clock we would start marching to the House of Representatives and at 11:30 a.m. we would reconvene in the Senate to resume the business of the Senate.

Madam President, I do not know what to say about the committees. I urge Members not to let committee meetings interfere with the joint meeting. I think our guest from Germany would be mighty offended if we did not have a good, solid representation from the Senate.

So I urge the chairman and ranking members to consider that they should recess their committees at the same time the Senate recesses.

Mr. BYRD. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. There is nothing to keep those committees from meeting during a recess, but the majority leader is urging the committees not to meet. I hope that our committees would not be in session during that recess because I agree with the majority leader that it would be an offense, I would think, for the President of West Germany to appear before a joint meeting of the two Houses without good attendance. And I am concerned about that attendance.

Mr. BAKER. So am I. I thank the minority leader. I urge Members to form together and to attend that meeting.

Madam President, I thank the managers in particular and I thank all Senators. I urge now we proceed to third reading.

Mr. HELMS. One second, if I may. Did I understand the distinguished majority leader to say that final passage with regard to the King resolution would be on Wednesday?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Madam President, I did say that. The reason for it is there is a requirement for a number of Senators to be out of the city on Monday. I should have talked to the Senator from North Carolina ahead of time. I gave that to our clearance clerks. I hope that is not a problem for the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. That is fine with me. I just hoped that we could save a day.

Mr. BAKER. I wish we could. I have to lose that day, and maybe we will not. I think there is a strong reason why we should do it Tuesday and Wednesday instead of Monday and Tuesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I made no opening statement on this legislation, preferring to await the judgment of the Senate. I think my colleagues have made all the statement that is necessary by virtue of doing something that has not been done in 5 years. I now hope we can proceed to a final vote on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill, having been read the third time, the question is, Shall the bill pass? The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) and the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) are necessarily absent.

Mr. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), and the Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), and the Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) would each vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any other Senator in the Chamber who desires to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 70, nays 23, as follows:

So the bill (H.R. 3913), as amended, was passed.

Mr. WEICKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. WEICKER. Madam President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments on H.R. 3913 and request a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to and the Presiding Officer (Mrs. KASSEBAUM) appointed Mr. WEICKER, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. CHILES, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. INOUYE, and Mr. STENNIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONGRATULATIONS TO MANAGERS AND STAFF

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I take this opportunity to extend my congratulations to the managers on both sides and their staffs. I am looking at today's calendar of business, on the back of which is a chart called "Status of Appropriation Bills, First Session, 98th Congress." This is the fourth day of October and on that, I see that we have 12 appropriations bills reported by our committee; 4 of them have become law, 2 on the President's desk; 9 of them passed by the Senate; and I can recall previous Octobers when there has not been a single entry on that column. I think the Senate owes a special vote of thanks to the chairman of the committee (Mr. HATFIELD), and the ranking minority member (Mr. STENNIS), to the chairman of the subcommittee in this case for managing this bill (Mr. WEICKER), and Senator PROXMIRE for his management on behalf of the minority. They have both done an extraordinary job in bringing this matter to a conclusion at this time.

I am advised that we spent 7 hours on this bill. There were 23 amendments and passage in the space of 1 day. That must be close to a record for consideration of a Labor-HHS appropriations bill. If my memory serves me, we have not even passed a Labor-HHS appropriations bill for 5 years. They have all been funded through continuing resolutions.

We still have not passed this one. We go to conference now with the House and I have great confidence that Senator WEICKER and Senator PROXMIRE will ably represent the point of view of the Senate and that the bill that comes out of the conference committee will be a good bill, as first presented ot the House and the Senate and then to the President for his signature.

Madam President, I think they have done a remarkable job, all of those who have participated, but Senator WEICKER and Senator PROXMIRE in particular deserve a special vote of thanks and gratitude for the expeditous handling of a very, very difficult measure, which, in the past, has baffled both the House and the Senate in their best efforts.

Mr. BYRD. Will the majority leader yield, Madam President?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. BYRD. I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the majority leader. I, too, congratulate Senator WEICKER and Senator PROXMIRE. The Senate can be proud also for the consideration and understanding they gave to Senators who offered amendments and participated in the debate.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I know full well that many Senators voted on tabling motions and on amendments that they preferred not to, but it is a measure of the responsibility of Members that they comported themselves as well as they did.

THE MARTIN LUTHER KING HOLIDAY BILL

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I indicated earlier that I hoped to get unanimous consent on the Martin Luther King holiday bill. I cannot propose that agreement tonight because the clearance process has not yet been completed. I have high confidence that we can do it in the morning. Since I am not able to clear that tonight, I am obligated to try to make arrangements for the Senate tomorrow on the assumption that we shall have to go through with a cloture vote. As I say, I do not think we will, but I cannot say I am prepared at this time to ask that the vote be vitiated.

Mr. BYRD. If the majority leader will yield, just in the event he might not be sure what the situation is on this side, we have cleared the matter. I hope he will be glad to hear it.

Mr. BAKER. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. BYRD. Let us hope it does not come unstuck overnight.

Mr. BAKER. I hope not. I am tempted to come in very early.

11-059 O-87-43 (Pt. 19)

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9:45 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 9:45 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR REDUCTION OF LEADER TIME

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that, on tomorrow only, the time for the two leaders under the standing order be reduced to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER. I may say for the record that I consulted with the minority leader on that request and he kindly concurred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS, RECESS FROM 10:10 A.M. UNTIL 11:30 A.M. RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that after that time for the recognition of the two leaders under the abbreviated standing order, the time remaining before the hour of 10:10 a.m. be devoted to the transaction of routine morning business and that, at the hour of 10:10 a.m. tomorrow, the Senate stand in recess so it may proceed as a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives for a joint meeting with the House, to reconvene at 11:30 a.m., at which time, three Senators will be recognized on special orders for not to exceed 15 minutes each as follows: Senators MATTINGLY, CHILES, and GORTON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR FURTHER PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS AND ORDER OF PROCEDURE TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, after the recognition of the three Senators on special order, I ask that there be a further period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend past 1 p.m. with statements therein limited to 10 minutes each, and that at 1 p.m. the 1 hour contemplated by rule XXII prior to cloture vote begin to run with the mandatory quorum provided by rule XXII being waived.

Mr. BYRD. Reserving the right to object, which for the record would mean that the vote would occur at what?

Mr. BAKER. Yes. Let me go ahead and include that.

And that at 2 p.m. the vote on cloture to close debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of H.R. 3706, the Martin Luther King, Jr., holiday bill occur.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I change the time so that the cloture vote will occur at 1:30, and the 1 hour under rule XXII will commence at 12:30. I make that amendment to my request.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I did include the waiver of the madatory quorum, did I not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

SENATOR MOYNIHAN AND THE HUMPHREY AWARD

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, in late 1981 the American Political Science Association established the Hubert H. Humphrey Award to recognize "notable public service by a political scientist." The award is one of only three lifetime career honors bestowed by the association in recognition of especially noteworthy achievement.

I am pleased to report, Mr. President, that the first recipient of the Humphrey Award has now been selected. He is the distinguished senior Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN). The Hubert H. Humphrey Award is, of course, named for our late and beloved colleague and President of the Senate and it is quite appropriate that a Member of this body be chosen as its first recipient.

The association presented the Humphrey Award to Mr. MOYNIHAN on September 1, 1983 during its annual meeting in Chicago. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the presentation announcement, delivered by Prof. Frank J. Sorauf of the University of Minnesota, be entered at this point in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the announcement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESENTATION BY PROF. FRANK J. SORAUF

This is the first time The Association has given the Hubert Humphrey Award. It was established to recognize "notable public service by a political scientist." In addition to myself the award committee was composed of Adam Ulam of Harvard University, the chairman, and John Kessel of the Ohio State University. Professor Ulam regrets very much that he cannot be here this evening.

We are pleased to present the Humphrey Award to the senior senator from New York, Daniel Patrick Moynihan. His career is, in our judgement, a remarkable combination of service to the academy and to the nation. To his public service he has brought a freshness of thought and an intellectual independence that best exemplifies the uses of knowledge in the public service. He has also brought both to the academy and to public life a wit and exuberance that are rare in both.

Senator Moynihan received the Ph.D. from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. He held academic appointments at Harvard University between 1966 and 1976 in education, urban politics, and government, and from 1966 to 1969 he served as director of the Harvard-MIT Joint Center for Urban Studies. He is the coauthor of Beyond the Melting Pot (with Nathan Glazer) and the author of Maximum Feasible Misunderstanding (1969) and The Politics of a Guaranteed Income (1973), as well as many other books, essays, and articles. Since this is a reward for "notable public service", let me remind you briefly of the Senator's record. He began it as secretary to the governor of New York, and in the 1960's and 1970's he served the administrations of four different presidents in various capacities, including two which carried Cabinet status. Between 1973 and 1976 he was the U.S. Ambassador to India and then to the United Nations. He was elected to the senate in 1976 and reelected in 1982.

In making this award we have not sought a replica or approximation of Hubert Humphrey, but we are nonetheless pleased that this first award goes to a colleague who shares so many of the Humphrey qualities—a deeply felt social concern, a belief that the public's problems can be solved by the intelligent use of public policy, and even that gift for abundant eloquence. Senator Moynihan also shares with Hubert Humphrey an extraordinary breadth of public experience: executive and legislative, national and local.

Senator Moynihan, you honor us by your presence this evening. It is a very great pleasure to present this award to you in memory of a great American and on behalf of a grateful Association.

Mr. BYRD. I yield the floor.

EXTENSION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, if the minority leader has no objection, I would like to put a request that arrangements being made for the session of the Senate tomorrow and related mattes be inserted in the RECORD in a period for the transaction of routine morning business, and I request that that period extend to 7:10 p.m. in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I have a few calendar items that I believe I can do quickly, if the minority leader is agreeable.

Mr. BYRD. I have examined these items which the majority leader has in mind, and I am agreeable to transacting this business.

NATIONAL EYE HEALTH CARE MONTH

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 54) to authorize and request the President to designate the month of January 1984 as "National Eye Health Care Months," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed,

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 54

Whereas the precious gift of eyesight is recognized as the most valuable of the senses;

Whereas the National Society to Prevent Blindness declares that half of all blindness can be prevented when early attention by medical eye doctors is sought and obtained;

Whereas newborns and the elderly are particularly susceptible to diseases and tumors of the eye; and

Whereas the quality of medical eye health care available in America is the finest in the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States of America is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the month of January 1984 as "National Eye Health Care Month" and urging all Americans to join in this observance and to seek direct help from medical eye doctors when eye conditions which may lead to blindness are experienced.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL PROFESSIONAL SECURITY MONTH

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 114) to request the President to proclaim September 1983 as "National Professional Security Month," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 114

Whereas security practitioners are dedicated to protecting the assets—people, property, and information—of private industry, government, and public institutions; and

Whereas the efforts of these professionals have significantly reduced the losses caused by a wide range of crimes committed against banks, schools, hotels, hospitals, museums, retail outlets, and the countless other organizations that employ their services; and

Whereas these same security professionals have demonstrated outstanding service in preventing or minimizing losses to the community from such natural or manmade disasters as fires, riots, strikes, and other civil disorders; and

Whereas the American Society for Industrial Security has designated the month of September 1983 to honor security professionals throughout the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of September 1983 be designated "National Professional Security Month", and that the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on all Government agencies and upon all the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL HOME CARE WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 122) to designate the week of November 27, 1983, through December 3, 1983, as "National Home Care Week," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 122

Whereas organized home health care services to the elderly and disabled have existed in this country since the last quarter of the eighteenth century;

Whereas home health care is recognized as an effective and economical alternative to unnecessary institutionalization;

Whereas caring for the ill and disabled in their homes places emphasis on the dignity and independence of the individual receiving these services;

Whereas since the enactment of the medicare program, including skilled nursing services, physical therapy, speech therapy, social services, occupational therapy, and home health aide services, the number of home health agencies providing these services has increased from less than five hundred to more than three thousand; and

Whereas many private and charitable organizations provide these and similar services to millions of patients each year preventing, postponing, and limiting the need for institutionalization: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of November 27, 1983, through December 3, 1983, is designated as "National Home Care Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL PORT WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 145) to designate the week of October 2, 1983, through October 8, 1983, as "National Port Week," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 145

Whereas the past development of the public ports of the United States is the result of a fruitful partnership with the Federal Government constructing and maintaining the navigable waterways and harbors of the United States, and local municipalities assuming major responsibility for land-based port development;

Whereas the commercial seaports and inland river ports of the Nation are indispensable to foreign and domestic waterborne commerce and to the economic well-being and national security of the United States;

Whereas the maintenance and development of a national network of commercial ports is vital to expanded international trade and to the attainment of a favorable trade balance;

Whereas commercial ports serving the waterborne commerce of the United States are responsible for the continued employment of more than one million workers and in 1981 generated a total of $66,000,000,000 in direct and indirect benefits to the United States economy;

Whereas there is a continuing need to focus public attention upon the value of a viable and competitive system of commercial ports; and

Whereas a National Port Week observance promotes public recognition of the vital role that ocean and inland ports have played in the economic growth and national security of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of October 2, 1983, through October 8, 1983, is designated as "National Port Week" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation to invite the Governors of the several States, the chief officials of local governments, and the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL REHABILITATION FACILITIES WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 147) to designate the week of September 25, 1983, through October 1, 1983, as "National Rehabilitation Facilities Week," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 147

Whereas over thirty-five million Americans suffer from physical or mental disabilities;

Whereas over one million additional Americans become disabled each year due to chronic disease, birth defects, or traumatic injury resulting from auto, sports, and other accidents;

Whereas many of these people will receive public or private financial assistance without rehabilitation services at great cost to private industry and the public;

Whereas there are over four thousand comprehensive rehabilitation facilities throughout the Nation;

Whereas such facilities provide to over one million disabled people a year comprehensive medical and vocational rehabilitation services not available in general hospitals;

Whereas the services and expertise provided by the personnel of such facilities are instrumental in enabling disabled people to return home or to resume working; and

Whereas an increase in national awareness and recognition of rehabilitation facilities will help the Nation further understand the needs and abilities of disabled people: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of September 25, 1983, through October 1, 1983, is designated as "National Rehabilitation Facilities Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL DISABLED VETERAN'S WEEK

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 155) designating the week beginning November 6, 1983, as "National Disabled Veteran's Week," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 155

Whereas there are two million five hundred thousand disabled veterans in the United States;

Whereas disabled veterans have sacrificed their well-being in the service of their country;

Whereas disabled veterans endure severe disabilities, such as loss of limb, paralysis, blindness, deafness, and delayed stress syndrome;

Wheras 16 to 35 per centum of all disabled veterans are jobless as a result of their disabilities; and

Whereas disabled veterans have made important contributions to national welfare: Now, therefore, be it:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in recognition of the contributions that disabled veterans have made to the welfare of the United States, the week beginning November 6, 1983, is designated "National Disabled Veteran's Week". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all Government agencies and the people of the United States to observe that week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL SICKLE-CELL ANEMIA AWARENESS MONTH

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 168) to provide for the designation of a month as "National Sickle-Cell Anemia Awareness Month," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 168

Whereas sickle-cell anemia is a life-threatening disease in which normal, round, red blood cells become distorted and take on the long and pointed shape of a sickle, due to the presence of an abnormal hemoglobin;

Whereas one in every ten black Americans carries the sickle-cell trait, and one in five hundred black Americans is stricken by the disease itself;

Whereas there exists no cure for this painful and crippling disease which denies a full life to many of its victims and creates intense pain and deep depression;

Whereas the disease and trait are both transmitted genetically from one or both parents who carries the trait, and it is vital that Americans, particularly black Americans, be tested for sickle-cell anemia to determine whether they carry or might transmit the trait; and

Whereas it is important to educate the public about sickle-cell anemia to promote awareness and support for research and treatment of this disease: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation which—

(1) designates the month of September 1983, as "National Sickle-Cell Anemia Awareness Month"; and

(2) calls upon the people of the United States to observe that month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER FOR H.R. 3379 TO BE HELD AT THE DESK

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I believe this has been cleared. I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 3379 be held at the desk until the close of business on tomorrow, Wednesday, October 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY—TREATY DOCUMENT NO. 98-10

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, as in executive session, if the minority leader does not object, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from an amendment to the 1973 Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (Treaty Document No. 98-10), which was transmitted to the Senate today by the President of the United States.

I also ask that the treaty be considered as having been read the first time; that it be referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed; and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The President's message follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, with a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to acceptance, an Amendment to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES) done at Washington, March 3, 1973. The Amendment provides for accession by regional economic integration organizations to CITES and, upon entry into force, would permit the European Community to become Party to the Convention. Accession of the Community would serve to make application of CITES within the Community an internationally binding obligation and thus enhance implementation and enforcement of the Convention, an objective which the United States strongly supports. The report of the Department of State is enclosed for the information of the Senate in connection with its consideration of the Amendment.

CITES was established to facilitate international conservation, providing for the control and monitoring of international trade in specimens of species endangered or threatened with extinction. The Convention, as currently constituted, provides only for accession of States. The European Community seeks to achieve accession through an Amendment which would open the Convention for accession by regional economic integration organizations constituted by sovereign States which have competence for the negotiation, conclusion and implementation of international agreements in matters transferred to them by their Member States and covered by the Convention. In such matters, the organizations would exercise the rights and fulfill the obligations attributed to their Member States. The Amendment, with revisions added at United States instance, was adopted by the CITES Parties at an extraordinary meeting in Gaborone Botswana, April 30, 1983.

I recommend that the Senate act favorably at an early date on this Amendment, and give its advice and consent to acceptance.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 4, 1983.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, there are nominations on today's Executive Calendar, beginning with Department of the Interior, including those of the judiciary on page 1 and page 2 and the Department of Justice on page 2. I am prepared to consider those at this time, if the minority leader is.

Mr. BYRD. Madam President, on this side of the aisle, we are prepared to proceed only with the nominations on page 1 under the judiciary.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session for the purpose of considering Calendar Nos. 322 and 323, under the judiciary, on today's calendar.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations be considered and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc and confirmed en bloc.

The nominations considered an confirmed en bloc are as follows:

THE JUDICIARY

Martin L. C. Feldman, of Louisiana, to be U.S. district judge for the eastern district of Louisiana.

C. Roger Vinson, of Florida, to be U.S. district judge for the northern district of Florida.

JUDGE C. ROGER VINSON

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Madam President, it is a pleasure for me to express my strong support for an individual who has been nominated by President Reagan to fill the vacancy in Florida's northern district, Mr. C. Roger Vinson.

Roger Vinson has distinguished himself in the academic field. He holds a bachelor of science degree from the U.S. Naval Academy. And in 1971, Mr. Vinson graduated from Vanderbilt University School of Law. While in law school he served as a member of the Vanderbilt Law Review and was named the Patrick Wilson Merit Scholar in Law. For 6 years Roger Vinson served as a naval aviator achieving the rank of lieutenant. As a partner in the law firm of Beggs & Lane in Pensacola, Fla., Mr. Vinson has made significant contributions to the State of Florida and its legal community.

He is a member of the American Bar Association, the Florida Bar, Escambia-Santa Rosa Bar Association, and the Society of the Bar of the First Judicial Circuit. He also serves on the advisory committee for the Florida Lawyers' Prepaid Legal Services Corp., is a member of the probate rules committee, the energy law committee, and the appellate rules committee. Through the years, Mr. Vinson has also worked in numerous civic endeavors contributing to make his city, State, and Nation a better place for his fellow man.

I believe that he is uniquely well qualified to serve as the U.S. district judge for the northern district of Florida and will be a great asset to the Federal bench. I strongly support his nomination.●

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for me to move to reconsider the vote by which the nominations were confirmed and to move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the nominations were confirmed, and I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of legislative business.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

1983 NATIONAL ENERGY POLICY PLAN—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 81

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 801 of the Department of Energy Organization Act (Public Law 95-91), I transmit herewith the 1983 National Energy Policy Plan.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 4, 1983.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. HELMS (by request).

S. 1918. A bill to extend the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to cover U.S. Government costs incident to services rendered in connection with the enforcement of plant and animal quarantine laws, laws governing the human care, treatment and transportation of animals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

SERVICES IN CONNECTION WITH ENFORCEMENT OF PLANT AND ANIMAL QUARANTINE LAWS

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, in my capacity as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry I am introducing at the request of Secretary of Agriculture, John R. Block, a bill that would extend the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to collect fees to cover U.S. Government costs incident to services rendered by the Department in connection with the enforcement of plant and animal quarantine laws, laws governing the humane care, treatment and transportation of animals, and loans to assure compliance with import requirements imposed by foreign countries to prevent the spread of plant and animal pests and diseases from the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the transmittal letter from the Secretary as well as the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D.C., May 19, 1983.

HON. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Transmitted herewith for the consideration of the Congress is a draft bill "To extend the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to collect fees to cover United States Government costs incident to services rendered in connection with the enforcement of plant and animal quarantine laws, laws governing the humane care, treatment and transportation of animals, and for other purposes."

The Department of Agriculture recommends that the draft bill be enacted.

The purpose of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to charge for services rendered in connection with: (1) laws intended to prevent the introduction or dissemination of plant and animal pests and diseases into or throughout the United States; (2) laws intended to assure the humane care, treatment and transportation of animals; and, (3) actions taken by the Secretary of Agriculture to assure compliance with import requirements imposed by foreign countries to prevent the spread of plant and animal pests and diseases from the United States. The bill provides that the money collected shall be credited to accounts which the Secretary may establish for these activities, and shall remain available until expended. The costs incurred for the performance of activities under section 1 of the bill will be charged to such accounts. Under present procedures, all costs of such activites are paid from appropriated funds; authority to recover costs for these activities is very limited. We believe all costs associated with these programs of the Department should be borne by the persons who receive the services provided, and not by the general public.

Enactment of this bill is consistent with the President's Fiscal Year 1984 budget and would reduce outlays by some $3.6 million annually. The proposal is also consistent with the recent General Accounting Office recommendations (see GAO report CED-81-49).

Upon enactment, fees totalling about $3.6 million annually would be implemented to recover the costs of issuing phytosanitary certificates and testing, certification, inspection, and quarantine of animals and plants for import and export.

A similar letter has been sent to the Speaker of the House.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that enactment of this proposed legislation would be in accord with the President's program.

Sincerely,

JOHN R. BLOCK,
Secretary.

S. 1918

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to prescribe charges to cover, as nearly as practicable, costs, including administrative, supervisory, legal and overhead costs related thereto, incurred by the United States Government for services rendered in connection with the enforcement of laws administered by the Secretary of Agriculture and intended to prevent the introduction or dissemination of plant and animal pests and diseases into or throughout the United States, laws administer by the Secretary of Agriculture and intended to assure the humane care, treatment and transportation of animals, and actions taken by the Secretary of Agriculture to assure compliance with import requirements imposed by foreign countries to prevent the spead of plant and animal pests and diseases from the United States.

SEC. 2. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, funds collected for performance of activities authorized under section 1 of this Act shall be credited to accounts which may be established for these purposes, such funds to remain available until expended for such activities. The owner, or agent of the owner, of any plants, animals, plant or animal products or materials, or the owner or principal operator of any means of conveyance subject to regulation by the Secretary in connection with the enforcement of plant and animal quarantine laws, or laws governing the humane care, treatment and transportation of animals and any person receiving services or benefits under such laws or related activities of the Secretary shall be liable for payment of charges assessed. Upon failure to pay such charges when due, the Government shall have a lien for the charges against such plants, animals, plant or animal products or materials, or means of conveyance. In the case of an importer or exporter who fails to make payment when due, the Government shall also have a lien against such plants, animals, plant or animal products or materials thereafter imported or attempted to be exported by such an importer or exporter. The Secretary may, in case of nonpayment of the charges when due, after giving reasonable notice of deafult to the owner, or agent of the owner, of the plants, animals, plant or animal products or materials, or the owner or principal operator of the means of conveyance, sell at public sale after reasonable public notice, or otherwise dispose of such plants, animals, plant or animal products, materials, or means of conveyance in the Secretary's custody, as the Secretary may direct. If the sale proceeds exceed the charges due and the expenses of the sale, the excess shall be paid, in accordance with regulations of the Secretary to the owner upon his making application therefore with proof of owership, within six months after such sale, and otherwise the excess shall be credited to the accounts from which costs are incurred to pay the expenses of the Secretary incident to such activities.

SEC. 3. The Attorney General may bring an action for the recovery of charges which have not been paid in accordance with this Act against any person obligated for payment of such charges under this Act in any United States district court or other United States court for any territory or possession in any jurisdiction in which such person is found or resides or transacts business, and such court shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide such action.

SEC. 4. The term "person" means an individual, corporation, partnership, trust, association, or any other pubic or private entity, or any officer, employee, or agent thereof.

SEC. 5. Section 2(c) of the Act of July 2, 1962 (21 U.S.C. 134a(c)), is amended by deleting the third sentence thereof, which reads "Such costs shall not constitute a lien against the animals, carcasses, products, or articles involved."●

S. 1919. A bill to provide for the inclusion of the Washington Square area within Independence National Historical Park, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources,

WASHINGTON SQUARE DESIGNATION

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill to provide for the inclusion of the Washington Square Park, located in the historic section of the city of Philadelphia, within the Independence National Historical Park. This bill would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to enter into a cooperative agreement with the city of Philadelphia—through the Fairmount Park Commission—to restore and maintain the square for the purpose of preserving, exhibiting, and relating the square's historical significance to the American people.

Washington Square Park, unlike the Independence Square Park which is also in Philadelphia, has been fiscally managed on a local and voluntary basis. Most of the money raised for the operating expenses has been contributed by firms and organizations located around the square. The Fairmount Park Commission, the Fairmount Park Art Association, and the city of Philadelphia, provided full support. My bill relieves some of the maintenance costs to local organizations and transfers partial responsibility to the National Park Service.

The Washington Square area ranks among the most historically rich regions in the United States of America, linking us to our American Revolutionary War dead. At first named Southeast Square, Washington Square covered 6 acres and was a field through which a brook wound its way from the northwest corner to its eastern boundary. In 1706, it was designated by the city council "for a common and public burying ground." It is this function which connects this park so vitally with American history.

On April 13, 1777, less than 1 year after the Declaration of Independence by the United States, John Adams, congressional delegate from Massachusetts, walked the brief expanse from the Pennsylvania State House—now Independence Hall—to the open field, now Washington Square. American patriots had been at war for 2 years and military prospects looked bad for General Washington. The Battle of Brandywine, the occupation of Philadelphia by the British Army, and the great winter at Valley Forge were only months away. John Adams wrote:

I have spent an hour this morning in the congregation of the dead. I took a walk in the "Potter's Field" (a burying place between the new stone prison and the hospital) and I never in my whole life was so affected with melancholy. The graves of the soldiers who have been buried in this ground from the hospital to the bettering-house during the course of the last summer, fall, and winter, dead of the small-pox and cause-diseases are enough to make the heart of a stone to melt away. The sexton told me that upwards of 2,000 soldiers had been buried there; and by appearance of the grass and trenches, it is most probable that he speak within bounds.

The Potter's Field of which Adams wrote is now Washington Square, and the soldiers who died of illness and wounds were from Washington's Army brought to Philadelphia following the heavy fighting in New Jersey.

Washington is as old as Philadelphia itself; and yet, it has enjoyed more obscurity than celebrated attention. In 1815, it was turned into a park, and trees were planted by the French botanist, Francois Andre Michaux. In 1825, the city commissioners renamed it Washington Square, and a movement ensued to erect a memorial in the square to Washington. Money was collected in 1833 and a cornerstone for the memorial was laid in the center of the square.

Washington Square received brief notoriety in 1870 when it was proposed that the new city hall should be erected either on Washington Square or Penn Square. Penn Square was selected by ballot vote and Washington Square became, once again, a remote site of little-known historical significance.

In 1915, local residents initiated another movement to improve the square. A census of trees taken by botanical scholars in Washington Square showed that there were some 104 varieties, many of which are rare to Philadelphia. Still, the movement was not sustained for Washington Square's restoration.

Finally, in 1952, plans were made for the creation of the memorial to the unknown soldiers of the American Revolution, and the park has been maintained by concerned Philadelphians since that time. Today, the national recognition which Washington Square deserves can best be achieved with passage of this bill to include it within Independence National Historical Park.

My bill, a companion to House legislation introduced by Congressman TOM FOGLIETTA, would provide that ownership of Washington Square be retained by the Fairmount Park Commission. The Fairmount Park Commission would retain full review powers over the use of Washington Square as well as over any significant restoration or change of design so as to avoid any diminution in the commission's traditional oversight responsibilities. Further, it would expand the memorial honoring the unknown soldiers of the War for American Independence. Lastly, the bill would authorize funding for the National Park Service to properly maintain the square for the benefit of the visitors each year.

Total cost requirements to bring the area up to the physical and esthetic standards of Independence National Historical Park are estimated at $2,243,725. The cost includes repairs and rehabilitation of benches, walks, utilities, irrigation, and maintenance. The amount of annual operating costs, including security and personnel, is estimated at $153,400.

On July 23, 1983, the House Interior and Insular Affairs Subcommittee on Public Lands and National Parks held hearings in Philadelphia where Congressman FOGLIETTA and others testified regarding the need for this legislation. Further hearings are scheduled and I urge the Senate to address this matter in the near future.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1919

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act entitled "An Act to provide for the establishment of the Independence National Historical Park, and for other purposes", approved June 28, 1948 (62 Stat. 1061; 16 U.S.C. 407m et seq.), is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"SEC. 8. (a) The area known as 'Washington Square' (bounded generally by Walnut Street on the northside, Sixth Street on the eastside, and the intersecting streets named 'Washington Square' on the westside and southside) is hereby included within the Independence National Historical Park, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

"(b) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to enter into a cooperative agreement with the city of Philadelphia (acting through its designated agency, the Fairmount Park Commission) under which—

"(1) the Secretary may occupy the Washington Square area included in the park under subsection (a) for the purpose of preserving, exhibiting, and interpreting the Square's historical significance to the American people;

"(2) the Secretary shall have responsibility for the care and maintenance of such area including any memorial, monument, or display placed in such area for historical or educational purposes;

"(3) the Secretary shall be prohibited from subletting or assigning to another person or organization any part of the Washington Square area without prior approval in writing by the city of Philadelphia;

"(4) the Secretary will operate and maintain the Washington Square area (including all monuments and exhibits in the area) and make all repairs thereto, including repairs necessary by reason of ordinary wear and tear; and undertake such work and restoration or major alteration as may be agreed to with the city of Philadelphia;

"(5) the Secretary will apply such reasonable rules and regulations as are necessary to perform his functions properly, and will exercise reasonable care to prevent damage to, or the destruction of, any part of the grounds or the memorials, monuments, and exhibits located in the Washington Square area, and provide public access to the grounds and monuments, memorials, and exhibits at all reasonable times; and

"(6) neither party to such cooperative agreement will erect or place, or permit the erection or emplacement of any monument, marker, tablet, or other memorial upon the grounds without the written consent of the other party.

Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, ownership of the Washington Square area shall be retained by the city of Philadelphia. No work of restoration or any major alterations or repairs to any part of the grounds or monuments, memorials, or exhibits within the Washington Square area may be undertaken by the Secretary of the Interior until the plans for such work have been mutually agreed to by the city of Philadelphia (acting through its designated agency, the Fairmount Park Commission).

"(c) Effective October 1, 1983, there is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior not more than $1,000,000 to be used for brickwork and paving in the Washington Square area, and such additional sums as may be necessary to operate and maintain the Washington Square area.

"(d) The Secretary shall appoint a three member commission to recommend to the Congress an appropriate monument or memorial to honor the unknown dead of the American Revolution. Membership on such commission shall consist of (1) a representative of the National Park Service, (2) a representative of the city of Philadelphia, and (3) a representative of the public, agreed to by the city of Philadelphia. Members shall serve on the Commission without compensation. Among the memorials to be considered by the Commission should be an Honor Guard of the Armed Services of the United States. The National Park Service is authorized to provide reasonable and necessary secretarial and clerical support for the Commission.".

S. 1920. A bill to amend the Small Business Act to establish a Small Business Computer Crime and Security Task Force, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Small Business.

SMALL BUSINESS COMPUTER CRIME PREVENTION ACT

● Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today, the Small Business Computer Crime Prevention Act, would aid in protecting America's small business from the growing threat of computer crime. This bill is a companion measure to H.R. 3075, which has been introduced in the House by Hon. RON WYDEN, of Oregon, and was reported by the House Small Business Committee today.

Small business is of obvious and enormous importance to our economy. It accounts for more than a third of our gross national product, for virtually all of the private sector employment growth, and for at least half of all innovations.

In recent months there has been much publicity surrounding the issue of computer crime. While the definition of computer crime varies, it involves theft of information, and unauthorized alteration of records, and damage to computer systems themselves. Computer crime is an issue of growing importance to the small business community, as the use of computerized accounting and management systems becomes widespread among small businesses eager to save costs and improve productivity. But because small businesses—and particularly high technology small businesses—are attractive targets for computer criminals, the introduction of computers could be inhibited unless small business can effectively secure their computer systems.

Congress and the administration have devoted considerable attention to the issues of computer security and information management as they relate to the opperations of the Federal Government. The issues arise especially where there are national security concerns.

But the phenomenon of computer crime as it affects the small business community has not yet been assessed. There has been little or no study on how computer crime specifically harms small businesses. Yet, small businesses are more likely to be affected by computer crime because they have fewer resources available to protect themselves against it.

The purpose of this bill is to establish, within the Small Business Administration, the Small Business Computer Crime and Security Task Force. This task force would inquire into computer crime committed against small business, evaluate the technical and legal means for preventing and combating computer crimes, and develop guidelines for enhancing the security of computer systems in cooperation with the National Bureau of Standards. The task force would report its findings and recommendations to the Administrator within 18 months. The bill also calls for the establishment of a resource center to provide information on computer crimes and on computer security technology available to the small business community. The resource center would serve as a clearinghouse to transfer computer security technology developed for the Federal Government.

Mr. President, in the interest of strengthening security in an emerging technological area of vital importance to small business, I urge the speedy passage of this bill. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1920

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Small Business Computer Crime Prevention Act".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) there is an increased dependency on, and proliferation of, information technology (including computers, data networks, and other communication devices) in the small business community;

(2) such technology has permitted and expanded criminal activity against small business concerns; and

(3) small business concerns are not always able to protect their information technology from computer criminals.

(b) The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to improve the management by small business concerns of their information technology; and

(2) to encourage small business concerns to protect such technology from criminal activity.

COMPUTER CRIME AND SECURITY TASK FORCE

SEC. 3. Section 4(b) of the Small Business Act (15 U.S.C. 633(b)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3)(A) The Administrator shall, not later than the 60 days after the effective date of this paragraph, establish a task force to be known as the 'Small Business Computer Crime and Security Task Force'.

"(B) The Task Force shall consist of the following members:

"(i) an employee of the Small Business Administration, appointed by the Administrator;

"(ii) an employee of the Institute for Computer Sciences and Technology of the Department of Commerce, appointed by the Secretary of Commerce;

"(iii) an employee of the Department of Justice, appointed by the Attorney General;

"(iv) an employee of the Department of Defense, appointed by the Secretary of Defense;

"(v) one individual, appointed by the Administrator, who is representative of the interests of the providers of computer hardware to small business concerns;

"(vi) one individual, appointed by the Administrator, who is representative of the interests of the providers of computer software to small business concerns;

"(vii) one individual, appointed by the Administrator, who is representative of the interests of the providers of insurance to small business concerns;

"(viii) one individual, appointed by the Administrator, who is representative of the interests of the providers of computer security equipment and services to small business concerns;

"(ix) one individual, appoined by the Administrator, who is representative of the interests of associations of small business concerns, other than small business concerns engaging in any of the activities described in clauses (v) through (viii); and

"(x) such additional qualified individuals, appointed by the Administrator, as the Administrator determines to be appropriate.

"(C) It shall be the function of the Task Force—

"(i) to define the nature and scope of computer crimes committed against small business concerns;

"(ii) to ascertain the effectiveness of State legislation, and available security equipment, in preventing computer crimes against small business concerns;

"(iii) in cooperation with the National Bureau of Standards, to develop guidelines to assist small business concerns in evaluating the security of computer systems; and

"(iv) to make recommendations to the Administrator with respect to the appropriate activities of the resource center established under paragraph (4).

"(D) The Administrator shall designate one of the members of the Task Force as its chairperson. The Task Force shall meet not less than once during each 6-month period following the effective date of this paragraph, at the call of its chairperson. A majority of the members of the Task Force shall constitute a quroum.

"(E) Each member of the Task Force shall serve without additional pay, allowances, or benefits by reason of such service. Each such member shall be reimbursed for actual expenses, including travel expenses, determined by the Administrator to have been reasonably incurred in the course of performing the functions vested in the Task Force.

"(F) The Administrator shall provide the Task Force with such staff and office facilities as the Administrator, following consultation with the Task Force, considers necessary to permit the Task Force to carry out its functions under this paragraph.

"(G) The Task Force may secure directly from any Federal agency information necessary to enable the Task Force to carry out its functions under this paragraph. Upon request of the chairperson of the Task Force, the head of such agency shall furnish such information to the Task Force.

"(H) Not later than 18 months after the effective date of this paragraph, the Task Force shall submit to the President, the Administrator, and the Congress a detailed report setting forth the findings of the Task Force with respect to the matters described in subparagraph (C) and containing such recommendations as the Task Force determines to be appropriate.

"(I) The Task Force shall terminate not later than 30 days after the submission of its report under subparagraph (H).

"(J) For purposes of this paragraph and paragraph (4)—

"(i) the term 'computer crime' means—

"(I) any crime committed against a small business concern by means of the use of a computer; and

"(II) any crime involving the illegal use of, or tampering with, a computer owned or utilized by a small business concern; and

"(ii) the term 'Task Force' means the Small Business Computer Crime and Security Task Force established under subparagraph (A)."

COMPUTER CRIME AND SECURITY INFORMATION

SEC. 4. Section 4(b) of the Small Business Act (15 U.S.C. 633(b)), as amended in section 3 of this Act, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4)(A) The Administrator shall—

"(i) provide to small business concerns information regarding—

"(I) computer crimes committed against small business concerns; and

"(II) security for computers owned or utilized by small business concerns; and

"(ii) provide for periodic regional forums for small business concerns to improve the exchange of information regarding the matters described in clause (i).

"(B) Not later than 60 days after receipt of the report of the Task Force under paragraph (3)(H), the Administrator shall establish as part of the Small Business Administration a resource center that will carry out the functions of the administrator under subparagraph (A)(i).".●

Mr. HELMS (for himself, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. DIXON, Mr. DOLE, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. EAST, Mr. EXON, Mr. FORD, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. JEPSEN, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. PERCY, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. TOWER, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. ZORINSKY) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the term "meat" comprises a broad category of food products, including beef, pork, lamb, and veal;

Whereas meat is a wholesome and nutritious food, one of the most valuable sources of vitamins and minerals in the human diet, and a high-quality source of protein;

Whereas the meat industry's annual sales of $70,000,000,000 make it the largest single component of United States agriculture;

Whereas the meat industry provides jobs for thousands of United States citizens; and

Whereas during the week of January 22, 1984, the meat industry will conduct educational programs to highlight the positive contribution of meat to the American diet: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that January 22 through January 28, 1984, be observed as "National Meat Week," and that all citizens should be encouraged to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit copies of this resolution to the President and the Secretary of Agriculture.

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. Speaker, I bring to the Senate's attention the immense contribution made by the meat industry to the health of the American public and to this Nation's economy.

Meat is one of the most valuable sources of vitamins and minerals in the human diet and represents a high-quality source of protein. The meat industry is the largest single component of U.S. agriculture, with annual sales of $70,000,000,000. In addition, the meat industry provides jobs for thousands of U.S. citizens.

In recognition of the important role that meat plays in our diets and to honor the important role that agricultural producers and others play in making this nutritious food available to us, I introduce, along with 30 cosponsors, a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that the week of January 22 through January 28, 1984, be observed as "National Meat Week." The resolution would encourage all citizens to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

Mr. DANFORTH (for himself, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. GLENN, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. METZENBAUM, and Mr. BYRD) proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 3913, supra; as follows:

On page 4, line 25, after "$22,500,000," insert the following: "together with $29,700,000 which shall be available only for sections 236, 237, and 238 of the Trade Act of 1974 and for necessary related administrative expenses,".

DOMENICI (AND KENNEDY) AMENDMENT NO. 2289

Mr. DOMENICI (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY) proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 3913, supra; as follows:

On page 49, between lines 14 and 15, insert the following:

For part B of title VII of the Higher Education Act of 1965, $38,300,000, to remain available until expended, $18,200,000 of which is provided for construction and related costs of a model sciences engineering facility at the University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, New Mexico, and $20,100,000 of which is provided for construction and related costs of a model high technology science and engineering center at Boston University, Boston, Massachusetts, except that the provisions of section 721 (a)(2) and (b) shall not apply to the funds appropriated under this heading, and the amount of the grants paid from funds appropriated under this heading shall not be subject to any matching requirement contained in section 721(c) of such part and shall be used for three facilities of the type mentioned in section 713(g).

McCLURE AMENDMENT NO. 2290

Mr. McCLURE proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 3913, supra; as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following: "Provided further, That out of the funds appropriated herein for use under the Trade Adjustment Assistance Program, or from other available funds, sufficient funds shall be available to complete currently ongoing Trade Adjustment Assistance training and relocation projects for those eligible displaced workers who became totally or partially separated from employment on or after December 1, 1981 and before September 1, 1983, and who were determined to be eligible on or before June 14, 1983.".

QUAYLE (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2291

Mr. QUAYLE (for himself, Mr. HATCH, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. CHILES, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. COCHRAN, and Mr. RANDOLPH) proposed an amendment to the bill H.R. 3913, supra; as follows:

On page 2, line 15, strike out "$2,793,810,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,843,810,000".

On page 2, line 24, strike out "$3,605,198,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,919,148,000".

On page 3, line 10, before the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That amounts available for part A of title II and part A of title IV, of the Job Training Partnership Act shall not be less than the amount available for fiscal year 1983 for each such part for the period July 1, 1984, to June 30, 1985,".

NOTICE OF HEARINGS

SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND RESERVED WATER

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public that S. 1705, to modify Federal land acquisition and disposal policies carried out with respect to Fire Island National Seashore, and for other purposes, has been added to the agenda of the subcommittee hearing scheduled for Thursday, October 6, in room SD-628. Also, the hearing will begin at 10 a.m. instead of 9 a.m., as previously scheduled.

In addition, I would like to announce that a public hearing has been scheduled before the subcommittee on Thursday, October 20, beginning at 9 a.m. in room SD-366 to receive testimony on H.R. 1149, to designate certain National Forest System and other lands in the State of Oregon for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System, and for other purposes.

Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, Subcommittee on Public Lands and Reserved Water, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510.

For further information regarding these hearings, you may wish to contact Mr. Tony Bevinetto of the subcommittee staff at 224-5161.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

SUBCOMMITTEE ON FAMILY AND HUMAN SERVICES

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Family and Human Services, of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, October 4, to hold a hearing entitled: "Broken Families: The Role of the Government."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

NATIONAL PRODUCTIVITY IMPROVEMENT WEEK

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, pursuant to Senate Joint Resolution 142, the week of October 3 through October 9, 1983, has been designated "National Productivity Improvement Week." In again offering this resolution, I hope to highlight the importance of promoting an overall environment in this country that is conducive to achieving and maintaining the productivity growth that is so essential to our national well-being.

During the decade of the 1970's we experienced a dramatic deceleration in the productivity of American business relative to the prior 20-year period. At the same time, our major competitors in world trade were able to maintain exceptionally high rates of productivity. From 1973 through 1980, for example, Japan experienced an average annual productivity growth rate of 7.2 percent, and West Germany had an average productivity rate of nearly 5 percent. The United States, on the other hand, registered a paltry 1.7-percent-average-annual rate of productivity growth in that same period. By significantly raising America's relative labor costs, this reduced productivity eroded the competitiveness of American business, resulting in the loss of billions of dollars of industrial production and of millions of private sector jobs.

Although in the first half of this year we have seen productivity growth in this country rise to a more respectable 4-percent-annual rate, we must not allow this recent performance to lull us into a false sense of security. We must take steps to insure that these efficiency gains are sustained and that they become more than merely a cyclical phenomenon associated with the early stages of a business recovery. More than ever, the maintenance of adequate productivity growth has become acutely critical as the U.S. economy is increasingly affected by the swinging tides of competition in the international marketplace. In only the last 10 years, international trade has risen from 13 percent to 22 percent of U.S. gross national product, and this figure promises to continue rising in the coming years. As a consequence, if we are to regain and maintain our preeminent position in world trade, which translates into domestic job creation, American business will have to improve the efficiency with which it produces goods and services.

Moreover, as if the threat of increased foreign competition were not enough, the recent decline in U.S. inflation and the tremendous appreciation of the dollar have augmented the urgency of permanently picking up American productivity. With lower inflation and increased competition, businesses can no longer pass on their inefficiencies to consumers by increasing prices. Profit margins can now only be protected by cutting costs to extract adequate earnings from a lower volume of sales. At the same time, the strong dollar, which has reduced foreign manufacturing costs by about 25 percent in dollar terms relative to U.S. firms, is also forcing American businesses to focus on becoming more efficient and lower-cost producers.

Thus, while the promotion of increased American business productivity should always be a national priority, today's economic circumstances demand that we be diligent and swift in the implementation of productivity-enhancing policy measures. As I have stated repeatedly, well conceived long-term economic policies must not be sacrificed to achieve illusory short-term gains. The inflationary policies of the past cannot be repeated, and greater devotion to research and development must remain a top national priority. We, as policymakers, must foster an environment that encourages risk-taking and that is conducive to increased business investment in plant and equipment. Equally important, we must establish policies that will lead to greater job training for our labor force, to insure that our business community has a skilled and talented pool of workers to draw from. It is high time we devoted a much larger share of our national resources to the improvement of our human capital stock. A well-educated and adequately trained labor force will always be the cutting edge behind advances in human civilization.

Finally, Mr. President, I feel it is important to note that the task of increasing productivity really goes beyond tangible policy measures such as liberalized depreciation allowances, and tax incentives for R&D and job training. Ultimately, it is the intangible element of cooperation and unity among ourselves as a society, that will in the end determine whether or not the United States will attain permanently higher rates of productivity growth. The past contentiousness between business, labor, and Government must be eliminated if we are to advance as a society. Common goals must be emphasized and worked toward if we are to promote increased living standards for all. Only by working together will we move forward. We should note that the Japanese like to cite the slogan: "None of us is as smart as all of us." We would do well to keep that ideal in mind.

Mr. President, I am very pleased that the American Institute of Industrial Engineers continues to promote a better understanding of the vital aspects of productivity improvement. Their efforts form a vital part of that element of cooperation we so desperately need. As we enter "National Productivity Improvement Week," let us renew our commitment toward establishing the policies and the cooperative attitude that will contribute to the improvement of American business productivity.●

THE FAIR TAX ACT

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in cosponsoring S. 1421, the Fair Tax Act, authored by our distinguished colleague from New Jersey, Senator BRADLEY, and coauthored in the House by Congressman GEPHARDT.

I have long favored simplification of our complicated tax structure. The taxpayers of this country have had to tolerate for far too long a system of taxation which is not only unduly burdensome to comply with, but by its very nature inequitable. The present Tax Code has grown to over 2,000 pages, with over 100 major loopholes worth some $250 billion, and the taxpaying public employs an army of 46,000 professional tax experts to help penetrate the maze of bureaucratic regulation.

By any measure, the system we now have has become a monstrous intrusion of Government authority into the lives and personal business of all our citizens, with costly exceptions that favor a few at the expense of many. We need to restructure it from top to bottom. We need to simplify the requirements, eliminate deductions, and close loopholes, so that rates for everyone can be lower and overall compliance a much less painful process.

That is precisely what S. 1421, the Bradley-Gephardt bill aims to do. It would provide a simplified and reduced, but still progressive, rate structure, consisting of three basic rates. The basic 14 percent rate would apply to 80 percent of all taxpayers, and the two higher rates, 26 percent and 30 percent, would apply to persons with adjusted gross incomes over $25,000 and $37,500 respectively. Corporations would pay at a uniform 30 percent rate. These rates will result in lower taxes for approximately 70 percent of all taxpayers.

The 30 percent whose taxes would be increased under Bradley-Gephardt would include those who are presently benefiting from existing tax breaks and loopholes. Bradley-Gephardt would eliminate most-itemized deductions, credits and exclusions, except those generally available to most taxpayers. Deductions would be retained for home mortgage interest payments, charitable contributions, State and local taxes on income and real property, payments to IRA's and Keogh plans, some medical expenses, and employees' business expenses.

Mr. President, I believe the Bradley-Gephardt bill would provide a basic and much-needed change in our revenue system. It is a realistic and workable proposal which deserves to be enacted, and I believe that it will be sooner or later. The bill already has attracted considerable favorable comment in the press and enjoys a growing constituency across the country. I congratulate Senator BRADLEY for his energy and wisdom in formulating this proposal and I am very pleased, indeed, to add my name as a cosponsor.

MAINE MEMORIAL RELATING TO BAHA'IS IN IRAN

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on September 7, 1983, the members of the First Special Session of the 111th Maine State Legislature adopted a joint resolution memorializing the Congress to denounce the inhuman and genocidal treatment of the Baha'is in Iran. Mr. President, at this time I present to you and the Members of this Senate, the State of Maine Memorial. I respectfully request that it be printed and that it be referred to the appropriate committee of the Senate for consideration.

The memorial follows:

STATE OF MAINE—JOINT RESOLUTION

We, your Memorialists, the House of Representatives and Senate of the State of Maine of the First Special Session of the One Hundred and Eleventh Legislative Session assembled, most respectfully present and petition the United States Congress, as follows:

Whereas, the persecution of members of the Baha'i religious community in Iran has received world-wide attention; and

Whereas, most recently, the entire civilized world was shocked by the news from Iran of the execution by hanging of women members of the Baha'i faith; and

Whereas, reports of attempted forced conversions to Islam of Baha'is in Iran and wholesale deliberate starvation of Baha'i communities have been made public; and

Whereas, executions of Baha'is for no other reason than their religious preference continue in Iran; and

Whereas, these violations of human rights on the part of the Iranian authorities constitute violations against all civilized norms of behavior, as incorporated within such expressions of world opinion as the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights, and, indeed, violate the very principles of Islam, itself; and

Whereas, the Baha'i religion has a long and continued association with the State of Maine through the Green Acres Center at Eliot, and other official groups; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That We, the Members of the First Special Session of the 111th Legislature, do hereby denounce the inhuman and genocidal treatment of the Baha'is in Iran by the present government of the Ayatollah Khomeini as a "crime against humanity," and we do further resolve that copies of this expression of our outrage and concern be sent to members of our State's delegation in Congress, the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Permanent Iranian Delegation to the United Nations.●

NICK CAPORELLA EARNS COLUMBUS CITIZENS FOUNDATION AWARD

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am pleased and proud that a Floridian, Nick A. Caporella, has been singled out by the Columbus Citizens Foundation, the leading Italian American charitable organization, for its Annual Leadership Award for Business and Industry. Significantly, that honor went last year to Lee Iacocca in recognition of his rescue of the Chrysler Corp.

Nick Caporella, president and chief executive officer of Burnup & Sims Inc., will be toasted this Saturday, October 8, in New York City at a Waldorf-Astoria dinner with the other three recipients—actress Sophia Loren, New York Governor, Mario Cuomo and Pace University president, Edward J. Mortola—each in their respective fields of endeavor. They will then participate in the Columbus Day parade up Fifth Avenue on Monday.

Mr. President, Nick is a highly deserving winner who has worked hard all his life, truly a symbol of the work ethic and entrepreneurial spirit of our country. This fact was highlighted in 1979 when he was selected for the Horatio Alger Award as a man who "started from scratch and, against great odds, reached the top rung of the ladder."

In his early twenties he paid $250 down on a used dragline and operated it day and night, scouring south Florida construction sites for business. He expanded, recruited his father and brother to help, bought more equipment—and prospered.

At age 30 he sold out but quickly found retirement did not agree with him. So he started a new site preparation firm in Fort Lauderdale, naming it Caporella & Sons in honor of his father.

In 1972 the company was acquired by Burnup & Sims, a telecommunications and cable television service company. In early 1976 Caporella became president and chief executive officer, at a time when this company was experiencing losses.

Nick Caporella's leadership quickly moved Burnup & Sims from loss to profit by the end of 1976 and over a 6-year period the company's revenues were tripled and its profits increased 26 times.

Mr. President, at age 47, Nick Caporella is an unquestioned success story, a man stimulated by challenge who has achieved by offering challenge and opportunity to those who work with him. I commend him and congratulate him on this selection by the Columbus Citizens Foundation.●

INTERCITY BUS DEREGULATION

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, last year Congress passed the Bus Regulatory Reform Act of 1982, which brought considerable easing of regulatory restrictions on the intercity bus industry. By reducing regulation and increasing competition in the industry, Congress intended to improve the financial health of privately owned bus companies and enable these companies and new entrants to provide improved service to the traveling public with reasonable fares.

There has been substantial new entry into the intercity bus industry since enactment of this legislation, consistent with the intent of Congress. However, there is now a disturbing development in the area of entry. I am referring to government subsidized entities seeking charter and special operations authority, which will directly compete with many privately owned companies.

The Bus Act was not designed to supersede the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964, nor the operating restrictions on the conduct of tours and charters by public mass transit authorities. Congress did not intend that the new act would in any way allow these entities to depart from their basic mission of serving commuters.

The entry standard of the Bus Act reflects this concern. Section 6 of the bill requires subsidized operators to meet a "public interest" test in order to obtain any type of operating authority. This section was drafted to apply to situations where private bus operators under contract or receiving subsidy from public mass transit districts would apply for operating authority. We believed it was unfair for these private operators to be on equal footing with unsubsidized operators; thus, they are required to meet a higher standard. The Bus Act was not intended to provide a loophole whereby publicly subsidized mass transit authorities could obtain nationwide charter and tour authority.

I understand that seven applications for extensive charter and special operations authority have been filed at the Interstate Commerce Commission by recipients of governmental financial assistance. The Commission has not decided any of these cases. I am hopeful that the Commission will carefully consider the legislative history of this provision in reaching its final decision.●

SENATOR HENRY M. JACKSON

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I should like to share with my colleagues a letter written by Mr. Sheldon Coleman, chairman of the Coleman Co., Inc. Mr. Coleman's letter, which was sent to approximately 50 publications in the recreation and leisure-time field, speaks admirably of Senator Henry M. Jackson's contributions to natural resource management.

I ask that Mr. Coleman's letter be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

COLEMAN CO., INC.,
Wichita, Kans., September 20, 1983.

Mr. CLARE CONLEY,
Editor, Outdoor Life, New York, N.Y.

DEAR CLARE: Our nation has benefitted from the energies and talents of many public officials over more than two centuries. Some of these men and women have left an indelible imprint on the land they so loved. Henry "Scoop" Jackson, who died on September 1 at his home in Everett, Washington, was such a person.

Over four decades in Congress—including 31 years in the U.S. Senate—Henry Jackson provided thoughtful leadership in the fields of energy policy, defense and natural resource management. He was a man of high principles and high energy, and a true believer in America. He knew well the pressures of decision making in the glare of the spotlight and the frustration of long hours spent on projects about which few seemed to care.

The recreation community has much to be grateful to "Scoop" for today. Throughout his long career, he was a champion of the outdoors and of recreation. While still early in his career, he served as one of eight Congressional members of the Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission (1958-1962), an effort which contributed greatly to an expansion of recreational opportunities in the 1960's and 1970's and to the environmental consciousness of our nation. "Scoop" took an active role in the Commission and was more centrally involved than any other single person in converting the group's recommendations into law and action.

Washington's senior U.S. Senator made his last formal appearance before a recreation audience in June of 1983 at the American Recreation Coalition's Forum. His message was simple: confrontational politics was jeopardizing the quality and quantity of recreation in America.

He gave eloquent testimony to the fruits of bipartisan labors in support of recreation during the 1960's and asked all recreation community leaders to work toward the creation of a new outdoor recreation commission which might refocus Congressional attention on issues and needs.

As campers and boaters, as skiers and fishermen, as hikers and bikers, as wildlife photographers and as motorcyclists, Americans who share the deep love of the outdoors Henry Jackson felt have already gained and will continue to benefit from his lifetime of service to the nation. His advocacy of balanced management of our forests; of expansion of federal, state and local park systems; of providing a range of recreational opportunities from Wilderness to intensive use and his ability to conceive and communicate farsighted programs combine to make "Scoop" a man sorely missed and surely not forgotten.

Sincerely,

SHELDON COLEMAN.●

AIR TRAVELERS SECURITY ACT OF 1983

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I want to commend my colleague, Senator WARNER, with whom I serve as cochair of the Senate Tourism Caucus, for his testimony on S. 764, the Air Travelers Security Act of 1983, this morning before a hearing of the Subcommittee on Aviation of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

This legislation, which Senator WARNER and I—as well as 36 of our colleagues—have joined in sponsoring, is aimed at preventing further havoc in the deregulated air travel industry by maintaining a stable relationship between airlines and the agents who service the airlines.

Senator WARNER's statement this morning was a clear and thorough endorsement of S. 764, one which I would like to share with my colleagues.

I therefore ask that the statement, along with its supporting materials, be printed in the RECORD.

TESTIMONY OF SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER

Madam Chairman, I am gratified by the opportunity to appear before your subcommittee testifying in behalf of the Air Travelers Security Act of 1983.

Most especially, I am gratified by the tremendous outpouring of bipartisan support given this bill by a majority of this subcommittee, as well as a majority of the members of the Senate Commerce Committee.

Madam Chairman, despite all of the years of hearings, all the volumes of testimony, all the hundreds of hours of serious deliberation expended by the travel industry, by the Federal Government, and by Members of Congress on this matter, the issue here is really a very simply one, and the decision to be made is quite clear cut.

The issue is: Will there be unfettered competition and will consumers continue to enjoy the rights and conveniences they have come to expect in the air travel accommodation marketplace?

If the position outlined in the Air Travelers Security Act is adopted, the answer is unquestionably "Yes."

If the position outlined in the Civil Aeronautics Board's (CAB) conclusion to the Competitive Marketing Investigation (CMI) is adopted, the answer is resoundingly "No."

Under the bill put forth by Congressman GLENN ANDERSON, 147 Representatives, 37 Senators and myself, International Air Traffic Association (IATA) and Air Traffic Conference (ATC) accredited travel agents would be allowed to continue serving the public in a ubiquitous manner while the barriers established by the CAB which previously barred others from participating in the travel marketplace would be stripped away, enabling these new entrepreneurs to take their place in an unregulated environment.

Under the CAB's position, however, the ubiquitous, accredited travel agent would be regulated into obscurity by the courts and the burden of antitrust litigation.

The marketplace would be chaotically filled with hucksters and fast-buck artists willing to, literally and figuratively, take every traveler for a ride.

The scope of marketing alternatives truly available to the traveler would be greatly limited.

And many of the rights and conveniences which the public has come to expect, and which are protected by ATC administered agreements among the airlines, would be lost.

As you know, these agreements, made possible by the antitrust immunity granted the ATC:

Provide a centralized process for accreditation and appointment of travel agents;

Provide for the recognition of common ticket stock by all airlines;

Govern the acceptance by one airline of another's ticketed passenger and their baggage;

And provide for the crediting to each airline the receipts of tickets sold for each airline by their accredited agents.

In short, Madame Chairman, if the CAB's decision is allowed to stand competition and consumer rights in marketplace will be only a figment of a former CAB chairman's imagination.

Since the beginning of the CMI in 1980, two items have surfaced as the focus of debate. They are:

(1) antitrust immunity and

(2) so-called "exclusivity".

As part of my written statement for the RECORD I am submitting a memoranda detailing my views on the antitrust issues in this debate (Appendix A).

I also am submitting a series of tables reflecting those elements of the ATC/IATA agreements which are provided antitrust immunity under the Air Travelers Security Act and those which are not covered (Appendix B).

With regard to exclusivity, the Air Travelers Security Act eliminates all regulatory barriers which previously prevented carriers from utilizing businesses other than accredited travel agencies for ticket sales and distribution.

There is one exception to this statement, however.

That is the secondary marketer or indirect air carrier.

On this matter, the CAB determined, in the course of the CMI, to abandon its creation for reasons I hope the CAB will enumerate at some point in this hearing. My formal written testimony provides more detail on this issues (Appendix C).

Madam Chairman, there are some who believe our bill is an obstacle to competition.

They are principally business travel department managers (BTD) who stated during the CMI that their only interest was in being able to generate income for their corporations, not in becoming travel agents.

Under our bill, and indeed under the present regulatory environment, the BTD's may legally purchase tickets directly from the carriers for internal distribution to company employees without going through travel agents.

More importantly, while carriers do not pay commissions on such transactions because the BTD's are purchasers or consumers of air travel, and not sellers or promoters, the carriers are free to grant these BTD's substantial discounts and liberal credit terms and, in fact, they do.

Furthermore, these discounts and terms are not available to either the general public or to travel agencies.

Some have suggested that the accredited agency system restricts the rights of travel marketing entities other than accredited agencies to sell and distribute tickets for compensation.

There are no such barriers presently, and there are none in the Air Travelers Security Act.

The current system permits carrier compensation to non-agency travel consultants for ticket sales.

This type of activity can be carried out by companies selling and distributing tickets through either machines placed on non-agency premises or through personnel employed by businesses located on such non-agency premises.

Further, the bill recognizes that other non-travel type companies such as department stores, banks, etc. could become accredited travel agencies with very little difficulty, and are therefore free to enter conference programs whenever they wish, provided they are not limited by regulations of other government agencies.

In short, nothing in the accredited agency system or in the bill under consideration today precludes businesses other than accredited travel agencies from selling and distributing tickets for compensation, either in the form of purchaser discounts or in the form of commissions.

Furthermore, those businesses which adhere to rules against self-dealing are free to become accredited agencies even if the principal function is not travel sales and service.

Madam Chairman, this bill represents an interest which is bigger than the airlines.

It's bigger than the 22,000 independent, highly competitive travel agents across the United States;

95 percent of which are small businesses;

46 percent of which are owned by women;

12 percent of which are owned by minorities; and

Which employ over 135,000 people, 70 percent of whom are women.

This bill represents an interest which is as big as the entire national and international travel and tourism industry and all the millions of people it serves annually.

Incidentally, the travel and tourism industry is represented here today by the Travel and Tourism Governmental Affairs Policy Council.

Additionally, attached to my formal statement is a list of other industry members who support this bill (Appendix D).

In the end, we as Senators . . . as representatives of the American public . . . must ask ourselves:

"How do we best secure the rights, the choices and the conveniences of those who travel?"

"Do we do it by imposing on the travel marketplace a set of arbitrary standards to be administered by the courts?"

"Or do we do it by destroying the unnecessary barriers to competition and allowing the market to regulate itself through the free enterprise of—

"ATC and IATA accredited full service travel agencies,

"Bulk discounters,

"Charterers,

"Automated point-to-point ticketing outlets,

"And an infinite variety of other alternatives?"

Madam Chairman, I think the choice is very clear, and that's why I enthusiastically support and seek passage of the Air Travelers Security Act of 1983.

MEMORANDUM: THE AIR TRAVELERS SECURITY ACT OF 1983, THE ANTITRUST IMMUNITY ISSUE

This Memorandum addresses the antitrust considerations in the Air Travelers Security Act of 1983, S. 764 and H.R. 2053. The principal controversy arising from this legislation involves the question of whether the current system of collective agreements between air carriers and travel agencies should retain antitrust immunity, which the Civil Aeronautics Board has decided to remove by the end of 1984 when the CAB goes out of existence. This legislation would restore immunity and essentially leave intact the current system, which most observers believe works extremely well. If the agreements lose immunity, however, it is likely that the agency-carrier system will no longer remain in effect because the agreements rely upon close cooperation among competing businesses not generally permitted under U.S. antitrust laws.

I. BACKGROUND AND SUMMARY

The United States has long been one of the most problem free countries in the world for air travel because of its system of collective agreements between air carriers and travel agencies approved by the CAB. Congress, in its enactment of the Airline Deregulation Act of 1978 and the subsequent enactment of the International Air Transportation Competition Act of 1979, found no basis for altering this system. The CAB nonetheless determined a need to study the competitive effects of the agreements, which provide for the sale and distribution of airline tickets through travel agencies accredited pursuant to standards set by both the Air Traffic Conference (ATC), a division of the Air Transport Association (ATA), consisting of all U.S. carriers; and by the International Air Transport Association (IATA), consisting of almost all non-U.S. carriers.

The CAB assigned one of its most experienced Administrative Law Judges, Ronnie Yoder, to conduct the Competitive Marketing Investigation, which lasted more than three years. After hearing testimony and assessing evidence submitted by the numerous interested parties, Judge Yoder found that the current system of ticket sales and distribution through accredited travel agencies has no viable alternative for serving the travel consumer. He also concluded that except for removal of certain anticompetitive provisions in the agreements to permit entities such as Ticketron to sell tickets, the system should be left intact. Judge Yoder determined, however, that the agency-carrier agreements system could remain in effect only if it continues to receive antitrust immunity. He found that the current system actually increases competition by making the sale and distribution of tickets extremely efficient and by providing easy access into the market for new agencies and new carriers alike.

In December 1982, a sharply-divided CAB rejected Judge Yoder's more significant findings and conclusions and stripped protection from the agreements and agency accreditation by removing antitrust immunity when the CAB ceases to exist at the end of 1984. A large bipartisan group of Senators and Representatives from all over the United States, led by Members of Congress particularly knowledgeable about the U.S. travel, tourism and airline industries, is cosponsoring the Air Travelers Security Act to replace the CAB ruling with Judge Yoder's findings and conclusions.

Supporting this legislation are virtually all sectors of the U.S. travel, tourism and airline industries, as well as all foreign carriers serving the U.S. These industries benefit substantially from the agency-carrier system, which facilitates air travel within, to and from the U.S. by providing for a nationwide network of some 22,000 accredited travel agencies which market air travel under a set of common rules and standards. The industry groups believe that the agency-carrier system may not survive absent antitrust immunity, and without the agency-carrier systems, air travel will be far more complicated and ultimately more expensive for the travel consumer, to the detriment of these industries.

Opposed to this legislation is the CAB, which has determined that the agency-carrier system does not need antitrust immunity to continue and takes the position that in a deregulated environment, exposure to antitrust liability is a normal and acceptable business risk. The only industry opponent is the National Passenger Traffic Association (NPTA), a group composed of large company in-house travel executives who wish to gain the same benefits as accredited travel agencies without meeting the agency-carrier accreditation standards.

II. THE NEED FOR NATIONWIDE, INDUSTRYWIDE COLLECTIVE AGREEMENTS IN THE AIR TRAVEL INDUSTRY

The air travel industry is unique in that it requires close cooperation among competitors to serve the travel consumer. The current agency-carrier system depends upon the ability of competing businesses to agree with one another on the rules and standards for efficient ticket sale and distribution. No single domestic or foreign carrier serves all points, nor will this ever be a realistic possibility. Carriers must therefore cooperate with one another to assure that the travel consumer can utilize various carrier combinations to travel in an efficient and cost-effective manner. Congress recognized the importance of intercarrier agreements when it passed the Airline Deregulation Act, finding such agreements "essential to the maintenance of a modern and convenient air transportation system, including those regarding uniform procedures for ticketing, interlining baggage, the recognition of tickets issued by one carrier for transportation on another." [1] There can be no viable national air transportation system absent the ability of carriers to work closely with one another.

Carrier interdependence requires common rules and standards to govern ticket sale and distribution in order to avoid consumer and industry confusion. The marketplace has developed the agency-carrier system as the best means of satisfying this objective. Judge Yoder accurately described this system when he found:

"These agreements provide a uniquely integrated marketing system based upon the ubiquitous presence of the industry travel agents which represent all carriers and enjoy the confidence of the public and carriers alike in their competence and reliability because of commonly administered accreditation standards. The system enabled by those agreements . . . undergirds and enables the current system of interlining and interchangeability and refundability of tickets." [2]

The intercarrier agreements essential to national air transportation thus require a set of mutually agreed upon standards to function effectively.

One cannot underestimate the importance of the travel agency-air carrier agreements to the U.S. transportation system. These agreements permit carriers to do business through one nationwide network of sales agents working under common rules and standards. This in turn assures each carrier that tickets received from its competitors on interconnecting flights can be safely honored without causing problems for the travel consumer. Judge Yoder observed:

"The present system of interline sales is acceptable to carriers because they have joint control over all travel agents, even those of other carriers, under the agreements between carriers that they will permit travel agent sales only by conference accredited agreement." [3]

Without mutually agreed upon standards to govern agency-carrier relationships, there would be no means by which travel agencies could uniformly serve all carriers and by which carriers could recognize each other's agents to serve the common travel consumer. Furthermore, reliable information about all available fares and schedules, increasingly difficult to obtain in the aftermath of airline deregulation, would be unavailable to the consumer for making an informed choice best suited to individual travel needs.

Unlike other nationwide, industry-wide collective agreements, the agency-carrier system promotes competition among its participants. The CAB conceded this point in its Competitive Marketing Decision by noting that "under a common system there are far more distribution locations providing information on fares and services to the public. Because there are more outlets, offering information on a wider variety of fares and services, competition among air carriers is enhanced." [4] The agency-carrier system is the only one capable of providing so many sale outlets for carrier and consumer alike which offer uniformly high and consistent levels of service.

III. THE INHERENT CLASH BETWEEN THE AGENCY-CARRIER AGREEMENTS AND FEDERAL ANTITRUST LAW

No one, including the CAB, questions the substantial benefits provided to the consumer and industry by the agency-carrier system. Without the ability to agree collectively on reasonable rules and standards for ticket sale and distribution, however, carriers and agencies can no longer provide these benefits. If immunity is lost, application of federal antitrust laws could create insuperable obstacles to continuation of the agency-carrier agreements, which are based upon close competitor cooperation. This is readily seen by subjecting the key provisions of these agreements to traditional antitrust analysis.

A. Applicable legal standards

The agency—carrier agreements are subject to section 1 of the Sherman Act,[5] which prohibits any contract, combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade and imposes criminal liability for violations. Section 4 of the Clayton Act [6] subjects antitrust violators to civil liability for treble damages and reasonable attorneys' fees. A court confronted with a suit challenging the collective agreements must decide whether to subject them to a per se or Rule of Reason treatment. The Supreme Court has determined:

"[T]here are certain agreements or practices which . . . are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their uses. This principle of per se unreasonableness not only makes the type of restraints which are proscribed by the Sherman Act more certain to the benefit of everyone concerned, but it also avoids the necessity for an incredibly complicated and prolonged economic investigation . . . an inquiry so often wholly fruitless when undertaken." [7]

In other words, certain practices are presumed to be antitrust violations because of their effects upon competition. These include various forms of price-fixing; group boycotts; and concerted refusals to deal.[8] A court would invalidate any of these practices found to exist in the agency-carrier system without undertaking the complex antitrust economic analysis which normally characterizes Sherman Act cases.

Conduct not subject to per se treatment is scrutinized according to Rule of Reason criteria developed over the years in a series of judicial decisions. Under the Rule of Reason analysis.

"The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable." [9]

The Supreme Court has noted that it is only after the courts have had considerable experience with certain business relationships that conduct should be classified as per se illegal. In the absence of such experience, the challenged conduct would be subject to Rule of Reason analysis to determine whether the challenged conduct promotes or suppresses competition.[10]

This has the effect of prolonging litigation since courts will thoroughly study the affected industry and the anti-competitive effects of the challenged conduct. Absent settlement, resolution of the dispute will turn upon evidentiary considerations formulated through extensive discovery. It is perhaps significant that a CAB majority decided to remove antitrust immunity from the agency-carrier agreements principally on the theory that such litigation would be "frivolous" and of the type that all businesses should be able to defend. Litigation subjecting the agency-carrier agreements to a Rule of Reason analysis will probably not be frivolous, and it may not be affordable when the costs of mounting a defense and the risk of losing are calculated. The airlines are not in particularly strong financial condition to absorb such costs and travel agencies, which are primarily small businesses, seem particularly ill-suited as co-defendants in massive, complex antitrust litigation.

Although the agency—carrier agreements have received approval in the past, there can be no assurance that they will withstand per se scrutiny in the courts despite the fact that both Judge Yoder and the CAB concluded in the Competitive Marketing Investigation that the agreements should be analyzed by them for anticompetitive effect under Rule of Reason criteria. The Department of Justice argued throughout the investigation that the agreements are per se illegal which proves that litigation challenging them would be neither frivolous nor fanciful. The viability of a legal challenge to the agreements as per se or Rule of Reason violations or both creates the inevitable prospect of protracted and costly litigation, which in itself provides a strong disincentive for continuation of the agreements. Added to these costs is the risk that a jury or court will conclude that a violation exists.

B. Potential illegality of industrywide accreditation standards

The agency-carrier agreements provide for common accreditation wherein carriers jointly set standards for selection and retention of travel agencies. These fall into several categories. Financial requirements for an agency include either bondability (ATC) or minimum capitalization (IATA). Honesty standards preclude accreditation in case of false statements on agency applications and felony convictions; bankruptcy (ATC); or prior accreditation suspension. Personnel requirements are imposed on both the agency manager, who must work full time and have agency experience; and upon the agency itself, which must employ at least one experienced person on the premises. Agency location requirements include rules related to limits on non-travel activities; public accessibility; and ticket security facilities. Accreditation standards preclude agencies from self-dealing in air transportation by limiting internal agency ticket use and by barring commission payments on tickets purchased for internal agency use. Only those agencies complying with these standards can become accredited.

The above standards are not unreasonable. Because they are set collectively by competitors, however, they are subject to stringent antitrust scrutiny absent immunity. The Supreme Court, in the recent Hydrolevel case, has expanded the liability of businesses which promulgate industry-wide standards of conduct actually applied even if the standards are advisory only and are voluntarily adhered to by those doing business with industry members.[11] The setting of standards to govern the sale and distribution of airline tickets through collective appointments and accreditation subjects both U.S. and foreign carriers to potential antitrust liability whenever a carrier refuses to permit its tickets to be sold by agencies which do not meet those standards. Even though the standards might be commercially reasonable, because they are set collectively by the carriers, commercial reasonability would not be a defense to liability if a court concludes that use of the standards fall within the per se category.

Even if adherence to such standards is voluntary, any effort by particular industry members to apply them might subject the industry to liability. Justice Powell, dissenting against the Hydrolevel ruling, identified the problem likely to be faced by carriers seeking to impose standards on travel agencies, when he concluded that an industry will protect itself "by ceasing to respond to inquiries concerning its codes."[12] He then noted that "Industry standard-setting can have a significant potential for consumer benefit" because "information can be expensive if consumers are forced to gain it only by their own experience or by the creation of another bureaucracy."[13] Hydrolevel involved a jury verdict and the question of whether the association could be liable for application of an industry code by individual members. The case is instructive in showing how industry standards can expose members to antitrust liability despite the efficiencies and benefits which flow from industry practices.

The recent National Association of Broadcasters case reinforces the likelihood that standards imposed as a condition of doing business within a given industry are incompatible with U.S. antitrust laws.[14] Judge Harold Greene, one of the nation's most prominent antitrust judges, struck down the advertising code imposed by broadcasters even though adoption of the code was voluntary. Because broadcasters deciding to adopt the code were contractually obligated to honor it, however, Judge Greene concluded that the comprehensive monitoring and enforcement program to maintain code compliance among subscribers made the standards obligatory rather than voluntary and invalidated them as an antitrust violation. Even though the CAB has made adherence to the ATC and IATA standards voluntary after 1984, it is doubtful that such standards can lawfully exist if they are imposed collectively by the carriers. Without standards for accreditation, there does not seem to be any reason for the agency—carrier programs to continue.

C. The area settlement plan

The current agency-carrier system provides for an extremely efficient mechanism to settle accounts, the Area Settlement Plan (ASP), which establishes a system of weekly standardized reporting and remission of ticket sale proceeds through a system of area banks located throughout the U.S. The area banks in turn draw upon an agency's commercial bank for the amount owed each carrier. The ASP also monitors agency performance of payment obligations and provides for both fines and eventual accreditation suspension for repeated agency delinquency. Adherence to the ASP has been voluntary since the CAB disapproved provisions which made ASP participation a condition for agency accreditation several years ago. Although agencies now have the right to negotiate individual credit and payment terms with each carrier, carriers have generally been unwilling to do this because the ASP works so efficiently and assures them prompt payment.

The ASP is vulnerable to antitrust attack when immunity is removed because of the holding in the 1980 Catalano case,[15] which invalidated as illegal per se price-fixing an agreement among wholesalers to deny credit to their customers. This case could preclude future carrier reliance on the ASP as the sole means of payment when immunity expires, since the ASP does not permit the individual buyer-seller negotiation of terms which characterizes the free market model contemplated by U.S. antitrust laws. The CAB found the ASP distinct from the practice in Catalano by treating airline ticket proceeds as funds held in trust for the carriers by the agents, and the CAB also pointed to voluntary participation in ASP as a means of distinguishing it from the Catalano situation. As seen in National Broadcasters and Hydrolevel, however, voluntary participation in a standards-setting agreement does not remove the participants from federal antitrust scrutiny, and the trust theory is somewhat subject to attack. There is judicial authority to support an argument that horizontal agreements which result in market efficiencies and corresponding lower prices to the consumer may not constitute per se antitrust violations, and under Rule of Reason analysis the ASP seems to be an acceptable practice.[16] It would appear, however, that Catalano, Hydrolevel and National Broadcasters make the ASP vulnerable to attack and this vulnerability might reasonably chill the willingness of the carriers to continue participation in it since other provisions of the agency-carrier system are also subject to challenge.

D. Exclusivity

Current agency-carrier agreements provide that only those agencies which meet all conference accreditation requirements are authorized to sell tickets. The CAB has invalidated this provision, effective January 1, 1985, while Judge Yoder's conclusion that exclusivity is essential for maintaining the present agency-carrier system would be incorporated into U.S. law if Congress enacts the proposed legislation. Absent immunity, exclusivity would be particularly susceptible to antitrust attack and those carriers which choose to engage in de facto exclusivity do so at substantial legal risk. In the Radiant Burners case,[17] the Supreme Court ruled that sellers in a given industry which agree not to deal with a buyer who fails to conform to industry standards set by the sellers can be subject to per se antitrust liability. This rule could effectively bar enforcement of industry-wide standards for travel agencies by contractual prohibitions against individual carrier transactions with agencies failing to comply with ATC or IATA standards.

The CAB found that the exclusivity provisions violate federal antitrust law absent immunity despite all the consumer benefits they offer.[18] Judge Yoder concluded that exclusivity is necessary for retention of the interline agreements because of carrier need to set uniform rules and standards for ticket sale and distribution, which would be meaningless if there were no means of enforcing them.[19] Both Judge Yoder and the CAB are probably correct, which illustrates the inherent conflict between antitrust laws and the need for immunity to retain the highly beneficial agency-carrier system.

Assuming that absent immunity, carriers may not collectively refuse to deal with agencies which fail to meet accreditation standards, single carriers deciding to deal only with accredited agencies fare little better under existing antitrust law. A single supplier normally has the right to select or reject customers, but courts applying the Sherman Act have qualified this right with certain restrictions particularly applicable to the agency-carrier system. For example, the Supreme Court had declared that a supplier may not impose anticompetitive ancillary agreements upon a prospective customer as a condition of sale.[20] Assuming arguendo that the ASP or accreditation programs are anticompetitive, it is doubtful that an individual carrier can lawfully compel a travel agency to participate in these programs as a condition for selling tickets. If federal antitrust law precludes these conditions, then the agency-carrier programs have little meaning. This becomes even more apparent by the antitrust prohibition against supplier employment of a third party to enforce restrictive practices, which, absent immunity, makes ATC and IATA enforcement of the agency programs at the request of a member carrier potentially unlawful.[21]

E. Conclusion

Little about the agency-carrier program is in harmony with existing antitrust law and absent immunity, there seems to be substantial doubt that the agreements will continue in any meaningful form. This is not surprising, since Congress has always exercised its power to grant immunity to desirable collective industry behavior to protect it from judicial sanctions.

IV. THE NEED TO IMMUNIZE THE AGENCY—CARRIER AGREEMENTS

Almost without exception, those who understand the agency—carrier system believe it should remain intact. Because the system relies so heavily upon collective agreements on common rules and standards, which are strongly disfavored by federal antitrust courts, it must receive antitrust immunity to continue. In fact, the CAB order initiating the Competitive Marketing Investigation states that "without immunity . . . it is likely that neither the IATA nor the ATC conference systems could have [ever] been developed."[22] CAB Chairman Dan McKinnon, the most prominent and vocal opponent of the Air Travelers Security Act, recognized this when he dissented against the CAB majority decision to remove immunity at the end of 1984. He wrote that "the facts show that antitrust immunity should be granted beyond 1984 for all approved conference programs so that the many public benefits of the established programs are preserved."[23]

If Congress does not restore immunity through passage of this legislation, the system will undoubtedly be subjected to costly antitrust proceedings which could last for years. The last major case involving CAB antitrust immunity issues lasted 12 years and involved 56,000 legal hours at a cost of $7.5 million to only one party in the dispute, prompting Chief Justice Burger to describe it as the "20th Century sequel to Bleak House."[24] Congress in fact cited the infamous Hughes-TWA litigation as the basis for much of the Airline Deregulation Act to avoid the problems and delays likely to emerge in a complex, Rule of Reason airline antitrust case. While such litigation is in progress, it is highly likely that administrative decision-making by the CAB successor agency for air passenger travel will function very poorly, since the agency will be reluctant to second-guess the court presiding over the case, and carriers will not know what conduct is illegal until the court finally decides this after all appeals are exhausted. Problems involved in naming IATA carriers as antitrust co-defendants may prove to be insurmountable, since many of them are owned by sovereign states which will not only impede discovery efforts, but also take retaliatory steps against U.S. carriers abroad. Subjection of foreign sovereign-owned enterprises to treble damage liability is a sensitive issue well known to Congress. Finally, the prospects of injunctive relief in such litigation make the spectre of judicial management of the air travel industry all too real, particularly since it has already happened with the even more complex and larger telephone industry.

The above prophesy assumes that the carriers will choose to continue participation in the agency-carrier programs and defend them from antitrust attack. In fact, however, there is ample evidence that if Congress fails to restore immunity, the carriers will withdraw their participation and dismantle the system. The extensive Competitive Marketing Investigation record indicates that "carriers would not continue to participate in the conference agreements if antitrust immunity is denied."[25] The carriers have frequently testified before Congress that this will indeed happen. Prior to the CAB decision, the ATA stated:

"The serious risk that the joint selection, retention and termination procedure of the ATC Travel Agency Program in its present form would be characterized as a per se [violation] poses an insurmountable antitrust obstacle to its continuation without continued immunity."[26]

In recent hearings, the ATA reaffirmed its position that removal of immunity will terminate the agency—carrier system:

"[W]ith the loss of antitrust immunity at the end of 1984, we doubt that the [agency-carrier] program could continue in its present form. The risk to the airlines and the cost of defending probable antitrust suits would just be too great . . . It is our studied conclusion . . . that without antitrust immunity the risks involved would be too great and the potential cost too heavy for the airlines to continue the current program."[27]

Given the carriers' own statements, and given the legal sensibility of their position based upon applicable judicial precedent, it is apparent that absent restoration of immunity to the agency-carrier system by Congress, that system will effectively cease to exist.

V. CONCLUSION

The current agency-carrier system work very well for the travel consumer and the travel, tourism and airline industries by assuring the existence of an efficient air transportation system governed by common rules and standards. Because the system consists of agreements among competitors necessary to serve a common travel consumer, and because federal antitrust law traditionally prohibits such agreements despite their attendant consumer benefits, it is reasonably certain that failure to pass this legislation and restore immunity to the agency-carrier system will be the system's undoing. If carriers decide to continue the agreements and defend them in antitrust litigation, there is no certainty whatsoever they will prevail since conduct constituting per se violations forecloses judicial scrutiny of its benefits and pro-competitive effects. If Congress fails to act, it is therefore likely that the courts will determine the nature of U.S. air travel in a manner not necessarily in the consumer or industry interest.●

MARKETING RELATIONSHIPS AND ANTITRUST IMMUNITY UNDER YODER DECISION

MARKETING RELATIONSHIPS SUBJECT TO CONFERENCES

Agency relationship

(1) Meets accreditation rules.
(2) Represents all conferences airlines.
(3) Holds out as "travel agent."
(4) Agent-at-law: binds the airlines through representations, ticket issuance, receipt of public's money on carrier's behalf.
(5) Acts as travel counsellor to public.
(6) Sells interline transportation involving conference airlines.
(7) Normally paid by commission but can take inventory risks.
(8) Settles accounts normally through Area Settlement Plan using Standard Agent Ticket Stock, but may settle outside ASP on airline stock if carrier agrees.
(9) Can discount if individual airline allows it.

MARKETING RELATIONSHIPS OUTSIDE CONFERENCES

Nonagency ticket distributors

(1) Negotiates own terms of relationship with any airline.

(2) Sells on an "on-line" basis only, for carriers with which it has contracted.

(3) Holds out as anything but a "travel agent."

(4) Normally takes inventory risk but can be paid commission based on sales.

(5) Can also be an accredited agent but not from same location.

(6) Uses ticket stock other than Standard Agents Ticket Stock and settles outside Area Settlement Plan on negotiated basis.

(7) Can discount if taking inventory risk or, if not, then with carrier consent.

Current examples:

(1) Contract Bulk Fare Operators (Club Med had CBF deal with American Airlines—there have been numerous others).

(2) Ticketron.

Future examples:[1]

(1) HATA—reservations/translation service.

(2) ATBB—ticket delivery from bank locations.

SUMMARY: RE SCOPE OF IMMUNITY UNDER YODER DECISION

Item and Immunized?

Conference procedures and actions—Yes.

Deviations by conferences from approved procedures—No.

Marketing relationships outside conference rules—No.

Group boycott by agents against airline to force raising of commissions or prevent reductions—No.

Group boycott by agents against airline to deter use of ticket distribution outside conference rules—No.

Price-fixing by agents—No.

Price-fixing by airlines, within or outside of ATC—No.

CONFERENCE PROCESSES

Process	Subject to review by CAB/DOT	Immunity [1]
Development/amendment of accreditation rules.	Yes	Yes.

Note: If CAB decision stands, all actions under "Conference Processes" will be subject to attack under the Sherman Act in any Federal court by Justice Department or any private plaintiff.

MEMORANDUM: RE EXCLUSIVITY AND LIMITATIONS ON ENTRY INTO THE DISTRIBUTION OF AIRLINE TICKETS

Throughout the CAB review of the ATC and IATA agency programs and the debate over the Air Traveler Security Act, critics of the programs have focused particular attention on their "exclusivity" provisions. These provisions require participating carriers to refrain from using agents who do not meet the qualification standards of the programs. The critics allege that exclusivity inequitably denies the builder of a superior distribution mousetrap an opportunity to use it and thus deprives consumers of the benefits of innovative competition. Since innovation and new entry lie at the heart of the competitive process, these allegations clearly warrant careful Congressional review.

Defenders of the agency programs point out that critics were unable to identify any specific distribution innovations which had been foreclosed by the programs. Perhaps more importantly, defenders contend that the programs themselves cannot effectively hamper innovation since they impose no limitations on sales techniques used by airline employees (e.g., use of ticketing machines or videotext in-home sales) or on sales by airlines to retailers who resell in their own names. The latter category of true retailers (i.e., non-agents selling air transportation to the public in their own behalf) are, however, legally classified as "indirect air carriers" and thus cannot do business without a CAB license or exemption. Fed. Aviation Act §§ 401, 416; see Order 82-12-85 at 50 M. 170.

The CAB has been extremely reluctant to license indirect air carriers for passenger transportation. At present, indirect passenger authority is available only for charter tour operations (14 C.F.R. Part 380) which are heavily regulated and contract bulk operations (Order 80-2-112), which are subject to equally stringent conditions. As a practical matter, these authorizations are simply insufficient to permit potential retailers to develop significant operations in selling to individual passengers. See Order 82-12-85 at 39, 40.

For example, a major travel agent or motel chain might decide that the traveling public would be prepared to buy from seats on regularly scheduled flights and that they could obtain those seats at satisfactory wholesale prices and under workable inventory arrangements from major airlines. Under present legal conditions, a retail operation of this kind would not be affected by the agency programs which would leave each participating carrier free to determine whether or not to sell to the innovator. The operation would, however, be foreclosed by CAB regulation and the innovator would find that the CAB had not even promulgated regulations governing applications for relief from this legal disability.

In these circumstances, it is apparent that both CAB legal restrictions and "exclusivity" may play a role in limiting the opportunities of a theoretical distribution innovator who wishes to operate outside the boundaries of program agency qualification. "Exclusivity" produces the offsetting advantages of ensuring agent competence in the absence of regulatory control, facilitating interline acceptance of agent-written tickets and safeguarding carrier investments in consumer confidence in accredited agents. CAB limitations on indirect air carrier entry, by contrast, have no offsetting benefits.

Thus, if the "innovation" problem could be resolved by removing CAB restrictions, and subjecting the agency programs to market discipline rather than dismantling them, the interests of carriers, agents and (most important) consumers would best be served. Indeed, a solution in which retailing became the outlet for innovations not yet acceptable for agency sales where carriers are directly accountable, would parallel the Board's action in Phase V of the Competitive Marketing Investigation where it recognized that its own tariff rules, rather than the agency programs, were the cause of limited pricing flexibility at distributor level.

Since the Board has never permitted meaningful entry in indirect passenger air transportation marketing, the impact of its restrictive regime is hard to assess empirically. Useful information was, however, made available during the Competitive Marketing Investigation when the impact of "exclusivity" in the international air cargo markets was examined.

In cargo marketing, the Board has used its exemption authority to allow virtually free entry to air freight forwarders who issue their own waybills and set their own prices and condititions while purchasing cargo space on scheduled flights from air carrier parties to the IATA agency program. 14 C.F.R. Part 296. The record evidence (see Attachment A) clearly demonstrated that forwarding was a virtually equivalent substitute for agency service from the perspectives of both distributors and shippers. See Order 82-12-85 at 113-116 ("forwarder status constitutes a readily available alternative to agency status"). Thus, the Board could find no blockage to innovation in international cargo marketing despite the presence of "exclusivity." [1]

The cargo experience set forth in the record of the Competitive Marketing Investigation makes clear that the Board's disapproval of passenger agency exclusivity was premature if not totally mistaken. The Board could have used the period of the Competitive Marketing Investigation to clear its own house by authorizing indirect air carrier entry into the retailing sector. In the unlikely event that passenger retailing did not provide "a readily available alternative to agency status" the Board could exercise its continuing jurisdiction to assess the balance between "exclusivity" benefits and burdens with real knowledge of substantive barriers, if any, to innovation. Surely, the real issue for the builder of the hypothetical better mousetrap and the consumers he wishes to serve is not the form which market entry takes but the substantive ability to test innovation in the marketplace.

[1] Nevertheless, the Board disapproved cargo exclusivity because it could not "conclude that other forms of cargo distribution would not have entered the marketplace if the exclusivity provisions had not been in place." Id. at 116. No statement could more clearly spell out the Board's application of an impossible standard to those defending the programs.

EXCERPTS

Mr. RUDEN. Okay. Thank you.

Vice Chairman BAILEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Madam Vice Chairman, members of the Board, may I reserve one minute of my time for rebuttal.

We turn to the IATA cargo agency program. In many respects the IATA cargo agreements and the way that they are administered mirror the passenger program which we reviewed yesterday and this morning.

The U.S. cargo resolutions are the consensus of airline cargo experts representing over 100 of the world's airline meetings in annual conferences.

These resolutions are part of a global program of similar agreements in effect in most free world countries. They establish minimal standards for universal cargo agency acceptability in the areas of business experience, financial responsibility, premises and integrity.

IATA efficiently administers the approval and retention process for its members.

You also have before you the cargo accounts settlement system, otherwise known as CASS. CASS is IATA's cargo counterpart to ASP. That is, it is a data processing system for bank settlement of accounts between cargo agents and other distributors on the one hand and air carriers on the other.

CASS started in this country during the last year under your interim approval.

Now, I want to emphasize three points in the limited time available. First, IATA endorses Judge Yoder's conclusions on the IATA cargo agency agreements and CASS. He correctly found that the distribution market for international air cargo services is fluid, it is open, it is fully price and service competitive.

Former Chairman Kahn reached the same conclusion when he independently studied the forwarding market several years ago and his analyses and findings are also in the record.

Only the Bureau has any questions about the competitive impact of these agreements, but we submit that its position lacks consistency.

While BDA agrees with the Judge that the selection criteria and the conference machinery benefit the shipping public, it argues inconsistently that the qualifying standards need not actually be applied to all agents.

But neither it nor anyone else has presented any evidence that the universal application of the standards has prevented any person from performing intermediary services in the cargo distribution market.

That is, no one has demonstrated that competition has been harmed by the application of these agreements. The factual record, therefore, fully supports Judge Yoder's conclusion.

But what is most significant is that the freely competitive distribution cargo market, which both Judge Yoder and former Chairman Kahn have described, developed and matured while the IATA cargo agency agreements were in existence.

This is irrefutable proof that the so-called agency exclusivity, which is a misnomer for the carriers simple covenant to apply the agency standards in the market place has not and does not impair competition.

Now, let's look more closely at this competitive cargo distribution market structure.

International air cargo is sold primarily by risk takers, that is, air freight forwarders and non-risk takers. That is the IATA cargo agent. In roughly a fifty-fifty proportion.

The carriers also sell directly to shippers, but only a relatively small part of the total sales are so transacted.

There are about a thousand cargo agents in the U.S. Most also function as risk taking air freight forwarders. In this risk taking capacity, they compete with carriers and agents on a price and service basis.

That is, by consolidating individual shipments into container or high weight break shipments, forwarders pass on part of the lower volume rate to individual shippers. Of course, where such volume discounts are either not available or the shipper requires prompt movements of goods, usually in small quantities, the forwarder puts on his agency hat, and charges the carriers unit rates, earning his commission in the normal agency fashion.

Otherwise, he may perform the service as a shipper's agent and charge the shipper directly. Remember that carriers also remunerate corporate shipping departments, the counterpart of a BTD, and they remunerate shipper's agents for preparing goods ready for shipment.

So shippers enjoy a wide variety of price and service options in the international air cargo market and as Alfred Kahn observed, the entry into this distribution market is very easy for new intermediaries.

Indeed, most IATA cargo agency applicants are already customs brokers or freight forwarders who have entered the distribution system and are simply seeking the additional service option of representing carriers in the agency capacity.

IATA approves most of these applicants on their first try.

The air cargo distribution market is, thus, many faceted. It is made up of direct carriers, their agents, air freight forwarders, shippers' cooperatives, shippers' agents, cargo charterers, a whole panoply of activities and entities, all of whom offer price and service options to the shipping public.

This distribution model, we submit, is the very paradigm of free competition. In air cargo the risk taker—I think that this is very important, members of the Board, the risk taker in air cargo has played a greater role than has as yet happened on the passenger side.

Why is this?

Most likely it is because this Board has historically fostered and developed air freight forwarding, whereas the passenger counterpart of the air freight forwarder, that is the contract bulk fare operator and the part charterer are very recent phenomena in the passenger distribution market.

The Board has only permitted these entities to come into existence within the last year or so.

But I reiterate that the most significant thing for this case is that the IATA cargo agency agreements, including so-called exclusivity, have not hindered the development of this fully competitive cargo distribution market, and no party has produced a single, live entity who claimed to be competitively harmed in its business as a result of the IATA program, and as you have seen, the DOJ didn't even take part in this part of the case.

They looked out at this system, they said, heck, that is competitive. We don't want any part of this part of the case.

Without any factual evidence, you cannot conclude that the resolutions substantially reduce and eliminate competition within the meaning of the act.

Now, my second point focuses on the positive effects of the qualifying standards as efficiently administered by IATA.

No one in this case, takes the position that the IATA standards for cargo agency selection by themselves are unreasonable. No one claims that they have other than a benign effect on competition or the consumer welfare.

As with the passenger agents, these standards have led to the development of a broadly based corps of qualified industry agents authorized to represent all airlines around the world for online and interline sales.

Properly qualified cargo agents are particularly important, members of the Board, because they prepare hazardous materials for shipment.

Hazardous materials are dangerous goods which can and have caused catastrophic harm to aircraft in flight. IATA requires proof that the applicant and its employees understand the IATA restricted articles manual and that manual, I show you here, is 360 pages long, and that they will follow this manual which is the universal, worldwide accepted safety procedural manual for packaging and marking dangerous goods.

Judge Yoder found no record of evidence to support the proposition that these critical qualifying standards and the uncontroverted benefits that they confer would be maintained without the carriers' mutual undertaking to apply these standards to all of their commonly selected agents.

In other words, so called agency exclusivity eliminates the possibility of double standards which could be particularly pernicious in cargo because of the risk of handling hazardous materials.

The carriers' mutual covenant to use only qualified agents is, therefore, narrowly targeted, that assures a basic level of competence necessary to maintain interline air cargo transportation.

Keep in mind that interline transportation is the creation of a joint product involving participation by two or more carriers.

Without this multilateral agreement on cargo agency standards, the carriers would be compelled to reach numerous bilateral agreements to accomplish precisely the same purpose, that is, to agree that their mutually appointed agents are acceptable to each other.

The conference system is simply the most efficient method of reaching that consensus on a very complex, practical problem of global dimension involving thousands of parties, both here and abroad.

Now, as I have said, no one disputes Judge Yoder's findings that the public benefits from this large corps of qualified agents in this country. Their presence makes the world-wide cargo air transportation system readily accessible to all U.S. shippers, both large and small.

All carriers, particularly the smaller foreign carriers, have with limited U.S. gateways, gained low cost sales representation and market penetration in all regions of the country.

This enhances inter-carrier competition, both actual and potential. A carrier who is seeking to develop a new international cargo route can avoid the substantial expense of selecting and approving its own agents.

They already exist and they already represent him.

Finally, the new entrant cargo agent also enjoys lower barriers to entry because of the mutually administered universal cargo agency program. He need qualify only once in order to represent all carriers. Once approved, he faces no vertical restrictions onwhere he must sell and he is confronted with no productivity requirements. He is free to function as a risk taker, if he wants to do so, and his business risk is much lower than it would be if he were confined to representing only one or a few carriers, rather than virtually the entire world air cargo system, as he is under this program.

All of these efficiency benefits result because the agreements are profit maximizing for the carriers who participate in them. That is, because the carriers mutually value their undertaking to appoint agents who meet the universally agreed standards and because the carriers save transaction costs by administering their agents through IATA.

Now, the Bureau will suggest to you that all these benefits can be achieved without the actual agreement by the carriers to apply the agency standards in the market place.

That is to say, without agency exclusivity. The Bureau advocates very simply a system of double standards. Judge Yoder correctly rejected this argument.

Common sense tells you that you cannot have standards and no standards at the same time, that you cannot maintain a system which is predicted on the existence of standards and the universal application of those standards in the market place but allow adherents simply to ignore the standards whenever they choose.

The Bureau's sole contention is that the agreements may reduce competition, may reduce competition by excluding some unknown entity entering the air cargo distribution market place. But they have no proof of such exclusion in fact, and the record clearly shows that there are many options for persons to enter the air cargo distribution system, and as Chairman Kahn found in looking at the system three or four years ago, the barriers to entry are very low.

And the Bureau does not come to grips with the special problem of hazardous materials. Under the IATA program each agent must prove his understanding of the hazardous material regulations.

Packages made ready for carriage must conform to those standards and must be properly marked so that carriers will be aware of the potentially dangerous goods onboard the aircraft.

Madam Vice Chairman and members of the Board, this record contains a reference to the NTSB's findings on a tragic accident that occurred in Boston in 1973 involving a Pan American 707.

On a perfectly clear day the cockpit suddenly filled with smoke as the aircraft was passing north of Boston on a transatlantic flight.

The crew frantically tried to determine the cause by reviewing the manifest of goods onboard, but they found no indication of anything that would cause such a problem. They tried desperately to get the plane back to Boston.

Observers on the ground could see the plane approaching. They could see smoke pouring out of the cockpit as it made its final approach and within a mile of the runway, the airplane pitched up, spun in, and killed all onboard.

Now, the NTSB found the crew were blinded and were made helpless because nitric acid had been placed on the aircraft without proper packaging or markings and had leaked, causing a chemical fire in the belly of the aircraft.

This was a cargo flight. And fortunately, the number of lives that were lost were few. But every day passenger flights depart this country for world-wide destinations with hazardous materials below deck.

The public interest requires that we take every reasonable step to make sure that such materials are properly marked and packaged, so that the air crews know what goods are there and in what quantities.

The cargo business is no place to introduce a policy of double standards on the selection and qualification of cargo agents as the Bureau would advocate in the vague name of less anti-competitive alternative.

Judge Yoder found that the risk to the public is simply not acceptable.

Now, Madam Vice Chairman, I have run out of time. I have about 30 seconds. I would like to say something about CASS, if I may.

CASS is open to all carriers. It is open to IATA carriers and non-IATA carriers on a voluntary basis. It is available to cargo agents, to forwarders, to shippers, to shippers' cooperatives, so long as they follow the simple mechanical procedures.

CASS does nothing but save money for all entities who participate in it and ultimately for the consuming public.

Like ASP, CASS is simply an efficiency machine, which eliminates expensive backroom costs for carriers and distributors. No party in this case opposes CASS as approved by you on an interim basis and as it is currently functioning in this country.

Fifty-four airlines are now using CASS here, and over two-thirds of the IATA cargo agents are participating in the system.

It is wholly benign. It is uncontroversial. It yields productive efficiencies. There are no allocative inefficiencies in the jargon of anti-trust economics, and you should have no hesitation in adopting Judge Yoder's decision.

EUROPEAN DELEGATION ON INTERNATIONAL DEFENSE

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I recently had the opportunity to meet with a delegation of distinguished European parliamentarians visiting this country to explain their countries' support of a strong Western defense, including the proposed deployment of the Pershing II and cruise missiles, beginning this December.

These European leaders, all of whom have extensive experience in national defense and security affairs, emphasized that they hoped the Geneva negotiation for a satisfactory arms control agreement would be successful but were equally firm in their support of deployment of the Euromissiles if negotiations should fail.

The members of the European Delegation on International Defense were: Peter Petersen, CDU member of the Bundestag, Federal Republic of Germany, and chairman of the delegation; Monique Garnier-Lancon, a deputy mayor of Paris and vice chairman of the European Institute for Security Matters, vice-chairman of the delegation; Edward leigh, Conservative Member of Parliament, Great Britain; Senator Robert Close, Liberal Member of the Belgian Senate; Carlo Ripa di Meana, Socialist Member of the European Parliament from Italy; and J. L. Janssen Van Raay, Christian Democrat Member of the European Parliament from the Netherlands.

They constituted a unique group, including representatives of the major non-Communist political parties of Western Europe, including Christian Democrat, Socialist, Liberal, and Conservative. And they represented the five countries where the Pershing II and cruise missiles will be deployed, plus France, which, with its independent nuclear force, supports deployment of these INF weapons.

The parliamentarians were particularly eager to inform the American people that the great majority of the European people support deployment as demonstrated in recent national elections in which political parties favoring deployment, unless there are successful Geneva talks, won decisive victories in Great Britain, Germany, Italy and the Netherlands.

Mr. President, I wish to extend my congratulations to the Center for International Relations and its president, Lee Edwards, for organizing this important and timely visit. And I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpted remarks by members of the delegation.

The remarks follow:

WHO SHALL DECIDE?

(By Peter Peterson, Federal Republic of Germany)

This fall, the world is in a state of unrest. We will find out whether the important NATO decisions are made by the Politburo in Moscow, or by the NATO councils in Brussels. In December 1979, NATO decided, after very careful deliberations, to deploy U.S. medium-range missiles in Europe unless the Russians scuttle theirs. It is important to remember that it was the Europeans, especially our German government, with the backing of all parties in Parliament, which urged the Alliance to take that decision.

For years the Americans negotiated with Moscow about intercontinental missiles, which could reach Russia or America, but nobody talked about the SS-20 that could destroy us without threatening the United States or Canada. When in SALT II, the tremendous American superiority in intercontinental weapons was given up, and a balance accepted, the Alliance decided that a balance on the European continent also must be restored.

We Europeans would prefer to SS-20 and no Pershing II and cruise missiles. But if that is not agreed on in Geneva, we will deploy as planned, starting at the end of this year. In that sense, the Politburo in Moscow will decide what is happening this autumn in Europe.

THE PRICE OF LIBERTY

(By Monique Garnier-Lançon, France)

I. THE THREAT

In this age, when each day the announcement of new tensions, of new confrontations, disposes us to reflections which should and ought to be for the good, how can one deny the evidence:

The threat which hangs over the free countries is stronger than ever: the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute (SIPRI), which cannot be accused of partiality, reminds us in their 1982 annual publication: it is especially the Soviet Union which has considerably increased its military expenses in the course of the last four years; in the domain of conventional terms it surpasses by far the United States. The Soviets have more rockets and atomic warheads than the United States and would be able to discharge the equivalent of 4.5 billion tons of TNT on U.S. territory. The number of nuclear tests in the U.S.S.R. was clearly higher in 1981 to that of the United States.

For us Europeans there is the added menace of Soviet medium range rockets, the SS-20 in particular, of which more than 350, according to the Pentagon, with triple heads are in the process of being deployed on Soviet territory; according to SIPRI, 175 were actually aimed at Western Europe at the end of 1981. NATO has at its disposal today no equivalent weapon. France for its part has at its disposal only 18 medium range rockets, deployed in the southern Alps.

The disequilibrium of conventional forces in Europe is still clearer if one weighs against each other NATO and the Warsaw Pact, even adding the French forces to those of NATO.

The light cast jointly by the allies on the Soviet threat and on the means of facing it is the only response to the pacifist and neutralist campaign which will go on developing on both sides of the Atlantic and whose probable outcome would be war as was the case in 1939. Governments, as all those who have any responsibility whatsoever in the free world, must make it understood that the will for peace is a completely different thing from pacifism, a naive belief for most, but a calculated affirmation for some who attempt to convince the former that unilateral disarmament will lead to peace. As Michel Aurillac, president of Club 89, who has well read and remembered Vladimir Bukovsky, continually reminds us: wanting to be red rather than dead, we will be red and dead.

II. FRANCE AND THE DEFENSE OF EUROPE

It is important therefore to emphasize with satisfaction the positions taken by France, each time that it manifests and affirms with firmness its interdependence, its attachment to the values of liberty, and to the concrete proofs of this liberty, and the respect of its pledges, in particular in relation to its Atlantic allies. But it is necessary to bring reality into the discussion and to keep above all from yielding to the illusion of a defense which is more proclaimed than truly operational.

It is a dangerous illusion, when our external forces of intervention, both naval and air, are at an insufficient level and when our ground and air forces in Europe, even at the price of a profound reorganization, cannot, without losing all effectiveness, fall below the level of supplies they have.

It is a dangerous illusion, finally, when the civil defense in which preceding governments did not believe, is always non-existent while it is developing in the U.S.S.R. and its satellites.

The reality of the Soviet threat and the necessity to strengthen the alliance impose therefore on France an increased effort in defense matters which excludes neither the spirit of economy nor the imagination.

III. TO STRENGTHEN THE ALLIANCE

It would be dangerous to draw from our increased effort isolationist conclusions. We live in an environment of free countries, which supposes that our defense and theirs be coordinated and, let us emphasize it, the strengthening of a purely defensive alliance between democracies controlled by their public opinions is a factor of peace.

It is not the purpose of preparing a conventional battle in which Soviet superiority is assured for a long time, but to permit political powers to take knowingly and with sufficient time, the decision to engage in nuclear arms.

IV. THE EAST-WEST DIALOGUE

The East-West dialogue must at the same time be pursued to maintain peace but must not be boiled down to a one-one consversation between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. in which France and Europe would be the losers.

France has a long experience of the politics of detente but it does not have the same meaning for the Soviets and for the West. Westerners want the free circulation of merchandise, persons and ideas, the Soviets want to pursue the ideological war and to choose to exchange only in proportion to their interests. The fiasco of the Helsinki conference and the subjugation of Poland are there to remind us.

This is why all negotiations with the Soviets is first of all a relation of forces. This is why the deployment of the Pershing II and of the cruise missiles by the U.S. in member states of NATO is the surest guarantee of the pursuit of negotiations, in balanced conditions, for the maintenance of this peace so ardently desired, but so fragile. The old adage is always current, alas: "Si vis pacem, para bellum" (Latin: "If you want peace, prepare for war.").

If France is not a participant in this initiative, since it has its own strategic system, it can do nothing but approve it and France owes it to itself to sustain it vigorously.

As for the offer of Mr. Andropov of December 21, 1982, concerning the SS-20, to reduce the number of these missiles to that of the French or British missiles, it is unacceptable to France, and, to use an expression of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs: "it is a means of diverting the conversation from its true subject." Besides the fact that this proposal integrates the French forces into the balance of the NATO-Warsaw pact, it is of an obvious bad faith. The French strategic ground missiles are 18 in number and to make these appear to be a so-called equilibrium between the SS-20 and the French and British forces, Mr. Andropov includes the five French and four British submarines in service, while not mentioning the 70 Soviet submarines. Mr. Mitterand was right to denounce it on January 2, 1983 as Mr. Chirac did at the time of his trip earlier this year to the U.S.

France has suffered harshly during the two World Wars which in less than 30 years provoked the invasion of its territory, and considerable destruction and human losses. As much as any other people it wants peace. But it knows, for it remembers, that weakness leads more surely to war than firmness and the continuity of ideas.

The dusty debate on "Atlanticism" which has poisoned French political life must give place to a lucid revitalization of the Atlantic alliance by the effort of all of its members and first of all of France. There are numerous positive signs: the common work of the R.P.R. and of the U.D.F. notably on the '83 budget and on the programmation law, the military budget and the planification law, the joint seminar of October, 1982, the Club Perspective et Realities and Club 89, the speech of M. Jacques Chirac at the meeting of the E.D.U. in July, 1982, the R.P.R. political project of January 23, 1983, the U.D.F. declaration on defense, ought to give to M. Mitterand the assurance that the opposition will support him if he matches his actions with his words and those of his Minister of Foreign Affairs.

It would be necessary, without doubt, to force the hand of some of his political supporters but the independence of France and the freedom of its people require this price. A people is free only if it wants to be and agrees to pay the price. There is no longer much time to profit from the general awakening of public opinion. If sterile and irresponsible political games were again to make it fall asleep in our free world it would be a sleep close to death.

SOME THOUGHTS ON ANTI-NUCLEAR PROTEST

(By Edward Leigh, Great Britain)

For the past three years, Western Europe has been under the most dangerous assault to its security since the years following World War II which led to the founding of NATO.

An unceasing barrage of Soviet propaganda—from the Kremlin in the form of bluster and blandishment, from the Soviet dupes in the so-called "peace movement" via their protests—all this has had the aim of undermining Western resolve and cohesion in the defense field, and of driving a wedge between the Americans and their European allies in NATO.

This blatant interference in the domestic politics of Western nations by the Kremlin, and the orchestrated hysteria of their protest movement by their friends, had as its immediate target the election of governments in Britain and West Germany which would bow to Soviet pressure not to install counter weapons to the Soviet SS-20 and which would pull the rug out from under the Americans. But our electorates have proved a bitter disappointment to the Russians and their would-be allies in the West. By the most decisive and crushing margins, the Socialists in Britain and Germany, and the ragbag of protestors who pressed their ideological garbage into Socialist election platforms, were overwhelmingly rejected by our voters.

Many in the United States did not fully grasp what was at stake in the British election held in June this year. What the British Left and its one-sided disarmament allies were proposing was the expulsion of U.S. forces and bases from Britain, the pulling out of NATO by Britain, and the immediate giving up by Britain of its independent nuclear deterrent. That was the prospect of one-sided nuclear disarmament which faced us.

Despite the infestation of our media, particularly television, with producers and reporters sympathetic to the one-sided disarmament campaign, despite the expenditure by the Soviets of the equivalent of millions of dollars on propaganda and direct funding of some national protest groups, despite the vicious anti-Americanism of the propaganda campaign waged by the Left in Europe, our people refused to go along with a policy which would have demolished Western security and made war more likely.

Now this same campaign, this barrage of fake but reasonable-sounding proposals from Russia, the domestic orchestration of those same defeatist voices which fatally undermined your resolve in South East Asia, this clamour will be raised in the United States in an effort to influence both the Party programs and the eventual outcome of your 1984 Presidential and Congressional elections. I trust that the American electorate will follow the example of their European allies and reject decisively the pacifists' and neutralists' recipe for defeat.

In the United States today, you have a different demand from your protesters compared with the one we fought. Your protesters demand a nuclear "freeze." But what does that mean? It may not be the blinkered recipe for suicide advocated by the British one-sided nuclear disarmers, but the freeze carries its own dramatic dangers.

It proposes enshrining the Soviet advantage in certain categories of weapons leaving the United States totally vulnerable in important areas such as the defense of its satellite observation capability. The Soviets have tested antisatellite weapons and now want a freeze on such tests. The Soviets have deployed over 350 mobile SS-20 missiles, targeted mainly on Europe, and now wants a freeze to prevent the Western alliance installing a countermeasure in the form of Cruise and Pershing II missiles. Thus a freeze would allow the Soviets to keep what they have while forbidding the United States to draw level.

Florence Nightingale, that famous pioneer of hospital reform, said that "the first duty of a hospital is not to spread disease." Well, the first task of a sensible security and defense policy is not to increase the risk of war. Yet that is precisely what the protest movements are hell-bent on doing.

The whole notion of deterrence, the basis of our defense policy, is to make the other man think it is not worthwhile that he start a conflict. We must so influence the Soviet policy makers and leaders as to make them believe that a policy of war is too costly an option. We must make them believe that they would lose more than they could ever hope to gain.

But every so-called "peace" demonstration actually undermines deterrence by making the Kremlin believe that the will of the West to defend itself is in doubt. Every "peace" demonstration tempts Soviet leaders to believe that maybe a war could be fought and won. Maybe, they think, those thousands of foolish people who march in demonstrations will not allow Western governments to defend their nations.

I believe sincerely that in this respect the protest movement undermines the real peace movement. The protestors sabotage the chances of the peace negotiators. They encourage the Soviets to sit tight, refusing to seriously negotiate down the level of their weapons aimed at us, because the Soviets believe that if they wait just long enough then the protestors will do their job for them and strip the United States and NATO of its missiles without the Soviets having to make one single significant concession. That is the true contribution of the current so-called "peace" movement.

Our policy of peace through strength is specifically designed to persuade Soviet leaders that no war, conventional or nuclear, can be fought and won. Our capability and our will to deliver a devastating response to a major attack must never be in doubt. That is the heart of deterrence—not simply the capacity to retaliate but the will to retaliate.

If I may be permitted a word of criticism—and this is based on personal experience—it is that opinion in the United States does not pay enough attention to what happens outside America and is often unprepared for developments which should have been foreseen until they actually break over the head of an Administration. In 1981 my colleagues and I from the British Coalition for Peace Through Security spent some time in Washington meeting with officials from the State Department, the Pentagon and the National Security Council. We were dismayed to find them totally uninformed about the seriousness of the problem stemming from the protest movements in Western Europe, and what this would mean for Allied security policies.

We not only correctly predicted what was happening, but we also predicted that this negative and destructive sentiment would make its way across the Atlantic. Once again we were right. Your own leftist Institute for Policy Studies in Washington has played host to our Campaign for one-sided Nuclear Disarmament, and has had a program of exchange speakers and tactics. Now your domestic politics is infected with the disease of neutralism and defeatism which we warned about. I just hope that American public opinion proves to be as mature as European public opinion in rejecting utterly the false prescriptions, hysteria and panic-mongering which are the trademarks to the protest movement.

We in Europe take seriously both the obligations and duties of the Western Alliance. We have common institutions and common liberties. We have common interests and common adversaries.

The American people have always been true and faithful allies to us, and their generosity in war and in peace will never be forgotten. I come to you today as one of a group of Europeans determined to help you win the peace. Your political testing time is about to come and we will do everything we can in order to ensure that our Alliance stays firm and grounded in that common liberty and freedom which we hold so dear and precious.

THE ALLIANCE AT A CROSSROADS

(By Robert Close, Belgium)

Since the day of the explosion in Hiroshima, which marked the beginning of the nuclear era, hope but also anguish escaped from Pandora's box. Hope because we believed that war was impossible because of the "balance of terror." Anguish, because it would only need one of two adversaries to think that he had a determining advantage sufficient to give him victory, or if not victory, then means of pressure which would enable him to impose his will.

Europe is now in this uncomfortable position. On the European level, at present, no display is possible in the absence of appropriate means of action. The aging Vulcans have been withdrawn and the American F-111s are growing less and less adapted to their job, through their numerical inferiority, their vulnerability on the ground and their decreasing penetration capacity, which is due to Russian progress in anti-aircraft defence.

This is what Senator Sam Nunn thinks: "The fact that the great majority of NATO tactical nuclear weapons, is used, would be limited to striking on NATO territory, is not easily going to frighten or deter the Soviet Union."

We must also clear up the regrettable confusion that exists between two problems which are connected but nevertheless separate: security and disarmament. To wish to neglect the one and give the other all the privileges is, to say the least of it, dangerous in a turbulent world. To believe that unilateral disarmament would produce peace is utopian and would solve nothing. This should be pointed out to all those who advocate pacifism at any price and obstinately oppose anything nuclear.

The end of 1983 will doubtless constitute a turning point. Either the decision to deploy the European missiles will be finally and unanimously taken or else one partner or another will decide not to decide.

In the latter case, this would be giving a new victory to the Soviet Union, by allowing it to insert a wedge between the allies and to broaden the split between the United States and Europe.

The Russians know that this could be momentous for the continent's future and they are putting everything into their effort to achieve it, making use of what Lenin called "useful idiots" whom they can always seduce with propaganda.

We will have to counter this manoeuvre. After all, M. Mitterand himself has said "Friendship is not based on complaisance. The Russians will negotiate all the better with us, the more they esteem our capacity of saying 'no' when necessary. It will make our 'yeses' more emphatic."

After the tragedy of the Korean airliner, we must remember what Arthur Koestler has written: "To yield to the seduction of the sirens is natural to man, but to want to lie down with the crocodiles is peculiar to our age alone."

We are at the crossroads, but it depends on no one but ourselves to follow the narrow steep road, to become aware of the dangers and to react promptly and firmly.

Yet, all the symptoms that made it possible to predict the disaster of 1940 are present, some amplified in the beginning of the eighties. Some feel they are signs of a civilization on the point of death, such as Gibbon described in 1776.

But I cannot agree with such a pessimistic view. We must hope that we can wake up in time, react against the insidious propaganda of those who prefer to lower their arms and make our political leaders see reason, instead of unrealistically ignoring the future.

The future will not be built on our fears, but on what we have dared.

THE INFERIORITY OF THE WEST IN EUROPE

(By Carlo Ripa di Meana, Italy)

While we are here thinking about the stability and future of the West, in Geneva Paul Nitze and Yuli Kvitinski are discussing the Euromissiles problem, which I do not hesitate to term the major problem of our time. The negotiations in questions are unequal in a way which reflects the inferiority of the West by comparison with the Soviet Union's presence in Europe.

The Soviet Union has at its disposal in Europe more than 250 SS-20 Euromissiles, out of a total number of over 350 distributed over her own territories. Each one of these more than 250 medium-range missiles aimed at our continent is armed with three nuclear heads, making a total of more than 750 devices, each one of which has a destructive power ten times that of the bomb which razed Hiroshima to the ground.

In addition, the Soviet Union keeps around 300 medium-range SS4 and SS5 missiles aimed at Europe. These are armed with only one nuclear warhead and are less accurate than the SS 20's, but they still have the same destructive force, enough to destroy the whole of Europe.

At the present moment, the West is in no position to offer any comparable practical opposition to the Soviet nuclear potential. The positioning of the West's nuclear missiles is tactical by nature, designed in part to fill the already existing gap between the sectors of the conventional forces, another front on which the Soviets have a devastating superiority.

The West's decision to install 108 Pershing II and 464 Cruise missiles in Europe, each armed with only one nuclear head, and able to strike as many targets in the Soviet areas, has the sole aim of partially redressing the Soviet superiority in the field of Euromissiles.

Recently Yuri Andropov proposed reducing the number of SS 20's to 162, asking in exchange that the West should, in compensation, remove the 162 medium-range missiles currently at the disposal of France and Great Britain. The novelty of Andropov's proposal lies in the promise on the Russian side to destroy their SS 20's in excess of the 162 limit, rather than redeploy them to the Asiatic front as had earlier been suggested.

Nevertheless, the hypothesis mentioned by the Soviet Premier is, as a whole, unacceptable. Contrary to what some people think, the idea of counting the 162 French and British missiles in these negotiations complicates rather than simplifies efforts to reach an agreement. This is because: (1) The French and British missiles, which are set up for the most part on submarines and not ground bases, have already been taken into account in the negotiations concerning intercontinental missiles (Start); (2) Neither France nor Great Britain are taking part in the negotiations on Euromissiles; (3) The positions of the English and French missiles belong to the national armed forces of those countries for the defence of their own territories and are in no way included in NATO plans; (4) the medium-range French and British missiles have only one warhead and are inferior in range and strength to the Soviet missiles.

The defence system we Europeans have created and built together, each country according to its own possibilities, is an indispensable element in the Western alliance. Yuri Andropov is well aware of this and he, by continuing the strategies introduced by his predecessors, has never stopped in his attempts to divide Europe from the United States and the European countries from each other, putting pressure on this or that country by alternating false promises with threats and, more recently, with the gravest acts of international terrorism.

Yuri Andropov knows all too well that if the process of European unification were to develop, moving from the present phase of imperfect economic unity to a phase of real political and economic harmony, the alliance as a result would emerge greatly strengthened.

This is exactly why I wish to emphasize the fact that we European parliamentarians do not represent our respective countries in their diversity, but rather in their common desire to be more united.

If someone today were to ask me what the idea of a united Europe means I would answer with an example. In 1981, "Western Security" pointed out, to the great surprise of the ill-formed, that European contributions to net NATO expenditure increased from 21.7% in 1969 to 41.6% in 1979.

That fact is not generally well-known because it has always been looked at in a fragmentary way, divided up amongst the various European countries which contribute. Yet it shows that the European contribution to Western security is not negligible and is proportionate to European present-day possibilities. At the same time I think it is clear that if Europe succeeds in reaching a unified political consensus then her resources will be increased just as will her future potential in all other fields.

On the other hand, as regards security and defense against Soviet aggression, only the unity of the whole of the West can guarantee the greatest efficacy. In this connection the missile system of the United States is the touch-stone for maintaining the strategic balance desired between East and West. Faced with the growing threat of the Soviet strategy, considerations of the expense of maintaining this East-West balance necessarily fade into the background. When freedom and democracy as well as our future and that of our children are at stake, no price is too high to pay.

We want peace and for this reason we must be ready to defend ourselves. Heaven help those who forget this. Lebanon chose to live without arms under the illusion that its innocuous appearance would give it protection from the aggressive activities of others. All of us know the bitter consequences of that tragic choice.

We want peace and therefore think it essential that the West be strong and able to face the challenges thrown at it. We want peace and hope that the negotiations under way in Geneva will reach an acceptable agreement. We will keep hoping this until the end of the Geneva conference on Euromissiles, but not a moment longer.

The Italian Position and the New Mediterranean Reality

I should like, if I may, to add a purely personal note. As many of you already know, Italy has accepted the responsibility of positioning 112 Cruise missiles in the event of the negotiations on Euromissiles failing. I hold that my government will keep its word and believe that nothing will induce it to change its mind.

These 112 missiles will be installed in Comiso in Sicily, the extreme south of my country in the middle of the Mediterranean, half way between the central and eastern sectors, on a nerve point of the Mediterranean basin.

This choice of position directly corresponds to the necessity of adapting the area to Soviet influences in Europe.

Until now few people have spoken of this area. The traditional notion that the weak point of the defense system was in Central Europe has always been strong. In fact armaments development and altered strategic conditions have brought a striking increase in the Soviet submarine fleet in the Mediterranean, together with a marked increase in the numbers of the surface fleet. Today the Soviet Mediterranean fleet has a strength equal to that of the worldwide Western fleet as a whole. The Soviets may now take certain initiatives which in the past would have been inconceivable.

Periodic naval maneuvers carried out by the NATO fleet are regularly spied on by the Soviets. Moreover it has already happened that in Taranto, an important city in Puglia at the centre of the Ioanian sea, the unmistakable silhouette of a Soviet submarine appeared near port. In the past few days for the first time, the Soviet fleet has been carrying out military exercises in the open sea off the island of Capri in the Tyrrhenian sea.

We know that the Soviet submarines in the Mediterranean are for the most part nuclear-powered as are many of their surface vessels.

Moreover, the nuclear armaments possessed by the Soviet fleet make it an extreme threat in the strategic arms balance.

In conclusion: the situation has changed drastically and today the south side of the NATO countries is at great risk.

But there is more. There is a general belief that the strategic influence and policy of the Soviet Union in the Mediterranean is still limited because of its limited presence in the Near East. This idea must be rejected. The strategic weight of a military power does not depend on the territorial extension of its influence but rather on its military force and political positions in the area.

Intentionally, I will not refer to the Libyan question that I consider already widely known by American public opinion.

The Soviet Union has a strong influence in Syria, a country in the heart of the Middle East on the border of Israel and with its coasts on the Mediterranean Sea. It is a Middle East country, but relatively very close to the Soviet Union. One year ago, Syria came out of its military conflict with Israel a severely depleted nation. All the commentators agreed with the forecast that it would take Syria 5-10 years to get back on its feet in military terms.

But already at the beginning of last summer, the Syrian minister of defense, General Tlas, was able to announce that his country had completely recovered from its losses and felt able to face another confrontation with Israel without being at a military disadvantage. This happened because the Soviet Union, moving from the Middle East strategy of relative defense endorsed by Brezhnev toward the strategy of attack favoured by Andropov, has made Syria the key point in a system which requires serious examination.

The Soviets provide all the military facilities in the port of Latakia. Present-day Syria has new and sophisticated arms. Soviet advisers in Syria have notably increased in number and importance from 5,000 to 10,000. Some of them have been seen wandering around that part of the Lebanon occupied by Syria; even going so far as to visit Beirut, a few kilometers from the peace forces of several Western countries, including Italy.

Above all, the Soviet Union has set up an indefinite number of electronic communication posts in Syria directly linked up with Soviet spyships stationed in the Mediterranean, equipped with Soviet tracking and listening devices. For the first time in history a country which doesn't belong to the Warsaw pact is militarily integrated into the Soviet intelligence system.

Syria is in the heart of the Near East and has long stretches of coast on the Mediterranean sea. We know what is causing the present discontent in Lebanon. We know that behind the Druse troops, who are battling the small army of the legitimate Lebanese government, is Syria and behind Syria is the Soviet Union. It is no longer possible these days to look at old problems from old points of view. The old problems continue to exist, but they have become more worrying and more serious.

I hold that the Mediterranean problem should be placed at the centre of the West's attention and that more of our efforts should be concentrated there. Historically, the Mediterranean is the southern boundary of Europe and the West.

European Security

(By J. L. Janssen van Raay,[1] The Netherlands)

It is my firm belief that an independent defense of Europe against the Soviet threat is not possible, nor is it desirable. On first sight, this is not obvious because Europe has more people than the United States or the Soviet Union, and is at least as wealthy. The main reason for our weak position is a geographic one: we just do not have the space for an adequate defense against a communist attack. An independent defense would inevitably mean a strategy of an aggressive nature, based on the continuous possiblity of attack, even a prevented one. This would mean a continuous menace of the peace.

Our natural allies, not only ideologically, politically, culturally and historically, but also militarily, are the U.S. and Canada. Our American allies create the necessary room for defense in modern warfare, and we take care of defending the forward area. This means that NATO is and should be the indispensable fundament of western security.

It is my firm conviction that the alliance should be based on two pillars of equal strength with the exception of the nuclear deterrent which should remain in the hands of the U.S. only. But the American allies on one side and Europeans on the other side should make roughly the same efforts for their defense.

I said with the exception of the nuclear deterrent, and now I touch on the most sensitive issue of these days. NATO is a defensive alliance and its main purpose is to maintain the peace and prevent a third world war with its apocalyptic consequences.

Notwithstanding all changes in NATO's strategy, the always unchanged and in my opinion unchangeable basis is the nuclear deterrent, which is, to put it bluntly, to threaten to kill so many Russians that this fact withholds them from attacking. In other words with highly immoral means (the potential killing of all the Russians) we reach an extremely ethical result (no nuclear or conventional war) so that no Russian life is in jeopardy.

It is this paradox of nuclear dissuading that is so difficult for politicians to explain to their electorate, and for their religious leaders to grasp. Though I am a convinced believer in democracy, I envy the Soviet-communist dictatorship in one respect. They do not care about public opinion, they do not have an electorate, and if a religious leader steps out of line he is sent to the Gulag Archipelago, to a psychiatric institution or is simply eliminated.

Still we have the vital task to explain to our peoples the unpleasant paradox on which our peace is based. Nuclear weapons of mass destruction radically changed the old strategic concepts, best formulated by Von Clausewitz in his famous maxim: "War is a continuation of diplomacy, although with other means." For the first time in history of mankind, both sides possess weapons which by their catastrophic effect exclude mutually their use, but only if and as long as it is credible that they will be used in case the other party attacks.

If one looks today at the practical result of this "balance of terror", the judgement should on the first sight be extremely positive. Prevention of a nuclear conflict between the super-powers and the allies automatically excludes conventional war between them. While elsewhere in the world, since World War II, more than 150 armed conflicts have taken place between states, peace between NATO and the Warsaw Pact has been maintained for more than 30 years. For those who remember the disastrous effect of unlimited conventional war this is a great success, the more so if one realizes that modern conventional weapons produce a manifold of destructiveness.

Still not only left-wing radicals, but also responsible church people are more and more doubtful with regard to the moral justification of our cornerstone of security. If one takes into account the traditional involvement of churches with regard to the moral aspects of warfare, it is no wonder that not only the military and the politicians had to adapt radically their ways of thinking, but that also the church doctrine had to be changed, specifically the doctrine of the justsum bellum. This doctrine accepted the unpleasant consequences of warfare when it was a just war. On the other hand, there is of course no moral justification under whatever circumstances for the whole world being destroyed.

Especially the Protestant theology in the Netherlands, and elsewhere, seeks to find a way out of the collision of ethical principles. Maintaining the peace by excluding nuclear and conventional warfare is reached from a ethical point of view—through completely reprehensible means: mass destruction. Politicians have found their way out by the paradox of nuclear strategy: We can punish an attack by the Soviet Union with complete destruction of the countries of the Warsaw Pact and we shall certainly do so.

Because the Soviet leaders know that we shall do so, or at least are not sure that we shall not do it, they do not attack so that we do not have to use the nuclear weapon. Yet, use eliminates a politically credible fact. This does not need to cause ethical problems for the political leaders, because nobody knows what the responsible people (Reagan, Andropov and, on a smaller scale, Thatcher and Mitterand) really shall do on the moment of truth. In politics, as in commerce, it is admissable to conceal real intent and to leave the other party uncertain. The ethical man cannot possibly do so. The statesman is successful in his policy if the opposite number has to take into account the use of strategic nuclear weapons. The ethical man is obliged to reveal his true intent. In other words, the ethical man by definition cannot threaten credibly.

The Protestant churches have tried to find solutions, but they have disregarded the new rules of deterrence:

(a) "Possession of strategic nuclear weapons is allowed, but use is not." This ethical/logical way of thinking misunderstands that announced non-use of nuclear weapons make their possession useless.

(b) "Nuclear weapons may be used as antiforce, but not anti-city." This thought derives from the old church doctrine that indiscriminate killing of noncombatants is not allowed. The clergy mean well, of course, but the consequences of their proposal is that nuclear weapons can be used again and war is possible.

(c) The peace movements have tried to give hope to the people with their slogan, "All nuclear weapons should disappear from the world, starting with the Netherlands." I find it utterly immoral to raise false illusions. As long as the Biblical prophecy that sheep and wolves will live peacefully together has not come true, so long nuclear weapons will exist. Even if today all nuclear weapons would be destroyed, they could be produced tomorrow because one cannot destroy or erase the knowledge to make them. Instead of raising false illusions, the church could better lead man to a responsible use of this new creation of God, nuclear energy. It is not the nuclear weapons which is moral or immoral.

The most dangerous members of the so-called peace movement are those who want unilateral nuclear disarmament. We should learn better from the lessons of history. If the western democracies in the thirties had reacted firmly from a position of military strength to the Nazi threat, the Second World War with its tens of millions of victims would have been prevented. We should never find ourselves in that same position again.●

MINORITY ENTERPRISE DEVELOPMENT WEEK

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, the designation of the week of October 2–8 as Minority Enterprise Development Week points attention to the great need for more ethnic and minority representation in our Nation's business community. Our efforts to expand opportunities for minority-owned businesses must not stop simply with designating a commemorative week; the Federal Government must take substantive steps to assist and inform minority-owned businesses of the opportunities available and the means to obtain them.

My State of Michigan provides a good example to the rest of the Nation on positive steps that can be taken to reach this goal. Traditionally, Michigan sets aside the first week in October to promote minority participation in business. Workshops, lectures and training seminars are held to inform minorities of new avenues for expansion, financing, and assistance from the State.

This year in Michigan, the entire month of October has been designated as Minority Business Enterprise Month. Throughout the State, a series of workshops and lectures designed to help minority business grow are being held. Included are workshops on: How to evaluate technological needs; women in business; business and marketing planning; Federal and State resources available to help minority businesses; and alternative financing strategies. Additionally, awards ceremonies will be held to honor successful minority-owned businesses. I applaud these individuals for their hard work and for the examples they set.

Most encouraging is the fact that Michigan is determined to continue this effort year round. In August, Gov. James Blanchard commissioned the State of Michigan Minority Technology Council. This joint venture between the University of Michigan and the Michigan Department of Commerce is designed to assist minority-owned businesses move into technologically intensive fields. It is a program I would recommend the Federal Government and the other 49 States adopt.

Mr. President, minority-owned businesses have a wealth of knowledge and expertise to offer this country. We should take advantage of these resources while at the same time expanding opportunities for these entrepreneurs.●

ONE OF IDAHO'S LEADING ENGINEERS STEPS DOWN AS CHAIRMAN OF CH2M HILL, INC.

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to share with you and my colleagues the career and personal accomplishments of my friend Earl C. Reynolds, Jr., of Boise, Idaho, who has recently retired as chairman of the board of CH2M Hill, Inc. Born in neighboring Oregon, Earl has been a resident of Idaho for 33 for years is one of the State's leading citizens. In business, civic, and national affairs, as well as in engineering, his efforts have profoundly affected many in Idaho and across the Nation.

Earl Reynolds became chairman of the employee-owned consulting engineering firm of CH2M Hill in 1980. CH2M Hill, which provides private-sector clients and governments at all levels with consulting services in engineering, planning, economics, and the environmental sciences, during Earl's tenure grew from 1,900 to 2,000 employees and advanced from seventh to sixth in size among engineering firms nationwide.

Since Earl Reynolds joined CH2M Hill in 1947, more than 1,200 projects have been successfully completed under his direction. In various management capacities he has been responsible for the development of energy systems—including the first liquified natural gas plant in Idaho and several geothermal systems—and for numerous wastewater management projects. Among these are the largest sewage collection and treatment plant in Idaho and the first waste stabilization ponds in Utah, which are the largest such facilities in the West. Earl's management expertise also extends to economic and environmental studies; comprehensive planning; the design of structures, foundations, and recreational areas; and planning and design of irrigation systems. He is registered as a professional engineer in seven Western States and has served in national positions with the American Consulting Engineers Council and the National Society of Professional Engineers.

After earning a bachelor's degree in civil engineering from Oregon State University, Earl attended Yale University, where he received a master's degree with honors in structural engineering in 1946. He then joined the seven-man engineering firm of Cornell, Howland, Hayes & Merryfield, as CH2M Hill was called in 1947. In 1950, he opened the firm's first branch office in Boise, Idaho.

Earl also managed CH2M Hill's central district from 1977 until 1980. During this period he was active in developing long-range plans that have led to a broader scope of activity for the firm in the areas of energy, industrial systems, water resources and wastewater treatment.

Earl Reynolds has also done much to foster the development of his community as a whole. He has been chairman of the Boise City Planning and Zoning Commission, and a member of the Boise City Board of Adjustment, the Ada Council of Governments/ Regional Planning Commission and the mayor's Committee on Downtown Development. He currently serves on the Boise Greenbelt Committee, the Boise State University School of Business Advisory Board, the board of directors of St. Luke's Hospital and the board of directors of Northwest Savings and Loan. He has been an active member of All Saints Episcopal Church for many years.

Among the many awards and citations Earl has received are the George W. Fuller Award presented by the American Water Works Association for outstanding service; the Idaho Statesman Distinguished Citizen Award; the Capitol Jaycees Boss of the Year Award; and the Outstanding Civil Engineer Award of the Idaho Section of the American Society of Civil Engineers.●

MAN THE FREE TRADE GUNS

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, there has never been a war in which everybody won. There have been many wars in which everybody lost. We should remember these historical lessons before we escalate the trade war that is underway between the United States and its foreign trading partners. Before we kick European and Japanese knees for their unfair export policies, we must make sure we do not stub our toe in the process. As President Reagan has said, "We are in the same boat with our trading partners. If one partner shoots a hole in the boat, does it make sense for the other one to shoot another hole in the boat?"

In Colorado, we do not have ships or even ports. So it is easy for us to forget the importance of exports, and we do not spend nearly enough time thinking about expanding our markets overseas. But anyone is making a big mistake who does not think their State is heavily involved in, and dependent upon exports.

Even landlocked States like Colorado can be very active exporting States. Nearly one-fifth of Colorado's 4,000 manufacturing firms sell to foreign customers—three times the exporting activity in the rest of the Nation's manufacturing industry. High technology accounts for most of these exports. Nearly all of the State's 136 instrument producers ship worldwide, as do half of the 325 electronic equipment, chemical, and transportation industries in my State.

And it is important to remember that these manufacturing firms are small businesses, where nearly all the new jobs in America are created every year. In fact, 91 percent of Colorado's manufacturers employ fewer than 100 people. These small companies, because of their ability to quickly identify and take advantage of foreign sales opportunities, have given Colorado an important place in the Nation's trading business. And everyone in Colorado benefits from this activity. Revenue in Colorado from manufactured exports reached $1.8 billion in 1983, with another $800 million coming into the State through agricultural exports. And it is estimated that across the Nation 3 cents of every export dollar winds up in State and local government treasuries.

Mr. President, it is impossible to overstate the importance of foreign trade to our economy. So it is doubly important to avoid dangerous mistakes of public policy in reacting to the various trade barriers erected by other nations. While I can understand why some of our trading partners would react in this manner to difficult economic times, it is not so easy to understand how we got ourselves into this corner in the first place.

Much of America's heritage is built on export trading. The early days of the Republic are symbolized even today by the Commerce Department's emblem, which pictures a lighthouse and a clipper ship. These ships once took American commerce to the four corners of the world and helped make us the economic power we are today. They represent the Yankee Trader spirit that motivated much of this land in the last century.

Those early Yankee Traders operated at a time when we were a growing Nation, blessed with seemingly endless natural resources, unlimited bounty of farm and forest resources, and unmatched human ingenuity. What the world wanted and needed, we could supply. The fertile minds of American inventors and the productive hands of American workers kept turning out more new products for the world marketplace.

But we also had a growing domestic market, growing in numbers and especially in affluence and standard of living. Nor surprisingly, our Yankee Traders began to look inward. This U.S. market was so big and so rich—and so easy. Why bother with the expense and hazards of selling products halfway around the world when there was so much business halfway around the block?

American businessmen remained—and remain today—among the world's greatest salesmen. But they concentrated most of their efforts on the home front. And increasingly, after World War II, other nations became attracted to the U.S. domestic market for the same reasons as American businessmen.

And the result is just what you would expect. Today, we find ourselves outhustled in many of the world's markets, and fighting to retain our competitive edge even in our own country. We export only about 7 percent of our gross national product, only 10 percent of America's companies export, and we have consequently run trade deficits for 7 consecutive years. By any of these measures our major trading partners more than double our performance.

If there is any question about the importance of these numbers to our Nation, consider these facts:

The Commerce Department estimates that 24,000 American jobs result from every $1 billion worth of manufactured exports.

Two of every five acres of farmland in the United States produce for exports.

One of out of every eight jobs in manufacturing depends on foreign trade.

Sixteen percent of the total value of U.S. goods produced is destined for some other country.

Five million Americans are employed because of exports.

Several critically important issues are pending before the U.S. Congress related to foreign trade that Americans everywhere should be concerned about—issues about which the Senate needs to think very carefully before acting.

First, a move afoot in the Governmental Affairs Committee to recognize our trade agencies could have important consequences. A bill introduced by Senator BILL ROTH would consolidate most of the trade functions of the Federal Government into a new Cabinet-level Department of International Trade and Industry. The administration supports the measure, largely because our trade policies are so splintered that no single person can effectively act as our trade spokesman. Consider the involvement of these agencies: U.S. Trade Representative, Foreign Agriculture Service, Export-Import Bank, Customs Service, International Trade Commission, Small Business Administration, and Commerce and Treasury Departments. No one person speaks for all of these.

The bill, S. 121, would create a new department, but would not include all of these functions. So some opponents argue that it is too little to help, and too expensive to work. Proponents claim that it would at least enable our trade spokesman to make clear public policy statements and prevent abuses that sometimes occur under the current system.

My own thought is that we should move very cautiously along this line. If all our trade functions could be organized into a single unit in which one spokesman could truly represent our interests, it could help the current situation greatly. The proposal should be prefaced, though, with the understanding that as many of these functions as possible should be included so we do not just solve part of the problem, and that staff and budgets will not increase. Spending more money on trade staffs will not solve the problem of disparity and duplication. But a well organized small department under which all trade responsibilities were handled might go a long way in the right direction.

More important than how we orgnize our trade policy, I think, is what our trade policy will be. How will we react to the trade restrictions, import quotas, and unfair export subsidies some of our trading partners are using—particularly since these policies have a disastrous effect on our ability to compete for markets that we have a legitimate right to?

This is where we are on the verge of shooting ourselves in the trade foot. The public outcry for protectionist policies designed to erect barriers of our own has been loud indeed. And we seem to be on the brink of enacting the kind of bills which would do exactly that. For instance, the domesic content auto bill would require a percentage of all the cars sold in America to be built in America. Other legislation steaming through these Halls would prohibit the import of certain agricultural products into this country. Other bills would create huge subsidies for exporters, in an effort to fight fire with fire.

This kind of protection for American businesses is probably the most counterproductive action we could take under these circumstances. It is not that Americans have not been provoked: Europeans have been so busy subsidizing food exports that they have become net exporters of a product they are hardly cut out to produce for themselves, much less sell abroad. And they are about to give another 5-percent raise to their farmers. The Japanese have used nearly every means at their disposal to limit imports of American beef and citrus products, while virtually glutting our markets with cars and electronic equipment. So why not teach Europe and Japan a lesson?

Because it is not the Europeans or the Japanese who will suffer from protectionist policies—it is America that will suffer. One result of the European practice of food export subsidies has been a higher cost of food for their consumers—40 percent higher grocery bills. Not to mention the severe impact on our own budget that such subsidies would have at a time when we are trying desperately to reduce Federal deficits.

Most important of all—it is the American farmer who would suffer the most. While we complain that Japan will not import any more American beef, and we should complain loudly, we should not lose sight of the fact that 36 percent of the edible beef we now export goes to Japan. So if the Japanese Government reacted to a Toyota import ban by cutting off the rest of the beef they are now buying, many American cattlemen could be put out of business overnight. The size and value of America's exports should put fear into anyone who is considering an action which might cause retaliation.

Mr. President, we have tried this before. In 1930, Congress enacted the Smoot-Hawley tariff, and students of history know of the disastrous curtailment of business activity and sales that occurred, because other trading partners, who found themselves in the same depression we suffered from, were forced to retaliate. And then more retaliation followed, and nobody was the winner. Some argue that our tariff policy delayed economic recovery longer than necessary, just as such a policy would be today.

It is very tempting to deal protectionist policies of other countries by taking similar actions here. But with this kind of medicine, we risk killing the patient.

And there are other solutions.

Congress passed the Export Trading Company Act last year, which is an extremely important tool for American businesses, especially small businesses. It offers small companies that might find it difficult to get into the export business the chance to organize joint ventures with other similar companies, so that our exports from the smaller businesses where so much of our employment lies could be greatly increased.

Second, efforts to expand our exports into new markets should be vigorously pursued. I added an amendment to the 1981 farm bill which encouraged the Secretary of Agriculture to open more agriculture trade offices around the world to broaden our farmers' access to nations where there had not been an American market before. Since then, five new offices have been opened. Great progress is being made toward opening a new trade headquarters in the People's Republic of China, and our 11th Foreign Agriculture Trade Office was recently opened in Jidda, Saudi Arabia.

Third, we should not let our free trade philosophy blind us to the reality of what other nations' protectionism sometimes does to American businesses. A policy of fair trade can be the most useful tool available to our negotiators in dealing with our trade partners. So policies designed to create "trade reciprocity" should be examined wherever needed. As I see it, we should simply begin each discussion with the understanding that we favor free trade. But when another country wants to restrict imports of America's products, we can respond in kind if necessary with similar restrictions on imports from that nation. In this way, without losing sight of the goal of free trade, we can dramatically demonstrate the awkward position such policies put us in, and we can use such policies to force other nations to get serious about trading with the United States.

Finally, I think the most untapped resource is probably our best potential export—services. The United States is rapidly becoming a service economy, not an industrial one. And at the same time, the world market for services, especially information and data services, is growing much faster than the market for manufactured goods or food. American service industries are the world's most highly developed, and should be able to capture a large share of this market. Since much of our service sector is in small businesses, export trading companies could be especially helpful here. And in addition to helping our current trade imbalance, exporting services would also likely lead to more merchandise exports, since service contracts in foreign countries often lead to the sale of U.S. products.

Like other industries, though, our service industries are sometimes at a competitive disadvantage because of barriers in other countries designed to protect their own service industries. So our policy must focus on this new area—at least as much as it focuses on farm and manufactured goods.

The United States is firmly and inseparably linked with other nations throughout the world in a global economy of mutually beneficial trade. If we are to survive in a world where our economy's focus is dramatically and quickly changing from an industrial and agricultural base to a high technology base, we must make certain that we do not provoke, or participate in, a major world trade war which will shut off sales and trade in every area.

We must not be tempted to turn to protectionism, even though others might do so. Rather, we must lead the way toward free trade through policies of fair trade. The problems we face today are not insurmountable, and they will not last forever.

The fact of the matter is that Europe is facing twice as high a butter mountain and half again as deep a wine lake by the end of the 1980's. And European consumers continue to pay 40 percent more for their food than Americans.

So if anything is clear, it is that Europe and Japan cannot just go on their merry subsidizing way forever. As the Wall Street Journal has pointed out, what the global economy—and especially our own economy—needs "is a United States that is not playing subsidy war games, but manning its free trade guns."●

PEABODY CONSERVATORY'S HISTORIC CONCERT HALL

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, this week the historic concert hall of the Peabody Conservatory of Music will be reopened and rededicated with appropriate ceremonies and a gala concert, marking the end of the first phase of Peabody's ambitious renovation project and another step forward in the revitalization of the historic Mount Vernon Square neighborhood.

For the past 2 years this historic hall has been closed for extensive renovation, including the installation of an orchestra pit, modern lighting, additional space to permit the staging of opera, and sound equipment to enable concerts to be broadcast live.

With these renovations, the hall, retaining its traditional facade as a 19th century recital hall, becomes one of the finest small performance facilities in the city of Baltimore. These are the first major renovations to be undertaken in the Peabody's illustrious 127-year history. The work was made possible by generous gifts from Sidney Friedberg and other trustees of the Peabody, the State of Maryland, and many Maryland corporations and foundations.

Mr. President, the concert hall is the heart of the conservatory's teaching and performing activities and its restoration is an expression of faith in the future of America's oldest conservatory of music.

I ask that a brief history of the Peabody, written by R. P. Harriss, one of Maryland's outstanding commentators on the arts and published in the News American 2 years ago, on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of the Peabody's founding, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The history follows:

125 YEARS LATER, PEABODY STILL MAKES JOYFUL NOISE

(By R. P. Harriss)

For most Baltimoreans, "the Peabody" means the Peabody Conservatory of Music. But George Peabody, its founder, had more than music in mind.

In a letter dated Feb. 12, 1857, he set forth his specifications for the Peabody Institute. A Yankee by birth, a Baltimorean by adoption, eventually a Londoner by residence, he had his own ideas of what it should be:

"First . . . an extensive Library."

"Second . . . lectures by the most capable and accomplished scholars in science, art and literature.

"Third—I wish, also, that the Institute shall embrace within its plan an Academy of Music.

"Fourth . . . the establishment of a Gallery of Art."

Of the four areas covered by the philanthropist's letter, music would become the principal concern.

Just when did it really get started? According to an Oct. 23, 1966 column I wrote in anticipation of its 100th birthday, "In 1857, Peabody gave his first $300,000 (for the institute), along with the letter stating his aims. It was chartered by the Maryland Legislature in 1858, the cornerstone was laid in 1859, the (first) building completed in 1861.

"Owing to the unsettled state of this harbor city during the Civil War (1861-65), the concert hall was not formally dedicated until Oct. 25, 1966. It had been used for a science lecture earlier the same month; the first music program was not performed there until late December. The conservatory's faculty was appointed in 1867 and met its first classes in 1868. Thus the Peabody concerts have been going on, without a break, for a longer period than the conservatory itself."

Without wishing to stir up any more dust, let me add that it didn't become the Peabody Conservatory until 1874; until then it had been called the Academy of Music.

Among the Peabody's directors since Hamerik's time have been Otto Ortmann, whose treatise on the physiology of piano technique is universally recognized, and pianist and symphony conductor Reginald Stewart, who brought a brilliant succession of concert artists to Baltimore as teachers at the conservatory and soloists with the Baltimore Symphony, of which he was also music director for 10 years.

Lecturers in the concert hall have ranged from Oliver Wendell Holmes to James Russell Lowell, from Ralph Waldo Emerson to Sidney Lanier, from Mark Twain to Sir Arthur Sullivan, from Anton Rubinstein to Hans von Bulow. The conservatory has also heard Igor Stravinsky, Virgil Thomson, Karlheinz Stockhausen, John Cage and Eubie Blake talk about and perform their music

The teaching and performing roster reads like a who's who in music: the Polish pianist and patriot Paderewski; the great French theorist Nadia Boulanger; the pianists Dame Myra Hess, Eugene Entremont, Rudolf Serkin and Leon Fleisher; violinists Ruggiero Ricci, Nathan Milstein and William Kroll; flutist Jean-Pierre Rampal; harpsichordist Wanda Landowska, organist Virgil Fox; too many of the great opera singers to list here, opera conductor Laslo Halasz and composers Aaron Copland, Theodore Chanler and Elliott Carter.

It might surprise many Baltimoreans that Peter Tchaikovsky rehearsed and conducted an orchestra concert here. That was before my time, of course, but Dmitri Shostakovich's performance—a press conference, at which I was present—was impromptu and mercifully brief.

In the Stalin era Rubinstein was in a small group of visiting Russian composers, including Khatchaturian and Kabalevsky, who were closely chaperoned by a hard-nosed official from the Russian Embassy in Washington. At a press conference held in the concert hall lobby someone asked Shostakovich to comment on the official public reprimand he had received in Moscow for his alleged musical deviationism. He attempted, in a few halting words in English, to justify it looking abjectly miserable.

Most of my memories of Peabody people are happier than that. There was the time the dignified Dr. Stewart put on a floor-mop wig and did an impersonation of Harpo Marx, the Scottish bassist Frazer Gange with his delightful stories, the jovial White Russian emigre Nicholas Nabokov, nephew of the famous writer Valdimir Nabokov, and the organist and composer Howard Thatcher, who was such fun to attend a concert with because of his witty whispered commentaries on the performers.

Also warmly remembered are the late Dr. Louis Cheslock, teacher, composer and musical crony of H. L. Mencken, and, still with us, the incomparable Dr. Lubov Keefer, teacher, raconteur and writer, a link between the Peabody past and present.

The present is lively, with loud sounds of renovation mingling with those of voice and instrumental practice. The concernt hall's interior is being restructured for better staging, more comfortable seating, air conditioning and sound-proofing. An automatic-lift orchestra pit will be installed, too. But the classical-relief sculpture at either side of the stage remains.

Modern times have brought temporary changes, such as the somewhat makeshift extension of the stage built during a period of several seasons when Halasz was producing opera there. Ming Cho Lee, now a highly regarded Metropolitan Opera designer, was the young and innovative set creator during that period.

What would George Peabody think if he could come to life, step down from his monument in Mount Vernon Place and look around at the changes? Would he be a bit startled by the newer building at St. Paul Street and Mount Vernon Place, annoyed that the three handsome old town houses acquired after his time have been padlocked and left to decay?

In 1977 the Peabody, faced with severe financial problems, became affiliated with Johns Hopkins University. As a Yankee financier who adopted Baltimore, George Peabody would probably grimance at seeing his creation admininstered by a university founded by his local business rival. But he wouldn't buck it.●

MINORITY ENTERPRISE DEVELOPMENT WEEK

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, the week of October 3 has been set aside by the administration as National Minority Enterprise Development Week. As chairman of the Small Business Committee, I want to commend the President for designating a week that, for the first time, recognizes the contributions that minority-owned businesses have made to our country and our economy. I would also like to express my own deep respect, admiration, and gratitude to the minority business community for the tremendous strides they have made and the essential role they play in our daily lives.

Throughout the history of this Nation, ownership of a business has been a traditional part of the American dream. It is the essence of our independent spirit, the attainment of a goal that brings with it self-sufficiency, self-determination, and the personal joy and satisfaction of making it on your own.

Unfortunately, for many years minorities did not share in that dream. In terms of our free enterprise system, members of the minority community were still forced to ride in the back of the economic bus. Well, Mr. President, I am proud to say that we are making significant strides toward reversing that harsh reality. Today, minority-owned firms are emerging as some of the most glowing success stories our Nation has to offer. The minority business owner is no longer the rare case, the exception. In all walks of business, we are seeing increasing numbers of minority entrepreneurs taking their place and staking their claim on their own piece of the free enterprise system.

This is the real American dream, Mr. President—the dream that any man or woman, no matter how humble their beginnings, can, through their own hard work and effort, become a success in this country.

The minority business owners we pay tribute to this week stand as shining examples of the best qualities our Nation has to offer. They dared to dream that they could make it; they dared to believe that they had a right to success; they dared to think that they could be more than spectators at the business game—they could be players themselves.

I believe it is appropriate that we set aside a week to pay tribute to these entrepreneurs, Mr. President. But I would urge my colleagues to use this week to do more than simply recognize the achievements that have been made. Let us take this opportunity to rededicate ourselves to the goal of increasing minority business participation. Strides have been made, yes, but in the flush of celebration, we must not forget that much more remains to be done.

For those minority entrepreneurs who have made it, things continue to look better and better. According to Black Enterprise magazine, total revenues for the top 100 black-owned businesses in the country grew from $1.5 billion in 1981, to $1.9 billion in 1982, a 1-year jump of more than 24 percent. In 1972, when the magazine first began compiling the list, total sales for this group were only $459 million. That represents a real growth increase of more than 80 percent in a 10-year period.

But the fact remains that of the roughly 16.8 million small- and medium-sized businesses in this country, only about 600,000 are owned by minorities. What that means is that while recognized minority groups—blacks, Hispanics, Asian-Pacificans, Eskimos, Aleuts, and American Indians—make up about 25 percent of our population, they own less than 3 percent of the businesses.

Of those 600,000 minority-owned businesses, 93 percent are small, sole proprietorships. Two out of every three of them are in the retail trade and service industries, and the great majority of them—60 percent, to be exact—are clustered in six States.

It is true that we are slowly making gains. In 1969, there were only 350,000 minority-owned businesses operating in this country, compared to the 600,000 operating now.

So, clearly, we are heading in the right direction. Programs such as the 8(a) procurement program, which sets aside Government contracts for qualifying minority firms, and the Minority Enterprise Small Business Investment Co. program, which provides long-term, low-interest loans to promising minority entrepreneurs, have played a large part in some of these success stories, and the Small Business Committee, which provides funding authorizations for these SBA programs, takes some pride in that.

What has been done in the past, however, is no longer sufficient to meet the tremendous challenges of the future. The Small Business Committee and the current administration recognize that, and that is why our committee worked in concert with the SBA and the Commerce Department to develop a coordinated program to assist minority businesses.

The result of these actions was an Executive order, issued by the President on July 14, 1983, setting forth goals and directives to increase opportunities for minority businesses in the public and private sectors.

The President's order calls upon each Federal agency with substantial procurement or grant-making authority to develop an annual minority business development plan. These plans, to be submitted annually to the high-level Cabinet Council on Commerce and Trade, will build upon the programs administered by the Minority Business Development Agency (MBDA) and the SBA.

The Secretary of Commerce and the Administrator of the SBA, in direct consultation with the Cabinet Council, will establish uniform guidelines to be used by agencies in developing these plans. This ambitious program, according to President Reagan, will result in the creation of an additional 60,000 minority businesses over the next 10 years; will produce $15 billion in procurement and Government contracts to minority firms by 1985; and will bring about an increase in credit and management assistance to minority businesses totaling more than $1.8 billion over the next 3 years.

Last week, the President designated the Department of Transportation to participate in the SBA's 8(a) pilot procurement program. This special 2-year program was designed by Congress to provide qualified minority firms with nontraditional Government contracts. I am pleased the administration is moving to implement this program. This additional tool should help to increase, not only the number of contracts which go to minority firms, but the caliber of contracts as well.

Mr. President, I am pleased and excited about these new initiatives and their implications for minority business development. I believe these programs represent a real commitment by the Congress and the administrative branch to attempt to increase opportunities for all minority-owned firms.

The President is to be commended for his initiative and his sensitivity to the needs of the minority business community. During Minority Enterprise Development Week, I call upon all my colleagues to follow his example and to look for ways that we can work to increase the opportunities for these firms who have contributed so much to our economy and our lives. Let us reaffirm our commitment to insuring that the American dream of owning your own business remains an equal opportunity dream.●

SOARING PHONE BILLS

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, last week, the Senate Commerce Committee voted to report out legislation, S. 1660, to help preserve universal telephone service in the wake of the divestiture of AT&T and a variety of regulatory changes. One major element of the bill would postpone, for 2 years, the imposition of flat access charges on residential and small business users. In my State those access charges could rise to $8.50 a month by 1990, doubling the current average monthly bill for basic service in State. In connection with our efforts, I would like to insert in the RECORD, the results of a New York Times/CBS Poll which indicate that if prices rise as high as many of us fear, unviersal telephone service will indeed be endangered.

The material follows:

[From the New York Times, Oct. 4, 1983]

POLL INDICATES CONFUSION ON BREAKUP OF AT&T

(By Andrew Pollack)

With three months to go before the breakup of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, Americans have little understanding of the reorganization and considerable doubt about its benefits, according to a New York Times/CBS News Poll.

Only 29 percent of the respondents to the nationwide survey said they had heard or read enough to understand what is going to happen in the divestiture, which takes effect Jan. 1 and which will change forever the way telephone service is provided.

Of those who said they did understand the change, 41 percent said they thought it would make telephone service worse, while only 25 percent said service would get better. Some 16 percent said service would remain the same and 18 percent did not know.

In other results, almost half the respondents—42 percent—said they could not afford to retain telephone service if local rates were to double, while 54 percent said they could afford it.

Nevertheless, 55 percent of the respondents said they did not favor subsidizing local telephone rates so that everyone could afford to have a phone. Only 34 percent favored such subsidies.

The survey of 1,587 people was taken in late September as Congress began work on legislation that would attempt to retain subsidies of local rates to maintain the 50-year-old policy of universal telephone service. Some experts think local telephone rates will double in the next year or two, leading customers to drop their phone service.

Gary L. Schmermund, division manager of public relations research for A.T. & T., said the result showing that people did not favor subsidies "certainly suggests to me that Congress doesn't have the support it thinks it does."

But Samuel A. Simon, executive director of the Telecommunications Research and Action Center, a consumer group, said the question about subsidies would have been answered differently if people knew that local rates were now being subsidized.

The widespread lack of understanding of the breakup stems perhaps from the complexity of the issue and from the fact that for decades, telephone service has been something that most Americans received from a single supplier and thought little about. With the divestiture, different operating companies will supply local service and AT&T will face more competition in supplying long-distance service.

Mistrust of the breakup might stem from the fact that Americans are now satisfied with telephone service: About 83 percent of those surveyed said they were either very satisfied or somewhat satisfied.

In another question, all respondents were told something of the pros and cons of the breakup and asked for their opinions.

AN OVERALL JUDGMENT

"Some people say the reorganization will be a good thing because it will mean lower long-distance rates and more competition in making telephones," the question said, "Others say it will be bad because local charges will go up and the system was working well and didn't need to be changed."

Some 45 percent of the respondents said the reorganization did not sound like a good idea, while 31 percent said it did and 24 percent said they did not know.

The respondents who were most worried about increases in the cost of local service tended to be the ones who were most skeptical about reorganization.

Of the 42 percent who said they would have to give up their phones if local charges doubled, 46 percent said they thought reorganization did not sound like a good idea and only 26 percent said it did. Older people and those with lower incomes were generally more opposed to the reorganization than others. Those who said they understood the reorganization responded 55 percent to 34 percent that it was not a good idea.

The survey also elicited information about patterns of telephone usage. Some 26 percent of those surveyed said they owned their own telephones, while 62 percent said they continued to rent them from their telephone company and 10 percent said they both owned and rented telephones. About one-third of those surveyed said their last long-distance bill was for less than $10, while 39 percent said it was between $10 and $40 and 25 percent said it was greater than $40.

WHO BENEFITS FROM RATE CHANGES

The results would indicate that a majority of customers will not benefit from changes occurring in rate regulation that will lead to a reduction in long-distance bills of about 10.5 percent, combined with the addition of a flat fee on every bill of $2 to $4, depending on the state. Only those with long-distance bills greater than $20, for example, in the case of a $2 monthly charge will save enough on long distance to offset the extra charge.

Some 55 percent responded "no" to the question about phone rate subsidies, which was: "Do you think local telephone service is so necessary that it should be provided to people who cannot afford to pay for it, even if that means higher phone charges or higher taxes for other people?"

Those in rural areas, now among the biggest beneficiaries of subsidies, responded 61 percent to 28 percent against such subsidies. Those over 64 years of age and those with incomes of less than $10,000 a year were about evenly split, 40-40.

Asked about the importance of a telephone to them, 51 percent said it would be a "real hardship" to get along without a phone, while 37 percent said it would be "somewhat difficult" and 11 percent said it would be "easy." Those over 64 years of age, those with college degrees and those with high incomes were more likely than others to answer that living without a phone would be a real hardship.

Nevertheless, 42 percent said they would drop phone service if local rates doubled. Of those with annual incomes under $10,000, 72 percent said they could not afford to keep a phone. Mr. Schmermund of A.T&T. said, however, that far fewer people would drop phone service than indicated. He said people had little knowledge of what the various parts of their bill were and would tend to think of their total bill doubling, not just their local bill.

HOW POLL WAS CONDUCTED

The New York Times/CBS News Poll is based on telephone interviews conducted from Sept. 24 through Sept. 28 with 1,587 adults around the United States, excluding Alaska and Hawaii.

The sample of telephone exchanges called was selected by a computer from a complete list of exchanges in the country. The exchanges were chosen to insure that each region of the country was represented in proportion to its population. For each exchange, the telephone numbers were formed by random digits, permitting access to both listed and unlisted residential numbers.

The results have been weighted to take account of household size and to adjust for variations in the sample relating to region, race, sex, age and education.

In theory, in 19 cases out of 20, the results based on the entire sample will differ by no more than three percentage points in either direction from what would have been obtained by interviewing all adult Americans. The error for smaller subgroups is larger. For example, the margin of sampling error for those respondents who said they had heard about the telephone company reorganization is plus or minus five percentage points.

In addition to sampling error, the practical difficulties of conducting any survey of public opinion may introduce other errors into the poll.

Edward R. Tufte, professor of political science and statistics at Yale University, assisted The Times with this survey.●

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Now, Madam President, on tomorrow, when the Senate resumes session at 9:45 a.m., it will be pursuant to recess. After the two leaders are recognized under an abbreviated standing order, there will be a very brief period for the transaction of routine morning business until 10:10 a.m., at which time the Senate will stand in recess in order to proceed as a body to the hall of the House of Representatives to hear an address by the President of West Germany in a joint meeting with the House of Representatives.

The Senate will resume session after the recess at 11:30 a.m., at which time three Senators will be recognized on special orders of not to exceed 15 minutes.

After the execution of those special orders, there will be a further period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend no longer than 12:30 p.m.

At 12:30 p.m., the 1 hour under rule XXII before the vote on cloture will begin to run. The mandatory quorum under that rule is waived.

At the hour of 1:30 p.m., the vote on cloture on the motion to proceed to the consideration of H.R. 3706, the Martin Luther King, Jr., holiday bill will occur.

I anticipate, Madam President, that if cloture is invoked, the Senate will continue with its consideration of that motion and perhaps conclude action on the motion during the day. I reiterate, I hope—I believe—that we will obtain clearance for a unanimous-consent request in the morning to vitiate that vote and to go ahead and set a time certain for final passage and other arrangements for final consideration of the Martin Luther King bill when we return after the October break.

RECESS UNTIL 9:45 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until 9:45 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 7:08 p.m. the Senate recessed until tomorrow, October 5, 1983, at 9:45 a.m.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate October 4, 1983:

THE JUDICIARY

Martin L. C. Feldman, of Louisiana, to be U.S. district judge for the eastern district of Louisiana.

C. Roger Vinson, of Florida, to be U.S. district judge for the northern district of Florida.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, October 4, 1983

The House met at 12 noon.

The Reverend Dr. Ernst G. Schmidt, Gloria Dei Lutheran Church, Huntingdon Valley, Pa., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Creator God, help us to realize the uniqueness of this country. We have the responsibility and privilege of governing ourselves with a freedom which is the envy of millions.

We are in this hallowed Hall today because there have been those who dared to treasure truth and liberty above self.

Lord, You know how hard it is for us at times—so many pressures, ideas, and interest groups pull and push us. Starch our backbones, Father, so we remain true to our convictions. Enable us to leave these Chambers every day with our heads held high and feeling good because we have been true to our people's trust and have given our best.

In the name of Jesus who has given us the prime example we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 339, nays 23, answered "present" 8, not voting 63, as follows:

Mr. BONKER changed his vote from "present" to "yea."

So the Journal was approved.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

THE REVEREND ERNST SCHMIDT

(Mr. KOSTMAYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to welcome on behalf of our colleagues the Reverend Ernst Schmidt, pastor of Gloria Dei Lutheran Church in Huntingdon Valley, Pa.

Reverend Schmidt founded Gloria Dei Church some 27 years ago. At that time services were held in a small firehouse. Now Gloria Dei has expanded to over 3,000 members.

Reverend Schmidt preaches a positive philosophy revolving around a concept of a friendship with Christ. He gives his church members a good feeling about themselves as people and this is reflected in the positive feeling that the community has about Gloria Dei.

Gloria Dei is particularly noted for its concern with elderly citizens and is responsible for the construction of three residential facilities for the elderly. In this way Gloria Dei is responding to the needs of its community.

Reverend Schmidt is a graduate of Whittenberg University, has studied at the Lutheran Theologian Seminary in Philadelphia and received his doctorate at Muhlenberg University in Allentown. His father was also a pastor in Philadelphia, and I am happy to welcome Reverend Schmidt and the 100 members of Gloria Dei who have joined us here today.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO SIT DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE TODAY

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be permitted to sit today during the 5-minute rule.

Mr. Speaker, I have cleared this with the minority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

WHITE HOUSE SHOULD DISCLAIM AND APOLOGIZE FOR SHAMEFUL TACTICS

(Mr. ANDREWS of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, when the IMF bill came before this House several weeks ago, I voted for it. I also voted for an amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GRAMM). That amendment was opposed by leaders on both sides of the aisle, and 20 of my Democratic colleagues voted against it. Now those 20 Democrats, who in this instance voted with the House's Republican leadership, have been subjected by the Republican National Committee to vicious attacks in their home districts, calling their patriotism into question. The Republicans who opposed Mr. GRAMM's amendment have suffered no such fate.

Mr. Speaker, there is no place in this House for this kind of shameful politics. Like me, many of my freshman Democratic colleagues supported this legislation against a great deal of popular opinion back home. We supported it because we believed it was a prudent and necessary response to the worldwide financial crisis. Even so, a majority of freshman Democrats will withdraw our support unless the White House disclaims this kind of tactic and apologizes publicly to all our colleagues who were so unfairly maligned.

ASSESSING PLIGHT OF SOVIET JEWRY IN THE WAKE OF KAL 007

(Mr. ADDABBO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, over the past few years, we have witnessed an alarming drop in the number of Jews emigrating from the Soviet Union, and felt the frustration of trying to help. Numerous accounts from refuseniks and prisoners of conscience give us a glimpse of how seriously the situation has deteriorated. The long and arduous application process, coupled with surveillance, harassment, loss of job and status, and the threat of eventual imprisonment paints a grim picture for Jews trying to emigrate. Their courage is uplifting, their plight, agonizing.

Now, in the wake of severe setbacks in United States-Soviet relations, it is more important than ever to continue to speak out for individuals held in Russia against their will. Only by unceasingly impressing our views on this point to the Soviet leadership can we hope to help even a few escape religious persecution.

We must continue the pressure at this level, and explore new ideas and methods. We may never know which actions help the most, so we must barrage the Soviet leadership from as many directions as possible.

During this tense period, we must do our utmost not to allow Soviet Jews to become pawns in the game of politics and diplomacy. Through our actions, we must make clear that our opposition to Soviet policy is steadfast, and that further persecution will only strengthen our determination. Any lag in our support could give the Soviets an excuse to tighten emigration restrictions further. Our responsibility is immense, but the cost in human suffering here is too great to let emotions over the airline incident sway our judgment at the risk of baiting the Russians into harsher policies.

SUPPORT FOR RESTORED FUNDING FOR OFFICE OF SPECIAL INVESTIGATIONS

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, in the near future, the House is expected to complete action on H.R. 2912, the Department of Justice Authorization Act for fiscal year 1984.

I support this legislation for a variety of reasons. However, one of the most important is the bill's restoration of some $77,000 cut from the budget of the Office of Special Investigations in the Department of Justice. This is the Office responsible for the investigation, apprehension, and prosecution of suspected Nazi war criminals living in the United States.

The administration proposed this reduction notwithstanding the fact that the Office litigation has increased significantly in the past 2 years. Almost three times as many cases have been filed with the Office than were before it in 1981. In addition, there are some 267 investigatory cases pending in the Office with over 100 of them just referred in the past year. The Office has been successful in expediting proceedings on these cases through prosecutions and in some cases deportations.

This is not the time to reduce funding for the only office vested with the specific responsibility of tracking down Nazi war criminals who have taken refuge in this Nation. We have a tragic 35 year record of inaction on the Nazi war criminal problem which should not be exacerbated by cutting funds for that Office which is beginning to do this important work.

Let us never forget what heinous crimes the Nazi's committed against Jewish people and above all let us not allow these criminals to avoid prosecution. The United States should not be a haven for harboring Nazi war criminals—it should be the leader in the crusade to bring them to justice.

NATION CANNOT AFFORD TREMENDOUS EXPENSE OF SIMPSON-MAZZOLI BILL

(Mr. ROYBAL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, on October 18 the House Committee on Rules will consider the Simpson-Mazzoli bill. That committee must grant an open rule and permit all amendments including those proposed by the administration.

In their letter of July 27 the administration revealed for the first time that Simpson-Mazzoli will cost for the first year alone, $1,576 million and not $200 million as authorized by the bill. This amount will increase to $11,530 million by 1988 and does not include the cost of reimbursement to the States, enforcement of sanctions nor the reduction of immigration backlog.

Mr. Speaker, enough is enough. The Nation cannot afford the tremendous expense of the Simpson-Mazzoli bill.

PRESIDENT MAKES RIGHT CHOICE RE PHILIPPINES VISIT

(Mr. EDGAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, rarely do I agree with President Reagan on matters of foreign policy. However, I congratulate him for his decision, announced yesterday, not to visit the Philippines in November. Although the President's official reason for the cancellation is likely congressional action on spending bills in November, administration sources have indicated that the instability of the Marcos Government, the recent assassination of prominent opposition figure Benigno Aquino, and domestic opposition to the visit were the real reasons the trip was called off.

I am pleased that the President has made such a thoughtful decision. Many of us in Congress have long asked whether uncritical, unconditional support of the Marcos regime is in the long-term interest of the United States. On September 1, I joined 45 other House Members in calling on the President to cancel his visit because of the Aquino murder. We wrote at that time:

> We remain concerned that the Aquino assassination and President Marcos' approach to its investigation is symptomatic of an overall policy to limit the democratic opposition in the Philippines, suspend human rights, and abrogate political and civil liberties.

Mr. Speaker, the President has made the right choice. He should take this opportunity to review the human rights situation in the Philippines, reaffirm our commitment to uncover the facts about the Aquino case, and address the uses of U.S. security assistance to the Philippines.

A CRACK IN THE CUP OF FREEDOM—BANNING HANDGUNS IN PRIVATE HOMES

(Mr. DERRICK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, today there is a crack in our cup of freedom.

It was put there by the Supreme Court's decision not to hear a case opposing the ban of handguns in private homes.

We have come many generations away from the oppression that drove our forefathers to these shores. They understood that gun control is a seed of dictatorship.

Each freedom carries inherent dangers—with freedom of religion, we must coexist with bizarre cults; with free speech, we must allow room for ideas contrary to the very freedom which allows such discussion; with the right of assembly comes the threat of violence—and so it is with the right to bear arms. But the right to protect one's own life and domain is a precious right that we must zealously guard. The criminal giants are inevitable; our concern is for the Davids of the world.

I urge you to join with me to see that this freedom is quickly mended.

NATIONAL SUMMIT CONFERENCE ON EDUCATION

(Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House passed and sent to the Senate the legislation to create a National Summit Conference on Education.

This bipartisan effort, signed by 120 of my colleagues, creates a structured working group. Individuals representing education, business, labor, parents, students, and others, will be selected by a bipartisan committee.

A specific agenda will be put in place and the outcome of the regional meetings and the conference will be evaluated to determine its effect. It is not a study; it is not a commission.

It is a mechanism to avoid a costly rush to judgment on education. It is a mechanism to provide a way in which to include Americans in the discussions of their system of education. It is, I believe, a strategy for success.

I am very encouraged with the bipartisan support we have received and I am equally encouraged by the support that we have received on this legislation from all of the leading education groups, including the NEA, the AFT, and the PTA.

I appreciate the full support of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the AFL-CIO.

I ask my colleagues to encourage the Senate and the administration to support our bipartisan efforts here in the House to create a National Summit Conference on Education.

(Mr. FOGLIETTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, voices were heard which attacked the value of designating the birthday of the late Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., a national holiday. Those voices brought discredit upon the Congress, and questioned the integrity of the House, which 2 months ago passed legislation which would establish Dr. King's birthday as a national holiday.

Mr. Speaker, political cheap shots are not unusual. They are particularly prevalent when someone who seeks to prevent legitimate actions is incapable of presenting a valid argument against that action. Such is the case with these voices, which hide behind a cloak of morality when they attack the freedoms which the Constitution guarantees, and who label anyone with whom they disagree an "action-oriented Communist," or a Communist sympathizer given to Marxist/Leninist leanings. Martin Luther King was the finest spokesman for democracy this Nation has seen in the 20th century. He sought, through peace, to bring America to realize the hypocrisy we practiced by holding up the words of Thomas Jefferson as our credo around the world, when we could not bring ourselves to practice what we so stridently, and moralistically preached. If "we hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal," is what this Nation truly believes, then there can be no more important act than to finally recognize this man who fought and died for those words, and to appreciate that this holiday is more than a commemoration of Dr. King, it is an affirmation of all this Nation stands for.

If these other voices, voices which occupy high federally elected posts, can confuse a movement devoted to the very foundation of American values with communism, then it is little wonder that they can callously dismiss the views of millions of Americans with a wave of the hand, a shrug of the shoulder, and a remark like, "I'm not going to get a black vote, period." Mr. Speaker, I address the House today out of the conviction that the men and women of the Congress are elected to represent the people in their States and districts, not the special interests which distort the values we claim to hold dear.

Those who condemn Martin Luther King for his views are right on one subject—he did oppose the Vietnam war. Dr. King was a practitioner of nonviolence; it made no sense for him to do anything else. He believed in the right of self determination—the essential tenet of democracy. That did not make him a Communist. Indeed, it was Dr. King who said:

Communism and Christianity are fundamentally incompatible. A christian cannot be a true Communist. Under communism, the individuals soul is shackled by the chains of conformity. His spirit is bound by the manacles of party allegiance. He is stripped of both conscience and reason. Communism will never be defeated by the use of atomic bombs or nuclear weapons. Our greatest defense against communism is to take offensive action of behalf of justice and righteousness.

If we accept the challenges with devotion and valor, the bells of history will toll for communism and we shall make the world safe for democracy and secure for the people of Christ.

Mr. Speaker, those other voices which screech so loudly against this "Communist," could learn a great deal from Martin Luther King.

THE DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., HOLIDAY BILL

(Mr. GRAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, voices have been heard at the national level opposing a bill to honor the memory of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., with a national holiday by declaring that Dr. King espoused Marxism.

It is indeed a shoddy and sordid argument, reminiscent of the ugly hate-filled era that spawned Dr. King's great nonviolent movement.

Additionally, it ironically occurred the same day that the White House was sending signals through aides that the President was leaning toward endorsing the King holiday bill, which was passed overwhelmingly by this House more than 2 months ago.

Mr. Speaker, I stand before you and my colleagues to insist that President Reagan stop lurking in the shadows on this issue. It is time that our Chief Executive, who has been called the Great Communicator, to step into the forefront, and publicly announce his position on a national holiday for the man whose leadership and courage to the ideal of human equality created a nonviolent movement that eventually struck down some of our Nation's most discriminatory laws.

If White House aides are to remain credible and if we are to believe that this Nation has truly moved a step closer to sharing the American dream with all its citizens, regardless of race, creed, or color, then it is time that our Chief Executive use his influence to end this cheap and disgraceful attempt to resurrect the Red scare tactics of a past era.

Mr. President, if you really want the King bill to become law, you should not leave it to your aides to tell us. You should tell the American people.

Mr. President, the next move is up to you.

You can show us that the ideals for which Reverend King was slain—peace, compassion, and brotherhood—are still alive and well.

Thank you.

TRANSPORTATION APPROPRIATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE TO HOLD HEARINGS ON FAA FACILITY CLOSURES

(Mr. LEHMAN of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, section 319 of the Department of Transportation and related agencies Appropriations Act, 1984 (Public Law 98-78) required the Federal Aviation Administration to submit a detailed, site-specific and time-phased plan for all facility closures or consolidations over the next 3 years. That plan has been submitted to our subcommittee. Any Members may receive a copy by calling the FAA. In summary, the plan calls for closing 104 flight service stations, 52 control towers, and 16 other facilities. A total of 41 new facilities will be opened, including 37 flight service stations.

Section 319 of Public Law 98-78 prohibits FAA from closing any facilities prior to December 1, 1983, and provides that any closure or consolidation questioned in writing by the House or Senate Committees on Appropriations or by any legislative committee of jurisdiction shall be delayed until at least April 15, 1984.

In order to permit a timely response to the FAA plan, our Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee plans to hold a hearing on Tuesday, October 25, 1983, with FAA Administrator Helms and any interested colleagues or organizations.

SOVIETS SHOULD RELEASE ONE PRISONER OF CONSCIENCE FOR EACH LIFE LOST ON FLIGHT 007

(Mrs. BOXER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, nothing can replace the lives lost in the tragic 007 Korean airliner incident. That is a simple statement of fact.

However, I am today proposing along with several of our colleagues, an idea which we hope will lead to a lessening of world tensions if the Soviet Union acts favorably.

We are proposing that for each life lost on the jetliner, the Soviet Union release one prisoner of conscience, whose only crime has been the desire to live a life of freedom. There are thousands of prisoners of conscience whose release would give them a new lease on life. These people only desire freedom in a free country.

If a great number of us rally behind this proposal perhaps we can begin a new period of discussion and dialog centered around the critical issue of human rights.

THE NATION'S TELEPHONE SYSTEM

(Mr. BONKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, events are moving rapidly in the restructuring of our Nation's telephone system.

Over the weekend, AT&T and independent phone operators filed for $20 billion in rate increases.

This week, AT&T is scheduled to file for a $1.75 billion decrease in long distance rates.

These changes are occurring under recent FCC decisions, particularly the decision to levy an "access fee" on all residential and business phone users for the privilege of being connected to the long-distance network.

But before these changes proceed too far, there should be no mistaking the intent of Congress in the area of telephone rates.

Recent action by both Senate and House Committees demonstrates that Congress intends to overturn or delay the FCC's access fee decision.

We are determined to protect the tradition of universal telephone service.

And there should be no confusion over the reasons why Congress is getting involved in this issue.

A lot of people are making the claim that with divestiture the long distance contribution to supporting local service must come to an end.

In fact, there is no basis for these claims. Judge Harold Greene, who presided over the breakup of AT&T stated explicitly that there is no reason why some form of long-distance contribution cannot continue.

Mr. Speaker, before these proposed rate increases and rate cuts proceed too far, all parties should recognize that Congress intends to act. I believe a majority of my colleagues do not support the access charge and other decisions of the FCC.

MARTIN LUTHER KING'S BIRTHDAY

(Mr. BRITT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday a voice was heard opposing the establishment of Dr. Martin Luther King's birthday as a national holiday, using the occasion to deliver an attack on the character of Dr. King. I rise today to assure Members of this body that that voice does not speak for North Carolina.

Dr. King moved us from the politics of violence to the politics of nonviolence. He opened the broad avenues of hope through the political process, and shut down the dead-end street of violence as a means of achieving social change.

It is altogether fitting and proper that we should honor Dr. King's contribution by setting aside a day in his memory. Ten of my eleven House colleagues from North Carolina voted in favor of establishing Dr. King's birthday as a national holiday. One opposed the initiative on economic and other grounds, and, while I disagree with that position, it was undertaken in good faith by a number of House Members whose position I respect.

Yesterday's statement, however, was not made in good faith, but represented charged rhetoric calculated to divide, not reconcile. It was a voice that does injury to the body politic. It was not the voice of North Carolina.

THE BUDGET CRISIS

(Mr. CLINGER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, future Federal budget deficits pose the most severe domestic economic crisis this country has faced since the Second World War. What is worse, Mr. Speaker, this is a creeping crisis, one that is not readily apparent to the millions of Americans who are again buying homes and autos, and who again feel secure in their continued employment.

Recently, as chairman of the House Wednesday Group, I moderated a dinner-seminar attended by many of my Republican colleagues, leading members of the business community, and economic policymakers from past and present administrations, both Democrat and Republican.

We heard that our major corporations are closing plants at home but building plants abroad. We also heard that this problem will only get worse as continued deficits crowd out needed investment, raise interest rates, spur inflation, and cause major distortions to the economy, especially to export and interest-sensitive industries. The inevitable result—fewer jobs and a lower standard of living.

The conventional wisdom at the moment is that Congress will duck this problem until after the 1984 election. Congress is a crisis-activated institution, and it will not act until the crisis hits it in the face, regardless of the terrible damage that will result from waiting. Until then, it is business as usual. Democrats blame Republicans, and Republicans blame Democrats. All the while, the crisis creeps on.

But I submit that if we wait until after the election then the damage to our economy may be irreparable. Deficits will be guaranteed through 1987. Our industrial competitiveness will be further eroded, and millions more jobs will move offshore. In fact, by that time, we will have added an additional $800 billion to the deficit, which will require a 20-percent increase in taxes just to pay its financing.

Mr. Speaker, we are faced with political gridlock that can only be broken by strong and creative leadership. Recently, the President and the leaders in Congress joined together to provide such leadership on the crisis in Lebanon. The budget crisis at home requires no less.

I am a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 375, which directs the President to convene a domestic economic summit with congressional leaders from both parties. We need all leaders from both parties and the President in one room, prepared to make tough decisions and ready to unite in support of a single program.

We can wait no longer, Mr. Speaker. The crisis is real. The gridlock must be broken. Leadership is needed, and I am convinced that leadership will make the difference.

INTERNATIONAL DAY OF BREAD

(Mr. ROBERTS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my colleagues today that today is the International Day of Bread. This celebration is part of an international celebration called Harvest Festival Week. It is a symbol of our country's ability to feed both ourselves and a very troubled and hungry world.

Each of my colleagues, as a courtesy of my office, will be receiving a loaf of bread. I would hope that while we enjoy that bread that we would remember that the farmer is the key to our own and the world's food supply. Even though farming regions in the Midwest were hit hard with drought this summer, the American consuming public still is assured an adequate supply of reasonably priced and wholesome food. Even with the drought, our food prices from last July to this July have remained constant. I hope my colleagues enjoy the bread and at the same time recognize the contributions of the American farmer.

H.R. 1054 WILL HELP REDUCE POTENTIALLY SERIOUS SAFETY HAZARDS

(Mr. SHUMWAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, last week two young boys in my congressional district returned from a hike in the Sierra Nevada Mountains near Lake Tahoe, Calif., with four unexploded 75-millimeter recoiless cannon shells. Fortunately, an Army demolition team successfully removed the dangerous rounds without incident.

The ammunition found by the boys was some of the many dud-rounds that remain unaccounted for after being fired last winter for avalanche control purposes—a task carried out by the State transportation agency. California, like many other Western States, has traditionally used surplus Army ammunition to protect their mountain highways from snow avalanches. Unfortunately, the quality of this surplus ammunition is poor and creates a public safety hazard. Specifically, the fuses on the surplus shells are 30 years old and explode with a 30-percent dud-rate on soft snow.

Last winter, I introduced a bill that will remedy this unacceptable situation. H.R. 1054 will allow the Secretary of the Army to make more reliable, nonsurplus ammunition available to the non-Federal entities responsible for avalanche control. This legislation will help to reduce potentially serious safety hazards such as last week's near tragedy.

MEMBERS URGED TO VOTE "NO" ON DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT EXTENSION

(Mr. BETHUNE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, later today the Defense Production Act will be here on suspension, and I urge a "no" vote on that bill.

The reason is this: The Defense Production Act has broad authorities which have been on the books since 1950. The other body, the Senate, enacted a bill which establishes criteria and some oversight features which will make that bill better. Here in this House we will not have an opportunity, if it is passed on suspension, to add to the criteria and tighten that bill up.

The corporate welfare interests are out there, they are eager to get to the trough, and I assure you that if we put these broad authorities on the books, you can rely on the fact that within a couple of months they will be using these broad authorities to funnel money into the mining interests and to all others who can state some sort of a case that their product needed in the national security interest.

The Defense Department has indicated in a letter in February that they plan to request an additional $300 million authorization in 1985 and go up to $500 million annually beginning in fiscal year 1986.

This bill is not ready to be passed by the House of Representatives. I urge a "no" vote on the suspension, and let us bring it here under the regular order of business.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT

(Mr. LOWERY of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, last month the Soviet Union stalked and destroyed a Korean Air Lines jet knowing its identity as a passenger transport. Theories differ on the Soviet motive, but all agree it was a heinous crime.

Everyone touched by the incident has tried to express a fitting response to the Soviet misdeed. A joint resolution of Congress condemned the action and asked for reparations for the families of the victims.

This resolution did not go far enough. World outrage has been expressed, but restitution to the families of the world has not been made.

Restitution should be in the form of the release of 269 political prisoners, one for each life lost on KAL 007, to be nominated and selected by the free world.

This would be an eloquent request, which, left unfilled, will remind the world of Soviet shame in downing a civilian aircraft without remorse, and the continuing disgrace of the Gulag Archipelago. If the request is honored, the freedom of these 269 persons would be a living memorial to those lost in the tragedy.

As long as we ask for restitution, our request will stand as a verbal "Guernica," a reminder of a place in our world that has no respect for life, human rights, and liberty.

CONFISCATION OF OUR CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

(Mr. MARLENEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in opposition to the confiscation of our constitutional rights. That is exactly what the Supreme Court has condoned by not reviewing the Morton Grove gun control bill.

I object to a city, town, or village subverting the U.S. Constitution and my right to bear arms.

Innocent hunters and sportsmen, too, are subjected to Morton Grove's unconstitutional ban. It is an inherent right to own a firearm in this country, and has been since our Founding Fathers declared it so.

A lawful American citizen who legally owns a firearm should not be subjected to a felony. I have a bill, H.R. 3714 that would allow me to carry a legally purchased firearm across State lines even if there are laws such as Morton Grove's. What should be a crime is eroding the document that helped found this Nation, and serving to help banish full-fledged constitutional rights.

Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the Supreme Court's refusal to reconsider the Morton Grove gun ban. I will take the U.S. Constitution over a village ordinance every time.

Those of you who believe that we have a right to possess a firearm and a right to use that firearm to protect our lives and property should view today's top editorial in the Washington Post with great alarm. I urge my colleagues to join me in passing my bill H.R. 3714.

This bill will protect those of us who legally own a firearm and protect us from criminal charges that arise when we unknowingly stray into a jurisdiction such as Morton Grove or worse yet those bastions of crime such as Washington, D.C., and New York City which prohibit the possession of a handgun.

Apparently the Washington Post would rather have the crime than the deterrence that comes with a majority of its citizens who are in legal possession of a handgun.

VACATING PROCEEDINGS ON AND RECONSIDERATION OF S. 552, GEORGE W. WHITEHURST FEDERAL BUILDING AND U.S. COURTHOUSE

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings by which the House passed the Senate bill (S. 552) to designate the Federal building in Fort Myers, Fla., as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse," on yesterday, October 3, 1983, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I do this so that the gentleman from Missouri can explain why this bill has been brought back to the floor today.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, on yesterday, October 3, 1983, the House passed H.R. 3303 to designate the Federal building in Fort Myers, Fla., as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building." After the passage of the House bill the House took up the Senate bill, S. 552, and passed that bill.

It was discovered after passage of the legislation there was a discrepancy in the Senate bill in that on page 1 in two places reference is made to the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Building and United States Courthouse," while on page 2 the reference is only to the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building."

This action is, therefore, taken at this time to conform the Senate bill in its entirety so that in all cases it will read the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Building and United States Courthouse."

This is what my amendment would do.

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 552

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the building located at 2301 First Street, Fort Myers, Florida, known as the Federal Building, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Building and United States Courthouse". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to that building shall be deemed to be a reference to the "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building".

SEC. 2. Section 3(b) of Public Law 98-1 is amended by striking the words "six months" and substituting therefor "two years".

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. YOUNG OF MISSOURI

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. YOUNG of Missouri: Page 2, lines 3 and 4, strike out "George W. Whitehurst Federal Court Building" and insert in lieu thereof "George W. Whitehurst Federal Building and United States Courthouse".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. YOUNG).

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, D.C., October 4, 1983.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the permission granted in Clause 5, Rule III of the Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives, I have the honor to transmit a sealed envelope received from The White House at 4:03 p.m. on Monday, October 3, 1983, and said to contain a message from the President whereby he transmits the First Special Message for Fiscal Year 1984 under the Impoundment Control Act of 1974.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely,

BENJAMIN J. GUTHRIE,
Clerk, House of Representatives.
By W. RAYMOND COLLEY,
Deputy Clerk.

NEW DEFERRALS OF BUDGET AUTHORITY AND OUTLAYS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 98-116)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of Monday, October 3, 1983.)

1983 NATIONAL ENERGY POLICY PLAN—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 98-117)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Energy and Commerce and ordered to be printed:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Tuesday, October 4, 1983.)

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken today at the conclusion of legislative business.

CONNECTICUT RIVER ATLANTIC SALMON COMPACT ACT

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3044) to grant the consent of the Congress to an interstate agreement or compact relating to the restoration of Atlantic salmon in the Connecticut River Basin, and to allow the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of the Interior to participate as members in a Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 3044

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress consents to the interstate compact relating to the restoration of Atlantic salmon to the Connecticut River Basin and creating the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission, which compact was entered into by the States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont pursuant to the laws of those respective States and is set forth in the statutes of the States of Connecticut (P.A. 79-528), Massachusetts (Chap. 716, 1981), New Hampshire (108:1, 1979), and Vermont (1979, No. 89; Amended in 1981, No. 85:9) and reads substantially as follows:

"ARTICLE I

"The purpose of this compact is to promote the restoration of anadromous Atlantic salmon, hereinafter referred to as Atlantic salmon, in the Connecticut River Basin by the development of a joint interstate program for stocking, protection, management, research, and regulation. It is the purpose of this compact to restore Atlantic salmon to the Connecticut River in numbers as near as possible to their historical abundance.

"ARTICLE II

"This agreement shall become operative immediately whenever all of the States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont have executed it in a form that is in accordance with the laws of the executing State and the Congress has given its consent.

"ARTICLE III

"Each State joining herein shall appoint two representatives to a commission hereby constituted and designated as the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission. One shall be the executive officer of the administrative agency of such State charged with the management of the fisheries resources to which this compact pertains or his designee. The second shall be a citizen who shall have a knowledge and interest in Atlantic salmon to be appointed by the Governor for a term of three years. The Director of the northeast region of the Fish and Wildlife Service, United States Department of the Interior or his designee and the Director of the northeast region of the National Marine Fisheries Service, United States Department of Commerce, or his designee shall be members of said commission. The commission shall be a body corporate with the powers and duties set forth herein.

"ARTICLE IV

"The duty of said commission shall be to make inquiry and ascertain from time to time such methods, practices, circumstances, and conditions as may be disclosed for bringing about the restoration of Atlantic salmon in the Connecticut River and its tributaries.

"To promote restoration, preservation, and protection of Atlantic salmon in the Connecticut River Basin, the commission may draft and recommend to the Governors of the various signatory States legislation to accomplish this end. The commission shall, more than 60 days prior to any regular meeting of the legislature of any signatory State, present to the Governor of the States its recommendations relating to proposed enactments to be made by the legislature of the State in furthering the intents and purposes of this compact.

"The commission shall have the power to recommend to the States party hereto stocking programs, management procedures, and research projects and when two or more States party hereto shall jointly stock waters or undertake cooperative management or research, the commission shall act as the coordinating agency. The commission, using all available means, shall encourage acquisition by the signatory States of river bank, river bed, and access thereto.

"The commission shall consult with and advise the pertinent administrative agencies in the signatory States with regard to other anadromous species and their potential impact or the potential impact of sport fisheries and commercial fisheries for other anadromous species on the restoration of Atlantic salmon to the Connecticut River Basin.

"In the interest of developing a sound program of Atlantic salmon management, the commission shall promulgate regulations governing Atlantic salmon fishing in the mainstem of the Connecticut River in all four signatory States as hereinafter provided. Such regulations may: (1) establish the open and closed seasons for Atlantic salmon which may vary by river section, (2) establish hours, days, or periods during the open season when fishing for Atlantic salmon shall not be permitted in designated areas, (3) prescribe the legal methods of taking Atlantic salmon including the type of gear such as gaffs, landing nets, or tailers which may be used to assist in landing fish, (4) establish a minimum legal length for Atlantic salmon, (5) establish a daily creel limit, the season creel limit, and the possession limit for Atlantic salmon.

"The commission shall recommend, review, and issue comments on such regulations as may be promulgated by the signatory States governing Atlantic salmon fishing and tributary streams. The States of Connecticut and Massachusetts agree to make available for broodstock, from fish taken in the fish passage facilities at the Rainbow Reservoir Dam and the Holyoke Power Company Dam, such numbers of adult Atlantic salmon as the commission deems necessary to carry out the Atlantic salmon restoration program.

"The commission shall have the power to issue a Connecticut River Basin Atlantic salmon license and the sale of such licenses shall be handled by the individual signatory States or their authorized agents. The individual signatory States shall be accountable to the commission for all such licenses and the moneys received therefrom. The initial fee for such licenses shall be determined by majority vote of the commission but shall not exceed the maximum resident angling license fee of the signatory States except that the commission may upon determination of need and with the unanimous approval of its membership increase such license and issuing fee. The individual signatory States or their issuing agents may retain a recording fee up to 50 cents for each license issued. Forms for such license shall be provided to the signatory States by the commission. Such license shall be a legal prerequisite for any person including minors fishing for or possessing Atlantic salmon in the waters or on the shores of the Connecticut River and all of its tributaries. In addition to said Connecticut River Basin Atlantic salmon license, all persons, except those specifically exempted because of age, disability, or other limitations as determined by statute or regulations of the individual signatory States shall be required to possess a valid resident or nonresident sport fishing license issued by the State in which the person is fishing. The commission shall recognize that in certain waters or sections of waters a daily rod permit may also be required, such daily rod permit to be issued by the State in which such waters or sections of waters are located; however, the signatory States shall not, by fee, distinguish between residents and nonresidents. The authority to limit the numbers of persons fishing for Atlantic salmon in certain tributaries or sections of certain tributaries shall remain the prerogative of the individual signatory States.

"The respective police agencies of the signatory States shall have the authority to enforce all of the regulations and license requirements of the commission any place in the Connecticut River Basin.

"The commission shall have the authority to accept gifts, State grants, and Federal funds. The commission shall have the authority to expend money from fees collected for Connecticut River Basin Atlantic salmon licenses or from such other funds available to the commission to finance the cost of stocking, management, or research carried on by signatory States to further the purposes of this compact. Such funds shall be in the form of direct grants to the agency of such State charged with the management of the fisheries resources and may be up to 100 percent of the cost of projects approved by a majority vote of the commission.

"ARTICLE V

"The commission shall elect from its number a chairman and a vice chairman and at its pleasure may remove such officers. Said commission shall adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of its business. At such time as funds are available to the commission, the commission may establish and maintain an office for the transaction of its business. The commission may meet at any time or place but must meet at least semiannually.

"The commission shall have the authority to expend money from available commission funds to reimburse its membership for necessary travel expenses.

"ARTICLE VI

"At such time as funds are available, the commission may employ and discharge at its pleasure such personnel as may be required to carry out the provisions of the compact and shall fix and determine their duties, qualifications, and compensation.

"ARTICLE VII

"There shall be established a technical committee to consist of one fishery biologist from each of the signatory States, the United States Fish and Wildlife Service, and the National Marine Fisheries Service to act in an advisory capacity to the commission. The technical committee shall have the authority to request employees of the signatory States, the United States Fish and Wildlife Service, and the National Marine Fisheries Service or others who have special fields of expertise to act as special advisers to the committee. At such time as funds are available, the commission may reimburse technical committee members and special advisers for necessary travel expenses.

"ARTICLE VIII

"No action shall be taken by the commission in regard to its general affairs except by affirmative vote of a majority of members present at any meeting, provided there is a quorum. A quorum shall consist of a simple majority of all members of the commission. Provided further, That no action shall be taken by the commission unless each signatory State is represented at any such meeting. No recommendation or allotment of grant funds shall be made by the commission except by the affirmative vote of a majority of the members.

"ARTICLE IX

"Continued absence of representation or of any representative on the commission from any party hereto shall be brought to the attention of the Governor thereof.

"ARTICLE X

"The States signatory hereto agree to make an annual appropriation to the initial support of the commission in the amount of $1,000 for each of the first three years that this compact is in effect.

"ARTICLE XI

"The commission shall keep accurate accounts of all receipts and disbursements and shall report to the Governor and the legislature of each State party to this compact on or before the tenth day of January of each year setting forth in detail the transactions conducted by it during the 12 months preceding January first of that year. The comptrollers of the States are hereby authorized and empowered from time to time to examine the accounts and books of the commission, including its receipts, disbursements, grants, and such other items referring to its financial standing as such comptroller may deem proper and to report the results of such examination to the Governor of said State.".

SEC. 2. The Congress authorizes the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of the Interior to participate as members of the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission in the manner specified by the compact approved by the first section of this Act.

SEC. 3. The consent of the Congress granted by the first section of this Act to the compact referred to in that section—

(1) shall become effective only if none of the States that are members of the compact has in effect a statute providing for withdrawal from the compact or if all such States have agreed by statute to the same provisions for withdrawal from the compact; and

(2) shall be effective for a period of twenty years beginning on the date the consent of the Congress becomes effective under paragraph (1).

SEC. 4. Nothing contained in the compact approved by the first section of this Act shall be construed as impairing or in any manner affecting any right or jurisdiction of the United States in and over the region which forms the subject of that compact.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FORSYTHE) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX).

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration by the House would simply provide the consent of Congress to an interstate compact designed to promote and facilitate the restoration of the Atlantic salmon to the Connecticut River basin. This interstate compact has alrady been enacted into State law by Massachusetts, Connecticut, Vermont, and New Hampshire, but as you know, the U.S. Constitution requires the consent of Congress for any such interstate agreement to enter into force.

Specifically, the compact provides for the establishment of the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission which is charged with developing cooperative interstate stocking, protection, management, research and regulatory programs. The objective of the commission is to restore the once abundant, but now decimated Atlantic salmon to historical levels of abundance.

In order to promote both State-Federal and interstate coordination, H.R. 3044 further provides the authority for both the National Marine Fisheries Service and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to participate as members of the Commission. Last, to insure proper congressional and State oversight and evaluation of this program, the bill limits the term of the compact to 20 years.

Mr. Speaker, the coordinated Federal and interstate program provided for under the Connecticut River Atlantic salmon compact has great potential for developing Atlantic salmon into substantial new fishing opportunities in the New England region. Without the consent of Congress needed to validate this compact, such benefits may never be realized. Furthermore, because of the enthusiasm of the signatory States to arrange all fiscal support for the Commission and its activities, H.R. 3044 does not carry an authorization for Federal spending. The bill is wholeheartedly supported by the administration and so I urge your support, and the support of the Members here today for this important legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3044, the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission Act, as amended. This bill provides congressional consent to an interstate fisheries compact unanimously supported by all member States.

The compact is designed to promote the restoration of sea-run Atlantic salmon in the Connecticut River basin. The member States—Connecticut, Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire—have ratified the compact and this bill provides the requisite authority for the Federal Government, specifically the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the National Marine Fisheries Service, to participate as members of the Commission established by the compact.

The bill, as amended, allows the States to standardize their compacts and sets the effective date of the compact for a period of 20 years. These provisions resolve the legal difficulties associated with the inconsistencies in the various State enacting statutes. Also, by including a sunset clause for the compact, the States will be encouraged to review the compact's effectiveness and the success that has been achieved in meeting the goal of restoring the Atlantic salmon to the Connecticut River basin.

I would urge my colleagues to support this legislation which provides necessary congressional sanction for this fisheries management legislation.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE), who really is the author of this bill.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3044, the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Compact Act.

For several years now, the four States of Connecticut, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts have been working with each other and two Federal agencies to develop and administer a program to return the Atlantic salmon to the Connecticut River. At one time, Atlantic salmon could be found in the Connecticut River in abundant numbers. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service estimated that the size of the salmon population in the Connecticut River basin ranged from 70,000 to 140,000 adult salmon. I cannot wait for those days to return—Atlantic salmon in my district.

By the early 19th century, however, the salmon population in the Connecticut River basin was virtually eliminated. Pollution of the river's main stem and tributaries, the lack or proper management and the construction of dams contributed to the extinction of this prized food and game fish in the Connecticut River. Since that time, many in New England have hoped for the return of the Atlantic salmon.

After a brief attempt by the States during the mid-1800's, a contemporary restoration program was initiated in 1967 when 5,000 2-year smolts were released into the Connecticut River. Since then, hatcheries have been built; fish ladders constructed, and each year more smolts are released into the river system. In addition to these State projects, the Federal Government has also been involved. In Vermont, a new Federal hatchery was constructed with a capacity to produce 400,000 smolts annually.

In 1974, the program showed the first sign of success—at least one adult Atlantic salmon returned to the Connecticut River, the first one in over 100 years. In 1981, the annual run reached its new height of 530 fish. The record continues to improve every year. In fact, with several ladders in operation, the Connecticut River is now opened to Atlantic salmon for 173 miles upstream. Another fish ladder at Bellows Falls, Vt. is expected to open later this month. With the completion of this ladder and one scheduled to open next year, the entire river will be free for the salmon to return.

This success is encouraging, but much more must be done to establish a stable salmon population—the program must be consistent and ongoing for a considerable period of time.

With this in mind, an interstate compact was formed to coordinate the efforts of the four States and to enlist the assistance of Federal expertise and resources. The compact charter provides for a Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission composed of 10 members: 8 State appointees and 2 Federal Government representatives. Essentially the Commission has three main functions:

First, the Commission will act as an overall coordinating body to recommend stocking programs, management procedures and research.

Second, the Commission will promulgate regulations for salmon fishing in the main stem of the river and will issue salmon fishing licenses with the fees collected to be used by the Commission.

Third, the Commission will be authorized to accept gifts, State and Federal grants to be used along with the fees for Atlantic salmon management and research.

As required by article 1 of the U.S. Constitution, H.R. 3044 simply grants the consent of Congress to this interstate compact for a period of 20 years. The legislation also authorizes the Department of Interior, that is, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the Department of Commerce, that is, the National Marines Fisheries Service to participate as members of the Commission. The Federal agencies have already expressed interest in the program.

The effort to restore the Atlantic salmon has made measurable progress. With the institutional support of this interstate compact, the program should attain its ultimate goal—the restoration of Atlantic salmon to the Connecticut River in historic levels of abundance. I urge the House to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 3044.

Mr. Speaker, let me take this opportunity to commend the able and expeditious work of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. The leadership of subcommittee Chairman JOHN BREAUX along with the ranking member, my friend the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FORSYTHE), was extremely helpful during the committee's consideration and this floor deliberation. Full committee Chairman WALTER JONES insured that this bill received prompt and careful consideration. I appreciate their valuable assistance and leadership.

Let me take this opportunity to elaborate on the amendment offered in full committee by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX).

I asked the subcommittee chairman to include the additional section of the bill to resolve a legal and constitutional difficulty that surfaced after a closer examination of the State enabling legislation. When ratifying the compact, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts included a withdrawal provision in the preamble of its statute. The language added to this interstate agreement allowed Massachusetts to withdraw from the compact without the consent of the other States involved. None of the other three States adopted this provision in their statutes. Since the compacts must be uniform for congressional consent, the States have technically not agreed to the same compact. Even though the substance of the agreement is exactly the same, this additional provision may be interpreted as a difference great enough to question the validity of the compact.

The language was adopted, from what I understand, because several Massachusetts legislators were concerned that the agreement did not include a termination date nor provide for any review process to assess the success or failure of the salmon restoration program. They felt, and I agree, that such a multistate effort will be improved by legislative review after a certain period of time.

The amendment, now section 3 of the bill, accomplishes this goal without delaying the implementation of the compact. There are two conditions for congressional approval. First, the compact is required to be uniform. Either Massachusetts must withdraw its provision or the other States must conform with a similar amendment. Second, the compact is authorized by Congress for 20 years. This period will allow for congressional and State review of the program.

I have been assured by officials in Massachusetts, particularly the legislator who offered the amendment to include the language, that the State will begin the process of amending its statute. They have accepted this compromise.

I hope this adequately addresses the concerns you raised.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I just want to take this time to say that I have been following this program for many years since I was attorney general for the State of Vermont, and I certainly must say that the success of the program is certainly due to the gentleman in the well. There is no one who has worked harder in following this program than he has.

The progress that we have seen now, with the salmon beginning to return to the river, will certainly benefit the gentleman's State, and it will benefit mine also, of course, where they will head for the headwaters.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to thank the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) publicly for all the tremendous effort he has put into this program. It is great to see the program moving forward and to see the success that is coming from it.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this important piece of legislation and I would like to commend the gentleman from Massachusetts for rallying the members of the New England congressional delegation to this valuable cause.

H.R. 3044 is an important step in the effort to restore salmon to the Connecticut River. At one time, population estimates of salmon in the Connecticut River basin ranged from 70,000 to 140,000. Unfortunately, due to irresponsible damming practices and other uses of the Connecticut River, the salmon have virtually disappeared.

In 1977, the States of Vermont, New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Massachusetts joined with the Federal Government to propose a Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission. The purpose of the compact is to promote the restoration of the Atlantic salmon run into the Connecticut River basin. It would set up a joint interstate program of management and research.

In 1982, the Governors of all four States signed similar laws to allow their States to engage in this program. Under the Constitution, the consent of the Congress is required for the compact to go into effect. We must also authorize the participation of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the National Marine Fisheries Service in the Salmon Commission.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is necessary to facilitate a program that is a fine example of Federal-State cooperation which will result in no additional cost to the Treasury. It is also a program that promises to be popular and beneficial in the States of the Connecticut River basin. On behalf of all Vermonters, I want to thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his initiative in bringing this bill to the floor of the House.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS) for his remarks, and I thank him for all his help.

One of the things that we obtained while we were trying to clean up the river was the salmon hatchery up there at Bethel, Vt., which is now completed. I know the gentleman is going to still be around here in the future, and someday maybe you will name it after me.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Absolutely, no question about it.

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, just in closing, let me say that I think this is again showing that we are cleaning up our environment. Our other rivers in the Northeast are also beginning to see fish again. This is the kind of thing that we have really been striving for as a nation, and this is just clear proof that it does pay off to really work on the environment.

Mr. Speaker, I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MCKINNEY).

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, today I rise in firm support of H.R. 3044, the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Compact Act. This measure gives the consent of Congress, for 20 years, to a compact entered into by Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont to restore Atlantic salmon in the Connecticut River basin "as near as possible to their historic abundance." According to the Congressional Budget Office, enactment of H.R. 3044 will result in no significant additional cost to the Federal Government.

Based on records from the 19th century and habitat quantification estimates developed by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the size of the Atlantic salmon population in the Connecticut River basin ranged from 70,000 to 140,000 adult salmon annually. Unfortunately, due to irresponsible damming practices and an increase in pollution, the Atlantic salmon population had all but disappeared by the early 19th century. An effort to restore the salmon population was initiated in the late 19th century, but only limited success was achieved because of a lack of cooperation among the members of the four-State Commission—New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut.

In 1976, the Fish and Wildlife Service, the National Marine Fisheries Service, and the four States, entered into a compact which established the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission. Nevertheless, the Commission has done very little to accomplish their goal. This has been because the U.S. Constitution asserts that "No State shall, without consent of Congress, enter into an agreement or compact with another State." H.R. 3044 would grant the congressional consent required in this instance, and provide a vehicle for cooperation among the four States.

I fully support this legislation, and commend the work of the committee in this regard.

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3044, a bill to grant the consent of Congress to an interstate compact which is designed to bring about the restoration of Atlantic salmon in the Connecticut River basin.

Atlantic salmon were once common throughout the streams of northeastern North America. However, due to the construction of dams which prevented the juvenile salmon from reaching the ocean rearing areas and the adults from reaching the freshwater spawning areas, as well as the effects of pollution, the Atlantic salmon was brought to the verge of extinction in the United States. More recently, as a result of pollution abatement and mitigation of the effects of hydroelectric dams, the Atlantic salmon is becoming reestablished in the Connecticut River.

Mr. Speaker, legislatures of four States, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont, have joined hands to aid and encourage the rebirth of this fishery. I want to commend them as well as the bipartisan group of Congressmen who introduced H.R. 3044 to approve establishment of a Connecticut River basin Atlantic salmon compact. This compact will make possible the coordinated research and management efforts which are essential for the successful rehabilitation of this highly migratory species.

The consent of Congress is required to authorize the Regional Directors of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the National Marine Fisheries Service to take part as members of the Commission, and for the participation of U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and National Marine Fisheries Service designees on a technical committee to advise the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission.

This legislation would help to restore a very valuable sport and commercial species to the Atlantic States region without authorizing any new Federal funding. I urge my colleagues to vote favorably on this important measure.●

● Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to ask my colleagues to quickly and overwhelmingly support a noncontroversial piece of legislation now before this body that is extremely important to my State of Connecticut. This legislation is H.R. 3044, the Atlantic Salmon Compact Act, and has the support of 19 of my colleagues from three other New England States including Vermont, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire.

Since 1967, Connecticut, Vermont, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire have been working together to find ways to restore Atlantic salmon to the Connecticut River. During the last few decades, pollution, lack of proper management, and the construction of dams in the river have wiped out the entire population of Atlantic salmon in the Connecticut River Basin.

In 1974, a historic and memorable moment occurred when the first salmon in over 100 years returned to the Connecticut River. Since that time, the annual number returning has reached the extraordinary level of 530 fish. This number is indeed significant but in order to maintain, and more importantly, increase these numbers, it is vital that the four States involved and the Federal Government cooperate to attain this very worthy goal.

So far, Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts have done their part as all four State legislatures have ratified the compact. Now, the fate of this compact lies in the hands of all of you here today. This compact will not add any additional costs to the Federal budget and so, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 3044, which, if enacted, would give Federal consent to this interstate compact allowing the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission to fulfill its purpose.●

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of H.R. 3044, I rise today in support of this important legislation which will at last bring an orderly plan to the preservation and future of the Atlantic salmon in the Connecticut River throughout the New England area. I believe this legislation, which will allow the States to enter into a 20-year compact to determine the direction and the development of this important resource, could not be more timely.

The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service estimates that at one time between 70,000 and 140,000 Atlantic salmon left the ocean every year to swim up the Connecticut River to spawn. By 1812, however, a series of dams, blocking major stretches of spawning ground, caused the salmon to all but dispapear from the river. Fifty years later, the New England States through which the river winds, launched the New England Commission of Inland Fisheries in a cooperative effort to breed and sustain the fish.

It took another 100 years before Congress passed the Anadromous Fish and Conservation Act, to renew the effort. The Federal and State governments built hatcheries able to produce 600,000 young fish a year and opened up spawning grounds to the salmon by constructing special "fish ladders" that bypass the river's power-generating dams. In 1974, a lone salmon returned to the Connecticut River; by 1981 the number reached 530.

To consolidate these achievements and make further progress, the four States, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, and the National Marine Fisheries Service finally agreed in 1976 to enter into a compact establishing the Connecticut River Atlantic Salmon Commission. Since that time, all four States have consented through legislation to be members.

The commission's duty is to restore, preserve, and protect the Atlantic salmon in the Connecticut River Basin and its tributaries. Its work must be shared with the Governor, in order to encourage the States to acquire sections of the river and bank and act as the coordinating agency for any cooperative efforts between two or more States. I fully support the provisions of this bill which will allow the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Commerce to appoint representatives as members of the commission, which is established by the interstate compact.

The restoration, enhancement, and maintenance of Atlantic salmon populations in selected New England rivers was a major priority of the State and Federal fisheries agencies last year. I believe this legislation, granting the consent of Congress to an interstate compact relating to the restoration of Atlantic Salmon, will make their efforts even more fruitful in the years to come. I commend the swift work of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee in bringing this legislation before us today, and I urge my colleagues to support it.●

● Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, as the Representative from New Hampshire's Second District, where the Connecticut River originates from the scenic Connecticut Lakes region in Pittsburg, it is an honor for me to congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) for his leadership in developing the Connecticut River Atlantic salmon compact.

At one time the Atlantic salmon thrived in the Connecticut River. It is indeed a sad and unfortunate fact to know that in past years, due to improper management, pollution, and various water construction projects, the Atlantic salmon has all but disappeared from the Connecticut River Basin.

New Hampshire depends heavily on its tourist industry. Our scenic rivers have provided ample fishing to tourists for years. Therefore, this initiative, led by the gentleman from Massachusetts, is a very important step in the process to return the Atlantic salmon to the waters of the Granite State.

Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont have been working with each other along with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service for some time now to develop a mutually agreeable plan to return the Atlantic salmon to the Connecticut River. To date, all four State legislatures have ratified the compact.

Again, the gentleman from Massachusetts is to be commended for his leadership in bringing this important legislation to the attention of our colleagues.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3044, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXPORT ADMINISTRATION ACT OF 1979 EXTENSION

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4068) to extend the authorities under the Export Administration Act of 1979 until October 28, 1983, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 4068

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 20 of the Export Administration Act of 1979 (50 U.S.C. App. 2419) is amended by striking out "October 14" and insert in lieu thereof "October 28".

SEC. 2. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Commerce for the fiscal year 1984 such sums as may be necessary to carry out the Export Administration Act of 1979.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER).

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is made necessary by the fact that the Export Administration Act, which originally expired on September 30, 1983, and was by action of this body and that of the other body extended last week to October 14, must now be once again extended to October 28.

As the Members know, the House currently has the Export Administration Amendments Act of 1983 under consideration, and we had 3 days of deliberations last week. Regrettably, because so many amendments are pending and because the other body has failed to take this issue up on the Senate floor, we now find it necessary once again to seek a simple extension of the act.

This is terribly important, Mr. Speaker, because the Export Administration Act is the one authority that the President has to exercise foreign policy and national security controls. Until the Congress can act on a new measure, we must proceed with a simple extension. I am hopeful that the second extension will be sufficient for both the House and the Senate to act upon their respective measures so that we can have a new Export Administration Act signed into law by the end of the month.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

□ 1310

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the extension of EAA to October 31, but I do remind some of our Members that 2 weeks ago, a number of us prophesied that this was going to happen.

Now, again, it will not take a prophet to predict that it is going to take another extension after October 31 to complete EAA. The Senate has not even begun to schedule time to debate the EAA.

We, in this House, have not, I think it is fair to say, scratched the surface in debating pending amendments to the EAA.

This is very important legislation. The Export Administration Act is going to have many amendments. I have been told that we have as many as 25 amendments waiting to be offered to the EAA; so I think it is appropriate to extend it to October 31. This is not enough time, however, to get the job done. It is going to take more than 2 weeks to adequately address all the issues in EAA.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROTH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the gentleman and members of the subcommittee for their cooperation, not only with our work on the Export Administration Amendments Act, but our efforts to extend the existing act so that we can properly dispose of this matter.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

As the gentleman from Washington had mentioned just a short while ago in his remarks, the Export Administration Act is the only vehicle that the President has in this area and it is very important.

I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4068, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HAZARDOUS WASTE AMENDMENT

(Mr. SKELTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, in the very near future, this body will finish its consideration of the Hazardous Waste Control and Enforcement Act, H.R. 2867, and I have today offered an amendment that deserves the Members' attention. Simply stated, my amendment provides the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency with the tools that he needs to do the job that the Congress intended, namely, to protect the health and welfare of the residents of an area that is found to be contaminated by toxic waste.

My amendment brings to this body the experience that my Missouri colleagues and I have gained from the Times Beach hazardous waste disaster. It gives the Administrator the discretion to permanently relocate residents where cost effective or necessary, to pay local businesses debts during relocation to keep the local economy afloat, and to provide unemployment benefits where necessary and that are already contemplated by the Disaster Relief Act of 1974.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that none of my colleagues will ever face the trauma that Missourians have faced in the wake of the contamination of entire towns. With this amendment, however, at least we can close the gaps that we have discovered in the Superfund law so that the Government can act more promptly to protect its citizens.

The Senate Environment and Public Works has adopted this amendment at the behest of Senators DANFORTH and EAGLETON. We should assure passage of this into law by passing it in this body.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950 EXTENSTION

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill (S. 1852) to extend the expiration date of the Defense Production Act of 1950, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 1852

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first sentence of section 717(a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 (50 U.S.C. App. 2166(a)) is amended by striking out "September 30, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1985".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. BETHUNE) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE).

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, my amendment is at the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment is part of the gentleman's motion and the gentleman may explain it.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, my amendment to S. 1852 would strike all after the enacting clause and substitute language which would simply extend the existing authorities of the Defense Production Act of 1950 for 2 years. I believe this is the sensible course for the Congress to take at this time.

The Senate bill would extend the DPA for 5 years, and would extensively revise the authorities of title III of the act.

Title III of the Defense Production Act contains the authorities for expansion of productive capacity and supply of materials necessary for the national defense. As those authorities stand now, the President could extend direct loans and guarantee loans up to a certain amount, and enter into purchase agreements upon obtaining advance appropriations for these activities.

After only 1 day of hearings, the Senate Banking Committee proceeded to mark up a bill, which would change those authorities so that literally each individual loan, loan guarantee, and purchase program would need to be authorized, and prior to that, be identified on an individual basis in the President's budget submissions. This is a drastic revamping of traditional DPA authorities, and I suggest to Members that we ought not to accept them without giving a good deal more examination to them than has been devoted so far.

For example, I do not believe that the House Banking Committee or the Congress really wants to be put in the position of micromanaging the Defense Department by having to make technical decisions about the relative merits and national security considerations of titanium versus beryllium versus other types of possible strategic materials and processes.

As Members know, the House has had under consideration for 2 years now amendments to title III of the Defense Production Act which would establish a much-needed program to revitalize the defense industrial base of our country for defense-related jobs. We have been unable to bring that bill to the floor this session for a number of reasons. I will not elaborate on all of them, but I would mention that the Supreme Court's legislative veto decision required both the Bank and Education and Labor Committees to revisit the bill in August and September.

With the Defense Production Act's authority having lapsed last Friday, we are now willing to put aside for now the much-needed program which the Banking Committee had recommended, and move for a simple 2-year extension of the Defense Production Act.

The fact is that the Defense Production Act must be extended. It contains authoriies which the DOD and other agencies utilize on a day-to-day basis in defense contracting and for programs to maintain the mobilization readiness of our industrial and material resources. We have kept this statute on the books for 33 years, and I believe we must continue it. But I do not believe we should give it a 5-year extension as the Senate has done. We have never done that before. We have always given the act no more than a 2-year extension, in order for Congress to review how those broad authorities are being applied. I do not think we should change that practice now.

One of the important jobs the Defense Department has, under the authority of the DPA, is to protect our defense industrial base against the potential cutoff of strategic minerals from unreliable foreign suppliers. Such cutoffs have occurred in the past. DOD is concerned, as are many congressional committees, that future turmoil in southern Africa could result in a paralyzing supply disruption of cobalt, chrome, platinum metals, and other critical materials upon which our national defense is dependent.

Under authority granted last year, DOD is now preparing a modest program to assess which of these metals can be produced domestically. With respect to cobalt, for example, I understand that DOD is proposing to spend between $2 and $5 million in the next fiscal year to test the quality of the domestic ore body and refining processes. DOD is further requiring that all environmental laws and regulations be met by applicants for the contracts. It is difficult for me to understand why anyone who really cares about national security would oppose some modest pilot work on domestic cobalt when our entire military jet-engine fleet is dependent upon this metal. It seems to me that a small pilot program of the kind suggested by DOD makes good sense, and it provides the Nation with an invaluable insurance policy. Similar pilot programs are being proposed for ball-bearing production, something called metallized glass chaff and other materials necessary to defense production. But I want to emphasize that to my knowledge no final decisions have been made for going ahead with any large-scale production program for any particular material.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that we want to subject the Congress to the kind of onerous and piecemeal inspection which the Senate amendments would very likely force on us. As the amendments are written, they would require the Congress to examine in detail individual actions which the executive agencies proposed to take under the title III authorities. that could involve taking individual proposed programs such as the ones I just described, in some cases very small ones, through all the steps of the legislative process—hearings, markup, floor consideration, perhaps conference. I do not believe we need or want this kind of minutiae.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the Senate-passed bill would attempt to deal with the legislative veto problem in a way which might well not be in accord with how the House wants to approach the problem. The Banking Committee staff has identified legislation veto provisions in the existing DPA statute, and we intend to deal with this issue in concert with an approach adopted by all of the other committees of the House, under the leadership of the Rules Committee.

The House is now in the process of examining how to resolve the issue raised by the Chada decision—we certainly do not want to shortcut this process at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of a simple 2-year extension of the Defense Production Act. That is what my amendment would do, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that this is a simple extension of the Defense Production Act. It has been in effect for 33 years and all that is involved here today is to extend it for a couple more years.

The fact of the matter is, that is not so simple. Let me say why. First of all, times change. Indeed, this act has been on the books since 1950 and it has been extended from time to time, but times changes.

In the last few years, there has been an effort here in the Congress that began, I guess in all fairness, with the rhetoric of the 1976 election campaign, when President Carter and others were talking about the need to constrain spending. So after much effort here in the Congress and elsewhere, there has been some progress made to constrain the growth of Federal spending; but the phenomenon that we have noticed during that same period of time is that as soon as we constrain Federal spending, we see that the creative applicants for Federal assistance have simply moved down the street to the lending window and the lending window is wide open. For it is just about as good to get a Federal loan or a loan guarantee or an interest subsidy or some sort of complicated buy-back or purchase agreement as it is to get a Federal grant, a Federal spending program.

As a matter of fact, it is just as good if you do not pay it back. We find in many instances that Federal loans and loan guarantees are not being paid back.

This entire problem is out of hand. Federal lending programs, such as we are discussing under title III here today, are growing faster now than Federal spending programs.

I always say that twice. Federal lending programs are growing faster than Federal spending programs.

Now, if we were working in the old environment back when we could spend and spend and take care of everybody that way, then perhaps I would not be so concerned about this; but times have changed and the matter is not as simple as people think it is any more.

So this is not a simple proposition; let me lay that aside right now.

The GAO has looked carefully at this whole business of the Defense Production Act. The GAO has said that we ought to renew title I, but the GAO has also said that title III, that title which contains all the loans and loan guarantees, is not needed at this particular time.

□ 1320

No major catastrophe or disaster is going to occur if we do not extend title III. That is really what we are here today to talk about—title III, the part that includes all of those loans and loan guarantees and credit assistance programs.

The point that we need to remember about the old Defense Production Act is that the authorities are so broad that the Defense Department or enterprising legislators could finance just about anything they wanted to through those authorities if they get an appropriation—all they have to do is conjure up some justification that seems to be related to the national security interest. And let me point out to you that we are not talking anymore about developing raw materials. GAO notices that we are talking now about including intermediate and processed materials. Just imagine all of the instances where some enterprising Member of this body or the other body could think up that the widget that is manufactured in his district by the Acme Widget Co. is somehow related to the national security because it goes into one of the tanks or whatever. And that is exactly what can happen under the broad authorities that are here.

I think it is time that we think seriously about putting some limitations on this old Defense Production Act, because the authorities are too broad. I can assure you right now that there is money already in the appropriation process that can be funneled in here and used under these authorities. God knows what it will be used for, but it could be done. I assure you when we get to the appropriations process on this particular matter, there will be an effort made to put money in there and no one right now can say exactly what it will be for. But I rather suspect it is going to be for those corporate interests who are wanting subsidies for their companies, even though there is no justification for it. The GAO has written that there is no justification for the nine proposed projects that DOD is thinking about. And I would like to read to the Members a paragraph from a GAO statement made by Kevin Boland, the Senior Associate Director, when he testified in the other body.

In general, we found that the projects do not adequately justify the national security benefits to be derived and/or the economic cost associated with the Federal subsidy. For six of the projects, a weakness in the defense industrial base had not been identified. Moreover, the cost effectiveness of title III compared to other mitigating funding alternatives was not adequately justified for any of the nine projects.

So, what you have here is a bunch of greedy corporate interests who want to be subsidized, who do not want to play in the free market anymore. They want to come in and get their corporate welfare handout through this old Defense Production Act. And that is precisely what is going to happen. And upon study and reflection, GAO has said no, there is no justification for this. And they found that there was no reason why they should be permitted to take advantage of this particular act.

Now, one other point of caution here is that we are not just talking these days about DOD. In the past, we have always looked at the Defense Production Act as if we were only talking about the Defense Department. And so, a case could be made that if we monitor their activities out there and force them to establish criteria that we can determine whether or not the projects that they are trying to push through here are justified and whether they make sense economically.

But now it is known that other agencies—not DOD—other agencies are going to try to come in and cash in on the Defense Production Act. Most notably, FEMA—Federal Emergency Management Agency—is going to try to come in and justify subsidies for the cobalt industry. Now here is the rub.

The Defense Department has established in-house criteria by which GAO and others can measure whether or not there is a justification for what it is they seek in the way of subsidies for these businesses. The other agencies have not.

This bill in the House needs criteria built into the law so that we can force those other agencies to make an economic justification. This bill needs oversight. And if we do not do these kinds of things, my friends, we are just going to leave the door open and we are not going to have any way to monitor and control what I predict will be the latest vehicle for the corporate welfare interests to come in and fill their pockets with more and more credit assistance programs.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BETHUNE. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. GREGG. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

If I understand what you are saying, what you are asking us to do as a body is to not pass this on the Suspension Calendar but to bring this back so we can have some sort of rule where we will have the possibility of amending the bill, to allow us to address essentially defense funding and control defense spending and waste within the Defense Department.

Mr. BETHUNE. That is precisely what I am saying. In fact, the distinguished gentleman from New York, who I admire and have worked with on a number of issues, said himself that the criteria that were built into the Senate bill need more examination before we here in this body swallow it hook, line, and sinker, that there have been some changes taking place.

I think if what they did in the U.S. Senate needs more examination, it seems to me only reasonable that what we would do here in the House would need more examination than we can give it on suspension.

I have some amendments to offer to this bill. Others have amendments to offer to this bill. And it seems only reasonable that we ought to have an opportunity to do that.

Mr. GREGG. If the gentleman would yield further, is it not logical that those of us who are concerned about the defense dollar, because we are getting a tremendous amount of expression of interest from the electorate that the defense dollar may not be getting the best buy for the dollars spent, those of us who want to see a strong defense but also efficiently spent dollars, should want to take a second look at the Defense Production Act so that we can evaluate whether or not the concerns which you are raising, which have been pointed out specifically by GAO, which is the questionable standards by which contracts are being approved, where there may not be critical material needs or they have not set up standards which qualify materials as critical, those standards would be reviewed and we, as a Congress, can get a little tighter control over the billions of dollars we are spending not only in the appropriating process direct payment for defense but also now through the back door, through the credit process.

Mr. BETHUNE. It seems only reasonable to me, and particularly since on a February 22, 1983, memo from the Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering:

DOD plans to request an additional $300 million authorization for fiscal year 1985 and reach a program sustaining level of $500 million annually beginning in fiscal 1986.

Now, to me, that is a lot of money. At least out in Arkansas it is a lot of money. We could almost run our whole State on that for 1 year.

What I am suggesting here is that this is being rushed through now on the suspension calendar, which is ordinarily reserved for noncontroversial matters. This bill is controversial in the House Banking Committee, House Armed Services Committee, House Appropriations Committee, Senate Banking, Armed Services, and Appropriations Committees.

I think the bill is not only substantively flawed for the reasons I have suggested, but I think the bill is procedurally flawed in that there are some legislative vetoes still in the 1950 act, and I do not know that those have been treated in any sensible way. We certainly should do that. So, I think we are rushing through here and being a little reckless and hasty with this particular bill.

Mr. GREGG. I just want to thank the gentleman for bringing this up. I think you clearly red-flagged this piece of legislation. You are not asking that we kill it outright. You are asking it just be taken off the Suspension Calendar so we, as a body, can address this issue of waste within the Defense Department and the specific GAO reports you are referring to. I think you have done us a service by bringing this up and noticing this to us. I would hope that the Members would join you in casting a vote to take this off the Suspension Calendar so we can get a consideration of it in the open House.

Mr. BETHUNE. I thank the gentleman.

I would say to all Members, those in the Chamber and others listening in, I did make the statement there is no justification, not adequate justification, for any of the nine projects which are on DOD's list. I made that statement, that was made in the other body by GAO. But I have in my hand the detail work that goes behind that which is classified "Secret." If Members wish to come by and pore over that to assure themselves that the projects that are on the table are simply not needed and will result in a ripoff to the taxpayer and corporate welfare, then I encourage them to come by and do so.

I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed 12 minutes.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California (Mr. SHUMWAY) and I ask if he will yield to me.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAFALCE. First of all, with respect to the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas and his opportunity to amend the bill, we went through a subcommittee process, we went through a full committee process, and there was more than ample opportunity for the gentleman, who is a member of both the subcommittee and the full committee, to offer whatever amendments he wished to at that time.

□ 1330

Second, the argument is advanced that we ought to have a bill on the floor that could be amended rather than on the Suspension Calendar.

We did have such a bill, H.R. 2782, a similar bill which was presented in the previous Congress. A quasi-filibuster was conducted against that bill, and the prospect of a quasi-filibuster against H.R. 2782 is what led myself and the distinguished ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California (Mr. SHUMWAY) to agree to proceed, not with a new bill, but with a simple 2-year extension.

I want to point out not only does the majority support this, but the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, Mr. SHUMWAY, the ranking minority member of the full committee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE), the Reagan administration, and the Armed Services Committee, both the majority and the minority.

It is a very very small minority, primarily one person, that is opposing a simple 2-year extension of a law that has been on the books for 33 years, and which this administration says is absolutely necessary to conduct the Nation's defense business.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the legislation before us which resolves the lengthy and sometimes controversial debate over the extension of the Defense Production Act by simply extending the act for 2 years, without amendment. As the House is undoubtedly aware, the DPA provides essential authorities for defense-related industrial readiness, and for other powers which might prove necessary in time of emergency.

While it is clear, in my view, that it is in the national interest that the DPA not expire, substantial controversy exists over the use of those title III authorities which provide for strategic materials projects. Many of us on the minority side, for instance, oppose H.R. 2782, legislation in the form of amendments to title III reported by the Banking Committee establishing an expensive new assistance program for small- and medium-sized businesses, and for skills training. At the same time, serious questions have been raised by the GAO, CBO, and others about the worthiness of DOD's $200 million title III strategic materials budget request for fiscal year 1984.

An additional question that has arisen in the context of the DOD budget request is whether or not the funding for projects pursuant to DPA title III must be specifically authorized. I have here two letters from Under Secretary of Defense Dick DeLauer. In his letter of June 9 to subcommittee Chairman LAFALCE, he asserted: "Since we are seeking an appropriation for purchase commitments of critical materials needed to support procurement of military weapons, we believe that 10 U.S.C. 138 requires a specific authorization prior to the appropriation of funds." However, in a letter dated September 27, DeLauer essentially reversed himself, stating that "we request * * * extension of existing title III authorities and appropriations of $200 million for title III in fiscal year 1984."

In view of the serious questions which now exist about the ways in which the Defense Department proposes to utilize title III of the DPA, as well as about the proper role of the Banking Committee in authorizing specific title III projects, the simple 2-year extension of the DPA proposed here seems an appropriate course of action. Adoption of this legislation will assure the continuation of the Defense Production Act itself, while allowing the Banking Committee to fully weigh the pros and cons of DOD's budget request, as well as the procedures for dealing with it, in a thorough fashion.

Although the gentleman from New York may not fully share my concern with this final point, I would also like to alert our colleagues on the Appropriations Committee that the appropriation of $50 million for DPA title III activities, as is now evidently being considered, seems quite premature in view of the problems described a moment ago. Until the Banking Committee—the committee with jurisdiction—has the opportunity to resolve the questions that now exist with regard to title III, I think it only makes sense that all such appropriations be deferred.

Mr. Speaker, the administration strongly supports S. 1852. I urge its adoption.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, People always remember history differently, I suppose. But when you are in the minority, you always remember what happens in the committee because that is where you get rolled, that is where they have the votes in their pockets. So it is always a very important time for us.

And the floor is a very important time for members of the minority party, because ony here can we break out of the mindsets and trappings that control those committees, break through the special interests and the lobbying forces of the mining interests, and the corporate interests, and everyone else who has their hand out, and who have got the pressure applied in the committee to work their will there. The floor is the only place where you can break out and have a good debate and a time to speak rationally to Members who are not bound by those trappings.

When this bill came through the subcommittee and through the full committee, the chairman of the full committee encouraged to let the bill go on out. I made a statement at that time, in the full committee that I would wait until we brought the bill to the floor, that I had some serious amendments and some good amendments.

So here we are, but we are here on suspension, and the gentleman from Arkansas cannot have his day in court, even though I have some good amendments that would prevent these handouts to the great corporate interests who are in such great need out there of assistance that they cannot find their way clear to do business without getting their hand in Uncle Sam's pocket.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 3 minutes to the distinguished ranking minority member of the full committee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE).

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation to extend the Defense Production Act for 2 years.

While I recognize that there are currently many complex issues pertaining to the DPA now pending before Congress, and that there exists a wide variety of opinion about how the Defense Production Act should most appropriately be utilized, the fact remains that we must move promptly to extend the act. In the absence of any consensus on possible amendments to the act itself, the simple extension before us seems the logical way to proceed.

If this legislation is adopted, the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs will then be in a position where necessary decisions on the Department of Defense's proposal for a $200 million strategic materials program can be made without the pressure of an expiring Defense Production Act complicating the situation.

Serious questions about DOD's budget requests pursuant to title III of the DPA do remain unanswered. In my view, however, the existence of such questions do not detract from the fact that the Defense Production Act itself must not be permitted to expire.

In this regard, it is my understanding that a lengthy lapse in the DPA would have a deleterious impact on the Defense Department's ability to procure and deploy needed components and weapons systems.

The administration strongly is in favor of the legislation before us today.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the chairman of the Economic Stabilization Subcommittee, my colleague from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) for his cooperation on this bill. He was not in favor of a 2-year extension at first. He has some amendments of his own to the Defense Production Act.

The administration would favor up to a 5-year extension, but the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) has seen fit to compromise, and I for one appreciate it.

I would also like to thank my friend from California (NORM SHUMWAY) for his leadership on this issue.

I urge support for the pending legislation, Mr. Speaker, and yield back the balance of whatever time I might have.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MCKINNEY).

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, for almost 3 years the Banking Committee has been attempting to develop a program to revitalize the Nation's defense industrial base through amendments to the Defense Production Act. In the last Congress we conducted extensive hearings and made a persuasive case for our legislation. However, the Defense Industrial Base Revitalization Act was unable to get through the House for a number of reasons, not the least of which was a strong opposition led by some of my good friends on the committee with help from OMB.

I believed in that legislation and continued to hope that we pass something similar in this Congress. Although the deterioration of the defense industrial base continues today, I do not think that Congress is ready to pass such a program this year or next.

But our hearings and research into that broad area and the authority and uses of the Defense Production Act of 1950, lead me to believe that the Banking Committee should review the way the authority under the DPA is implemented. The Economic Stabilization Subcommittee can use this extension period to examine and report to the full committee proposals for amending the act. However, I find it inconceivable that we should be asked to accept the proposed Senate amendments without first examining their impact.

My own impression is that the affect of the amendments in S. 1852 as passed by the other body would totally gut the DPA. In addition, the bill would create a bureaucratic nightmare with resulting production and construction delays and inevitable cost overruns. The existing congressional oversight procedures are far better than those in the Senate bill and I urge the House to support a simple extension of the act.

S. 1852 as amended by the House provides for an extension of the Defense Production Act authority to September 30, 1985. The Defense Production Act has been amended and extended by each Congress since 1950. It is basically a preparedness measure which provides the President authority to institute and maintain a number of programs intended to improve the readiness of the Nation's industrial base in the event of a national emergency. The act also is the authority for our national defense mobilization program.

The Defense Production Act as amended is the Nation's sole authority for national defense preparedness and the cornerstone of the legal structure for our national preparedness program. On these grounds alone it is essential to our Nation's security that this act be extended without interruption.

The extension will get us through the election period so that any future recommendations will be free, I hope, of political pressures. The DPA is too important to our national security to be made a pawn of partisan interests. I urge my colleagues to adopt S. 1852 with the House amendment in the interest of maintaining a stable and strong national defense program.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

I thank the Speaker.

There has been an interesting history to this effort to try to get money for those who are involved in some of the wealthiest, most lucrative businesses in this country. It began last year, you will remember when we had the debate about the Defense Industrial Base Revitalization Act. We all called it DIBRA in those days. Do you remember that one? They came here and said they were going to put $5 billion, $5 billion into that project. They based it on the old Defense Production Act and the facts are they could have leveraged that $5 billion to make $50 billion in loans, loan guarantees, credit assistance, purchase contracts, commitments and stuff like that.

We beat that down. The House said "no" to that; figured it all out; said that is a ripoff. We beat it down.

So then they came back this time with the Defense Production Act and the budget this year, the administration's budget, and I attacked the administration on this point, included $200 million. I noticed that in that budget. I said what is that $200 million in there for? I raised that question out in the subcommittee that the gentleman chairs. We discovered that $200 million was allegedly for several DOD interests not the least of which was the cobalt industry out in Idaho. And then when we got into it the hearing clearly showed that there was no justification for cobalt. So we started raising more questions.

Well now they are down to $50 million, but they are still coming. And if they get this $50 million they will be back for another $50. And as I read a little bit earlier, we had clearly a statement from the Defense Department saying they are looking for $500 million annually beginning in 1986. That is out-of-pocket money. If you leverage that and use it for interest subsidies and those kinds of things, you can multiply that by 10 in the impact that it has in the credit market. And we are all trying to find ways to keep the Government's encroachment in the credit market down. I suggest to you this is nothing more than the latest vehicle to try to reach into the pocket of the people by the big corporate interests.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO).

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this 2-year authorization of the DPA authority.

They are very important authorities and I hope the House today will go on record overwhelmingly in support of them.

Mr. Speaker, we in this bill have had points of controversy with regard to the authority for loan guarantees, for purchase agreements, and vocational education as well as for various types of science and technology grants to colleges and universities.

That part of the bill has been removed because it was controversial.

The DOD requested some $200 million for fiscal year 1984, however this 2-year extension provides more of that request.

What the Department of Defense asked for in 1984 had nothing to do with cobalt incidentally. On the merit of DOD proposals some should be authorized for appropriation. These are evaluated as follows:

Noise quiet bearings: DOD is currently dependent on Japan where there are questions raised about the legitimacy of this export of military-related material.

These bearings are essential to our SSBN and SSN submarine forces. The first being the most survivable leg of the triad and the second is essential for the control of the seas which link the alliance.

At a time when the threat is increasing both qualitatively and quantitatively, we must be prepared to enhance both elements of our submarine force. Currently, noise quiet bearings production capacity is a bottleneck which inhibits increases in submarine procurement and also has a deleterious effect on the in-service rate of our submarines. The Department of Defense asked up to $20 million. The House should recommend up to $20 million.

Metallic coated glass chaff: One lesson of the Falklands is that the British force used more than the current yearly production of this vital item which protects aircraft against radar homing missiles. The great density of the Soviet antiair threat in Europe, the Middle East, and elsewhere makes this item essential to our national security. Current production capability bears no relation to wartime requirements. The DOD asked up to $15 million. The House should recommend up to $15 million.

Traveling wave tubes (TWT): These are used for jamming in electronic warfare. Physical performance of weapons systems has reached a plateau. Thus, electronic warfare is of increased importance. At present, money is wasted by overly short production runs. The DOD plan is to accelerate the buy, essentially providing a rolling inventory which will be available until a new generation of jammers—and increased demand—is required in the late 1980's. The program is a multiyear program, thus full funding is not needed in fiscal year 1984. The DOD asked up to $50 million. The House should recommend up to $25 million.

The total of the above recommendation is up to $60 million. Since these are maximum figures, the House should impose a limit of $50 million overall.

Some of the Department of Defense requests should be denied without prejudice until better data is supplied; these being:

Polyacrylonitrile (PAN): DOD makes a case for the need for PAN production expansion but the real need is 4 or 5 years away. Additionally, a food additive petition is before FDA regarding the use of PAN in soft drink bottles. If approved, this use of PAN would result in a vastly increased domestic production capability. DOD has not responded to queries as to the compatibility of food grade and aircraft grade PAN. DOD should explore the question of domestic PAN production with those companies which have submitted food additive petitions. DOD asked for $25 million.

Optical glass: Need has not been justified by DOD. DOD asked for $50 million.

Ammonium perchlorate: DOD admits that the expansion of this production can be achieved through means other than title III. DOD asked for $20 million.

Beryllium metal: DOD bases its case on old data. The case for beryllium is not urgent. Problems with the inertial upper stage (IUS) mean that the Peacekeeper system will not be fully capable until 1988–89. Thus, delays are acceptable. Also, the C–5B will use carbon brakes and the F–14D specification can be altered to eliminate beryllium. The F–16F/F–15E have been proposed as zero by the House Appropriations Committee staff.

Given the high civilian use of beryllium, remaining urgent problems can be solved through use of title I until the fiscal year 1985 request passes Congress. DOD asked $70 million.

It should be noted that depleted uranium and cobalt were in the 1983 reprograming money. According to a briefing by Richard Donnelly, Director Industrial Resources OUSD(R&E), the 1983 money for these programs has not been expended. Thus, there is no need for 1984 authorizations. In fact, I am told that the cobalt program is to be terminated by DOD. The specter of cobalt should therefore be laid to rest once and for all.

The next step was the removal of the uncontroversial, noncontroversial amendments, of course which were near and dear to my heart, in an effort to try to satisfy the concerns of critics because the basic concern was that the legislative clock had run out in terms of this DPA act. It has happened. The terms of the DPA authorities are very important.

There are many among us who feel deeply about the controversial and some of the noncontroversial amendments that we have worked and labored on in the Banking Committee with respect to DPA.

The fact of the matter is the arguments that are being presented in opposition to this bill today really are irrelevant because they are really tilting at windmills, they have won their battle with regard to the proposed amendments with regard to the new authorization. I hope we could come back and deal with these proposed changes and argue those particular points, both the noncontroversial and controversial points, but I really think it is inappropriate at this time to try to knock down the simple extension of the DPA act on that basis.

So I want to alert my colleagues to this.

Indeed, the authorities under the DPA have been important historically in terms of trying to maintain our defense industrial base. I think those authorities are important in the future; the authorities for instance to develop a master urgency list for vital and critical materials, to give them some sort of priority on that basis. But really the loan authority, the money authority, the other concerns that have been raised here, are simply not present in this extension.

Now some would rather open it up and have a full debate. But I think the lapsing of the act, the lapsing of the authority would do far more damage than any good that might come form that debate.

I hope at a later date we can readdress the authority and the other amendments to this act that we have all worked on.

I want to show my colleagues, whatever the intention is with regard to cobalt, there is a whole list of priorities with regard to what the needs are, what the DPA was or should be seeking to do.

I hope that some day we can have this important debate. But really that is misleading today. It does a disservice to this House. Certainly the authority that we have under DPA is critical legislation, to keep this functioning. There has not been time in the House to consider the more extensive amendments that have been suggested.

Interestingly enough, many of the concerns that are now coming to fruition, whether it is environmental concerns and other areas, were not even raised in the subcommittee with regard to this particular act. So I think that really they do a disservice to the process to begin to raise these issues at this point.

I think it is not a red flag that is being raised Mr. Chairman, it is rather a red herring.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) has 4 minutes left and the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. BETHUNE) has 4 minutes left.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Just very quickly I want to point out that the argument here relies on a supposed need to bolster our national defense and national security. I, as a pro-defense Republican have gotten out on the line and tried to support the defense package, but when I notice who is involved in this one on the other side beating the drums saying we need this for defense I take it with a grain of salt. I am always a little suspicious as to whether it is really going to go for defense and national security or whether this it is going to go someplace else? That is an interesting question that I have.

On the environmental concerns there is a reason why there has been no elaborate discussion on that point. Whoever heard of the Committee on Banking and Currency caring about environmental concerns; whoever heard of the lobbyists who come to the Banking Committee caring about environmental concerns? But I guarantee you, when you get to the floor, those kinds of things have to be answered. And there are some people that are genuinely concerned about these mines that are going to be dug with Government money and what they are going to do to some of the environmental projects that are underway.

I will guarantee you that they are interested. And you can look at the letters they are circulating to the Members right now if you think they are not interested.

On title III, listen to what GAO says:

> Based on our current evaluation we believe that the loss of title III would not have an immediate impact on existing DOD programs.

In other words, you can forget the whole of title III because if it lapses it would not have any sort of impact.

□ 1350

What impact the lapse of title III will have is that it would get rid of this authority that they are going to start using to reach into the taxpayers' pocket.

And on the criteria, I think it is important that we try to narrow down and give some criteria so that we can judge whether or not FEMA and these other agencies, who are going to be serving these special interests and reaching into our pocket, have got some sort of economic justification.

We need that criteria in the law and we need oversight, because as I pointed out earlier, there are two legislative vetoes in this bill that we want to reenact which have been killed by the decision of the Supreme Court in INS versus Chadha, the decision which said that we cannot have the legislative vetoes.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to reserve the remaining 4 minutes to myself for conclusion. Therefore, I leave it up to the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. BETHUNE) to complete his remarks.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago in the heat of debate, I said that there was $200 million all for cobalt. We never could tell just exactly what they were going to use that money for when they came before the subcommittee. It was like trying to catch flies to get the DOD to try to tell us just exactly what they were going to use that money for.

But what we did discern is that they were going to use it in part for cobalt, which is not necessary according to the reports that I have and there is no justification for it. And we also learned that they had eight other projects they were interested in and GAO said there was no need for that.

So, I believe the point comes down to this. This bill is too broad, it is obviously controversial. We can see the arguments being made here on the floor and it has no business on the Suspension Calendar. It is not going to hurt if we let title III lapse. Somebody said we cannot let this bill lapse. It has lapsed. It lapsed a couple of days ago and the earth did not stop turning and the building did not cave in. It has lapsed before. So far as title II, is concerned GAO says it does not make any difference if we do not enact it for some time to come.

Title I we need to renew. But title III needs work because I will tell my colleagues it is the very vehicle which is going to be used by those corporate interests who managed to get themselves in a position to get them a champion here in the Congress to go out and try to get a subsidy for their particular business.

I urge Members to defeat it on suspension, give us an opportunity to put the kind of criteria and restrictions that the U.S. Senate put in their bill and that we are throwing out here in the interest of just doing something simple and that is reenacting the 1950 law.

It is not a simple proposition. Times have changed and if we do not do something now, here, right here in this place to fight on every front, to control these kinds of subsidies that are going through the lending window, we are going to be in big trouble and we are going to have a big headache. Because it is not the little people out there that are getting these subsidies today, it is the big fat-cat corporate interests, I will assure the Members of that.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, let me try to put this debate in some perspective.

We are dealing with the Defense Production Act, a law that was passed some 33 years ago. It was suggested by President Truman; it was adopted at that time as necessary to deal with defense production during the Korean war. There were seven titles to that act.

In the 1950's, four of those titles expired and have never been reauthorized. They included titles dealing with wage and price controls, labor dispute authority, credit allocation, and so forth. We are not talking about that now at all.

Three of the titles of the 1950 law have continued from 1950 to the present day, for 33 years. They have never existed for more than a 2-year period of time. They have been reauthorized every 2 years, never for more than a 2-year period of time.

Those titles have been reauthorized by Democratic Congresses and Republican Congresses. Authority for reenactment has been sought by Democratic Presidents and Republican Presidents.

Earlier this year, March 30, 1983, the Defense Production Act expired. There was a debate as to whether or not we should beef it up, make it stronger. I wanted to beef it up. And some said, "Oh, we should certainly not do that. Let's cut back its authority." And we could not resolve it. We were at impasse.

And I hope that reasonable men could get together and resolve the differences between March and September 30. So we extended the act until September 30. But, there could be no meeting of the minds between March 30 and September 30. As a matter of fact, it seemed as if individuals became even more entrenched in their positions.

We had another impasse. And I did not want to see the Defense Production Act expire. And I went to the distinguished ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California (Mr. SHUMWAY) and I did not like what he had decided, and he did not like what we had decided to do, because we were coming at it from different directions. I wanted to add to the President's authority under the DPA. He wanted to take back a little bit of that authority. But we said, let us work with the administration and let us just give them a simple 2-year extension, no add-ons, no subtractions. And then we will work on the DPA after that, but we will not let it lapse.

And that is what we are doing today. We are putting our differences behind us so that the authorities that the administration needs under the Defense Production Act, to determine priorities of contracts, to engage in demonstration programs and not just for cobalt at all, but for noiseless ball bearings, for metalized glass shaper, for metallic beryllium, for traveling wave tubes, et cetera, et cetera, can be carried out so that the defense of this Nation can be insured.

Now, at the very last minute, and I mean today, and all sorts of red herrings have been brought up. Oh, this concern with the bill, that concern with the bill. For 33 years the law has been in existence and I have not heard one environmental concern, for example, for the entire past year until today. Clearly, they are red herrings, clearly. The majority and the minority are in support of this bill except for a handful of dissenting voices. The administration is in support of this bill, not only DOD, but OMB and FEMA—I got a phone call today from the head of FEMA, Mr. Giuffrida, he said:

> We have got to have this bill, we have got to have it right away. It lapsed on Friday, we cannot continue to operate. Please get it passed today.

On behalf of the defense production of the United States, let us simply extend the Defense Production Act an additional 2 years, no adds-ons, no subtractions.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support a 2-year extension of the Defense Production Act. I also favor the prudent use of title III authorities to develop the Nation's ability to respond to an interruption of supplies of strategic minerals.

For several years, the Interior Committee has expressed concern about the U.S. economy in the event South Africa, Zaire, or other suppliers should prove unreliable. And, I think prudent analysts look upon the political situation in southern Africa as troubling.

We need to assess our own domestic supplies of cobalt, chrome, and other crucial minerals, and to get at them in an environmentally sound manner. The title III pilot plant program designed by the Defense Department is a reasonable, prudent investment—a good insurance policy for the Nation.

We finally have initiated action to secure our strategic minerals supplies. Without positive action on our part, this whole effort could come to a halt placing our economy in real jeopardy.

I urge my colleagues to support the DPA extension.

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise because I must reluctantly oppose the consideration under suspension of the rules of S. 1852, providing for an extension of the Defense Production Act.

Clearly, it is necessary to provide for an extension of this act in order to insure that critical defense capabilities are maintained. Nevertheless, any extension of the Defense Production Act must be done in a manner which will not encourage spending on projects of possibly dubious economic and military value.

The other body approved an extension of the Defense Production Act with amendments requiring specific congressional authorization for Defense Department actions under title III. We are being asked today to consider a straight 2-year reauthorization of the Defense Production Act, without any opportunity to consider the amendments of the other body or any variation of those amendments. I am opposing consideration of this legislation under suspension of the rules because I believe these amendments merit careful consideration. Congress should have the opportunity to review any Defense Department proposals to subsidize defense contractors in order to avoid opening the door to excessive and wasteful defense spending.

The title III authorities of the Defense Production Act have not been used in any significant manner since the Vietnam war. This year, the Defense Department has expresed renewed interest in exercising its authorities under title III. Serious concerns have been raised about whether the Defense Department should have the broad authority currently granted to it under the Defense Production Act, or whether it would not be more prudent to require congressional authorization for specific projects.

If the Defense Production Act is reauthorized for 2 years with the current broad authority intact, a variety of programs could be initiated before Congress has an opportunity to review this act again. I believe if we are going to provide a 2-year authorization, we should require the Defense Department to justify its specific proposals before Congress in order to insure that any spending under this act is truly essential.

Concerns have been raised that certain proposals under the Defense Production Act could have severe environmental impacts. In addition, some projects that will be low budget initially could prove to be exceedingly costly in the outyears. Without a guarantee that Congress will have an opportunity to review these programs throughly, we could pave the way to wasteful and unnecessary spending.

As one who supports a strong national defense, I believe we must insure that every defense dollar is spent for programs that will truly enhance our national security. We must be certain that we are not paying unnecessary subsidies for products that could be obtained more cheaply through other means.

I urge my colleagues to defeat this measure as a suspension so that it can be brought to the floor in a form permitting consideration of the amendments of the other body.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) that the House suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill, S. 1852, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

The point of no quorum is considered withdrawn.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS), chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SELF-GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H.R. 3932), to amend the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 3932

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 303(b) of the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b) An amendment to the charter ratified by the registered qualified electors shall take effect upon the expiration of the thirty-five-calendar-day period (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, holidays, and days on which either House of Congress is not in session) following the date such amendment was submitted to the Congress, or upon the date prescribed by such amendment, whichever is later, unless, during such thirty-five-day period, there has been enacted into law a joint resolution, in accordance with the procedures specified in section 604 of this Act, disapproving such amendment. In any case in which any such joint resolution disapproving such an amendment has, within such thirty-five-day period, passed both Houses of Congress and has been transmitted to the President, such resolution, upon becoming law subsequent to the expiration of such thirty-five-day period, shall be deemed to have repealed such amendment, as of the date such resolution becomes law.".

(b)(1) The second sentence of section 412(a) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "Except as provided in the last sentence of this subsection, the Council shall use acts for all legislative purposes.".

(2) The last sentence of section 412(a) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "Resolutions shall be used (1) to express simple determinations, decisions, or directions of the Council of a special or temporary character; and (2) to approve or disapprove, when specifically authorized by act, proposed actions designed to implement an act of the Council.".

(c) The second sentence of section 602(c)(1) of such Act is amended to read as follows: "Except as provided in paragraph (2), such act shall take effect upon the expiration of the 30-calendar-day period (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, and any day on which neither House is in session because of an adjournment sine die, a recess of more than 3 days, or an adjournment of more than 3 days) beginning on the day such act is transmitted by the Chairman to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, or upon the date prescribed by such act, whichever is later, unless, during such 30-day period, there has been enacted into law a joint resolution disapproving such act. In any case in which any such joint resolution disapproving such an act has, within such 30-day period, passed both Houses of Congress and has been transmitted to the President, such resolution, upon becoming law subsequent to the expiration of such 30-day period, shall be deemed to have repealed such act, as of the date such resolution becomes law.".

(d) The third sentence of section 602(c)(1) of such Act is amended by deleting "concurrent" and inserting in lieu thereof "joint".

(e) The first sentence of section 602(c)(2) of such Act is amended by deleting "only if during such 30-day period one House of Congress does not adopt a resolution disapproving such act." And inserting in lieu thereof "unless, during such 30-day period, there has been enacted into law a joint resolution disapproving such act. In any case in which any such joint resolution disapproving such an act has, within such 30-day period, passed both Houses of Congress and has been transmitted to the President, such resolution, upon becoming law subsequent to the expiration of such 30-day period, shall be deemed to have repealed such act, as of the date such resolution becomes law."

(f) The second sentence of section 602(c)(2) is amended to read as follows: "The provisions of section 604, relating to an expedited procedure for consideration of joint resolutions, shall apply to a joint resolution disapproving such act as specified in this paragraph.".

(g) Section 604(b) of such Act is amended by deleting "concurrent" and inserting in lieu thereof "joint".

(h) Subsections (b) and (c) of section 740 of such Act are amended by deleting in each subsection the words "resolution by either the Senate or the House of Representatives" and inserting in lieu thereof "joint resolution by the Congress".

(i) Section 740(d) of such Act is amended by deleting "concurrent" and inserting in lieu thereof "joint".

(j) The amendments made by this section shall not be applicable with respect to any law, which was passed by the Council of the District of Columbia prior to the date of the enactment of the Act, and such laws are hereby deemed valid, in accordance with the provisions thereof, notwithstanding such amendments.

SEC. 2. Part F of title VII of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEVERABILITY

"SEC. 762. If any particular provision of this Act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of this Act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.".

SEC. 3. Section 164(a)(3) of the District of Columbia Retirement Reform Act is repealed.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, beginning on line 18, strike subsection (b) and renumber the succeeding sections accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 5, beginning on line 17, strike Section 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3. Section 164(a)(3) of the District of Columbia Retirement Reform Act is amendment to read as follows:

"(3)(A) The Congress may reject any filing under this section within thirty days of such filing by enacting a joint resolution stating that the Congress has determined—

"(i) that such filing is incomplete for purposes of this part; or

"(ii) that there is any material qualification by an accountant or actuary contained in an opinion submitted pursuant to section 162(a)(3)(A) or section 162(a)(4)(B).

"(B) If the Congress rejects a filing under subparagraph (A) and if either a revised filing is not submitted within forty-five days after the enactment under subparagraph (A) rejecting the initial filing or such revised filing is rejected by the Congress by enactment of a joint resolution within thirty days after submission of the revised filing, then the Congress may, if it deems it in the best interests of the participants, take any one or more of the following actions:

"(i) Retain an independent qualified public accountant on behalf of the participants to perform an audit.

"(ii) Retain an enrolled actuary on behalf of the participants to prepare an actuarial statement.

The Board and the Mayor shall permit any accountant or actuary so retained to inspect whatever books and records of the Fund and the retirement program are necessary for performing such audit or preparing such statement.

"(C) If a revised filing is rejected under subparagraph (B) or if a filing required under this title is not made by the date specified, no funds appropriated for the Fund with respect to which such filing was required as part of the Federal payment may be paid to the Fund until such time as an acceptable filing is made. For purposes of this subparagraph, a filing is unacceptable if, within thirty days of its submission, the Congress enacts a joint resolution disapproving such filing.".

Mr. DELLUMS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, this bill corrects a defect in the Home Rule Act that puts a cloud over the ability of the city to go to the bond market to sell its bonds. The cloud to which I refer, Mr. Speaker, is created by the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the so-called Chadha case insofar as that decision relates to the District of Columbia.

The Chadha case, more formally, is referred to as the Immigration and Naturalization Services against Chadha.

Mr. Speaker, with that brief explanation, I would indicate that the distinguished gentleman from the District of Columbia (Mr. FAUNTROY), who chairs the subcommittee of jurisdiction, will give a more lengthy presentation.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3932, a bill that seeks to remove the cloud created by the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the Chadha case insofar as that decision relates to the District of Columbia.

That case, more formally styled as Immigration and Naturalization Service against Chadha, and related cases, is causing a dramatic change in the way the executive and legislative branches of the Federal Government relate to each other. Chadha held that congressional veto provisions embodied in several Federal statutes were unconstitutional. More specifically, the Court held that legislative action which has the effect of altering the legal rights, duties, and relations of persons outside the legislative branch must be embodied in actions of both Houses of Congress, then presented to the President for approval or disapproval. The Court further held that the invalid congressional veto provisions were severable and stuck only those parts of the statutes which contained them.

The D.C. Home Rule Act in several places contains provisions for congressional veto of acts of the District of Columbia Government. According to many experts, these provisions fail the constitutional test set down in Chadha. For example, the legislative veto provisions of the Home Rule Act were listed in Justice White's dissent in the Chadha case. Justice White, listed 56 acts of Congress which would be invalidated by the Court's decision. The legislative veto provisions of the Home Rule Act were also included in a more comprehensive list of 207 congressional veto provisions which the U.S. Department of Justice submitted to the Congress as failing the test for constitutionality as found in the Chadha decision. And the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress in special report issued July 5, 1983, concluded that the legislative veto provisions of the Home Rule Act were suspect under Chadha.

It is the considered opinion of the D.C. Committee, in consultation with the District Government, that corrective legislation is the best way to excise the District of Columbia Home Rule Act from the taint of Chadha.

The Chadha case was decided by the U.S. Supreme Court on June 23, 1983. Shortly after the decision, Members of the D.C. Committee met at an informal roundtable meeting with the Mayor of the District and the Chairman of the District of Columbia Council, along with several local Home Rule Act and constitutional experts, and staff from the Senate. Following the roundtable meeting, subsequent working meetings were held. The bill, H.R. 3932, was drafted as a result of those meetings and was introduced on September 20, 1983. An identical bill, S. 1858, was introduced in the Senate on the same day.

H.R. 3932 is a straightforward, nonsubstantive proposal containing technical amendments to the District of Columbia Home Rule Act, designed to conform to the mandates of Chadha. It does not eliminate congressional oversight of District-passed legislation. It does not reduce the time for congressional review. Indeed, with Presidential involvement, it has the potential of increasing the time of congressional review. Moreover, it does not change the manner in which the District of Columbia Committee functions in the event the Congress chooses to involve itself in acts of the D.C. Government.

It is, however, urgently needed. The District has been working diligently to get itself into the municipal bond market with a reasonable bond rating. In the wake of Chadah, the District has been unable to secure an "unqualified" legal opinion from bond counsel. The absence of an unqualified legal opinion would render any bond issue the District sought to make effectively unmarketable—no one would buy the bonds. The District has Housing Finance Agency bonds ready to go and will shortly be prepared to go to the market with other types of bonds. If our goal of terminating expensive borrowing by the District from the Federal Treasury is to be achieved, we must act to clean up the Chadha problem.

Mr. Speaker, the basic thrust of H.R. 3932 is simple. In each instance in the D.C. Home Rule Act where a legislative veto is allowed, it is stricken, and in its place is inserted the requirement for "joint resolution." The import of this change is that in order for the Congress to reject an act of the District of Columbia Council, both Houses of Congress must affirmatively act by joint resolution, and the joint resolution must be presented to the President.

So, at section 303(b) of the Home Rule Act, the requirement that District Charter amendment proposals be approved by concurrent resolution of the Congress under H.R. 3932, is changed to a requirement of joint resolution. At section 602(c)(1), the provision allowing for congressional rejection of D.C. Council acts by concurrent resolution is changed to require joint resolution. At section 602(c)(2), the provision allowing for one-House veto of criminal acts of the D.C. Council is changed to require a joint resolution to reject such acts. Section 740, which allows the President of the United States, in emergency conditions, to direct the Mayor to allow the use of the D.C. Metropolitan Police Force is changed in H.R. 3932 by requiring a joint resolution by Congress to terminate such use of the police rather than a simple resolution. And section 164(a)(3) of the D.C. Retirement Reform Act which allows the Congress to reject a report of the Retirement Board by simple resolution, is changed to joint resolution.

H.R. 3932 makes laws passed by the D.C. Council prior to its enactment valid and adds a new section to the Home Rule Act, section 762, which contains a severability provision. There are also certain other technical and conforming amendments.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does not go as far as I would like it to go. Repeal of the congressional review period altogether would have been a preferred approach. It is, however, a proposal that has widespread support, and it does cure the potential problems raised by Chadha with respect to District legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the House to support H.R. 3932, an urgent matter for the District of Columbia—a bill which does not impede or impair congressional oversight of D.C. Government action.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the chairman of the committee and the Delegate from the city of Washington for facing up to an issue which all of us are going to have to face up to on almost every piece of legislation in this Congress. I must say, within the confines of the District of Columbia, I find that the Constitution is rather clear but we, as members of this committee, often come in front of the Congress and usually I come to explain a bill passed by the District of Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, more often than not, when this Member has come to the floor to explain a bill dealing with the District of Columbia, my statements have included the word "unique." Normally, I use that term to describe the situation in which the city finds itself with respect to Congress. Today, however, I use the word unique to characterize the situation in which Congress and the Committee on the District of Columbia find itself, and to explain the urgency connected with H.R. 3932.

This bill seeks to address the problems created by the Supreme Court decision dealing with the process of congressional veto. I am not a lawyer, and therefore may be at a slight disadvantage in discussing the question of whether or not the Court decision should apply to dealings between Congress and the District of Columbia government. Yet even this non-lawyer recognizes the problem created by the fact that the Supreme Court made specific reference to portions of the Home Rule Act and the D.C. Retirement Reform Act in its decision.

I do not feel the intent of this legislation is to affirm the Court's decision, and thereby concede that the process Congress has utilized for the past 10 years is improper. I do not believe it is. It is this Member's position that the Court decision has created an uncertainty in the process of self-government, and something must be done very soon to avoid a virtual halt in the local legislative process. It is for that reason that I express by strong support for expeditious consideration and approval of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, despite what some may say to the contrary, the District of Columbia government is facing and dealing with the full array of problems that beset any municipality, and it is doing so on a daily basis. When the remedy to any of these problems involves legislation enacted by the Council, the implementation must be postponed while the proposal undergoes the congressional review period. Since the Supreme Court decision calls into question the very process of congressional review, any local act which is approved or rejected by the existing process could be the subject of litigation. That is a situation which cannot be allowed to continue any longer than necessary, because it results in absolute chaos within the District's business. Everything from a routine alley closing to changes required to bring local law into compliance with Federal laws and regulations is in jeopardy, not because of its purpose or content, but because of the process by which it is permitted to take effect.

The bill before us seeks to solve this dilemma, and it does so in the most straightforward manner possible. Quite simply, in each instance where Congress has given itself the authority to approve or disapprove local actions by a simple or concurrent resolution, the requirement for a joint resolution has been substituted. That is all that H.R. 3932, as reported, seeks to do, and it is the opinion of the legal experts involved that it does so in a manner which resolves the objections to congressional veto raised by the Court.

The bill as reported includes two committee amendments. As a result of these amendments, the bill covers only those portions of the Home Rule Act and the D.C. Retirement Reform Act referenced by the Court, and it handles all of those provisions in absolutely identical fashion.

Section 1 of the bill addresses itself to the sections of the Home Rule Act (Public Law 93-198, as amended) which make provisions for congressional approval or disapproval of local actions. In each such reference, the requirement for simple or concurrent resolutions in replaced with a requirement for a joint resolution. Language is added to each section so amended which explains what happens if the Congress has approved a joint resolution within the time period specified, and if the President has not signed the resolution into law until after that time period has expired. Simply put, should that ever happen, the local law is deemed to be repealed as of the date such resolution becomes law. These changes are made in the sections of the Home Rule Act dealing with the approval of Charter amendments; the approval of routine local legislation; the approval of local legislation dealing with the Criminal Code; approval of emergency use of local police by the President beyond 30 days; and the procedures by which Congress considers such resolutions. The final provision of section 1 has the dual purpose of providing an effective date for the new procedures contained in the bill, and validating local laws which have already undergone review under the old procedures.

Section 2 of the bill simply adds a standard severability clause to the Home Rule Act.

And finally, section 3 of the bill amends the section of the D.C. Retirement Reform Act which permits Congress to reject the annual report of the D.C. Retirement Board if it is found to be deficient. Such action will now require a joint resolution rather than a simple resolution.

I would additionally note that proposals to shorten the length of the congressional review period, or to remove the ability of one Member to discharge this committee, while enjoying the support of some Members, are absent from this bill. While such amendments might logically have been included, the importance of the overriding problem we are facing today has precluded any attempts to go beyond the minimum changes required.

Mr. Speaker, the amendments made by this bill will insure that the manner in which Congress reviews and acts upon local legislative proposals will not be called into question. It goes no further than that which is absolutely necessary to achieve that goal. And if approved, it will remove the possibility of calling into question the legality of every past and future action of the District of Columbia government. For these reasons, the bill deserves support, and I urge its passage.

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, for a decade now, the District of Columbia has enjoyed home rule as a result of the Home Rule Act of 1973. I believe that the Congress showed extreme constitutional permissiveness in granting to the D.C. Council the authority to draft tentative legislation which would become law unless disapproved by Congress within 30 legislative days. By not disapproving a piece of legislation presented by the Council, Congress gives its tacit approval of that legislation.

Now, however, there is a bill being considered that is meant to protect the city's home rule from possible court challenges which could arise from the Supreme Court's recent Chadha ruling, which declares legislative vetoes unconstitutional. Supporters of H.R. 3932 claim that this bill is necessary in order to safeguard home rule, but I believe that there are two points which are being ignored: First, congressional disapproval of tentative legislation presented by the Council is not a legislative veto; it is nothing more than a "simple and concurrent" resolution. Proponents of H.R. 3932 who claim that the authority of such disapproval could be challenged by the courts neglect to mention this fact. They have attempted to gain support for the bill by formenting unfounded and precipitated fears about potential disputes arising over the constitutionality of congressional disapproval when, in reality, resolutions of disapproval and vetoes are not even the same thing. Until this difference is clearly delineated, debate on this matter is destined to be both irrelevant and confusing.

Second, I would like to point out that not only is H.R. 3932 unnecessary to protect the Home Rule Act from judicial intervention, it also unduly strengthens home rule. By amending the current requirement of a simple and concurrent resolution for disapproval to a joint resolution, we are in effect positing greatly increased power in the hands of the D.C. Council. Whereas now a majority of only one House is needed to disapprove District bills, H.R. 3932 would make disapproval much more difficult and irksome by requiring a majority of both Houses as well as Presidential consent.

Therefore, I not only see no need for H.R. 3932, but I also find it somewhat alarming because of its effect on the D.C. Council's influence and strength.

The following letters from the Federation of Citizens Associations of the District of Columbia clarify these points.

FEDERATION OF CITIZENS ASSOCIATIONS
OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D.C., October 3, 1983.

Representative PHILIP CRANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

We are writing you urgently to express our opposition, under instructions of the Executive Board of our Federation, to the amendments included in H.R. 3932.

Our Federation opposes them because they incorrectly claim that the Supreme Court Decision in the Chadha case forbidding legislative vetoes of Executive Department actions also renders the present Home Rule Act unconstitutional.

As D.C. Council Chairman David A. Clarke conceded in his prepared testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Governmental Efficiency and the District of Columbia, this is not true.

Under the present Home Rule Act Congress is not vetoing any Executive Branch act. It is merely carrying out is own constitutional duties under the Constitution's requirement for bicameral action. Under the rule, no legislation takes place unless and until each House has passed the identical Bill.

The Congress went to the utter limits of Constitutional permissiveness in granting the D.C. Council, its creature, the right on behalf of each House to draft tentative legislation which would become in effect Congressional provided that, after an elapse of thirty legislative days, the Congress gave its tacit consentive, in as much as neither House disapproved. Thus, there is no legislative veto involved since no legislation exists, the legislative process itself is incomplete until Congress has given its tacit approval, through inaction, or arrests the legislative process by an explicit disapproval.

We believe, moreover, that these amendments are themselves unconstitutional, giving the President a role, a right, to intervene unconstitutionally in the constitutional prerogatives of each House. Moreover, as you yourself must be keenly aware, recalling the House of Representative's disapproval of the 1980 Sex Reform Act, found repehensible to the overwhelming number of members of Congress, such a disapproval would be rendered impossible under these amendments. Moreover, the wise and timely interventions of members of the House in attempts of the Mayor to deny funds to D.C. retirement programs for firemen, police, teachers and judges would also become extremely difficult, if not impossible.

We beseech you to call these facts to the attention of the members of the House of Representatives.

For the Federation:

STEPHEN A. KOCZAK,
President.

J. GEORGE FRAIN,
First Vice President.

FEDERATION OF CITIZENS ASSOCIATIONS
OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D.C., September 26, 1983.

To Senators Charles McC. Mathias, Thomas Eagleton, and Members of Senate Government Operations Committee; Representatives Ronald V. Dellums, Walter E. Fauntroy, Stewart B. McKinney, and Members of Committee on the District of Columbia:

DEAR SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES: Under instructions of the Executive Board of the Federation of Citizens Associations of the District of Columbia, representing 23 citizens associations throughout the District, we transmit herewith the Federation's opposition to S. 1858 and H.R. 3932, companion Bills amending the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act.

The Federation considers both of these Bills to be unconstitutional, in clear and patent violation of Article I, Section 8, subsection 17 of the U.S. Constitution.

The alleged reason for the introduction of these Bills is the Supreme Court decision, in Immigration and Naturalization Service versus Chadha, No. 80-1832 (June 23, 1983) holding unconstitutional the provision in the Immigration and Nationality Act by which one House of Congress could disapprove of the action of the Attorney General. The Court's decision was based on Article I, Section 7, Subsection 2 requiring bicameral action of the Congress.

On the inaccurate interpretation of this Supreme Court decision, Senators Mathias/Eagleton and Delegate Fauntroy introduced these Bills to overcome what they construe to be a "legislative veto" in "The Home Rule Act", P.L. Law 93-198, 87 Stat. 774.

There is one feature of the "Home Rule Act" which might render it unconstitutional. This is Title VI, Section 602(c)(1) which requires both Houses to disapprove of acts of D.C. Council. This requirement for action by both Houses is in violation of Article I, Section 8, Subsection 17 of the Constitution, in as much as no legislation is valid unless it comports with the right of either House to act.

When acting under the Home Rule Act, the D.C. Council is, under Constitutional theory, acting as a special committee of the Senate and of the House and the provisions of the Home Rule Act provide a tacit enactment by the Senate and the House of the legislation submitted unless there is an explicit disapproval. Under bicameral rules, neither House can be denied the right to give that binding explicit disapproval.

Our Federation has exercised restraint in seeking Congressional disapproval of D.C. Council acts under Section 602(c)(1) out of a decent and due deference to the deep desire of citizens of the District for the greatest latitude of home rule. Nevertheless, our Federation did successfully request disapproval under Section 602(c)(2) where the Constitutional requirement for bicameral action is mandated, that is, where either house has preserved its Constitutional right and privelege to withhold its own consent. We cite the House disapproval of the so-called D.C. Sex Reform Act of 1980 which the House overwhelmingly disapproved after we initiated action against it.

We remind the House and Senate that the experiences of the Continental Congress with the threat from armed military personnel influenced the drafters of the Constitution to exclude the President and the Executive Branch from any role whatsoever over the District of Columbia. The purpose of the "exclusive" jurisdiction reserved to Congress in Article I, Section 8, Subsection 17 is to prohibit the President, as Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States, even to be tempted to intimidate the Congress, to intrude by arbitrary force into Congressional independence and to coerce the Congress, or disregard it, in arbitrary or unauthorized use of the military forces in undeclared wars or military adventures at home and abroad.

Thus we are appalled that the very Senators and Representatives who are most critical of the President's apparent desire to disregard the War Powers Act, intended to require the President to comply with Section 8, Subsection (11) of Article I, introduced these Bills. Forcefully, we stress that the "exclusive" jurisdiction of Congress over the District of Columbia follows immediately after the Subsections dealing with war, armed forces, militia, and the appointment of military officers. Moreover, subsection 17 also states that the "exclusive" jurisdiction of the District arises from the same consideration as Congress's "exclusive" role over "all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

Bills S. 1858 and H.R. 3932 gratuitously and unconstitutionally vest powers in the President which the Constitution's framers have wisely denied to the Executive Branch. These Bills are a derogation of the powers of Congress itself and an attack upon its "exclusive" jurisdiction in its own house. Moreover, these Bills are also an attack upon the privileges of each House to act, or not to act, in all matters of legislation.

In fact, these Bills vest in the D.C. Council powers which the Congress may not, under the Constitution, vest in any other body. By requiring this cumbersome and unconstitutional means to set aside D.C. Council acts, these Bills unconstitutionally diminish the powers of Congress to be sovereign in its own territory.

We have read and find incomprehensible the "severability" clause in these Bills. We are led to conclude that the grave concern about the inability of students to read in elementary schools should be applied even more to lawyers and law schools. These Bills purport to protect the constitutionality of the "Home Rule Act" as it now exists. Yet, included in them is the absurd requirement to "sever" the very provisions to protect the Constitution from any action of the Court regarding these amendments. In effect, the Bills propose the implausible and absurd theory that one can "sever" the Constitution's applicability to the D.C. Council, which is a creature of the Congress.

Because of the precipitous actions of the two responsible committees, in the House and the Senate, we do not have more time to expand on our arguments. We note that in the House, Representative Dellums, consistent with his authoritarian and oligarchic disregard of the citizens of the District, has denied and foreclosed any prospect of our appearance to testify. On September 28, Representative Dellums, without any Hearings, is proceeding to "mark up" this Bill. This is consistent with his anti-democratic practices. We note that the Senate Committee does not intend to permit us to appear in person to testify against this Bill, which we consider unconstitutional.

Under instructions from our Executive Board, we lodge protests against these practices of both Committees. Moreover, we serve notice that, if these amendments pass, we shall file suit to declare the entire "Home Rule Act" unconstitutional because well-established Constitutional theory, based on the experience of the Continental Congress and the framers of the Constitution, compels us in "conscience" to oppose a patent violation of its provisions.

While on the subject of our own rights, we note that to date none of the authors of these Bills, or its supporters, have acknowledged receipt of earlier correspondence from us in which we challenged the constitutionality of the proposed draft of the constitution for the proposed State of New Columbia. We would greatly appreciate acknowledgement of that correspondence.

We emphasize that we do have a proper respect for the honorable members of the Congress of the United States and that the expressions we have used are not intended in any way to diminish that respect. However, we have suffered long from the inattention of these two Committees to our most serious concerns for the Constitution and its safeguards.

Consequently, the repeated denials by these two Committees to allow us to appear have caused us to decide that, in the matter of this legislation which affects us both as citizens of the United States and as citizens and residents of the District of Columbia, we have no other choice but to state that we must go to court to declare these amendments and, we fear, the entire Home Rule Act unconstitutional.

Finally, we stress that the Supreme Court's decision regarding "legislative vetoes" is not relevant in the case of "Vetoes" of the President's and the Executive Branch's actions. Since the President has no Constitutional role in the District, the only Constitutional theory which applies is "bicameralism". In this case, "bicameralism" means that each House is free to act and concur, or not to act or concur, in any legislation affecting the District. Thus, the right to disapprove of any legislation by the D.C. Council is a right which each House has, particularly if that act of disapproval is explicit.

We have other arguments which, because of the precipitous actions of the Committees, we do not have time to record.

Since we are not permitted to testify, we ask that the record eventually sent to the floor of the House and the Senate contain the full text of this letter so that both Houses are aware of our very grave concerns, so grave that we will proceed as quickly as possible, if these amendments are passed, to challenge the constitutionality of the Home Rule Act as amended.

Sincerely,

For the Federation of Citizens Associations of the District of Columbia.

STEPHEN A. KOCZAK,
President.

J. GEORGE FRAIN,
First Vice President.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

RAISING THE RETIREMENT AGE FOR JUDGES OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURTS

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H.R. 3655) to raise the retirement age for Superior Court judges in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 3655

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1502 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code is amended by striking out "70" and inserting in lieu thereof "74".

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, again, this is another straightforward proposition from the Committee on the District of Columbia. It simply raises the mandatory retirement age of the District of Columbia judges from 70 to 74.

I might add one other statement, Mr. Speaker, simply that this bill passed the full Committee on the District of Columbia without dissent.

It seems to me I have nothing else to add, Mr. Speaker. It is simply a straightforward proposition raising the retirement age of the judges from 70 to 74. The bill passed the full committee without dissent.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3655 is an antiage discimination bill which raises the mandatory retirement age of District of Columbia judges from 70 to 74. It was introduced at the request of the court leadership. An identical measure has been introduced in the Senate.

The aim of H.R. 3655 is to increase the experience and maturity of those who sit on the bench in District of Columbia local courts by allowing persons who are ready, willing, and able, to serve beyond the age of 70. Age 70 is an artificial numerical factor and does not reflect intellectual stamina or the capacity to serve.

I believe whatever controversy surrounding this measure can be capsulized by stating that opponents of the measure ask "Why?" Whereas proponents ask "Why not?" Asking "why" is a fair question, and I will leave it to those who may oppose this measure to more fully explain the reasons for asking it. I shall attempt only to explain my reasons for believing "Why not" is a more compelling question.

There is no mandatory retirement age in the legislative branch of the District or Federal Governments nor is there a mandatory retirement age in the executive branch of the District of Federal Governments. The President of the United States, for example, is not forced to retire when he reaches a certain age. Moreover, there is no mandatory retirement age for Federal judges, including justices of the U.S. Supreme Court.

A survey of the States reveals that 28 have a mandatory retirement age of 70, while 5 States, Iowa, Indiana, Oregon, Texas, and Washington have a mandatory retirement age of 75. Six other States have mandatory retirement at ages of 71 and 72, while the 11 remaining States have no mandatory retirement age.

It is important to note that many of the mandatory retirement age statutes are antiquated and do not take into account the fact that good health and life spans have extended dramatically in recent years. Connecticut's statute was enacted in 1818. New Hampshire's statute became law in 1783.

At the hearing held by the District of Columbia Committee on this bill, statements were received from Chief H. Carl Moultrie of the D.C. Superior Court, D.C. Council Chairman David Clarke, Council member Wilhelmina Rolark, Chairman of the D.C. Council's Judiciary Committee, and the D.C. Corporation Counsel, Inez Reid. All indicated support for the measure.

In addition, a panel of lawyers from the District of Columbia testified that they personally supported increasing the retirement age. The panel included John Pickering, chairman of the D.C. Bar's Court Study Committee, Mr. Rufus King, chairman of the D.C. Bar's Court Committee, Mr. Iverson O. Mitchell, president of the Washington Bar Association, and Mr. John E. Scheuermann, from the D.C. Council on Court Excellence.

Mr. Speaker, why not change the current artificial numerical factor and allow our experienced and mature judges, who just happen to reach the age of 70, to stay on the job in active status? Why not—if there is no significant budgetary impact—do in the District as we do in the Federal judicial system, and allow judges to serve beyond the age of 70? Surely the D.C. Superior Court of the D.C. Court of Appeals is no more strenuous than the U.S. Supreme Court. Why not?

D.C. Superior Court Chief Judge H. Carl Moultrie put it best when he said, "* * * intellectual stamina is not decreased by age alone, and the complexity of the law and the legal environment in which it is applied, demands experience and maturity."

The court, Mr. Speaker, is the last place where discrimination of any kind should be tolerated.

EXPLANATION OF COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

The bill, H.R. 3655, was mistitled in that it referred only to raising the retirement age for D.C. Superior Court judges. In fact, section 1502 of title II of the District of Columbia Code covers both D.C. Superior Court and D.C. Court of Appeals judges. The intent of the bill is to cover both.

The amendment changes the title to reflect the dual coverage.

□ 1420

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from the District of Columbia, in his usual fashion, has done a thorough job of detailing the reasons for enacting this legislation. There is only one additional point I would like to make.

The reason we are here today considering this bill, which some might reasonably argue should be a local decision, is because in the Home Rule Act, Congress retained absolute authority over changes to title 11 of the District of Columbia Code dealing with the D.C. courts. As long as the Council is prohibited from enacting any legislation in this area, we will be coming to the floor with recommended changes to the local judicial system.

It is my hope that we can act on another matter related to the local courts as efficiently and quickly as we have in this instance. Just last week, this body approved the conference report on the District of Columbia Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1984. In that act, funding is provided for seven additional superior court judges to assist in reducing the case backlog. However, that funding is made subject to the enactment of authorizing legislation. I look forward to bringing such an authorization measure to the floor prior to the end of the session.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, as has been pointed out by the chairman, and the gentleman from the District of Columbia, this bill, H.R. 3655, is a technical bill that has no other effect than to raise the mandatory retirement age of D.C. judges from 70 to 74.

I had some reservations about this bill when it was first introduced, but these reservations have been dealt with at the committee level and I am now in support of the bill. There are a number of States which have a retirement age above 70 so this action is not unprecedented. I have a concern that judges over the age of 70 are more susceptible to certain disabilities than are younger jurists; but there is a commission on disability and tenure that is charged with constant oversight of all judges' competence.

As has been stated by the chairman this bill was reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia on a unanimous vote. I urge all of my colleagues to vote in favor of this bill.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to raise the retirement age for judges of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia and judges of the D.C. Court of Appeals."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

MASHANTUCKET PEQUOT INDIAN LAND CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 1499) to settle certain claims of the Mashantucket Pequot Indians, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. McCAIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman briefly explain what is involved?

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield under his reservation, as many Members will recall, a similar measure to settle the claims of the Mashantucket Pequot Indian Tribe of Connecticut was considered and approved by the Congress last year. That legislation was vetoed. In the meantime all interested parties—including the administration—have continued to try to resolve the problems. S. 1499 is the product of those efforts. It is a measure which is acceptable to all parties. It settles the claims of the tribe in return for certain land concessions by the State of Connecticut and $900,000 from the United States—all of which is in the 1984 Interior Department appropriations bill. The bill also extends Federal recognition to the tribe. Enactment of S. 1499 will end a legal dispute that has persisted far too long. I hope it is approved and signed into law.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for that explanation.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCAIN. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge my colleagues in the House to again support the Mashantucket Pequot Indian Land Claims Settlement Act.

A similar bill was passed by the Senate by unanimous consent on February 23. It was then passed by the House of Representatives on March 22.

S. 1499 is the successor legislation to S. 366 which was vetoed on April 5, 1983 by President Reagan. The President directed the Secretary of the Interior to enter into negotiations with "the parties at interest" to determine an acceptable solution. S. 1499 is the product of these negotiations.

The terms of the new settlement are: An increased contribution from the State of Connecticut of some $200,000 worth of road construction within the Pequot Reservation. Total State contribution is 50 percent or $450,000; submission of a recognition petition by the Pequot Tribe to the Department of the Interior.

On July 19, 1983, the administration testified before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee that would not object to the enactment of S. 1499. This is the third time this bill has been before this Chamber and it must be approved with haste. The bill has been before both the House and Senate Budget Committees and has received a waiver from the Senate Budget Committee Wednesday. Senators WEICKER and DODD have just passed this bill under unanimous consent in the Senate. There are no more controversial points regarding this settlement.

The bill: Provides 800 acres of land in Ledyard, Conn.; establishes $900,000 trust fund to purchase the lands with additional 50-percent contribution by the State plus 20 acres of State land; grants the tribe Federal recognition; authorizes congressional consent and approval of prior transfers of land; and extinguishes tribal claims for damages.

I would like to thank the Senate majority leader, Mr. BAKER, for taking an interest in this settlement and for arranging for negotiations between the Connecticut congressional delegation and the White House.

I would also like to thank Senator ANDREWS, chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs for holding hearings on this matter.

Senators DODD and WEICKER deserve special appreciation for handling this legislation in the Senate. Chairman UDALL and ranking minority member, Representative LUJAN also deserve sincere thanks for helping with the passage of this bill both in the House Interior Committee and today.

It is my hope that my colleagues will assist the State of Connecticut in a final resolution of this land claim by supporting S. 1499.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, this legislation does have the support of the administration and all other parties affected by the Pequot claims. Although the compromise that it contains is the work of many people, I think it is appropriate to mention in particular the diligent efforts of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GEJDENSON). He and the other members of the Connecticut delegation have done yeoman work in getting this settlement before the Congress. I join with them in urging the House to approve S. 1499.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL)?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follow:

S. 1499

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Mashantucket Pequot Indian Claims Settlement Act".

CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(a) there is pending before the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut a civil action entitled "Western Pequot Tribe of Indians against Holdridge Enterprises Incorporated, et al., Civil Action Numbered H76-193 (D. Conn.)," which involves Indian claims to certain public and private lands within the town of Ledyard, Connecticut;

(b) the pendency of this lawsuit has placed a cloud on the titles to much of the land in the town of Ledyard, including lands not involved in the lawsuit, which has resulted in severe economic hardships for the residents of the town;

(c) the Congress shares with the State of Connecticut and the parties to the lawsuit a desire to remove all clouds on titles resulting from such Indian land claims;

(d) the parties to the lawsuit and others interested in the settlement of Indian land claims within the State of Conncecticut have reached an agreement which requires implementing legislation by the Congress of the United States and the Legislature of the State of Connecticut;

(e) the Western Pequot Tribe, as represented as of the time of the passage of this Act by the Mashantucket Pequot Tribal Council, is the sole successor in interest to the aboriginal entity generally known as the Western Pequot Tribe which years ago claimed aboriginal title to certain lands in the State of Conecticut; and

(f) the State of Connecticut is contributing twenty acres of land owned by the State of Connecticut to fullfill this Act. The State of Connecticut will construct and repair three sections of paved or gravel roadways within the reservation of the Tribe. The State of Connecticut has provided special services to the members of the Western Pequot Tribe residing within its borders. The United States has provided few, if any, special services to the Western Pequot Tribe and has denied that it had jurisdiction over or responsibility for said Tribe. In view of the provision of land by the State of Connecticut, the provision of paved roadways by the State of Connecticut, and the provisions of special services by the State of Connecticut without being required to do so by Federal law, it is the intent of Congress that the State of Connecticut not be required to otherwise contribute directly to this claims settlement.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this Act—

(1) The term "Tribe" means the Mashantucket Pequot Tribe (also known as the Western Pequot Tribe) as identified by chapter 832 of the Connecticut General Statutes and all its predecssors and successors in interest. The Mashantucket Pequot Tribe is represented, as of the date of the enactment of this Act, by the Mashantucket Pequot Tribal Council.

(2) The term "land or natural resources" means any real property or natural resources, or any interest in or right involving any real property or natural resources, including without limitation minerals and mineral rights, timber and timber rights, water and water rights, and hunting and fishing rights.

(3) The term "private settlement lands" means—

(A) the eight hundred acres, more or less, of privately held land which are identified by a red outine on a map filed with the secretary of the State of Connecticut in accordance with the agreement referred to in section 2(d) of this Act, and

(B) the lands known as the Cedar Swamp which are adjacent to the Mashantucket Pequot Reservation as it exists on the date of the enactment of this Act, the secretary of the State of Connecticut shall transmit to the Secretary a certified copy of said map.

(4) The term "settlement lands" means—

(A) the lands described in sections 2(a) and 3 of the Act To Implement the Settlement of the Mashantucket Pequot Indian Land Claims as enacted by the State of Connecticut and approved on June 9, 1982, and

(B) the private settlement lands.

(5) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior.

(6) The term "transfer" means any transaction involving, or any transaction the purpose of which was to effect, a change in title to or control of any land or natural resources, and any act, event, or circumstance that resulted in a change in title to, possession of, dominion over, or control of land or natural resources, including any sale, grant, lease, allotment, partition, or conveyance, whether pursuant to a treaty, compact, or statute of a State or otherwise.

(7) The term "reservation" means the existing reservation of the Tribe as defined by chapter 824 of the Connecticut General Statutes and any settlement lands taken in trust by the United States for the Tribe.

APPROVAL OF PRIOR TRANSFERS; EXTINGUISHMENT OF ABORIGINAL TITLES AND INDIAN CLAIMS

SEC. 4. (a) Any transfer before the date of enactment of this Act from, by, or on behalf of the Tribe or any of its members of land or natural resources located anywhere within the United States, and any transfer before the date of enactment of this Act from, by, or on behalf of any Indian, Indian nation, or tribe or band of Indians of land or natural resources located anywhere within the town of Ledyard, Connecticut, shall be deemed to have been made in accordance with the Constitution and all laws of the United States, including without limitation the Trade and Intercourse Act of 1970, Act of July 22, 1970 (ch. 33, sec. 4, 1 Stat. 137, 138), and all amendments thereto and all subsequent reenactments and versions thereof, and Congress hereby does approve and ratify any such transfer effective as of the date of said transfer.

(b) By virtue of the approval and ratification of a transfer of land or natural resources effected by subsection (a), any aboriginal title held by the Tribe or any member of the Tribe, or any other Indian, Indian nation, or tribe or band of Indians, to any land or natural resources the transfer of which was approved and ratified by subsection (a) shall be regarded as extinguished as of the date of such transfer.

(c) By virtue of the approval and ratification of a transfer of land or natural resources effected by this section, or the extinguishment of aboriginal title effected thereby, any claim (including any claim for damages for trespass or for use and occupancy) by, or on behalf of, the Tribe or any member of the Tribe or by any other Indian, Indian nation, or tribe or band of Indians, against the United States, any State or subdivision thereof or any other person which is based on—

(1) any interest in or right involving any land or natural resources the transfer of which was approved and ratified by subsection (a), or

(2) any aboriginal title to land or natural resources the extinguishment of which was effected by subsection (b), shall be regarded as extinguished as of the date of any such transfer.

(d) Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect or eliminate the personal claim of any individual Indian (except for Federal common law fraud claim) which is pursued under any law of general applicability that protects non-Indians as well as Indians.

(e)(1) This section shall take effect upon the appropriation of $900,000 as authorized under section 5(e) of this Act.

(2) The Secretary shall publish notice of such appropriation in the Federal Register when the funds are deposited in the fund established under section 5(a) of this Act.

MASHANTUCKET PEQUOT SETTLEMENT FUND

SEC. 5. (a) There is hereby established in the United States Treasury an account to be known as the Mashantucket Pequot Settlement Fund (hereinafter referred to in this section as the "Fund". The Fund shall be held in trust by the Secretary for the benefit of the Tribe and administered in accordance with this Act.

(b)(1) The Secretary is authorized and directed to expend, at the request of the tribe, the Fund together with any and all income accruing to such Fund in accordance with this subsection

(2) Not less than $600,000 of the Fund shall be available until January 1, 1985, for the acquisition by the Secretary of private settlement lands. Subsequent to January 1, 1985, the Secretary shall determine whether and to what extent an amount less than $600,000 has been expended to acquire private settlement lands and shall make that amount available to the Tribe to be used in accordance with the ecomomic development plan approved pursuant to paragraph (3).

(3)(A) The Secretary shall disburse all or part of the Fund together with any and all income accruing to such Fund (excepting the amount reserved in paragraph (2)) according to a plan to promote the economic development of the Tribe.

(B) The Tribe shall submit an economic development plan to the Secretary and the Secretary shall approve such plan within sixty days of its submission if he finds that it is reasonably related to the economic development of the Tribe. If the Secretary does not approve such plan, he shall, at the time of his decision, set forth in writing and with particularity, the reasons for his disapproval.

(C) The Secretary may not agree to terms which provide for the investment of the Fund in a manner inconsistent with the first section of the act of June 24, 1938 (52 Stat. 1037), unless the tribe first submits a specific waiver of liability on the part of the United States for any loss which may result from such an investment.

(D) The Tribe may, with the approval of the Secretary, alter the economic development plan subject to the conditions set forth in subparagraph (B).

(4) Under no circumstances shall any part of the Fund be distributed to any member of the tribe unless pursuant to the economic development plan approved by the Secretary under paragraph (3).

(5) As the Fund or any portion thereof is disbursed by the Secretary in accordance with this section, the United States shall have no further trust responsibility to the Tribe or its members with respect to the sums paid, any subsequent expenditures of these sums, or any property other than private settlement lands or services pruchased with thse sums.

(6) Until the Tribe has submitted and the Secretary has approved the terms of the use of the Fund, the Secretary shall fix the terms for the administration of the portion of the Fund as to which there is no agreement.

(7) Lands or natural resources acquired under this subsection which are located within the settlement lands shall be held in trust by the United States for the benefit of the Tribe.

(8) Land or natural resources acquired under this subsection which are located outside of the settlement lands shall be held in fee by the Mashantucket Pequot Tribe, and the United States shall have no further trust responsibility with respect to such land and natural resources. Such land and natural resources shall not be subject to any restriction against alienation under the laws of the United States.

(9) Notwithstanding the provisions of the first section of the Act of August 1, 1888 (25 Stat. 357, chapter 728), as amended, and the first section of the Act of February 26, 1931 (46 Stat. 1421, chapter 307), the Secretary may acquire land or natural resources under this section from the ostensible owner of the land or natural resources only if the Secretary and the ostensible owner of the land or natural resources have agreed upon the identity of the land or natural resources to be sold and upon the purchase price and other terms of sale. Subject to the agreement required by the preceding sentence, the Secretary may institute condemnation proceedings in order to perfect title, satisfactory to the Attorney General, in the United States and condemn interests adverse to the ostensible owner.

(c) For the purpose of subtitle A of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, any transfer of private settlement lands to which subsection (b) applies shall be deemed to be an involuntary conversion within the meaning of section 1033 of such Code.

(d) The Secretary may not expend on behalf of the Tribe any sums deposited in the Fund established pursuant to subsection (a) of this section unless and until he finds that authorized officials of the Tribe have executed appropriate documents relinquishing all claims to the extent provided by sections 4 and 10 of this Act, including stipulations to the final judicial dismissal with prejudice of its claims.

(e) There is authorized to be appropriated $900,000 to be deposited in the Fund.

JURISDICTION OVER RESERVATION

SEC. 6. Notwithstanding the provision relating to a special election in section 406 of the Act of April 11, 1968 (82 Stat. 80; 25 U.S.C. 1326), the reservation of the Tribe is declared to be Indian country subject to State jurisdiction to the maximum extent provided in title IV of such Act.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS: FEDERAL COURT JURISDICTION

SEC. 7. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the constitutionality of this Act may not be drawn into question in any action unless such question has been raised in—

(1) a pleading contained in a complaint filed before the end of the one-hundred-and-eighty-day period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act, or

(2) an answer contained in a reply to a complaint before the end of such period.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, exclusive jurisdiction of any action in which the constitutionality of this Act is drawn into question is vested in the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut.

(c) Any action to which subsection (a) applies and which is brought in the court of any State may be removed by the defendant to the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut.

(d) Except as provided in this Act, no provision of this Act shall be construed to constitute a jurisdictional act, to confer jurisdiction to sue, or to grant implied consent to any Indian, Indian nation, or tribe or band of Indians to sue the United States or any of its officers with respect to the claims extinguished by the operation of this Act.

RESTRICTION AGAINST ALIENATION

SEC. 8. (a) Subject to subsection (b), lands within the reservation which are held in trust by the Secretary for the benefit of the Tribe or which are subject to a Federal restraint against alienation at any time after the date of the enactment of this Act shall be subject to the laws of the United States relating to Indian lands, including section 2116 of the Revised Statutes (25 U.S.C. 177).

(b) Notwithstanding subsection (a), the Tribe may lease lands for any term of years to the Mashantucket Pequot Housing Authority, or any successor in interest to such Authority.

EXTENSION OF FEDERAL RECOGNITION AND PRIVILEGES

SEC. 9. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, Federal recognition is extended to the Tribe. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, all laws and regulations of the United States of general application to Indians or Indian nations, tribes or bands of Indians which are not inconsistent with any specific provision of this Act shall be applicable to the Tribe.

(b) The Tribe shall file with the Secretary a copy of its organic governing document and any amendments thereto. Such instrument must be consistent with the terms of this Act and the Act to Implement the Settlement of the Mashantucket Pequot Indian Land Claim as enacted by the State of Connecticut and approved June 9, 1982.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Tribe and members of the Tribe shall be eligible for all Federal services and benefits furnished to federally recognized Indian tribes as of the date of enactment of this Act.

OTHER CLAIMS DISCHARGED BY THIS ACT

SEC. 10. Except as expressly provided herein, this Act shall constitute a general discharge and release of all obligations of the State of Connecticut and all of its political subdivisions, agencies, departments, and all of the officers or employees thereof arising from any treaty or agreement with, or on behalf of the Tribe or the United States as trustee therefor.

INSEPARABILITY

SEC. 11. In the event that any provision of section 4 of this Act is held invalid, it is the intent of Congress that the entire Act be invalidated. In the event that any other section or provision of this Act is held invalid, it is the intent of Congress that the remaining sections of this Act shall continue in full force and effect.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM PROTECTION AND RESOURCES MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1983

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 298 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 2379.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 2379) to provide for the protection and management of the national park system, and for other purposes, with Mr. PERKINS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Monday, October 3, 1983, all time for general debate had expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the bill is considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The text of H.R. 2379 is as follows:

H.R. 2379

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "National Park System Protection and Resources Management Act of 1983".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the natural and cultural resources of the national park system embrace unique, superlative and nationally significant resources, constitute a major source of pride, inspiration, and enjoyment for the people of the United States, and have gained international recognition and acclaim;

(2) the Congress has repeatedly expressed its intentions, in both generic and specific statute and by other means, that the natural and cultural resources of the national park system be accorded the highest degree of protection;

(3) many of the natural and cultural resources of the national park system are being degraded or threatened with degradation; and

(4) no comprehensive process exists for the gathering of data, the identification, analysis, and documentation of trends, and the identification of problems regarding the condition of the national park system's natural and cultural resources, and for the development of a program to prevent and reverse the degradation of the natural and cultural resources of the national park system.

PURPOSE AND POLICY

SEC. 3. In furtherance of the provisions of the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535; 16 U.S.C. 1-4), it is the purpose of this Act, and shall continue to be national policy, to provide for a high degree of protection and preservation of the natural and cultural resources within the national park system for the benefit of the public, and to provide for the interplay of the forces and processes of natural geological change and ecological succession in perpetuity (except for locations of development or where the historic scene is to be stabilized and depicted at a particular static point in time). In furtherance of that purpose and policy, it is the specific purpose of this Act to provide for the development of comprehensive management programs, and planning and decisionmaking processes which will—

(1) identify damage, threats, and problems affecting the natural and cultural resources of the national park system, and

(2) provide for the implementation of actions which will prevent and reverse such adverse forces so as to maximize the protection and preservation of the natural and cultural resources of the national park system.

Nothing in this section shall be deemed to constitute a change in the more specific purposes or provisions of the various Acts establishing the individual units of the national park system.

STATE OF THE PARKS REPORT

SEC. 4. (a) In furtherance of the provisions of section 3 of this Act, the Secretary shall undertake a continuing program of data collection, research, monitoring, analysis and documentation as to conditions, factors and forces which are degrading, or threatening to degrade, the natural and cultural resources of the national park system and shall prepare a biennial "State of the Parks" report. Such report shall constitute documentation of the condition of park resources, including problems related to their degradation and solutions to such problems. The report shall correlate to a fiscal year base and shall be transmitted by January 1, 1985 (and by January 1 of each odd numbered year thereafter), by the Secretary to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives and to the President of the United States Senate for referral to and consideration by the appropriate legislative committees of the Congress. Successive reports shall update previous submissions. Each report shall be printed as a House document. The report shall include, but need not be limited to, the following major components:

(1) a brief description, for each individual unit of the national park system, of—

(A) the past, current, and projected condition of the unit's natural and cultural resources;

(B) the impact from identified factors and forces, ranked in order of priority, emanating from both inside and outside the unit, which damage or threaten to damage the welfare and integrity of the unit's natural and cultural resources, with identification of the trends and the severity of impact of such factors and forces;

(C) ongoing and planned protection and management actions, including specific research programs, with regard to subparagraphs (A) and (B) of this paragraph; and

(D) the accomplishments and results of the actions undertaken in accordance with subparagraph (C);

(2) a description and assessment of the systemwide efforts to address the requirements of paragraph (1) of this subsection, which assessment shall include a list of all personnel positions systemwide (given according to pay grade, location, and professional expertise of the incumbent) assigned 50 per centum or more of the time to direct resource protection, resource management activities or research, and an assessment of the effectiveness and adequacy of these personnel in meeting resource management objectives;

(3) a detailed and specific discussion, developed in accordance with the requirements of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection, of continuing, newly implemented and/or recommended systemwide policies, plans, programs, actions, commitments, and accomplishments for both the direct management actions and the research programs of the National Park Service relating to the prevention and reversal of factors and forces which are altering or damaging, or threatening to alter or damage, the welfare and integrity of natural and cultural park resources, which discussion shall include, but not be limited to—

(A) management policies, directions, and priorities;

(B) accomplishments in and progress toward resolving specific problems described in the current and the previous State of the Parks report;

(C) continuing research projects;

(D) new administration and research proposals for park protection and resource management programs;

(E) an itemized estimate of the funding required for the following two fiscal years to carry out both the continuing and the new management actions and research programs;

(F) legal authority available for addressing damage and threats emanating from outside unit boundaries, the effectiveness of that authority in preventing damage to the natural and cultural resources, and suggestions for new authority which may promote resource protection; and

(G) the progress in meeting the objectives of this Act;

(4) a discussion of the adequacy of past and present congressional appropriations in addressing protection and resource management programs; and

(5) a determination and explanation of funding needs for fulfilling the mandates of this section.

(b) In the preparation of the State of the Parks report, the National Park Service shall take appropriate steps to solicit public involvement. A preliminary draft of the report shall be made available to the public for a period of thirty days for review and comment no less than three months before the final report is due for submission to the Congress. Notice of the availability of such draft for public review and comment shall be published in the Federal Register. A summary of public comments received shall be transmitted with the State of the Parks report.

SIGNIFICANT RESOURCE PROBLEMS

SEC. 5. The Secretary shall identify and establish priorities among at least the fifty most critical natural and the fifty most critical cultural resource problems or threats within the national park system and shall prepare a detailed analysis of such problems or threats (with an estimate of the funds necessary to reduce or eliminate the problems or threats). Such analysis shall be made annually and shall be submitted to the appropriate committees of the Congress on the same date as the submission of the President's budget to the Congress.

SCIENTIFIC ADVISORY ASSISTANCE

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary shall take such steps as may be necessary to contract with the National Academy of Sciences for development of a plan for the National Park Service to conduct natural and cultural resources inventories and research directed to the problems of and the solutions for natural and cultural resource problems within the national park system.

(b) The plan required under subsection (a) shall be simultaneously submitted to the Secretary and to the appropriate committees of the Congress no later than eighteen months after the effective date of this Act. Three months and six months after the effective date of this Act, the Secretary shall submit to the appropriate committees of the Congress a written statement as to his progress in the consummation of arrangements with the National Academy of Sciences for the development of such a plan.

(c) Funding for such plan shall derive from funds specifically appropriated for this purpose to the National Park Service.

RESOURCE MANAGEMENT PLANS

SEC. 7. Resource management plans for each unit of the national park system, including areas within the national capital region, shall be prepared and updated no less frequently than every two years. Such plans shall address both natural and cultural resources of the park units and shall include, but not be limited to—

(1) a historical overview of the past composition, treatment, and condition of the resources;

(2) a statement of the purposes and objectives for the management and preservation of the individual and collective components of the resource base;

(3) an inventory of significant resources and their current condition, prepared in accordance with acceptable scientific baseline data collection methods;

(4) an identification of current and potential problems, emanating from sources both inside and outside park unit boundaries, associated with the protection and management of the resources;

(5) a comprehensive, detailed program of proposed actions to be taken to prevent or reverse the degradation of the natural and cultural resources of the park, including a proposed schedule of actions to be initiated and the estimated costs to complete such actions; and

(6) a brief summary of accomplishments in resolving resource problems identified pursuant to paragraphs (4) and (5) of this subsection.

General management and other relevant plans developed for each park unit shall be brought into conformity with the park unit's resource management plan, and the resource management plan shall be used to provide data for the State of the Parks report. The Secretary shall establish guidelines for the National Park Service setting forth procedures whereby the development of general management plans and resource management plans shall be coordinated with other affected Federal agencies, States, and local governments.

LAND CLASSIFICATION REVIEW

SEC. 8. The Secretary shall conduct a review of the current land classification system for the preservation and use of lands within national park system units, and shall adopt such revisions as may be appropriate to assure the protection of park resources, appropriately balanced with the use and appreciation of those resources by visitors. Such review shall include the development of a new classification for maximum resource protection where restricted use may be necessary to protect sensitive ecosystems and cultural resources or areas of special value for research, scientific, or related purposes. The review mandated by this section shall be completed and the results adopted by January 1, 1985.

INTERNATIONALLY RECOGNIZED AREAS

SEC. 9. (a) Those park units accorded the designation of "biosphere reserve" or "world heritage site" shall receive priority attention and consideration for prompt, heightened resource data collection, monitoring, and resource protection efforts. The Secretary shall develop a document, setting forth such policies and guidelines as are appropriate to achieve these objectives, to be published in draft form in the Federal Register no later than January 1, 1985 for public comment, and published in final form no later than April 30, 1985. Such document shall be revised subsequently as appropriate.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that with respect to any international park located within the United States and any adjacent nation which has been recognized and designated as a Biosphere Reserve under the auspices of the international conservation community, the responsible park management officials of the United States and such nation, in conjunction with appropriate legislative and parliamentary officials, establish means and methods of ensuring that the integrity of such Biosphere Reserve is maintained, and the collective attributes for which it was so recognized and designated are accorded the highest practicable degree of continuing protection.

PUBLIC LAND MANAGEMENT

SEC. 10. (a) In any case of areas which are within any unit of the national park system, where the Secretary of the Interior is vested with any authority to—

(1) issue any lease;

(2) authorize or permit any use, occupancy, or development of such areas;

(3) sell or otherwise dispose of such lands or waters or interests therein or sell or otherwise dispose of any timber or sand, gravel, and other materials located on or under such areas,

he may exercise such authority only after he has determined that the exercise of such authority will not have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such national park system unit was established (including the scenery and the natural and cultural resources). Such determination shall be made only after notice and opportunity for a hearing on the record. The process for collecting needed information and evaluation thereof for this section or section 11 may be integrated with such planning and decisionmaking processes as are required by other law, except that the determination of the effect upon park resources shall be a separate document or a separate chapter within a document executed by the Secretary of the Interior or the head of any other Federal agency or instrumentality as may be required by this section or section 11.

(b) In any case of areas which are adjacent to any unit of the national park system, where the Secretary is vested with any authority described in subsection (a), the Secretary may exercise such authority only after he has determined that the exercise of such authority will not have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such national park system unit was established; except that if the Secretary determines that—

(1) any significant adverse effects on the values for which the national park system unit was established are clearly of lesser importance than the public interest value of the proposed action; and he may exercise such authority. The Secretary shall publish the record of such decision in the Federal Register and transmit copies of such decision documents to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives. The Secretary shall not implement such decisions until thirty legislative days after such transmittal.

(c) This section shall not apply to inland waters except those which the Federal Government owns.

FEDERAL PROGRAM REVIEW

SEC. 11. (a) Each agency or instrumentality of the United States conducting or supporting activities within or adjacent to any unit of the national park system shall, to the extent practicable, undertake to insure that those activities will not significantly degrade the natural or cultural resources or values for which the unit was established. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to give rise to a cause of action in any court of law.

(b) During the normal procedure utilized by any Federal agency in deciding to undertake or approve any Federal action (except such actions as may be required for maintenance or rehabilitation of existing structures or facilities) on areas within or adjacent to any unit of the national park system, the agency head (or the Secretary as determined pursuant to subsection (d) of this section), shall consider whether such action may degrade or threaten the natural or cultural resources of any such unit, and if the head of such agency finds that such action may have such an effect, he shall notify the Secretary in writing. Such notification shall, at a minimum, include a description of the proposed action, the proposed agency's views as to the potential short and long term impact of the proposed action on the park unit's resources, and any measures proposed by the agency to prevent or minimize adverse effects on such park unit's resources.

(c) The Secretary shall respond in writing with regard to the foreseeable impact on park resources of such proposed Federal action and shall include recommendations for any changes in the proposed Federal action needed to avoid adverse effects on park resources. Such response shall be submitted to the proposing Federal agency within sixty days after receipt of notification required by subsection (b). The response by the Secretary shall include (as an attachment) the views of professional personnel within the National Park Service whose expertise is relevant to the issue of the impact of such proposed action on park resources.

(d) In any instance in which the Secretary has not been notified of a Federal agency's proposed action and on his own determination finds that such action may threaten the natural or cultural resources of any unit of the national park system, the Secretary shall notify the head of such Federal agency in writing. Upon such notification by the Secretary, such agency head shall promptly provide the Secretary with the information specified in subsection (b), and any other relevant information in the possession of such agency if requested by the Secretary, and such notification by the Secretary pursuant to this subsection shall thereby invoke the other relevant provisions of this section.

(e) The Secretary shall fully consider any adopted city, county, State, or Federal comprehensive development plans or elements thereof and shall, if requested by the affected governmental unit, hold a public hearing prior to responding to the Federal agency if such response to the proposed action is to be negative. The hearings are to be held at or near the site of the proposed action or project after notification of the affected local government unit.

(f)(1)(A) In all cases where the proposed Federal action would occur upon federally owned lands or waters within the authorized boundary of a national park system unit, the proposing Federal agency shall comply fully with the recommendations of the Secretary.

(B) In all cases where the proposed Federal action would occur upon areas not owned by the Federal Government within the authorized boundary of a national park system unit, the proposing Federal agency shall fully consider the recommendations of the Secretary and shall comply with such recommendations, unless the head of such agency, after consideration of applicable law, including the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535; 16 U.S.C. 1-4), and the Act of August 18, 1970 (84 Stat. 825; 16 U.S.C. 1a-1 through 1a-7) finds that the public interest in the proposed action is greater than the public interest in avoiding the adverse effects on the natural and cultural resources of the affected national park system unit. The proposing Federal agency shall, upon such determination publish the record of decision in the Federal Register and notify, in writing, the Secretary and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives of such decisions, including the reasons therefor, and shall not implement the proposed action for thirty legislative days after the date of such transmittal.

(2) In any case where the proposed Federal action involves areas adjacent to the boundary of a national park system unit, the proposing Federal agency shall fully consider the recommendations contained within the response from the Secretary. The proposing Federal agency shall transmit the details of the planned final course of action to the Secretary prior to implementing such action. In any instance in which there is substantial disagreement between the proposing agency's course of action and the Secretary's recommendations to the agency, the Secretary shall, within ten days) of receipt of the agency's planned final course of action, notify, in writing, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives. The proposing Federal agency may proceed with the proposed final course of action at the time of transmittal to the Secretary, except that if the proposed final course of action is inconsistent with the recommendations of the Secretary, the proposed final course of action shall not be implemented for thirty legislative days after the date of such transmittal to the committees of Congress referred to in the preceding sentence.

(g) The Secretary shall publish promptly (but in all cases within ten days) in the Federal Register a notice of—

(1) receipt of any proposed Federal action, including a summary of the key components of the proposal and the location and availability of supporting documents, and

(2) notice of the response made by the Secretary to the proposing agency, including all recommendations made by the Secretary.

(h) The following Federal actions which constitute a major and necessary component of an emergency action shall be exempt from the provisions of this section—

(1) those necessary for safeguarding of life and property;

(2) those necessary to respond to a declared state of disaster; and

(3) those necessary to respond to an imminent threat to national security.

(i) Any action under this Act must be brought in the United States district court for the district in which the national park system unit concerned is located, and such court shall have jurisdiction to provide any appropriate relief.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE, COOPERATION, AND PLANNING

SEC. 12. (a) The Secretary is directed to cooperate with, and is authorized to provide technical assistance to, any governmental unit within or adjacent to the units of the national park system where the results of such cooperation and assistance would likely benefit the protection of park resources. There shall be initiated, by the superintendent of each unit of the national park system, an effort to work cooperatively with all governmental agencies and other entities having influence or control over lands, resources, and activities within or adjacent to the park unit for the purpose of developing, on a voluntary basis, mutually compatible land use or management plans or policies for the general area.

(b) Those personnel assigned to provide assistance described in subsection (a) shall be employees of the National Park Service knowledgeable about the affected unit of the national park system and the resources that unit was authorized to protect.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to make grants to units of local government for the purposes described in subsection (a). Such grants shall not exceed $25,000 in any fiscal year to any unit of local government. The Secretary shall develop criteria for the awarding of grants, with such criteria to include priority for awards which will afford the greatest increased degree of protection to critically degraded or threatened park resources.

(d) There is authorized to be appropriated not more than $750,000 in each of fiscal years 1984, 1985, and 1986 for the purposes of this section. Such sums shall remain available until appropriated, and such sums as may be appropriated shall remain available until expended.

(e) Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, no less than two park units in addition to all "biosphere reserves" and "world heritage sites", for each administrative region of the national park system shall have initiated the effort described in subsection (a). No more than two years after the date of enactment of this Act, each unit within the national park system shall have initiated such an effort.

(f) In no more than two years following the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall assure that each unit, or each regional office for the region in which a unit is located, has on its staff at least one person who is trained and knowledgeable in matters relating to the provisions of this section, and whose principal duty it shall be to coordinate the activities which are related to the provisions of this section. The Secretary shall initiate, within no more than one year of the date of enactment of this Act, a training program for park personnel in the principles and techniques necessary to carry out the requirements of this section.

PUBLIC INFORMATION PROGRAM

SEC. 13. By January 1, 1984, the Secretary shall initiate and shall continue to develop, a public information program designed to inform park visitors and the public of the problems confronting the protection of park resources and the solutions being implemented to address those problems. Educational information of this nature shall be made available to youth groups and to educational institutions.

PERSONNEL

SEC. 14. The Secretary shall promptly and continually take actions to assure that the staffing of the National Park Service provides for an adequate number and distribution of personnel with sufficient scientific and professional knowledge and expertise to provide for the protection and management of the natural and cultural resources. Scientific research shall be directed to the resource protection and management needs of the park system units. Programs, guidelines, and standards for the following shall be under development by no later than January 1, 1984, and completed no later than January 1, 1985:

(1) employee training programs in resource protection and resource management;

(2) performance standards for all employees as related to resource protection and resource management;

(3) qualification criteria related to resource protection and resource management for positions to be filled by new employees; and

(4) career ladders for employees specializing in resource protection and resource management, with equitable promotion opportunities for advancement into mid-level and senior general management positions.

GENERAL MANAGEMENT PLANS

SEC. 15. Section 12(b) of the Act of August 18, 1970 (84 Stat. 825; 16 U.S.C. 1a-1 through 1a-7) is amended by inserting the following at the end of the first sentence: "Each such plan shall be reviewed, revised and approved no less frequently than every ten years or it shall cease to constitute an officially approved plan. All plans not fully addressing all of the following elements on January 1, 1984, shall be revised and approved to so address all such elements by no later than January 1, 1988.".

DONATIONS

SEC. 16. (a) In the case of real property located adjacent to, or within or in the near vicinity of, any unit of the national park system if—

(1) the owner of any interest in such property desires—

(A) to make a contribution of such interest to any person, and

(B) to have such contribution qualify as a charitable contribution under section 170 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to deduction for charitable, etc., contributions and gifts), and

(2) the Director of the National Park Service determines that the contribution of such interest to such person will protect or enhance the unit of the national park system, the Director of the National Park Service shall, upon such owner's written request, promptly take appropriate steps to assist the owner in satisfying the requirements of such section 170 with respect to such contribution.

(b) The assistance provided by the Director of the National Park Service under subsection (a) shall include (but shall not be limited to) providing for—

(1) a professional valuation of the interest in real property being contributed, and

(2) a statement as to the importance of such contribution related to protecting and enhancing park unit values.

ALASKA NATIONAL INTEREST LANDS CONSERVATION ACT PRIORITY

SEC. 17. In all cases where the Secretary determines that the provisions of this Act are in conflict with the provisions of the Act of December 2, 1980 (16 U.S.C. 3101-3233), the provisions of the Act of December 2, 1980 (16 U.S.C. 3101-3233) shall prevail.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 18. As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "Appropriate committees of the Congress" means those committees of both the House and the Senate which have primary jurisdiction for the authorization of national park system units and programs or for the appropriation of funds for the acquisition and operations of such units and programs.

(2) "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior acting through the Director of the National Park Service except where specific reference is made to the Secretary of the Interior.

(3) "Resource" and "resources" includes—

(A) in the case of natural resources, the geology, paleontological remains, and flora and fauna which are principally of indigenous origin, and

(B) in the case of cultural resources, the historic and prehistoric districts, sites, buildings, structures, objects and human traditions associated with or representative of human activities and events, including related artifacts, records and remains.

(4) "National park system" has the meaning provided by section 2 of the Act of August 8, 1953 (16 U.S.C. 1b-1c).

(5) "Federal action" means any Federal project or direct action, or any Federal grant or loan to a public body.

(6) The term "thirty legislative days" means thirty calendar days of continuous session of Congress. For purposes of this paragraph—

(A) continuity of session of Congress is broken only by an adjournment sine die; and

(B) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of the thirty-day period.

SAVINGS PROVISION

SEC. 19. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to exempt the Secretary of the Interior, the Director of the National Park Service, or any other department, agency, or instrumentality of the United States from compliance with any other requirement of law.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 20. Effective October 1, 1983, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Department of the Interior such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

COMPLIANCE WITH BUDGET ACT

SEC. 21. Any new spending authority (within the meaning of section 401 of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974) which is provided under this Act shall be effective for any fiscal year only to the extent or in such amounts as provided in appropriations Acts. Any provision of this Act which authorizes the enactment of new budget authority shall be effective only for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1983. Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect or impair any authority to enter into contracts, incur indebtedness, or make payments under any other provision of law.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, it shall be in order to consider, in lieu of the amendments recommended by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, an amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 2, 1983, by Representative UDALL, if offered by Representative UDALL or his designee, prior to the consideration of any other amendments to the bill, and said substitute shall be considered as having been read.

The Chair now recognizes the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. UDALL

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which is printed in the RECORD of August 2, 1983, as is provided in the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. UDALL:

Page 2, line 3, strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "National Park System Protection and Resources Management Act of 1983".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the natural and cultural resources of the national park system embrace unique, superlative and nationally significant resources, constitute a major source of pride, inspiration, and enjoyment for the people of the United States, and have gained international recognition and acclaim;

(2) the Congress has repeatedly expressed its intentions, in both generic and specific statute and by other means, that the natural and cultural resources of the national park system be accorded the highest degree of protection;

(3) many of the natural and cultural resources of the national park system are being degraded or threatened with degradation; and

(4) no comprehensive process exists for the gathering of data, the identification, analysis, and documentation of trends, and the identification of problems regarding the condition of the national park system's natural and cultural resources, and for the development of a program to prevent and reverse the degradation of the natural and cultural resources of the national park system.

PURPOSE AND POLICY

SEC. 3. In furtherance of the provisions of the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535; 16 U.S.C. 1-4), it is the purpose of this Act, and shall continue to be national policy, to provide for a high degree of protection and preservation of the natural and cultural resources within the national park system for the benefit of the public, and to provide for the interplay of the forces and processes of natural geological change and ecological succession in perpetuity (except for locations of development or where the historic scene is to be stabilized and depicted at a particular static point in time). In furtherance of that purpose and policy, it is the specific purpose of this Act to provide for the development of comprehensive management programs, and planning and decision making processes which will—

(1) identify damage, threats, and problems affecting the natural and cultural resources of the national park system, and

(2) provide for the implementation of actions which will prevent and reverse such adverse forces so as to maximize the protection and preservation of the natural and cultural resources of the national park system.

Nothing in this section shall be deemed to constitute a change in the more specific purposes or provisions of the various Acts establishing the individual units of the national park system.

STATE OF THE PARKS REPORT

SEC. 4. (a) In furtherance of the provisions of section 3 of this Act, the Secretary shall undertake a continuing program of data collection, research, monitoring, analysis and documentation as to conditions, factors and forces which are degrading, or threatening to degrade, the natural and cultural resources of the national park system and shall prepare a biennial "State of the Parks" report. Such report shall constitute documentation of the condition of park resources, including problems related to their degradation and solutions to such problems. The report shall correlate to a fiscal year base and shall be transmitted by January 1, 1985 (and by January 1 of each odd numbered year thereafter), by the Secretary to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives and to the President of the United States Senate for deferral to and consideration by the appropriate legislative committees of the Congress. Successive reports shall update previous submissions. Each report shall be printed as a House document. The report shall include, but need not be limited to, the following major components:

(1) a brief description, for each individual unit of the national park system, of—

(A) the past, current, and projected condition of the unit's natural and cultural resources;

(B) the impact from identified factors and forces, ranked in order of priority, emanating from both inside and outside the unit, which damage or threaten to damage the welfare and integrity of the unit's natural and cultural resources, with identification of the trends and the severity of impact of such factors and forces;

(C) ongoing and planned protection and management actions, including specific research programs, with regard to subparagraphs (A) and (B) of this paragraph; and

(D) the accomplishments and results of the actions undertaken in accordance with subparagraph (C);

(2) a description and assessment of the systemwide efforts to address the requirements of paragraph (1) of this subsection, which assessment shall include a list of all personnel positions systemwide (given according to pay grade location, and professional expertise of the incumbent) assigned 50 per centum or more of the time to direct resource protection, resource management activities or research, and an assessment of the effectiveness or adequacy of these personnel in meeting resource management objectives;

(3) a detailed and specific discussion, developed in accordance with the requirements of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection, of continuing, newly implemented and/or recommended systemwide policies, plans, programs, actions, commitments, and accomplishments for both the direct management actions and the research programs of the National Park Service relating to the prevention and reversal of factors and forces which are altering or damaging, or threatening to alter or damage, the welfare and integrity of natural and cultural park resources, which discussion shall include, but not be limited to—

(A) management policies, directions, and priorities;

(B) accomplishments in and progress toward resolving specific problems described in the current and the previous State of the Parks report;

(C) continuing research projects;

(D) new administration and research proposals for park protection and resource management programs;

(E) an itemized estimate of the funding required for the following two fiscal years to carry out both the continuing and the new management actions and research programs;

(F) legal authority available for addressing damage and threats emanating from outside unit boundaries, the effectiveness of that authority in preventing damage to the natural and cultural resources, and suggestions for new authority which may promote resource protection; and

(G) the progress in meeting the objectives of this Act;

(4) a discussion of the adequacy of past and present congressional appropriations in addressing protection and resource management programs; and

(5) a determination and explanation of funding needs for fulfilling the mandates of this section.

(b) In the preparation of the State of the Parks report, the National Park Service shall take appropriate steps to solicit public involvement. A preliminary draft of the report shall be made available to the public for a period of thirty days for review and comment no less than three months before the final report is due for submission to the Congress. Notice of the availability of such draft for public review and comment shall be published in the Federal Register. A summary of public comments received shall be transmitted with the State of the Parks report.

SIGNIFICANT RESOURCE PROBLEMS

SEC. 5. The Secretary shall identify and establish priorities among at least the fifty most critical natural and the fifty most critical cultural resource problems or threats within the national park system and shall prepare a detailed analysis of such problems or threats (with an estimate of the funds necessary to reduce or eliminate the problems or threats). Such analysis shall be made annually and shall be submitted to the appropriate committees of the Congress on the same date as the submission of the President's budget to the Congress.

SCIENTIFIC ADVISORY ASSISTANCE

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary shall take such steps as may be necessary to contract with the National Academy of Sciences for development of a plan for the National Park Service to conduct natural and cultural resources inventories and research directed to the problems of and the solutions for natural and cultural resource problems within the national park system.

(b) The plan required under subsection (a) shall be simultaneously submitted to the Secretary and to the appropriate committees of the Congress no later than eighteen months after the effective date of this Act. Three months and six months after the effective date of this Act, the Secretary shall submit to the appropriate committees of the Congress a written statement as to his progress in the consummation of arrangements with the National Academy of Sciences for the development of such a plan.

(c) Funding for such plan shall derive from funds specifically appropriated for this purpose to the National Park Service.

RESOURCE MANAGEMENT PLANS

SEC. 7. Resource management plans for each unit of the national park system, including areas within the national capital region, shall be prepared and updated no less frequently than every two years. Such plans shall address both natural and cultural resources of the park units and shall include, but not be limited to—

(1) a historical overview of the past composition, treatment, and condition of the resources;

(2) a statement of the purposes and objectives for the management and preservation of the individual and collective components of the resource base;

(3) an inventory of significant resources and their current condition, prepared in accordance with acceptable scientific baseline data collection methods;

(4) an identification of current and potential problems, emanating from sources both inside and outside park unit boundaries, associated with the protection and management of the resources;

(5) a comprehensive, detailed program of proposed actions to be taken to prevent or reverse the degradation of the natural and cultural resources of the park, including a proposed schedule of actions to be initiated and the estimated costs to complete such actions; and

(6) a brief summary of accomplishments in resolving resource problems identified pursuant to paragraphs (4) and (5) of this subsection.

General management and other relevant plans developed for each park unit shall be brought into conformity with the park unit's resource management plan, and the resource management plan shall be used to provide data for the State of the Parks report. The Secretary shall establish guidelines for the National Park Service setting forth procedures whereby the development of general management plans and resource management plans shall be coordinated with other affected Federal agencies, States, and local governments.

LAND CLASSIFICATION REVIEW

SEC. 8. The Secretary shall conduct a review of the current land classification system for the preservation and use of lands within national park system units, and shall adopt such revisions as may be appropriate to assure the protection of park resources, appropriately balanced with the use and include the development of a new classification for maximum resource protection where restricted use may be necessary to protect sensitive ecosystems and cultural resources or areas of special value for research, scientific, or related purposes. The review mandated by this section shall be completed and the results adopted by January 1, 1985.

INTERNATIONALLY RECOGNIZED AREAS

SEC. 9. (a) Those park units accorded the designation of "biosphere reserve" or "world heritage site" shall receive priority attention and consideration for prompt, heightened resource data collection, monitoring, and resource protection efforts. The Secretary shall develop a document, setting forth such policies and guidelines as are appropriate to achieve these objectives, to be published in draft form in the Federal Register no later than January 1, 1985 for public comment, and published in final form no later than April 30, 1985. Such document shall be revised subsequently as appropriate.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that with respect to any international park located within the United States and any adjacent nation which has been recognized and designated as a Biosphere Reserve under the auspices of the international conservation community, the responsible park management officials of the United States and such nation, in conjunction with appropriate legislative and parliamentary officials, establish means and methods of ensuring that the integrity of such Biosphere Reserve is maintained, and the collective attributes for which it was so recognized and designated are accorded the highest practicable degree of continuing protection.

PUBLIC LAND MANAGEMENT

SEC. 10. (a) In any case of areas which are within any unit of the national park system, where the Secretary of the Interior is vested with any authority to—

(1) issue any lease;

(2) authorize or permit any use, occupancy, or development of such areas;

(3) sell or otherwise dispose of such lands or waters or interests therein or sell or otherwise dispose of any timber or sand, gravel, and other materials located on or under such areas. he may exercise such authority only after he has determined that the exercise of such authority will not have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such national park system unit was established (including the scenery and the natural and cultural resources). Such determination shall be made only after notice and opportunity for a hearing on the record. The process for collecting needed information and evaluation thereof for this section or section 11 may be integrated with such planning and decisionmaking processes as are required by other law, except that the determination of the effect upon park resources shall be a separate document or a separate chapter within a document executed by the Secretary of the Interior or the head of any other Federal agency or instrumentality as may be required by this section or section 11.

(b) In any case of areas which are adjacent to any unit of the national park system, where the Secretary is vested with any authority described in subsection (a), the Secretary may exercise such authority only after he has determined that the exercise of such authority will not have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such national park system unit was established; except that if the Secretary determines that—

(1) any significant adverse effects on the values for which the national park system unit was established are clearly of lesser importance than the public interest value of the proposed action; and

he may exercise such authority. The Secretary shall publish the record of such decision in the Federal Register and transmit copies of such decision documents to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives. The Secretary shall not implement such decisions until thirty legislative days after such transmittal.

(c) This section shall not apply to inland waters except those which the Federal Government owns.

FEDERAL PROGRAM REVIEW

SEC. 11. (a) Each agency or instrumentality of the United States conducting or supporting activities within or adjacent to any unit of the national park system shall, to the extent practicable, undertake to insure that those activities will not significantly degrade the natural or cultural resources or values for which the unit was established. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to give rise to a cause of action in any court of law.

(b) During the normal procedure utilized by any Federal agency in deciding to undertake or approve any Federal action (except such actions as may be required for maintenance or rehabilitation of existing structures or facilities) on areas within or adjacent to any unit of the national park system, the agency head (or the Secretary as determined pursuant to subsection (d) of this section), shall consider whether such action may degrade or threaten the natural or cultural resources of any such unit, and if the head of such agency finds that such action may have such an effect, he shall notify the Secretary in writing. Such notification shall, at a minimum, include a description of the proposed action, the proposed agency's views as to the potential short and long term impact of the proposed action on the park unit's resources, and any measures proposed by the agency to prevent or minimize adverse effects on such park unit's resources.

(c) The Secretary shall respond in writing with regard to the foreseeable impact on park resources of such proposed Federal action and shall include recommendations for any changes in the proposed Federal action needed to avoid adverse effects on park resources. Such response shall be submitted to the proposing Federal agency within sixty days after receipt of notification required by subsection (b). The response by the Secretary shall include (as an attachment) the views of professional personnel within the National Park Service whose expertise is relevant to the issue of the impact of such proposed action on park resources.

(d) In any instance in which the Secretary has not been notified of a Federal agency's proposed action and on his own determination finds that such action may threaten the natural or cultural resources of any unit of the national park system, the Secretary shall notify the head of such Federal agency in writing. Upon such notification by the Secretary, such agency head shall promptly provide the Secretary with the information specified in subsection (b), and any other relevant information in the possession of such agency if requested by the Secretary, and such notification by the Secretary pursuant to this subsection shall thereby invoke the other relevant provisions of this section.

(e) The Secretary shall fully consider any adopted city, county, State, or Federal comprehensive development plans or elements thereof and shall, if requested by the affected governmental unit, hold a public hearing prior to responding to the Federal agency if such response to the proposed action is to be negative. The hearings are to be held at or near the site of the proposed action or project after notification of the affected local government unit.

(f)(1)(A) In all cases where the proposed Federal action would occur upon federally owned lands or waters within the authorized boundary of a national park system unit, the proposing Federal agency shall comply fully with the recommendations of the Secretary.

(B) In all cases where the proposed Federal action would occur upon areas not owned by the Federal Government within the authorized boundary of a national park system unit, the proposing Federal agency shall fully consider the recommendations of the Secretary and shall comply with such recommendations, unless the head of such agency, after consideration of applicable law, including the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535; 16 U.S.C. 1–4), and the Act of August 18, 1970 (84 Stat. 825; 16 U.S.C. 1a–1 through 1a–7) finds that the public interest in the proposed action is greater than the public interest in avoiding the adverse effects on the natural and cultural resources of the affected national park system unit. The proposing Federal agency shall, upon such determination publish the record of decision in the Federal Register and notify, in writing, the Secretary and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives of such decisions, including the reasons therefor, and shall not implement the proposed action for thirty legislative days after the date of such transmittal.

(2) In any case where the proposed Federal action involves areas adjacent to the boundary of a national park system unit, the proposing Federal agency shall fully consider the recommendations contained within the response from the Secretary. The proposing Federal agency shall transmit the details of the planned final course of action to the Secretary prior to implementing such action. In any instance in which there is substantial disagreement between the proposing agency's course of action and the Secretary's recommendations to the agency, the Secretary shall, within ten days of receipt of the agency's planned final course of action, notify, in writing, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives. The proposing Federal agency may proceed with the proposed final course of action at the time of transmittal to the Secretary, except that if the proposed final course of action is inconsistent with the recommendations of the Secretary, the proposed final course of action shall not be implemented for thirty legislative days after the date of such transmittal to the committees of Congress referred to in the preceding sentence.

(g) The Secretary shall publish promptly (but in all cases within ten days) in the Federal Register a notice of—

(1) receipt of any proposed Federal action, including a summary of the key components of the proposal and the location and availability of supporting documents, and

(2) notice of the response made by the Secretary to the proposing agency, including all recommendations made by the Secretary.

(h) The following Federal actions which constitute a major and necessary component of an emergency action shall be exempt from the provisions of this section—

(1) those necessary for safeguarding of life and property;

(2) those necessary to respond to a declared state of disaster; and

(3) those necessary to respond to an imminent threat to national security.

(i) Any action under this Act must be brought in the United States district court for the district in which the national park system unit concerned is located, and such court shall have jurisdiction to provide any appropriate relief.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE, COOPERATION, AND PLANNING

SEC. 12. (a) The Secretary is directed to cooperate with, and is authorized to provide technical assistance to, any governmental unit within or adjacent to the units of the national park system where the results of such cooperation and assistance would likely benefit the protection of park resources. There shall be initiated, by the superintendent of each unit of the national park system, an effort to work cooperatively with all governmental agencies and other entities having influence or control over lands, resources, and activities within or adjacent to the park unit for the purpose of developing, on a voluntary basis, mutually compatible land use or management plans or policies for the general area.

(b) Those personnel assigned to provide assistance described in subsection (a) shall be employees of the National Park Service knowledgeable about the affected unit of the national park system and the resources that unit was authorized to protect.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to make grants to units of local government for the purposes described in subsection (a). Such grants shall not exceed $25,000 in any fiscal year to any unit of local government. The Secretary shall develop criteria for the awarding of grants, with such criteria to include priority for awards which will afford the greatest increased degree of protection to critically degraded or threatened park resources.

(d) There is authorized to be appropriated not more than $750,000 in each of fiscal years 1984, 1985, and 1986 for the purposes of this section. Such sums shall remain available until appropriated, and such sums as may be appropriated shall remain available until expended.

(e) Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, no less than two park units in addition to all "biosphere reserves" and "world heritage sites", for each administrative region of the national park system shall have initiated the effort described in subsection (a). No more than two years after the date of enactment of this Act, each unit within the national park system shall have initiated such an effort.

(f) In no more than two years following the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall assure that each unit, or each regional office for the region in which a unit is located, has on its staff at least one person who is trained and knowledgeable in matters relating to the provisions of this section, and whose principal duty it shall be to coordinate the activities which are related to the provisions of this section. The Secretary shall initiate, within no more than one year of the date of enactment of this Act, a training program for park personnel in the principles and techniques necessary to carry out the requirements of this section.

PUBLIC INFORMATION PROGRAM

SEC. 13. By January 1, 1984, the Secretary shall initiate and shall continue to develop, a public information program designed to inform park visitors and the public of the problems confronting the protection of park resources and the solutions being implemented to address those problems. Educational information of this nature shall be made available to youth groups and to educational institutions.

PERSONNEL

SEC. 14. The Secretary shall promptly and continually take actions to assure that the staffing of the National Park Service provides for an adequate number and distribution of personnel with sufficient scientific and professional knowledge and expertise to provide for the protection and management of the natural and cultural resources. Scientific research shall be directed to the resource protection and management needs of the park system units. Programs, guidelines, and standards for the following shall be under development by no later than January 1, 1984, and completed no later than January 1, 1985:

(1) employee training programs in resource protection and resource management;

(2) performance standards for all employees as related to resource protection and resource management;

(3) qualification criteria related to resource protection and resource management for positions to be filled by new employees; and

(4) career ladders for employees specializing in resource protection and resource management, with equitable promotion opportunities for advancement into mid-level and senior general management positions.

GENERAL MANAGEMENT PLANS

SEC. 15. Section 12(b) of the Act of August 18, 1970 (84 Stat. 825; 16 U.S.C. 1a-1 through 1a-7) is amended by inserting the following at the end of the first sentence: "Each such plan shall be reviewed, revised and approved no less frequently than every ten years or it shall cease to constitute an officially approved plan. All plans not fully addressing all of the following elements on January 1, 1984, shall be revised and approved to so address all such elements by no later than January 1, 1988.".

DONATIONS

SEC. 16. (a) In the case of real property located adjacent to, or within or in the near vicinity of, any unit of the national park system if—

(1) the owner of any interest in such property desires—

(A) to make a contribution of such interest to any person, and

(B) to have such contribution qualify as a charitable contribution under section 170 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to deduction for charitable, etc., contributions and gifts), and

(2) the Director of the National Park Service determines that the contribution of such interest to such person will protect or enhance the unit of the national park system, the Director of the National Park Service shall, upon such 24 owner's written request, promptly take appropriate steps to assist the owner in satisfying the requirements of such section 170 with respect to such contribution.

(b) The assistance provided by the Director of the National Park Service under subsection (a) shall include (but shall not be limited to) providing for—

(1) a professional valuation of the interest in real property being contributed, and

(2) a statement as to the importance of such contribution related to protecting and enhancing park unit values.

ALASKA NATIONAL INTEREST LANDS CONSERVATION ACT PRIORITY

SEC. 17. In all cases where the Secretary determines that the provisions of this Act are in conflict with the provisions of the Act of December 2, 1980 (16 U.S.C. 3101-3233), the provisions of the Act of December 2, 1980 (16 U.S.C. 3101-3233) shall prevail.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 18. As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "Appropriate committees of the Congress" means those committees of both the House and the Senate which have primary jurisdiction for the authorization of national park system units and programs or for the appropriation of funds for the acquisition and operations of such units and programs.

(2) "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior acting through the Director of the National Park Service except where specific reference is made to the Secretary of the Interior.

(3) "Resource" and "resources" includes—

(A) in the case of natural resources, the geology, paleontological remains, and flora and fauna which are principally of indigenous origin, and

(B) in the case of cultural resources, the historic and prehistoric districts, sites, buildings, structures, objects and human traditions associated with or representative of human activities and events, including related artifacts, records and remains.

(4) "National park system" has the meaning provided by section 2 of the Act of August 8, 1953 (16 U.S.C. 1b-1c).

(5) "Federal action" means any Federal project or direct action, or any Federal grant or loan to a public body.

(6) The term "thirty legislative days" means thirty calendar days of continuous session of Congress. For purposes of this paragraph—

(A) continuity of session of Congress is broken only by an adjournment sine die; and

(B) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of the thirty-day period.

SAVINGS PROVISION

SEC. 19. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to exempt the Secretary of the Interior, the Director of the National Park Service, or any other department, agency, or instrumentality of the United States from compliance with any other requirement of law.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 20. Effective October 1, 1983, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Department of the Interior such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

COMPLIANCE WITH BUDGET ACT

SEC. 21. Any new spending authority (within the meaning of section 401 of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974) which is provided under this Act shall be effective for any fiscal year only to the extent or in such amounts as provided in appropriations Acts. Any provision of this Act which authorizes the enactment of new budget authority shall be effective only for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1983. Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect or impair any authority to enter into contracts, incur indebtedness, or make payments under any other provision of law.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, this is an important and major bill. It has been a product of a lot of work in the House Interior Committee, especially the work of our subcommittee chairman (Mr. SEIBERLING).

After we had concluded our markup and voted in our committee to report the bill the distinguished Committee on Public Works and Transportation expressed some concern about the bill on the jurisdiction question. It was for that reason that after conferring with my colleagues on this side, I introduced the amendment which is now pending before us. It is basically a clean bill amendment which incorporates some of the provisions which were of concern to the other committee. With that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SEIBERLING TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. UDALL

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEIBERLING to the amendment in the nature of a substitute by Mr. UDALL: Page 13, strike out line 7 and all that follows down through line 13 on page 20 and substitute:

SEC. 10. (a) In any case of areas which are within any unit of the National Park System, where the Secretary of the Interior is vested with any authority to—

(1) issue any lease;

(2) authorize or permit any use, occupancy, or development of such areas;

(3) sell or otherwise dispose of such lands or waters or interests therein or sell or otherwise dispose of any timber or sand, gravel, and other materials located on or under such areas,

he may exercise such authority only after he has determined that the exercise of such authority is not likely to have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such National Park System unit was established (including the scenery or the natural or cultural resources). Such determination shall be made only after notice and opportunity for a hearing on the record. The process for collecting needed information and evaluation thereof may be integrated with such planning and decisionmaking processes as are required by other law, except that the determination of the effect upon park resources shall be a separate document or a separate chapter within a document executed by the Secretary of the Interior.

(b) In any case of areas which are adjacent to any unit of the National Park System, where the Secretary of the Interior is vested with any authority described in subsection (a), the Secretary of the Interior, before exercising such authority, shall determine whether such action is likely to have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such National Park System unit was established, and if he finds such an effect would be likely and that the public interest in preventing such adverse effect on such values significantly outweighs the public interest value of the proposed action, taking into consideration the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535; 16 U.S.C. 1-4), and the Act of August 18, 1970 (84 Stat. 825; 16 U.S.C. 1a-1 through 1a-7), then he shall decline to exercise such authority. The Secretary of the Interior shall publish the record of such decision in the Federal Register and transmit copies of such decision documents to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United Senate and to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives.

(c) This section shall not apply to inland waters except those which the Federal Government owns.

SEC. 11. (a) When a Federal agency or instrumentality undertakes or proposes to approve a Federal action within or adjacent to a unit of the National Park System which it determines may have a significant adverse effect on the natural or cultural resources of such unit, such agency or instrumentality shall—

(1) promptly notify the Secretary of the Interior of the action at the time it is planning the action, preparing an environmental assessment regarding the action, or preparing an environmental impact statement under the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 for the action;

(2) provide the Secretary of the Interior a reasonable opportunity to comment and make recommendations regarding the effect of the Federal action on the natural and cultural resources of the National Park System unit concerned; and

(3) notify the Secretary of the Interior of the specific decisions in response to the comments and recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior.

The requirements of this subsection shall be carried out in accordance with procedures established by the Federal agency responsible for undertaking or approving the Federal action. These procedures may utilize the procedures developed by such agency pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act.

(b) Following receipt of notification pursuant to subsection (a)(1), the Secretary shall make such comments and recommendations as he or she deems appropriate pursuant to subsection (a)(2) as promptly as practicable in accordance with the notifying agency's procedures established pursuant to subsection (a). In any instance in which the Secretary of the Interior does not provide comments and recommendations under subsection (a)(2), the Secretary of the Interior shall notify, in writing, the appropriate committees of Congress.

(c) Following receipt of the notifying agency's decisions pursuant to subsection (a)(3), the Secretary of the Interior shall submit to the appropriate committees of Congress, including the authorizing Committees with primary jurisdiction for the program under which the proposed action is being taken, a copy of the notifying agency's specific decisions made pursuant to subsection (a)(3), along with a copy of the comments and recommendations made pursuant to subsection (a)(2).

(d) In any instance in which the Secretary of the Interior has not been notified of a Federal agency's proposed action within or adjacent to a unit of the National Park System and on his or her own determination finds that such action may have a significant adverse effect on the natural or cultural resources of such unit, the Secretary of the Interior shall notify the head of such Federal agency in writing. Upon such notification by the Secretary of the Interior, such agency shall promptly comply with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section.

(e) Each agency or instrumentality of the United States conducting Federal action upon Federally owned lands or waters which are administered by the Secretary of the Interior and which are located within the authorized boundary of a National Park System unit shall not approve such action until such time as the Secretary of the Interior has concurred in such action.

(f) Except as otherwise permitted by law, nothing in this section shall be construed to require any State or local government to carry out any study or prepare any document or response to comments or recommendations made by the Secretary of the Interior regarding any State or local activity supported by an agency or instrumentality of the United States which is subject to this subsection.

(g) The following Federal actions which constitute a major and necessary component of an emergency action shall be exempt from the provisions of this section—

(1) those necessary for safeguarding of life and property;

(2) those necessary to respond to a declared state of disaster; and

(3) those necessary to respond to an imminent threat to national security.

Any federal action which pertains to the control of air space, which is regulated under the Clean Air Act, or which is required for maintenance or rehabilitation of existing structures or facilities shall also be exempt from the provisons of this section.

Mr. SEIBERLING (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, the amendment would amend sections 10 and 11 of the amendment in the nature of a substitute to H.R. 2379 just offered by Chairman UDALL.

Section 11 has been completely rewritten with the assistance of our colleague, the chairman of the Public Works and Transportation Committee, JIM HOWARD, and conforming and technical amendments to reflect those changes were made to section 10.

Mr. Chairman, I am deeply indebted to our colleague, JIM HOWARD, for his help in clarifying section 11 so that we not inadvertently cause some problems or delays with agencies involved in developing and maintaining our national transportation system and other public works projects. It has been a pleasure to work with him on this issue. I look forward to other cooperative ventures between us which will demonstrate that environmental and development interests can be served side by side if approached in good faith and a cooperative spirit.

Mr. Chairman, turning first to section 10, this section deals only with situations where under existing law the Secretary of Interior has authority to issue a lease, grant a permit, or sell or dispose of Federal land or national resources. Before taking such action inside a national park the amendment would require the Secretary to determine that it would not have a significant adverse effect or would not be likely to have a significant adverse effect on the values for which the park was established.

In cases where he would be taking such action outside of but adjacent to a national park, section 10 would require the Secretary to determine whether such action would be likely to have a significant adverse effect on the values for which the park was established, and if so, then before proceeding he would be required to determine whether the public interest and the proposed action outweighs the public interest in protecting the park values against the possibility of such adverse effect.

The Secretary would be required in either case to publish his decision in the Federal Register and to notify the Congress. Since the decision would be part of the normal decisionmaking process of the Secretary, no extra layer of bureaucracy or delay would be imposed.

Turning now to section 11, Mr. Chairman, as amended by this amendment, it would insure that Federal agencies with responsibilities for Federal actions within or adjacent to national parks inform the Secretary of Interior whenever there is a possibility that a significant adverse effect on the particular national park may result in any such action by such an agency.

At this point, I would call my colleagues' attention to the narrow definition of Federal action in section 18 of the bill which limits it to Federal projects or direct actions and Federal grants or loans to public bodies.

Primary responsibility for deciding which Federal actions might have an adverse effect on a national park would rest with the Agency having the authority to take the proposed action. However, the agency would be required to give the Secretary of the Interior a reasonable opportunity to comment on the effect of the proposed action on the values for which the park was established.

The procedures utilized to conduct the review would be those of the project agency. This insures that any comments made by the Secretary correspond in time and form to the Agency's regular procedures. Where the Agency fails in its duty to obtain comments from the Secretary or the Secretary disagrees as to the lack of impact of an action, the Secretary may require the Agency to initiate the review and comment process contemplated by section 11, which is the one I have just described.

The Secretary would be required to submit to Congress a copy of the Agency's final decision.

The Congress, I might add, would, of course, then be free to do what it wished, but there is no provision for delay of the Agency's decision in order to give Congress further time. That has been removed from the bill.

Section 11 should have little effect on agencies already fully complying with the National Environmental Policy Act, or NEPA for short. NEPA, as implemented by the Council on Environmental Quality, already requires the kind of notice and comment required by section 11 whenever a national park would be adversely affected to a significant degree. Thus, the bill provides that NEPA procedures may be used in complying with section 11.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SEIBERLING was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. It is not the intent of this bill to add to the procedural requirements of NEPA, but to insure that the procedures used, whether under NEPA or otherwise take into consideration the effect of the proposed Federal actions on the natural and cultural resources of nearby national parks.

If the proposed Federal action would take place on lands administered by the Secretary of the Interior within a national park then and only then the concurrence of the Secretary would be required before the other Federal agency could approve such action.

I want to reiterate. Only where the action would take place on lands administered by the Secretary within a national park would his concurrence with the other agency be required.

Section 11 also provides that it is not to be construed as requiring any State or local government to make any study or prepare any document or response beyond what is already permitted under existing law.

Finally, emergency actions or actions necessary to preserve health and safety or actions necessary to respond to a threat to national security are also exempted by section 11. Further exempted are Federal actions pertaining to the control of air space, the maintenance or rehabilitation of existing structures, whether within or outside a park, and actions regulated under the Clean Air Act.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

The amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HANSEN OF UTAH TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. UDALL

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANSEN of Utah to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. UDALL: Strike out sections 10, 11 and 12 and substitute:

FEDERAL PROGRAM REVIEW

SEC. 10. (a) In any case of areas which are within any unit of the National Park System, where the Secretary of the Interior is vested with any authority to—

(1) issue any lease;

(2) Authorize or permit any use, occupancy, or development of such areas;

(3) sell or otherwise dispose of such lands or waters or interests therein or sell or otherwise dispose of any timber or sand, gravel, and other materials located on or under such areas,

he may exercise such authority only after he has determined that the exercise of such authority will not have a significant adverse effect on the values for which such National Park System unit was established (including the scenery or the natural or cultural resources). Such determination shall be made only after notice and opportunity for a hearing on the record. The process for collecting needed information and evaluation thereof may be integrated with such planning and decisionmaking processes as are required by other law, except that the determination of the effect upon park resources shall be a separate document or a separate chapter within a document executed by the Secretary of the Interior.

(b) This section shall not apply to inland waters.

SEC. 11. (a) When a Federal agency or instrumentality undertakes or proposes to approve an action within or adjacent to a unit of the National Park System which it determines may have a significant adverse effect on the natural or cultural resources of such unit, such agency or instrumentality shall—

(1) promptly notify the Secretary of the action at the time it is planning the action, preparing an environmental assessment regarding the action, or preparing an environmental impact statement under the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 for the action;

(2) provide the Secretary a reasonable opportunity to comment and make recommendations regarding the effect of the Federal action on the natural and cultural resources of the National Park System unit concerned; and

(3) notify the Secretary of the specific decisions made in response to the comments and recommendations of the Secretary.

The requirements of this subsection shall be carried out in accordance with procedures established by the Federal agency responsible for undertaking or approving the Federal action. These procedures may utilize the procedures developed by such agency pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act.

(b) Following receipt of notification pursuant to subsection (a)(1), the Secretary shall make such comments and recommendations as he or she deems appropriate pursuant to subsection (a)(2) as promptly as practicable in accordance with the notifying agency's procedures established pursuant to subsection (a). In any instance in which the Secretary does not provide comments and recommendations under subsection (a)(2), the Secretary shall notify, in writing, the appropriate committees of Congress.

(c) Following receipt of the notifying agency's decisions pursuant to subsection (a)(3), the Secretary shall submit to the appropriate committees of Congress, including the authorizing Committees with primary jurisdiction for the program under which the proposed action is being taken, a copy of the notifying agency's specific decisions made pursuant to subsection (a)(3), along with a copy of the comments and recommendations made pursuant to subsection (a)(2).

(d) In any instance in which the Secretary has not been notified of a Federal agency's proposed action within or adjacent to a unit of the National Park System and on his or her own determination finds that such action may have a significant adverse effect on the natural or cultural resources of such unit, the Secretary shall notify the head of such Federal agency in writing. Upon such notification by the Secretary, such agency shall promptly comply with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section.

(e) Each agency or instrumentality of the United States conducting Federal action upon Federally owned lands which are administered by the Secretary and which are located within the authorized boundary of a National Park System unit shall not approve such action until such time as the Secretary has concurred in such action.

(f) Except as otherwise permitted by law, nothing in this section shall be construed to require any State or local government to carry out any study or prepare any document or response to comments or recommendations made by the Secretary regarding any State or local activity supported by an agency or instrumentality of the United States which is subject to this subsection.

(g) The following Federal actions which constitute a major and necessary component of an emergency action shall be exempt from the provisions of this section—

(1) those necessary for safeguarding of life and property;

(2) those necessary to respond to a declared state of disaster; and

(3) those necessary to respond to an imminent threat to national security.

Any federal action which pertains to the control of air space, which is regulated under the Clean Air Act, or which is required for maintenance or rehabilitation of existing structures or facilities shall also be exempt from the provisions of this section.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE, COOPERATION, AND PLANNING: LIMITATION ON CAUSES OF ACTION

SEC. 12. (a) The Secretary is directed to cooperate with, and is authorized to provide technical assistance to, any governmental unit within or adjacent to the units of the National Park System where the results of such cooperation and assistance would likely benefit the protection of park resources. There shall be initiated, by the superintendent of each unit of the National Park System, an effort to work cooperatively with all governmental agencies and other entities having influence or control over lands, resources, and activities within or adjacent to the park unit for the purpose of developing, on a voluntary basis, mutually compatible land use or management plans or policies for the general area.

(b) Those personnel assigned to provide assistance described in subsection (a) shall be employees of the National Park Service knowledgeable about the affected unit of the National Park System and the resources that unit was authorized to protect.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to make grants to units of local government for the purposes described in subsection (a). Such grants shall not exceed $25,000 in any fiscal year to any unit of local government. The Secretary shall develop criteria for the awarding of grants, with such criteria to include priority for awards which will afford the greatest increased degree of protection to critically degraded or threatened park resources.

(d) There is authorized to be appropriated not more than $750,000 in each of fiscal years 1984, 1985, and 1986 for the purposes of this section. Such sums shall remain available until appropriated, and such sums as may be appropriated shall remain available until expended.

(e) Within one year after the date of enactment of the Act, no less than two park units in addition to all "biosphere reserves" and "world heritage sites", for each administrative region of the National Park System shall have initiated the effort described in subsection (a). No more than two years after the date of enactment of the Act, each unit within the National Park System shall have initiated such an effort.

(f) In no more than two years following the date of enactment of the Act, the Secretary shall assure that each unit, or each regional office for the region in which a unit is located, has on its staff at least one person who is trained and knowledgeable in matters relating to the provisions of this section, and whose duty it shall be to coordinate the activities which are related to the provisions of this section. The Secretary shall initiate, within no more than one year of the date of enactment of this Act, a training program for park personnel in the principles and techniques necessary to carry out the requirements of this section.

(g) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to give rise to a cause of action in any court of law.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, in this particular bill that we are discussing, that we discussed yesterday in great detail, I think it should be made abundantly clear that the members of the minority and many of the majority do not have any problems with the particular idea of internal threats to the park. Many of us have spent hours reading this report called "State of the Parks." We agree with the need to address internal threats that we have there. Many of us have many parks in our own districts. We have 14 in my State. There are more in Alaska, Wyoming; and all over the United States we have them. And they truly are the jewels in the crown of our national heritage, and we feel good about these things.

However, I would like to point out that during our debate yesterday two of the sections in this particular bill, sections 10 and 11, are really not reasonable the way that they are drafted.

I want to commend the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING), for addressing some of the concerns that we had yesterday in his revisions that were just adopted under section 11.

My amendment addresses similar concerns with section 10, makes some technical changes to section 11 to correct inappropriate references to so-called Federal ownership of water, and adds a much needed limitation on litigation that could otherwise arise from this bill.

The major substance of my amendment is to limit the relinquishment of Congress primary responsibility over external threats to national parks. Remember, I am talking about external threats to the national parks. I have no problem with addressing the internal ones we have talked about, and I think we have delineated very carefully what those internal threats are. My concern is with the expansion of the jurisdiction and authority of the Secretary of the Interior over lands adjacent to, that is outside of, the 334 national park units in this country.

This would be accomplished by eliminating from section 10 the new authority granted to the Secretary over lands adjacent to. I want to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, lands adjacent to the parks.

Let me make it very clear that is what we are talking about, outside the parks. I hope no one confuses the idea we are talking about anything inside the parks.

Throughout the life of this bill there has been considerable controversy over exactly what section 10 of this bill says and what it does, and what its impacts would be. I recognize there has been some controversy over here, and I further recognize sometimes it is a legitimate difference of opinion that we are talking about.

I have heard some Members of this body talk about attempting to eliminate this ambiguity. I still make the point: Do we as Members of this body want to put on the regulators, want to put on the courts, the ability to try to define these words adjacent to?

I remember once as a freshman legislator in the State of Utah where Governor Rampton, a very fine Democrat from that area, stood up and said: "Don't give me legislation that isn't clearly defined, that will have to go into the courts." I think that was good advice at that particular time, and it is excellent advice at this particular time, because if we go this way we are asking to put critical issues into the courts to be defined.

Consequently, following committee action on the bill, we requested an independent review and study of the legislation, and particularly the potential impacts of sections 10 and 11, from the Congressional Research Service and the General Accounting Office. This was through myself and the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. CHENEY). This is an independent study.

Let me now read what some of these conclusions were regarding this issue that, for the most part, to confirm our serious concerns and reservations about the impacts of this legislation, particularly section 10 in its current form, upon jobs, upon grazing, upon tourism, upon timber, upon water projects, upon transportation and other public works projects, upon mineral exploration and assessment, development of natural resources, and the list just goes on and on, and it, in effect, talks to all 435 of us, if we think about it, in our own districts.

Let me just briefly quote from what this report says. It says:

> The access limitation (under section 10) and the additional costs and requirements (under sections 10 and 11) has the potential to dampen interests in mineral leasing or timber harvesting in high potential areas.
> Because of the pattern of land ownership in many areas * * * limiting access to or across Federal lands could have the effect of closing some private lands—

With this particular piece of legislation—> from development. In effect, relatively large areas of land, both public and private, could be removed from consideration for mineral leasing or timber harvesting.

And if that is what we want to do, I guess we would vote for this bill. But we have already established those park boundaries. We know what those boundaries are. The wisdom of this group, the other body and the President have said the boundary is there.

We did not expand the boundary out for 5 miles or for 100 miles, and Lord only knows which one it is, under this bill, because no one else seems to know.

For many of the same reasons that would restrict leasing, exploration would also be impeded. These are just a few of the statements and conclusions from these independent reports.

Finally, I have from the very beginning been extremely concerned about the new opportunities this legislation, particularly section 10, would provide for dilatory litigation by any individual or group seeking to block activities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. HANSEN of Utah was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Section 10 would provide for dilatory litigation by any individual or group seeking to block activities of local governments, activities of all those little cities that surround our parks, and every one of us has literally hundreds of them around this great country, Federal land users and even private lands.

An independent legal counsel has concluded, and the following is his statement, if I may read it because I think it is extremely important:

The imprecise nature of the bill, with its many ambiguities and uncertainties, would invite a constant stream of litigation; thereby forcing the courts to decide the future of virtually every Federal action adjacent to park system units. The result: Delay, higher costs, lost jobs, resources, etc., when we so badly need them at this time.

My amendment addresses these serious impacts on legitimate activities outside of parks while maintaining those provisions of H.R. 2379 that provide additional management tools for park preservation and protection.

I ask your support for my perfecting amendment and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strenuous opposition to the amendment.

First of all, I would say that this amendment would eliminate the most important subsection in the entire bill, in effect gutting the bill.

The crux of the section that would be eliminated by this amendment is a very simple requirement that before he exercises authority he already has to grant a lease, to sell land or Federal property on the land, or to grant a use permit on Federal lands adjacent to a national park, that the Secretary shall make an evaluation of the action, and weigh first of all its impact on the national park, if it is adjacent to a national park; and, second, if he finds that it would be likely to have an adverse effect, a significant adverse effect on a national park, to weigh that impact versus the public interest in going ahead with the particular project.

That is what the Secretary is supposed to do now. That is the purpose of the National Environmental Policy Act. That is the way you keep him from making arbitrary decisions, to require that he balance the various concerns that he is supposed to have in mind.

By existing law that has been in effect ever since 1916, and reinforced by subsequent acts such as the act of August 1970, dealing with the park system and the Redwoods National Park Act and its general provisions, the Secretary is supposed to protect the national park system. So before he exercises his existing authority, and this bill adds nothing to his existing authority, it merely tells him that before he exercises that authority he is supposed to determine whether it will have an adverse impact, if it is adjacent to a park, and if so, to weigh that consideration versus the public interest in the project.

How can anyone possibly object to that?

Yet, that is all my amendment says, which has already been adopted. What the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) would do is to take that out entirely. Furthermore, his amendment would do one other thing. It would say that nothing in this act can be enforced in a court of law.

I will stipulate right here and now that the intention of this bill, as amended by the amendment just adopted, is not to require a court of law or to give a court of law any authority to review the substantive decision of a Secretary under this Act.

If that is already required by other law, fine, and I think it is in some cases.

This is a procedural act, and certainly we should not deprive the courts and the public of making sure that the procedures set forth in this act, the procedures of notifying the Secretary, of notifying the Congress, of giving consideration to whether it has an adverse impact on the park, certainly those procedures should be followed, or else the law is a farce.

□ 1450

And a court should have the right to enforce those procedures. So that is the second thing that is wrong with the gentleman's amendment. Otherwise, I have no particular quarrel with it.

So I will be glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN).

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I appreciate the chairman of our subcommittee, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) yielding to me.

Let me just say the reason for my amendment and the problem that is basically there with section 10 it is obvious to me, is that it extends to all lands adjacent to the parks a new standard.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Would the gentleman yield? Only lands administered by the Secretary of Interior, not all lands.

The gentleman agrees that is all it covers, right?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Well, if I may respectfully disagree with the gentleman, you should also go to the definitions section covering areas, that talks about particular areas, where moneys would be loaned by HUD or some other organization to that particular area.

Mr. SEIBERLING. But that is not section 10, that is section 11.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. By which the Secretary must abide.

Mr. SEIBERLING. If the gentleman would permit, the gentleman does not change that section.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. If the gentleman would let me continue, I think I would like to and I think I can explain it.

A new test by which the Secretary must judge, if we accept the gentleman's premise, that is the ground all around the park sites in the West, and I would assume around some of the other areas; BLM and Forest Service surrounds the vast majority, in fact, I cannot think of one in my State that is not surrounded in that way. But that is just my State, I guess; I guess Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, Montana, New Mexico, Arizona, California, they are probably all in the same boat. But maybe there is one back East that does not go that way.

But anyway, all applications for right-of-way, leases, et cetera, made within such adjacent to lands, the standard or the test now is "if the right-of-way lease", et cetera "would have a significant adverse effect on the part," it cannot be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SEIBERLING was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the new amendment changes the standards slightly, slightly under the new standards. The Secretary must analyze each right-of-way, et cetera, in this way: One, will the right-of-way and lease have a significant adverse effect on the park? Two, is a significant adverse effect likely to occur? Three, is public interest better served by preventing the significant adverse effect than by allowing the right-of-way?

The new standard, I am free to admit, is an improvement, no question about it. But it still places all activities in any proximity to the park under the burden of a cloud.

In the hands of a zealous Secretary, and I guess that would be a very interesting argument on this floor as to what constitutes a zealous Secretary in light of what has gone on in the last few days. I would say that Cecil Andrus was a zealous Secretary but surely the gentleman would have some other comments on that. The public interest of protecting the park could always be found to exceed the public interest of mineral exploration, harvesting, sewer projects, streets, sidewalks, all of those areas that come into that.

I stand in opposition to section 10(b) and put that in our amendment because it creates a buffer zone around every national park within which every use of the public lands is made subservient to the protection of the park. That is a priority of use that is not right.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I would like to recapture my time and say first of all the gentleman continues to say that every activity adjacent to a national park would be affected. I would like to point out again that section 10(b) which is the one he would eliminate which has already been adopted by the House is one which only applies to land administered by the Secretary under authorities that he already has.

So first of all it does not add any authority or take away any authority; it merely relates to authority the Secretary already has.

Second, it does what I think the gentleman would have to agree, and I would hope he can give me his attention, something the Secretary already has to do.

Does the gentleman mean to say that under existing law if the Secretary is considering action adjacent to a national park, whether it is to lease land or grant a right-of-way or sell Federal land, that he would not have to weigh the impact of that on the park? Is that what the gentleman's position is, that existing law does not require the Secretary to consider the impact of his action on the adjacent national park which he also administers? I cannot believe the gentleman would take that position because that is certainly not the law.

The law today is that the Secretary is supposed to weigh all the public interest factors involved in making a decision of that sort and certainly the impact on a national park which he himself administers is one of those factors he should take into account.

So all this does is spells it out, he is to weigh the public interest values of the action he is proposing to take versus any adverse impact it is likely to have on an adjacent national park. I cannot really see how that differs from what he is required to do now. It merely states it explicitly. It does not add any new authority to him at all.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, it is very obvious; then if that is the case, why do we need it? If it is already there there is no reason for this other piece of information or authorization that the bill talks about.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, the gentleman talked about——

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. The gentleman made the statement to me. Does the gentleman actually feel it is going to hurt these things? He had that authorization now, he has the right now as you accurately pointed out.

Mr. SEIBERLING. The gentleman talked about zealous Secretaries of Interior. Certainly none is more zealous than the present incumbent. What his zeal is directed to is another question.

Certainly it is not directed to protecting the natural and cultural values in the national parks to the same degree as it is directed toward developing certain other types of resources, regardless of the consequences on the national park or other natural values.

So all I can say is if there ever was a reason for spelling it out we have that reason today, and that is in the demeanor and actions of the present Secretary.

I do not yield any more, I am almost out of time. Let me just make one other comment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SEIBERLING was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Let me just comment on the so-called objective report of the Congressional Research Service, or the reports, I should say, which we were only furnished a copy of yesterday afternoon for the first time. Let me say I finally read them yesterday evening and they are an absolute disgrace.

There is something wrong with the Congressional Research Service that would put out reports that do not even state the plain language of the bill correctly and go on to spin a fine yarn about the supposedly horrendous implications of an act.

All I can say, any resemblance between the bill before us and the one described in these reports seems to be purely coincidental and they have no credibility whatsoever. And they are so bad I am going to take it up with the Director of the Congressional Research Service as to whether he is going to continue to allow his staff to put out hogwash like this.

That is my reaction to the CRS studies.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Sure I will yield to the gentleman from Alaska.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. I thank the gentleman for yielding. Mr. Chairman, to call a report hogwash because a gentleman does not agree with it is very offensive to me. The gentleman says one report is great, the report on the national parks.

Do not call a report that I happen to agree with hogwash. I am shocked.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I am sorry that I have shocked the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Well, it would not be the first time.

Mr. SEIBERLING. All I can say is that that was my reaction after reading the reports which are full of egregious errors.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud to stand today in support of my colleague from Utah's amendment to section 10, subsection b of the Parks Protection Act of 1983.

Before I discuss the major issues that I think are of concern here, one of the privileges or maybe one of the luxuries of public service is to pick and choose, to take what you like and to impugn or oppose that which you dislike.

I have before me a State of the Parks Report of 1980. I understand that is a creation of the Congressional Research Service and Department of the Interior. I do not know how many times my chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Lands has referred to this document as gospel. I suspect the same people that were involved in the research of the last several weeks that brought about or attempted to bring about some definitions as to the ambiguities that reside in section 10, probably were the same people who have some degree of expertise and authority as it relates to laws and how they affect the public lands of this country.

Why am I today standing in support of the amendment to the Seiberling amendment that strikes in essence the term "buffer zone"? I think in the colloquy between my colleague from Ohio and my colleague from Utah we have established that in the law today the Secretary, in large part, when considering an activity on the public lands of this country that in some way is adjacent to or might impact the environment in which a national park resides, that he must, by the law, take into consideration the action that would be taking place on that public land that in some way might impact our parks.

There is a phrase that came from New York—it did not come from Idaho or Utah where some of those pristine parks reside—it is a phrase that came from Broadway in New York that says, "On a clear day you can see forever."

One of the concerns that a good many of my constituents in the West have is that on a clear day in the middle of Yellowstone Park on the right mountain top it is possible to see forever. Now, what does forever mean? What does buffer zone mean in the concept of the Secretary of Interior being able to reach out the long arm of the Federal law and in some way impact an activity that is so far afield from a park or a park's ecosystem that it would only cause the kind of confusion that can ultimately result from the intrusion of the Federal Government?

Let me give the Members an example of, I think, some of the frustrations that result and the problems that we have that the Congressional Research Service in essence attempted to address in defining what buffer zone means.

What does a buffer zone mean to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Lands versus myself, as a minority member on that committee?

Well, would we say that the 2.2 million acres of that great national park, Yellowstone National Park, that encompasses about 3,437 square miles of land, would have a buffer zone of 10 miles? OK; let us agree that the Secretary of Interior in some way is going to be able to make the determinations on that 10-mile buffer zone. What have we allowed him to do in the extension of his authority? We have allowed him to take within the authority of the park itself an additional 1.8 million acres. Or, in other words, we have allowed him to extend the authority and the size of Yellowstone National Park nearly 80 percent. That impacts on my grazing lands in Idaho, that impacts on my timber lands in Idaho, that impacts on the job base in my State, and it has a variety of other kinds of concerns that I think are only now beginning to emerge, and why only now? Because my colleague from Utah cannot define buffer zone. My colleague from Ohio cannot define buffer zone. We have allowed a broad ambiguity to be placed in a law that is attempting in some way to define, refine, and protect the ecosystems of our great park system.

Have we accomplished anything by that? I am not going to impugn the integrity of the attorneys and the authorities over at the Congressional Research Service. What I am going to say is that in the language they examined, their frustration, which was explained in their definition, is just simply that. It is undefinable to say to what extent we are dealing with when we deal with a buffer zone.

Are we referring to a 10-mile margin?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. CRAIG) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CRAIG was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CRAIG. Or are we saying in some way that once we have established that margin of protection, way beyond the ecosystems of the great parks of this Nation, that we will then turn to the wilderness lands of this country and say in some way that on that clear day, when you stand on Castle Peak in Idaho and see for 300 miles, that some activity, on some Federal property, may in fact impact the vistas, the grand vistas that we in the West are so proud of, and therefore, for some reason, the long arm of the bureaucracy of the Department of the Interior will reach out, under the auspices and the blessing of the chairman of the subcommittee, and determine use on a piece of public property 200 miles away.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAIG. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I do not think it is necessary to just talk in the abstract about the so-called Congressional Research Service papers. Let me just read from the one the gentleman has cited.

The first sentence of the paper of September 15 says:

> H.R. 2379 and amendment No. 1 would effectively create buffer zones around all national parks in order to limit or to reduce the impact of outside activities on the park.

Then it goes on for seven pages talking about how terrible it would be if we had buffer zones and at the end of page 8, it says:

> The bill and the substitute amendment do not specify the creation of buffer zones, but they do assist the Secretary of Interior in preventing federal activity that would degrade the natural and cultural resources of the park.

So, in effect, what they are saying is, no, the bill does not create any buffer zones, it does not specify any buffer zones, but we think that it would de facto, and that is our interpretation and therefore we are going to expend eight pages telling about how terrible it would be to do that and at the end of that we will admit that the bill does not specify buffer zones.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, let me reclaim my time then, at that point, to say that the gentleman and I agree. We agree by the statement the gentleman made on the floor today that law currently exists on the books.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. CRAIG) has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CRAIG was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CRAIG. The gentleman and I agree that the laws on the books today provide for the Secretary of Interior to extend his authority, when necessary—I cannot quote the gentleman——

Mr. SEIBERLING. I do not agree with that, but if the gentleman would yield, I will tell him what I said.

Mr. CRAIG. All right. I would like to hear it again, because I think it is important in the context of what we are trying to duplicate here today.

Mr. SEIBERLING. This bill deals only with the exercise of existing authority that the Secretary has under law with respect to lands surrounding national parks. And where he takes action, as described in the bill, under the authority, which could have an adverse affect on the park, all this bill says is that first he will consider what the effect will be and second, he will weigh that against the public interest in taking the action in question.

Now, in the opinion of many experts, the existing law, including NEPA and the laws governing the park system, require him to make that evaluation now. But this Secretary does not always pay attention to that existing law. So all this does is spell it out in no uncertain terms.

Mr. CRAIG. I will reclaim my time then. And I guess what the gentleman is saying then, this is not a bill for all time. This is a bill for the current Secretary.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Oh, no, it is for all Secretaries.

Mr. CRAIG. Well, I am confused. I think the chairman of the subcommittee said that most experts agree today that the Secretary does have this authority to make those determinations, but the gentleman said that this Secretary chooses not to do that.

I guess the question is, between the gentleman and myself, apparently it is the gentleman's judgment that the Secretary is violating current law and yet no one seems to have brought him to task for that kind of violation.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAIG. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I do have a couple of points of clarification both from the gentleman from Utah and the gentleman from Idaho.

The first point, before we have had so much discussion about CRS that there may have been a misstatement.

The state of the parks report, the gentleman would agree, is a product of the Department of Interior, not the Congressional Research Service; is that correct?

Mr. CRAIG. I agree that that is true, but I also understand that the consulting efforts that went into the overall creation of the state of the parks report of 1980 had a tremendous amount of input from the Congressional Research Service and their authorities on the General Public Lands Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. CRAIG) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. BEREUTER and by unanimous consent, Mr. CRAIG was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

□ 1510

Mr. BEREUTER. If the gentleman will yield further, that may well be the case, and I believe it is the case. I just wanted to make clear we are talking about the state of the parks report, which is really the product of the Department of Interior at the instigation of Congressman Burton and Congressman Sebelius, both former colleagues.

I am really trying very hard to understand the limit of the disagreement of the gentleman from Idaho and the gentleman from Utah on the bill.

Section 10 does relate exclusively to Department of Interior lands, and I gather that the gentleman's comments concerned are mostly addressed to section 11 where we are dealing with what the gentleman referred to as the buffer zones.

From our own contact in the past Congress, that is a term that drives me up a wall, but the gentleman is entitled to use it. I would ask this of the gentleman, because I am one who contemplates the impossibility of suggesting a standard definition of land, like 10 miles or 5 miles, that suits all purposes. I would contend that in some cases 10 miles is far too much and, therefore, we ought to have something in which discretion can be exercised.

So I would ask this question of the gentleman: If we were to define something for "adjacent to" in an area kind of definition, what would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. CRAIG. The reason you have not heard the gentleman suggesting a specific definition or a margin of distance in miles is for the very reason that we have all just been discussing. We find it, in large part, undefinable. We do recognize in current law that the Secretary has the authority and the discretionary authority in some areas to make judgments as it relates to impact of activities on public lands in conjunction with the park systems of this country.

What I am suggesting is that which is being proposed by the chairman of the Public Lands Subcommittee of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs is simply an unnecessary addition to existing law.

Mr. BEREUTER. And that is section 10 or section 11?

Mr. CRAIG. That is both.

Mr. BEREUTER. Does the gentleman disagree with the specific requirements levied on this Secretary and all future Secretaries—and I would say it is all of the Secretaries that I am concerned about—to open up the process on Interior lands itself? Does the gentleman disagree with that?

Mr. CRAIG. No, I do not have any disagreement with that.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for the courtesy of his response.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Hansen substitute. I rise in strong support of the substitute, and if it is not adopted I also urge the defeat of this legislation.

The legislation is unneeded, it is unwarranted, and it is a waste of time.

The gentleman from Ohio has said before that we already have laws on the books. They have been implemented, they will be implemented, and our parks are being protected. If the gentleman from Ohio and those who would support this legislation desire to make the parks larger, then let us do it. I went through, I know many of you know, the making of many, many parks in my State. The lands were set aside with the idea that the buffer zone was built into the borders, as these other parks were. This is really a ripoff, trying to increase the size of the parks for certain special interest groups.

The adoption of the Hansen substitute improves upon the Udall bill or by the bill and admitted by the gentleman from Ohio, eliminating the legal uncertainties. The CRS has pointed out buffer zone language will invite litigation. Lawsuits could hold up vital municipal and State projects. We have heard these arguments.

I want to stress again that it is just not the West, although we hear it just from the Western Congressmen talking about this issue. But for those of you who might be listening to this program in your offices, it affects any monument or any national park or battlefield in your area. It affects your REA electrical lines, it could affect your sewer and water projects, your highway systems, your sound factor. It is far-reaching. Of course, the Secretary has to do some of these things now, but it does not meet the criteria of all that 472,000 lawyers that we have in the United States today, and there is going to be lawsuits and litigation. Right here on this floor right now we have lawyers arguing the legal points. If you think it is bad here when we are trying to make laws, wait until the special interests become involved in this.

Again, Mr. Chairman, if we do not adopt the Hansen substitute which makes this very poor piece of legislation more palatable, then I suggest we should defeat the whole thing.

I was sort of a little bit chagrined when my good friend and chairman, the gentleman from Ohio, referred to one study as hogwash and another one as the Biblical truth. Also was I chagrined when he directed the idea that this legislation was for the present Secretary of the Interior, when I checked back through my history and find out that this legislation was introduced and I believe passed by the House under the previous administration, until they finally woke up to the realities on the other side that this was bad legislation, and it did not pass the other body. I suggest that it should not even pass this body this time, and it should not become anywhere near law. It should be eliminated so that we have really the responsibility to the local communities to recognize that they are being affected.

I do not know why we need this legislation. Why do we need it, if already the laws are on the books? Why did it not pass the body the last time when we had a Secretary who put away 56 million acres by the stroke of a pen into a park or a monument. And we had one named Stewart Udall who put 78 million acres, I believe it was, into a monument also by a stroke of the pen.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I think I can clarify the gentleman's confusion, and that is simply that, no, this bill was not taken up or passed under the previous administration. As I recall, during the last Congress, at which time this bill passed the House by a vote of 319 to 84, the Secretary of Interior was Mr. Watt and the President was Mr. Reagan. So it has not changed in the last year since that action was taken.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Maybe I am confused.

Mr. SEIBERLING. We are dealing with the same bill, the same administration.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Did the gentleman not sponsor this legislation in 1979?

Mr. SEIBERLING. No.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. In 1978?

Mr. SEIBERLING. No.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Then time does fly in this body when we are having fun, does it not? I thought those were the dates, and I apologize to the gentleman. I thought the gentleman and I had cosponsored this, of all things, before I realized the folly of my ways.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN) cosponsored it and coauthored it.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Well, that goes to show that we are enlightened by the presentation of my good and esteemed collleagues on this side that we recognize that the legislation is not needed.

Again, I urge the Hansen substitute. It is the important factor if we want to make this turkey fly. It is now November, it will be November next month, I suggest that if the substitute is not adopted, then we should defeat the legislation and do not allow it to become law.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the bill.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I appreciate the great support the gentleman has given us in the committee as well as the support he is giving us now.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to correct the misstatement that keeps cropping up in the remarks that have just recently been made on that side of the aisle. They keep talking as though this bill grants additional authority to the Secretary of the Interior. It does not. What it does do is impose an explicit duty on the Secretary of the Interior to weigh the values that would be adversely affected by any action he proposes to take under his existing authority versus the values of going ahead and exercising that authority. That is not granting him authority; that is imposing a duty on him.

So let us get that clear. And all it says is that where the Secretary has authority and proposes to exercise it in or adjacent to a national park, he shall consider, he will weigh, the public interest value in exercising that authority versus the impact of it on the park.

I cannot really imagine that any Secretary of the Interior who was doing his job right would not observe that obligation, because if he adds up all of the requirements placed upon him by existing law, he already has that duty. But all this does is make it absolutely clear that that is his obligation, and it sets up a procedure whereby he notifies the Congress as to his decision.

So that is all there is to this bill. But it is perfectly clear that there are some people in some places who do not want to see the Secretary weigh those values. That is a two-edged sword. The amendment of the gentleman would also do one other thing: It would eliminate any possibility of requiring the Secretary to make that weighing of values by taking him to court.

All I can say is, there may be times when it works the other way, when the Secretary may have failed to do that and failed to approve some project that some of the gentleman's constituents might wish to have, and they might wish to go into court and say, "Wait a minute, Mr. Secretary, you did not weigh the public interest of going ahead with this right-of-way or this sale next to this park as you were required to do. You made an arbitrary decision. And so we are going into court to compel you to observe the procedures that are set forth in the law."

I think that is something that everybody would want the Secretary to do, and I cannot imagine that the gentlemen are really sincerely saying that he should not do that.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. CLARKE) yielding me time.

□ 1520

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, let me say at the outset that I am a supporter of this legislation and that I am a sponsor, and that the chairman of the subcommittee is correct. We support this legislation because we love our parks. We are proud of them. We want them protected.

I do not believe that is the issue here. In spite of all of the rhetoric that we hear, Interior has increased substantially the amount of money designated for maintenance of our national parks, to upgrade those parks, the roads, the water systems, upkeep on buildings.

During my last tour of all of the various parks in the States, I had seen 2 years or a year before, that some of them were deteriorating, that some of the logs were, as a matter of fact, rotting out, they were being replaced. So we see those kinds of things. We see restoration of ruins of Indian tribes, of maybe some forts of days gone by, rehabilitation of trails, general maintenance. As a matter of fact, the gentlemen will remember that many of us supported the Youth Conservation Corps because one of its prime reasons for existence was to furnish manpower to keep up our national parks.

So we do not believe that our parks should not be protected. As a matter of fact, quite the opposite. We feel very, very strongly that those parks should be protected.

We do believe, however, that a portion of this legislation is in error, and that is the crux of the argument in this amendment, and that is the whole question of the definition of "adjacent." Now, what does that mean? Does that mean one mile? Does that mean 10 feet, 50 miles, 100 miles? It is undefinable, and when you have such a provision in a bill, it invites all kinds of suits.

Let me propose to you, for example, why it is undefinable. In some areas, perhaps a mile or even 10 miles might be proper. But it was brought out time and again in committee that, say, at Ford's Theater over here, if you have defined "adjacent" as 1 mile or 2 miles or whatever, it is going to include the entire city of Washington.

I can see that by this provision being here, if someone, the groundskeeper or whatever they call him, at the White House desires to mow the lawn and he does not think it is an adverse action on Ford's Theater, which is adjacent to the White House, and he goes ahead and mows the lawn, somebody can bring a lawsuit on that because they thought that perhaps the pollen flying around, or whatever flies around, was an adverse action to the Ford's Theater.

So I say say to my friends that while we do support the upkeep and, as a matter of fact, the improvement of all our national parks, we are going on bad ground here, and they support this amendment because it removes the word "adjacent" and removes the requirement that anyone who is going to have any kind of a project, that is one more thing, one more permit, so to speak, that they have to get, one more regulation that they must comply with.

So it seems to me that it would behoove all of us to support the amendment of the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am not from any of the Western States and do not have any large areas of parks in the State of Louisiana, but if I were from one of the so-called Western States west of the Mississippi, I would have some very, very severe problems with the language before the committee at the present time with regard to what we are talking about, the so-called buffer zones.

I think anyone from any of the Western States needs to take a very careful look at the potential effect that this language would have on private lands, totally private lands, as far as any activities that might require some kind of a permit from the Federal Government. Parks can, should, and are protected, and they should be. What we are talking about today is extending a directive to the Secretary of the Interior as to what he must do on lands that are not within the park area but the lands that are adjacent to the park.

My first real serious concern about this is how big of an adjacent area are we giving some mandated instructions to the Secretary of the Interior about? Are we talking about one acre? Are we talking about 10 acres? Or perhaps we are talking about literally hundreds of thousands of acres that happen to be adjacent to a park that could be completely and totally privately owned and privately held by individuals. But we are saying today that the Secretary is going to have to make a decision that if he has to take any action, whether it be issuing a permit, whether it be issuing a right-of-way, whether it be considering the sale of any minerals that are underneath these Federal private lands, that the Secretary is going to have to decide himself, without consultation with any other Federal agencies, whether that could be a signficantly adverse impact on the park.

The reason I say we do not need this is very simple, because we have existing laws in place that are already working very well with regard to actions that involve a Federal decision on private lands that are adjacent to a park or not adjacent to a particular Federal park. We have the National Environment Policy Act. We cannot have a major Federal action on private land under the National Environmental Policy Act that may have an adverse effect without doing an environmental impact statement.

The difference in the existing law and what we are trying to do in this legislation which I object to is that we are saying that the Secretary is going to make the decision on whether that action has significant adverse impact. The current National Environmental Policy Act calls upon the Secretary to make that decision in consultation with other Federal agencies like the Corps of Engineers, like the Department of Energy, like the CEQ, the Council on Environmental Quality, where all the agencies in the Federal Government look at that action and make a determination on any potentially significant adverse effects it might have on a park or on anything else, for that matter.

This changes that. This is a major change. This says the Secretary, and there is only one Secretary, shall consider it, and he alone makes that decision, and I object to that. I do not think it is right.

I do not know of any problems that we have with the existing system. I do not know of an instance where an action has been taken that has required an environmental impact statement and that impact statement has said this will present a significant adverse impact, that a Secretary has issued a permit over that objection. If, in fact, he would dare issue a permit over an objection, he would be sued, and I do not know of a court decision where the actions of a Secretary in issuing a permit over a finding in an environmental impact statement has been upheld by the court. In other words, we simply do not have a problem with the way things are working.

So for the reasons that I have outlined, the fact that it is too broad and too vague, and the second fact is that it is already being handled quite well, and the third thing is that this eliminates other Federal departments which I think should be involved in the process, I would object to the existing language and support the Hansen amendment very strongly.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Has the gentleman read section 10(b) of the amended bill, which we just amended on the floor?

Mr. BREAUX. Yes. I would say to the gentleman from Ohio that I have read the language, and the language where it says that the Secretary, that he shall decline to exercise such authority, where it says that he shall make a finding of whether it has a significant adverse effect, where it says that he and he alone, meaning he does not consult with anybody else in the Federal Government, whether the corps or the CEQ or whether any other agencies of the Federal Government.

□ 1530

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BREAUX. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I am looking at subsection 10(b) and I find nothing where it says that he and he alone shall make such a decision. Tell me where it says that.

Mr. BREAUX. Well, let me just read to the chairman of the subcommittee what I am talking about. It says, "In any case of areas which are adjacent to any unit of the national park system, where the Secretary is vested with any authority described in subsection (a), the Secretary"—before exercising such authority shall make this determination. It speaks solely to the Secretary, which I presume is the Secretary of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BREAUX was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. But we are only talking about situations, where as spelled out in section 10(a) where he already is vested with authority; so we are not adding any authority. We are merely imposing additional duties.

Mr. BREAUX. I would say to the gentleman in response, we do not have very much time, that while the Secretary is the only one that has authority to issue a permit, under the existing law, under the National Environment Policy Act, he has to make consultations with other Departments of the Federal Government, as many as five, before he makes that decision.

Mr. SEIBERLING. This does not change that at all.

Mr. BREAUX. I would submit that this legislation eliminates that and that is where I object to it. We should not be eliminating the other Departments of the Federal Government, because they have a legitimate role in determining whether, in fact, a significant adverse impact is going to occur on these areas. With this language, their role is being diminished, if not in fact, completely eliminated.

For that reason, I think without this amendment we should not be supporting this legislation.

I think what the committee has done, the chairman of the full committee and the chairman of the subcommittee, is admirable legislation, with this exception. It is a significant change in existing law on how we handle private lands. I think therefore, the amendment is absolutely essential.

Mr. MARRIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I appreciate the opportunity to stand up and congratulate my colleague, the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) on a very timely amendment.

We studied this bill in the Interior Committee. Those who were there voted against it. It only passed because someone pulled out a pocketful of proxies and they got it through.

There is no justification for this legislation. Therefore, I strongly support the amendment of the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) which makes it somewhat livable.

I want to just make a couple of points and that is that this bill in a time when we are trying to put together all the funds we can to solve some of our western problems is going to spend about $13 million over the next 5 years strictly doing paperwork, duties that can be done in another way and they are already being done by the administration.

I am totally puzzled about the buffer zone that again has been mentioned several times. As I read the language and try to find out how this affects the State of Utah, it seems to me that the entire State of Utah would be buffered out in this case. I mean, when you look at the checkerboard land layout, when you see the fact that the language is ambiguous and we do not know what buffer zone means, I think that the entire State of Utah is affected by this legislation. A 10-mile buffer zone around Utah parks would eliminate about 9.1 million acres of land, which is 20 percent of the State.

I cannot imagine anybody out there being very enthusiastic about going from a State that is already owned by the Federal Government to the extent of 70 percent now being locked up by this buffer zone so that now the Feds control somewhere around 90 percent.

This bill would impact community planning. It would certainly hurt natural resource development. It would impact lands already leased. It would affect and severely restrict transportation problems and it would just add additional restrictions to those already under the Clean Air Act.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, provides virtually unlimited authority to restrict mineral development on lands in the West adjacent to the parks. Twenty percent of all the known oil and gas resources in the State of Utah are within 15 to 20 miles of a park. We are very unclear as to what effect that would have. I do not think any State that is an energy State would sit still very long if this amendment does not pass.

If the Hansen amendment passes, I would be happy to support the bill. If it does not, I would urge the House and the committee to vote against the bill on the grounds of commonsense and energy development in this country.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The Hansen amendment, of course, affects sections 10, 11, and 12, and I congratulate the gentleman from Utah on the change that he made to section 12. It is a change that I think was discussed in the Interior Committee, in the previous Congress and this Congress as well. I was a member of that Interior Committee during the 97th Congress when we debated this legislation, of which I am an original cosponsor. We strove long and hard to find solutions to some of the problems with section 11 that the gentleman from Utah and the gentleman from Idaho and others have raised here today. We strove our very best to find those answers. Perhaps we have not found them yet to the satisfaction of everybody. I am going to try to see if we can narrow down the extent of our disagreement here today, because I have heard favorable comments by some of the opponents to the legislation, favorable if, in fact, we can solve the problems that seem to be focused in on section 11.

I would ask the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) if he would respond to a question that would help me focus in on what the real differences are.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I would be happy to.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman.

On the gentleman's amendment, the title given to section 10 is changed from "Public Land Management" now to "Federal Program Review," which was the title that previously applied to section 11.

I would ask the gentleman if there is anything that is specifically behind that change that relates to Secretary of the Interior lands which are covered by section 10, but not section 11.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I think the chairman made that change in the amendment that came up previously.

Mr. BEREUTER. I see; so the gentleman is simply repeating that?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. That is on section 10.

Mr. BEREUTER. That is a title that seems a little confusing to me, although we are talking about Federal program review and each public land management section originally in the title did affect the Secretary of the Interior only.

I understand from comments with the gentleman a few minutes ago, private comments, that his concerns do not necessarily go exclusively to lands controlled by the Secretary of the Interior, but to leases that might be under his authorization to be applied to private lands, and that is correct, is it not?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I would be happy to elaborate on that, if the gentleman from Nebraska would allow me to.

Mr. BEREUTER. Yes; I would be pleased to let the gentleman do that.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. The basic problem, and I think we are all down to this, the basic problem is that section 10(b) creates a new standard in which park interests shall totally dominate over any other use. If you want to subject all other uses outside of parks totally to park interests, then you would support the bill as it now exists; however, if you want to allow all competing interests to be balanced—and we stress the word "balance"—then you would support the Hansen amendment to section 10(b). I really think that is the whole basic issue of the thing and it is a philosophical difference.

I come down on the side of total balance on the uses, and they are fair and balanced, and not the idea that the park use is ahead and superior to the other uses. I think everyone here would agree that has talked so far to that particular issue.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for clarification of his point of view.

We have had a suggestion here that there is really no problem that needs to be addressed; but I would like to focus in on one specific type of problem that is currently not well addressed in this country with respect to our national parks. I am going to concentrate only on the matter of geothermal energy development threats to our national park system. As an example of current threats to our national park system from development on adjacent Federal lands, I might also say it applies to private lands, but I am concentrating only on the Federal, let us consider the development of geothermal energy resources which is proposed today in the boundaries of Yellowstone, Crater Lake, Lassen, and Hawaii Volcano National Park, 22 parks in 12 States have this potential threat to them. At Yellowstone today we have hundreds of leases that are pending of Forest Service land, less than 15 miles from Old Faithful in a national forest.

At Lassen, lease applications blanketing the southern boundary of the park of the Lassen National Forest are under appeal to the Chief of the Forest Service, however, and here is the key point, the Forest Service has stated that while it could impose lease stipulations to protect national forest resources, it has no authority and neither does the Park Service to impose lease stipulations to protect park resources.

The same is true with respect to the situation at the Yellowstone National Park. What I am suggesting is I congratulate the gentleman opposed to this for bringing to us the concept of buffer zones which are nowhere mentioned in the legislation.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BEREUTER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BEREUTER. The reason that of course this creeps up is because we are talking about adjacency which they would suggest on the opposition side is ill-defined. But the minute we talk about some definite amount of geography, like 5 miles or 10 miles, we are talking then with truly creating a buffer zone which has been the object of all the attacks out here.

Now, here in the case of Idaho, we may well have geothermal potential that is some 70 miles or 80 miles from Yellowstone but still have an effect. And the effect of drilling in those areas, be they public or private lands, may well not become fully understood until the damage is done in Yellowstone National Park to that unique asset in the world.

So, that is why we have had to come with something that is less precisely defined in the area of adjacency.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

As you express your concern about geothermal exploration in the boundaries and/or near the areas of some of our national park systems, I would be the first to tell you I am concerned, and in no way do I know of anyone of this floor that would want to see geothermal drilling that in some way might damage the caldera system of the greater Yellowstone Park and ultimately Old Faithful or that guiser basin area. That is a real concern on the part of some of us.

Now, are you telling me today if geothermal drilling takes place on federally owned lands, that environmental assessments, environmental impact statements to the best of the knowledge of geologists and those who are specialists in geothermal areas as it relates to what that drilling may do, are something that is not stipulated in the process of gaining leases for the purpose of drilling?

Mr. BEREUTER. At the present time I would respond to the gentleman the Director of the Forest Service says that he has no ability to consider potential impacts upon the national parks, only of the national forests, when he makes his decisions about leasing arrangements.

Mr. CRAIG. In the least process, environmental impact statements must be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER) has expired.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER) be allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wonder if we could have agreement on putting a time limitation on discussions on this amendment and all other amendments to this bill of 4:15?

I make that as a unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER) is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman (Mr. BEREUTER) yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. I will be brief in consideration of others and other amendments.

It is my understanding at this time as it relates to environmental assessment or impact studies and therefore licensing, yes, I would expect you to get an answer from the Forest Service that, no, they could not specifically consider. But I will suggest to you that in a geothermal system in which someone may be seeking the right to drill for the purpose of developing the geothermal resource, that today systems as the caldera or others associated with parks and resources within parks are considered as potential impact and realities of such activities that might exist within that leasing activity.

Mr. BEREUTER. I would reclaim my time just to say I appreciate the gentleman's comments. I would say this: After 3 years it seems to me that despite having striven for a solution to what is an appropriate areas for consideration, so that review and comment can be had from proposed Federal actions adjacent to our national parks, opponents have still not come up with a better idea. And I solicit. And I thank my colleagues for considering my comments.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the State of the Parks Report, as suggested in this bill, is a sound move. It has real value to our national parks and country. I also find myself in strong agreement that we ought to protect our parks.

I do have some concerns, though, and I would ask the gentleman from Utah to respond to my questions, if he would.

I would like to know specifically what areas are adjacent and what areas are not adjacent.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I do not know if we have enough time to respond to the gentleman from Colorado. Let me just say this—because the information is not defined, we do not know what "adjacent to" is, we do not know if it is half a mile or a hundred miles. That is one of those things, the areas where we have disagreement with the gentleman from Ohio, and one of the reasons why we are putting in this amendment that we feel will handle that problem.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Let me be very specific, because I think this is critical to understanding the bill.

I see section (c) says, "This section shall not apply to inland waters except those which the Federal Government owns."

Now, we both know that the Federal Government has laid claim at one time or another to much of our inland water. I would like to know if this act will cast a cloud on water projects in Colorado that flow through National Parks.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I think it opens it up. It seems very obvious to me that is now opened up. It is one of the things that would come under direction of the Secretary under section 10(g) of the act as presently drafted without my particular amendment in it. Without that being changed I think specifically the answer is it would come under the direction.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. What about water projects in California that draw out of the Colorado River?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I am sure they would have the same problem.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. What about water diversions in Arizona?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I agree all the way along you could carry this onto a somewhat ridiculous conclusion, if I may say so, and carry it to any extent on any Federal water project.

If I may, I would like to point out I think the gentleman from Ohio and myself may have not got this out completely. When we talk about adjacent Federal grounds it also states very, very carefully in the bill that, "All projects which need authority to proceed." So, here we have the private XYZ Widget Co. and they need authority to go across the BLM ground, then they have to have the authority from the Secretary of the Interior. A city may need authority from the Secretary of the Interior. An airport may need authority from the Secretary of the Interior. It is so all-encompassing it almost boggles the mind. But it is not just the Federal ground. It is those who need authority from the Secretary to proceed. And I think that pretty well answers a lot of the questions you have previously asked.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Are we saying this particular bill without a definition of "adjacent to" can cast a cloud over every major project in the Western United States?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I guess it is one of those very interesting arguments you could get into. I think that could easily be the interpretation of it, because right now we do have a cloud over it. We have it on water projects.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Let us come to Washington, D.C.

We have a number of national monuments, national park facilities in Washington, D.C., and the surrounding areas. Let us say that we are contemplating a low-cost housing project in Washington, D.C., for the poor that is within several miles of a national monument. Is that adjacent? Does that come under these guidelines?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Let me ask you this: Was it going to have Federal money in the low-cost housing project which is adjacent to the national park?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Then it does come under it.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. What about a sewer plant to clean up our waste water.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Does this have Federal money?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Then it comes under it.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. What about a highway to move traffic in and out of Washington, D.C.?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. If it has Federal money in it, it is under it and it needs the Secretary of the Interior to OK it.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. What about a new bridge?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Again, Federal money is in this one, I assume. In that event we are again brought into this.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. What about a water treatment plant for clean drinking water?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. If it has Federal money in it, we are in it again.

□ 1550

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I hope that the advocates of the bill would spell out to me why they oppose spelling out what "adjacent to" is.

I offered an amendment in committee that addressed this area. Without some sort of clear definition of what "adjacent" is, the measure cast a cloud on water projects throughout the Nation, adjacent to parks.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BEREUTER. I am not aware of the amendment the gentleman offered in this Congress, not being a member of the committee. But I well recall that subsection (c) here is placed in the bill perhaps inappropriately at the instigation of the gentleman, because in the 97th Congress the gentleman raised a question, as I recall it, about a federally built water structure in a national park in his State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. BROWN) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BEREUTER and by unanimous consent, Mr. BROWN of Colorado was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BEREUTER. If the gentleman will continue to yield so I may complete the sentence, I believe the gentleman's concern was that a possible impediment might be placed in the way of reconstruction of that particular federally constructed reservoir, probably in the Rocky Mountain National Park. It seems to me that we had worked that out, but it does not parallel the language here, which seems to me to be overly broad.

Is my recollection correct in what really prompted this matter in the first place, the gentleman's concern about a federally constructed reservoir within his own national park area?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. The gentleman's recollection is accurate. My concern is not only for what would be in the park, but waters that are claimed by the Federal Government that flow out of that park. Anything that affects waters that go into or out of the parks has a cloud cast over them without some definition of "adjacent."

I would say this: I think paragraph C is a big improvement over no limitation. I think we could do a better job in tightening the bill in that area.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I am deeply interested in this bill, representing, as I do, the western congressional district in Montana. We have bordering the western district on its north Glacier National Park and on its south Yellowstone National Park.

As a member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs for two terms and until this January, I worked with both the minority and majority in trying to draw a bill that would both adequately protect the great national heritage of this Nation, our national parks, while still allowing appropriate Federal development and efforts within sight and sound of the national parks.

I have looked closely at this bill, although no longer a member of the committee, and I am as convinced now as I was 2 years ago that this bill would provide us with the necessary mechanisms with which to allow appropriate development near our parks.

I can tell you that in our State of Montana that does not happen today. Many Montanans have been attempting to build what they believe is a needed Federal highway just to the south of Glacier National Park. That highway has been held for the better part of a decade through court suits.

That is the sole place for the resolution of the issue. Such determinations should be shared with the steward of the national parks, the Secretary of the Interior. We should provide him with the coordinating mechanisms and the review process necessary to grant his approval, even though it is not absolutely needed, that these efforts such as that highway, or energy development or other efforts to either go ahead or not. We currently do not have that necessary, prescribed mechanism.

The point is that we are constantly being drug through the court process year after year after year.

Is it protecting the parks? Yes. But is it allowing appropriate adequate clean development to go forward in the shadow of the parks? No.

This legislation would allow that.

I know that is not the way the gentleman from Utah and some others who are supporting his amendment see it. But I say to my colleagues here in the House that after 3 years of working with this bill, and as one who is very concerned about both the protection of the parks and the appropriate development outside but near the parks, I am convinced that this bill, as it is written is go, prudent, reasonable legislation which will accomplish both of those necessary ends.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I will be pleased to yield to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman.

I want to just add a word to the discussion that just took place with respect to inland waters.

The purpose of that provision that says this section 10 shall not apply to inland waters is to make it clear that this does not require an evaluation of water projects that deal with inland waters, and the only purpose of putting in the exception that says "except as to water which the Federal Government owns," is to take care that we are not, in effect, changing the existing water law. That is all.

I stipulate that that is the intent of the bill. We had a very thorough discussion in the committee on that, and I completely agree with the gentleman that we do not want in any way to impinge on the existing law with respect to water projects on inland waters.

So I think that we have clarified that point, and it does not matter on that score which amendment is adopted, or whether the bill is adopted as it is, or whether the amendment of the gentleman from Utah is adopted. The effect is the same. The only thing is I think that the bill, as drawn, makes it a little more precise by not purporting to deprive the Secretary of the opportunity to evaluate his actions where the Federal Government itself has some ownership in the water, and I think that is a better way to do it.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. I appreciate the concerns of my colleague from Montana about the endless litigation that sometimes occurs when an activity is attempted outside of, in this case, a national park.

Does the gentleman believe that the situation that has existed at Glacier and in relation to a proposed Federal highway would be changed as a result of this bill? Would it avoid litigation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS) has expired.

(On request of Mr. CRAIG and by unanimous consent, Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CRAIG. To continue, Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Montana, do you believe, let us assume then that the current Secretary said absolutely the highway is necessary, our studies indicate that there will be no major environmental consequences on the park or the park system and that some group decided that it did, and were able to find in some way a question as to whether the procedures that the Secretary or his people follow were somewhat, in their opinion, inadequate, that that would just magically keep that out of court?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I say to my colleague that question is a good one and goes to the heart of the matter which I and others have raised.

This legislation does not give to any Federal agency or officer mandatory control over whether or not a Federal development should proceed. But it does establish guidelines under which that Federal agency or officer may make recommendations.

The point is that while this legislation does not stop a suit, it would give both the litigant and the judge information which is not now available to them from a prescribed agency of the Federal Government which has as its stewardship the care of the national parks. It seems to me that that may short circuit court action and at least help bring it to a conclusion.

Mr. CRAIG. You are telling me then the basis of the lawsuit in relation to the highway proposal near the Glacier area is as a result of a lack of Federal guidelines? It is a result of the lack of Federal guidance that is currently existent in the law, and that it is simply not the opposition of certain groups who feel there will be an environmental impact to the park itself?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. This legislation is not going to eliminate disagreements about development in and around the parks. What this legislation is going to do is provide guidelines for the resolution of disputes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. SEIBERLING and by unanimous consent, Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

□ 1600

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the interesting thing is that on the question of actions by other agencies than the Interior Department such as the Department of Transportation, the gentleman's amendment and the bill as amended by my amendment are identical. The gentleman's amendment does not change section 11 at all. And that is the one that deals with this particular type of situation.

But as the gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS) points out, this bill, as amended, provides for an orderly method whereby the Department of Transportation, in going ahead with the project, must inform the Secretary of Interior where there is a likelihood that it might have an adverse impact on the park. So it gets it all into an orderly procedure, as the gentleman from Montana has said, and it seems to me that everyone is ahead. But there is no quarrel on either side of the aisle with respect to that aspect of it.

So I think we have just covered it adequately.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I had understood, when debate was limited on this amendment and all amendments thereto and to the bill, that we would close at 4:15. Has that remaining time been allocated?

The CHAIRMAN. No, it has not been.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, is there any way, by unanimous consent, that we can do that so that we can wind this up? My problem is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY) has an amendment that we are going to accept, and if we do not finish this by 4:15, he may not get it in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he would have to get unanimous consent if the amendment was not printed in the RECORD and if he wants to speak.

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, within the State of Utah there are five national parks, two national recreation areas and six national monuments. Any legislation that endeavors to create a buffer zone around the national park system has the potential to virtually halt almost all development in the south and southeastern portion of that State.

I have a breakdown of that acreage which is a grand total of 2,179,821 acres in my district and Mr. HANSEN'S district.

If the word "adjacent" is left undefined or broadly defined, it will effectively stifle the development of energy resources in Utah.

I may remind you that the greatest oil shale sand developments in the whole country are in Utah and we rank second to Colorado in oil shale, in addition to having a good deal of oil, uranium, and other things, coal as well.

If local government is not allowed to participate in the defining of the word "adjacent" then local communities will suffer greatly because they might be precluded from expanding or developing their economic base. This is not just a western problem. One example might be Washington, D.C., as Representative BROWN has already mentioned.

There are numerous national monuments within this area. There is the George Washington Parkway which the Park Service administers; it is possible that a Director of the National Park Service could close down all of Washington, D.C., because of the effects on national monuments because the city is adjacent to these Park Service lands.

Because of the number of parks and their size this bill would have the potential to cripple the economy of my district, and in California, and in other States. I do not think it is fair to punish local people because we have created parks near their homes.

I may indicate that most of the parks in my area that I am familiar with, Yosemite and others, that I have visited, already have built into them a buffer. They were enlarged, built with an internal buffer zone and they do not need a buffer outside in most cases.

Let me quote from the Director of the National Park Service in his testimony to the Interior Committee. He said:

By creating open ended areas the parks would be protected at the expense of all other needs and values.

He went on:

In fact, by requiring absolute protection yet providing no reasonable criteria for determining what would be deemed to impair Park services, the provisions of H.R. 2379 would encourage uncertainty and litigation.

I have some other comments also.

He goes on:

Section 12 authorizes and directs the Secretary to provide technical assistance to local governments for land use plans. A grant program is also authorized. We cannot support an open ended grant program for this, or any other, purpose. The budgetary impact of such a grant program could be very serious, especially in this period of limited Federal resources.

Within the State of Utah there are five national parks, two national recreation areas, and six national monuments. Any legislation that endevors to create a buffer zone around the national park system has the potential to virtually halt almost all development in the south and southeastern portion of the State. The following is a breakdown by district of the park system lands within the State and their total acres:

FIRST CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT

National Parks: Bryce Canyon, 35,896 acres; Capitol Reef, 241,904 acres; Zions, 146,551 acres.
Total, 424,351 acres.
National Recreation Areas: None.
National Monuments: Cedar Breaks, 6,155 acres.
Total, 6,155 acres.
Net total, 430,506 acres.
Grand total, 2,179,821 acres.

THIRD CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT

National Parks: Arches, 73,378 acres; Canyonlands, 337,570.
Total, 414,948 acres.
National recreation areas: Glen Canyon, 1,283,645 acres; Flaming Gorge, 94,308 acres.
Total, 1,283,645 acres.
National Monuments: Timpanogas, 250 acres; Dinosaur, 42,093; Rainbow Bridge, 160 acres; Havenweep, 440 acres; Natural Bridges, 7,779 acres.
Total, 50,722 acres.
Net total 1,749,315 acres.

First. If the word "adjacent" is left undefined or broadly defined it will effectively stifle the development of energy resources in Utah.

Second. If local government is not allowed to participate in the defining of the word "adjacent" then local communities will suffer greatly because they might be precluded from expanding or developing their economic base. One example is that of the Washington, D.C. There are numerous national monuments within the area. In addition there is the George Washington Parkway which the Park Service administrates. It is possible that a Director of the National Park Service Capital region and/or the Secretary of Interior could effectively close down all of District of Columbia because of the effects on national monuments because the city is adjacent to these Park Service lands.

Third. Because of the number of parks and their size this bill would have the potential to cripple the economy of my district. I do not feel that we should punish the local people because we have created a park near their homes.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me just make one point. The gentleman from Montana (Mr. WILLIAMS) did not have time to yield to me but I would like to make the point that he has an aluminum plant that exists just 6 miles from the Glacier which has informed us that if they had to go across private lands—or across public lands they would have to possibly shut down at this particular point.

But the, really, the point I wanted to make is that I think the people in this House should realize there are 334 parks, monuments, battlefields, trails, parkways, seashores, historic sites, and it goes on and on this way. And each of them comes under the purview of this act. It is not just a certain little park somewhere; it is parkways, trails, all of those things come in. I do not think we are asking for anything exorbitant; I do not think we are trying to gut this act. We are merely trying to perfect it so that it will be the type of legislation that will not create litigation, will not create problems, that will in fact enhance the parks, not take away from them. I think the Hansen amendment does that. I would surely urge support for the amendment.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, we undoubtedly will have a vote on this bill which will take us beyond 4:15, and I was wondering if it would be in order, by a unanimous-consent request, that we could change that 4:15 time so that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY) would have time to offer his amendment after the vote on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, he can obtain time to debate his amendment.

Mr. LUJAN. I make such a request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman add to that unanimous-consent request my amendment as well? Could my amendment be included?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of what amendment the gentleman is referring to.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, it simply addresses the water language we discussed; it would eliminate the exception for Federal claimed water.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman making a request for additional time? What is the gentleman seeking to do?

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that following the vote on the pending Hansen amendment the gentleman form Colorado (Mr. BROWN) have 3 minutes and some member in opposition have 3 minutes for debate; and that the same request be extended to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY).

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, I rise against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN).

H.R. 2379, the National Park System Protection Act, makes an important statement. It recognizes and writes into law that protection for national parks within their boundaries only is not enough. It states clearly that we must take extra steps to protect these special places of our natural heritage for they are threatened by activities outside their boundaries as well as by overuse and neglect within their borders.

National parks are established because they are unique areas of extreme beauty. They are worthy of our fullest attention because they provide Americans with outdoor experiences unsurpassed elsewhere. We are the guardians of these parks as a Federal legislators we must take further action to protect them.

We cannot view these gems of nature, these invaluable natural resources in a vacuum. They are not isolated areas plunked down in the middle of wastelands, with huge fences around them for protection. A coal-fired powerplant down the road, an airport next door, or a shopping mall nearby are all going to adversely affect a national park. Smog travels in the winds, noise can be heard for miles around an airport, and traffic congestion ties up roads and creates hazards for wildlife and vacationers.

Recognizing the importance of monitoring developing outside the borders of our national parks, H.R. 2379 proposes well-reasoned and necessary measures to insure that the integrity of our park system is maintained. The legislation does not infringe on the rights of land developers or on anyone else's rights. Indeed, it protects the interests of the millions of Americans who visit our national parks each year or who are fortunate enough to live near them.

The amendment at hand essentially refutes the basic premise of this bill. The amendment would eliminate the special consideration our Secretary of the Interior must give to proposed developments adjacent to national parks. Adjacent means "next to" or "near." We have learned the hard way that our parks are endangered by air pollution, poor water quality, noise, and industrial wastes from activities next to or near their borders. To gut this important bill with the amendment would be a grave mistake.

How can we be sure that projects outside park boundaries will not adversely affect the very places we are trying to protect? The Secretary of the Interior must be given the authority to recommend how development near national parks should proceed or these valuable areas will continue to suffer from outside influences. This bill is a moderate, reasonable assurance that we will have environmental assessments made before we jeopardize the quality of our parks.

I urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah and to preserve the main purpose of this legislation.●

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 160, noes 245, not voting 28, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Parris for with Mr. D'Amours against.

Mr. Badham for, with Mrs. Burton of California against.

Mrs. Martin of Illinois for, with Mr. Wirth against.

Messrs. WEBER, McEWEN, ROYBAL, and HORTON changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Mr. ROGERS changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MURPHY TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. UDALL, AS AMENDED

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURPHY to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. UDALL, as amended: At the end of section 18, insert:

For purposes of this Act the terms "significant adverse effect on the values for which such national park system was established", and "degrade or threaten the natural or cultural resources of any such unit" shall not include the activity of hunting in areas adjacent to any unit of the national park system where such activity is not in violation of State or Federal law or regulation.

Mr. MURPHY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY) is recognized for 3 minutes, pursuant to the agreement.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, my amendment spells out that H.R. 2379 is neither intended nor should be used as a vehicle to restrict hunting opportunities where it is already allowed by State law, Federal law or regulation. It will guarantee American sportsmen that their hunting opportunities will not be adversely effected by passage of H.R. 2379.

Supporters of H.R. 2379 have consistently maintained that the bill is not aimed at reducing hunting opportunities. Nevertheless, the ambiguities in present law and regulation make it imperative that these guarantees be adopted into law.

Without such protection America's sportsmen and wildlife managers may find hunting opportunities significantly restricted by bureaucratic fiat at some future date.

My amendment simply makes it clear that H.R. 2379 is neither intended nor should be used as a vehicle to restrict hunting opportunities, and I would urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

□ 1630

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, by the definition of hunting, I understand that the gentleman does not intend to include trapping in that phrase. Is that correct?

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman is correct. It does not include trapping.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the amendment, and I will support the amendment.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ALBOSTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to commend my colleague from Pennsylvania, AUSTIN MURPHY, for offering his amendment concerning hunting to the Park Protection Act. As you so well know, Michigan has some of the best hunting lands this side of the Mississippi. I have spent a lifetime hunting in Michigan as well as many of my constituents. Speaking on behalf of the hunters in my State, I would like to express my strong support for this amendment.

It is important to my fellow hunters and to me that our interests are protected from those who would infringe upon our rights with a red line of bureaucratic tape.

Congressman MURPHY's amendment clarifies the fact that H.R. 2379 will not adversely effect the hunting community of America. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this amendment.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY), and urge its adoption.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Murphy amendment. America's hunters have a right to expect diligence by this Congress in protecting the hunting areas to which access is not allowed. I commend my colleague for his alertness in offering this amendment and I urge every Member to vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) for 3 minutes.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, supporters of H.R. 2379 have said consistently that this bill does not reduce hunting opportunities. We have an opportunity in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY) to assure that that is the case.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to vote "aye."

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I commend my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY), for offering this amendment. I have far too often seen the abuse of our laws by bureaucratic artistic license. Keeping America's land open to hunters is too important to be entrusted to unelected bureaucrats.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY) clearly identifies hunting as a wildlife management tool which should be protected. I fully support this amendment and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my strong support for my colleague's amendment. As a hunter, I know the importance this activity has in sound wildlife management practice.

It is important to my fellow hunters and to me that our interests be protected from those who would intrude upon our rights with bureaucratic redtape.

Congressman MURPHY's amendment reinforces the fact that H.R. 2379 will not adversely effect the hunting community of America. I thank him for offering the amendment, and urge the rest of my colleagues join me in support of it.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. LUJAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, we have no problem with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY).

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I support the Murphy amendment to H.R. 2379, the park protection bill authored by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING). This amendment makes clear that this bill if it becomes law, should not be used and is not intended to be used as a vehicle to restrict hunting opportunities where they are already allowed by State or Federal law.

I think this is a sound and fair amendment, Mr. Chairman. The purpose of this bill is to insure our national parks are protected from imprudent and unwise development activities. It is not designed to lessen the existing rights of sportsmen in our national parks. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this important amendment.●

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY) to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

The amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BROWN OF COLORADO TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. UDALL, AS AMENDED

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROWN of Colorado to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. UDALL as amended: In section 10(c) insert after the word "water" a period and strike out the words thereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado (Mr. BROWN) is recognized for 3 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I will try to be brief.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely makes it clear that Government-claim water will not be part of this bill. It will not fall under the adjacent impact. I think it clarifies a point of major concern by all who have looked at this measure.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, with this clarification that this would not hold for claim land, I certainly support the gentleman's amendment and thank him for offering it.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I would be glad to yield to the chairman, the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, depending on the answer I get, we may or may not accept this amendment.

As I understand it, this amendment is not intended in any way to abandon any control or rights which the Federal Government has over waters which it has a legal right to control. Is that correct?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, on that basis I have no objection to the amendment and will support the amendment.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I thank the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. BROWN) to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), as amended.

The amendment to the amendment in the nature of a susbtitute, as amended, was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SEIBERLING TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. UDALL, AS AMENDED

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I offer a conforming amendment, which was printed in the RECORD of Monday, October 3, 1983, to the amemdment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEIBERLING to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. UDALL, as amended: Page 26, Strike out line 21 and all that follows down through line 4 on page 27.

Mr. SEIBERLING (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I will not take very long.

This is simply a conforming amendment that removes the definition of "legislative day" since our amendments to sections 10 and 11 eliminated all reference to that. That definition is no longer needed. It is surplusage and, therefore, I offer this amendment to take it out.

Mr. HANSEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, we have no objections to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), as amended.

The amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), as amended.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2379, the National Park System Protection and Resource Management Act, because our national parks cannot afford 1 more day of neglect. These parks evoke awe and wonder in the hearts of tens of millions of park visitors from all over the world each year, and yet we do not know what potential or urgent problems are challenging them.

Our ignorance of the threats to America's wilderness is not benign neglect, it is benign abuse.

This bill is designed to achieve the modest goal of coordinating the Federal Government's activities affecting the national park system. It merely asks that the Department of the Interior oversee Federal responsibilities. It requires the Secretary of the Interior to certify that all actions taken by Federal agencies are consonant with our conservation policies. In addition, the Department shall present a state of the parks report to Congress every other year.

This bill does not create stifling Government regulation; it simply requires a modicum of supervision to preserve our parks.

Secretary Watt has not asked for funds to expand the national park system, preferring instead to protect the parks we already have. Why, then, does he oppose this attempt to monitor the threats to the national parks? This bill gives the Secretary of Interior the authority to implement his oft-stated goal of better maintenance; yet James Watt opposes this bill.

Damage to the American wilderness is irreversible. Air quality, ground water, and endangered plant and animal life take far more than a pound of cure for every ounce of damage. We can in no way be sure we are preventing such damage without better information, and H.R. 2379 provides us with the knowledge we need.

There have been a series of misconceptions about the thrust of H.R. 2379.

This bill does not, as its opponents have claimed, provide the Federal Government with vast veto power over all activities up to 100 miles from a national park. In seeking to watch areas adjacent to the parks, this bill merely makes certain that no Federal activities can harm a park's natural or cultural resources. The bill simply makes sure that the entire Federal Government adheres to a coherent policy concerning the national parks.

This bill does not, as some have charged, lengthen the Federal review process to create interminable delays in activities affecting the national parks. The program review requested of the Interior Department is specifically tailored to coincide with that of the Federal agency about which Interior is commenting.

Nor does this bill take autonomy away from local governments. It specifically creates grants to local governments so that they may participate in a newly coordinated planning process for the parks.

Over 300 million people visited the parks in 1982. We must not ignore our responsibility to serve the will of the American people and protect our national parks.●

● Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add my strong support of H.R. 2379 to this debate. It is clear from the National Park Service's state of the national parks report that our national parks are increasingly vulnerable to degradation from a variety of internal and external threats. Such unique national treasures as the Everglades NPR and Yellowstone NPR are among the affected areas, areas which we on the Interior Committee believe may extend to the entire National Park System.

Under the circumstance, I fail to see what is so dangerous about requiring Federal agencies to notify the Secretary of the Interior of actions which will degrade the natural or cultural resources of a park. In my home State of Connecticut, we have the Appalachian Trail, which particularly concerns me. I am certain that my constituents and the people of Connecticut would support the National Park Service being informed of potential threats to that area, whether internal of adjacent in origin.

This bill will not provide a solution to all the problems which currently beset our national parks. It will, however, provide a means to monitor the condition of park resources and to identify and prevent future hazards to our threatened pristine areas.●

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of Congressman MURPHY's amendment to H.R. 2379, the National Park System Protection Act. As a member of the Interior Committee, I strongly support this important amendment offered by Mr. MURPHY of Pennsylvania, which complements H.R. 2379 by insuring that passage of this legislation will not adversely affect hunting opportunities in the Federal lands covered under the bill. Congressman MURPHY's amendment enunciates the clear policy that the bill is neither intended nor should be used as a vehicle to restrict hunting opportunities where it is already allowed by State law, Federal law, or regulation.

I strongly and emphatically support, Mr. Speaker, hunting opportunities on our public lands which enhance the control of many species of animals. Hunting also provides recreation for millions of sportsmen throughout the country.

As a member of the Interior Committee, I have supported programs that protect our natural resources and at the same time, provide ample hunting opportunities. Sport hunters are among the most conservation-minded individuals. They enjoy the use of our open spaces and have been active in fighting for protection of our public lands and natural resources.

This has been demonstrated time and again by sportsmen in my very own district. For example, Jim McKnight, president of the Pennsylvania Federation of Sportsmen, has testified and fought hard for passage of H.R. 826, to declare a stretch of the Delaware River as wild and scenic under the National Wild and Scenic Rivers Act. I look forward to continuing to work with sports hunters in areas of mutual concern.

I urge my colleagues, Mr. Chairman, to support H.R. 2379. This is an important piece of legislation, and I urge adoption of Congressman MURPHY's amendment to improve and clarify the intent of this bill.

This bill is good for the hunters and sportsmen of Pennsylvania.●

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. MINISH) having assumed the chair, Mr. PERKINS, Chairman of the Committee on the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 2379) to provide for the protection and management of the National Park System, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 298, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 321, nays 82, not voting 30, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair on this vote:

Mr. Levitas for, with Mr. Rahall against.

Mr. BILIRAKIS changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just considered and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE NECESSARY CHANGES IN ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 2379, NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM PROTECTION AND RESOURCES MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1983

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill (H.R. 2379) to provide for the protection and management of the National Park System, and for other purposes, the Clerk be authorized to make necessary punctuation, grammatical, and technical changes in the bill, and to add section headings where appropriate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE OF COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES TO SIT DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE ON WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1983

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Merchant Marine of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be permitted to sit on Wednesday, October 5, 1983, at 2 p.m. for the purpose of marking up H.R. 2562—a bill to amend section 45 of the Shipping Act, 1916.

The ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FORSYTHE) and the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. SNYDER) have been apprised of the markup date and time and are in accord with this request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 5, rule I, the Chair will now put the question on the motion to suspend the rules on which further proceedings were postponed earlier today.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950 EXTENSION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending business is the question of suspending the rules and passing the Senate bill, S. 1852, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE) that the House suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill, S. 1852, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Messrs. McCURDY, RAY, BRYANT, WHEAT, and ROEMER changed their votes from "yea" to "nay".

So the motion was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON RULES TO FILE CERTAIN PRIVILEGED REPORTS

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight, October 4, 1983, to file certain privileged reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

LUPUS AWARENESS WEEK

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 102) to designate the week of October 16, 1983, through October 22, 1983, as Lupus Awareness Week, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I reserve the right to object to indicate that the minority has no problem with the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 102

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of October 16, 1983, through October 22, 1983, is designated as "Lupus Awareness Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

METROPOLITAN OPERA DAY

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 128) to designate the day of October 22, 1983, as Metropolitan Opera Day, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object. I will not only not object but I want to commend the gentlewoman for the expeditious manner in which her subcommittee and she dealt with this matter.

Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, October 22, 1983, marks the 100th anniversary of the Metropolitan Opera Company, one of the Nation's greatest cultural institutions and the most renowned opera company in the world.

I introduced House Joint Resolution 317 on July 12, asking the President to declare October 22 to be Metropolitan Opera Day throughout the United States. A total of 227 Members of this House have joined me in paying tribute to the Met by cosponsoring that resolution. On September 20, the Senate passed an identical resolution, introduced by New York Senators MOYNIHAN and D'AMATO.

The broad support for the resolution is representative of the Met's popularity throughout the Nation as well as the love for opera it has fostered. Americans have always considered the Metropolitan Opera to be a national treasure, and the Met has lived up to that reputation. One hundred years ago, the Met initiated its annual tour of American cities, a tradition that continues to this day. More than 50 years ago, the Met embarked on another effort to reach millions of music lovers—its Saturday afternoon radio broadcasts. Through these and a variety of other endeavors, the Met has cultivated an appreciation of opera that now thrives in dozens of local opera companies as well as thousands of communities.

The celebration planned for October 22 is a gala tribute to opera in America as well as a centennial spectacular for a matriarch of American arts. I am honored to represent the district in which the Met makes its home and pleased to play a role in this tribute.

There are at this point 227 Members of the House who have joined me in cosponsoring this resolution. I commend the committee for reporting the matter out.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. COURTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate that the minority has looked this legislation over, and in fact we are very much in favor of it.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 128

Whereas the Metropolitan Opera is one of the world's premier performing arts organizations and has an audience larger than that of any other such organization in the world;

Whereas the Metropolitan Opera, since its first performance one hundred years ago on October 22, 1883, has provided the finest quality in opera to audiences throughout the Nation;

Whereas the Metropolitan Opera pioneered radio presentations of live opera, performing on radio for more than forty years and more recently on television;

Whereas the Metropolitan Opera has toured the United States since its founding in 1883;

Whereas the Metropolitan Opera provides educational services to the people of the United States by generously encouraging and training young artists and by providing technical and managerial assistance to other opera companies in the Nation;

Whereas the Metropolitan Opera has presented renowned performing arts companies from all over the world at the Opera House;

Whereas the Metropolitan Opera House, which is maintained by the company, is one of the Nation's treasures and one of the greatest performing arts theaters in the world; and

Whereas, throughout its long history, the Metropolitan Opera Company has fostered generations of music lovers and has enriched and inspired this Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating October 22, 1983, the one hundredth anniversary of its first performance, as "Metropolitan Opera Day" throughout these United States.

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, the Metropolitan Opera is one of the world's premier performing arts organizations and has an audience larger than that of any other such organization in the world. The Metropolitan Opera has provided the finest quality in opera to audiences throughout the Nation. Also, throughout its long history, the Metropolitan Opera Company has fostered generations of music lovers and has enriched and inspired this Nation. Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of this resolution which authorizes and request the President to proclaim October 22, 1983, as Metropolitan Opera Day.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to cast my vote on rollcall No. 375, in which the House voted on whether or not to recede and concur with Senate amendment No. 7 of the conference report accompanying House Joint Resolution 368, continuing resolution. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye."

GRASSROOTS LABOR SUPPORT FOR CLINCH RIVER

(Mr. YOUNG of Missouri asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is generally acknowledged that the Clinch River breeder reactor project has the vigorous support of private industry. More than 750 utilities have put their money where their mouth is, to the tune of some $325 million of which $150 million has already been spent on the project. What may not be as well known, however, is the strong grassroots labor support the project enjoys.

By now, most Members may have received a letter from Bob Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Department. I believe the letter offers a strong argument for completion of this crucial breeder reactor demonstration program. I am, therefore, including it in the RECORD so that all members can recognize that, contrary to the incantations of the project's opponents, hardworking taxpayers are sufficiently astute to recognize the important role of the breeder reactor in this Nation's quest for energy independence. I urge each member to read the letter and share Mr. Georgine's insights.

The letter follows:

BUILDING & CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT, AFL-CIO,
Washington, D.C., September 22, 1983.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In just a few days you will be casting what could be a final vote on the Clinch River Breeder Reactor Project. I am writing to urge your support for the completion of this important project.

As you may know, in addition to my duties as President of the Building and Construction Trades Department, I also chair a national coalition known as the Committee on Jobs, Environment and Technology. This remarkable coalition numbers among its members 17 unions, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the NAACP, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Conference of Black Mayors, the National Black Caucus of State Legislators and many other concerned organizations.

We joined together because we all share a concern about America's future, particularly America's energy future. We believe America must meet its commitment, first made more than 30 years ago, to develop and demonstrate promising, renewable energy technologies which can help provide the energy security we all agree is so important. We believe the completion of the Clinch River Project, the demonstration stage for one of those promising, renewable energy technologies, is one important step towards meeting that commitment.

To date, $1.5 billion has already been spent on the project. It is estimated that completion will cost another $2.5 billion. The project's design is 90% complete; more than 70% of the components are on site or on order; and site preparation is proceeding ahead of schedule and under budget. Because the project is so far along in its design and component procurement, especially compared with other similar sized projects, the General Accounting Office and the Department of Energy have both expressed strong confidence that the $2.5 biliion estimate for completion is accurate and reliable.

Moreover, under a new finance plan submitted by the Administration, 40 percent of that $2.5 billion will be provided from the private sector, reducing the budget outlays for the completion of Clinch River by $1 billion.

There are those who have expressed dissatisfaction with this plan because the ultimate financial burden continues to lie with the government, which will insure much of the private funding. However, when put to an objective analysis, such assurances seem only fair.

Clinch River, like so many other long term federal programs, has suffered dramatically from policy vacillations at the federal level. According to the General Accounting Office, 70 percent of the project's cost increases since 1974 are directly attributable to that vacillation and the funding shortfalls and uncertainties it created. It, therefore, seems only logical that private investors must have strong assurance from the government that such vacillation will not affect the project in the future. In addition, the project has always been and will continue to be a government project. Control over all aspects for the project, from construction to operation, rest with the government. Hence, it is again only logical that the government, as the entity in complete control, continue to assume the bulk of the risks involved.

In assessing the finance plan, we must also not forget the others who have made substantial contributions to Clinch River. The unsecured utility contribution of $325 million remains the largest private sector contribution to a federal R&D project.

And organized labor has also made a contribution to Clinch River which will help save the project tens of millions of dollars. Under an unprecedented agreement with management, work will be allowed to proceed ten hours a day, seven days a week, thereby reducing construction time dramatically. In addition, the agreement also eliminates the possibility of strikes or lockouts which could further delay and thereby increase the costs of the project. We signed this agreement because of our genuine commitment to Clinch River. It is our contribution to a venture of importance to all Americans.

As the vote on Clinch River approaches, I hope you will give serious consideration to the points I have raised. The Building and Construction Trades Department, the AFL-CIO and the many diverse organizations that belong to CJET, consider Clinch River one important part of an ongoing effort to provide America with a secure energy future. To turn our backs now would do more than waste the $1.5 billion already spent. It would place at risk much of what we have learned during the $5 billion, 30 year R&D program that has made Clinch River possible; and it could essentially eliminate breeder technology from an already short list of future energy options.

Japan, France, West Germany, the Soviet Union and others are all moving ahead with breeder programs of their own because they recognize the potential of the technology. The development of renewable energy technologies must be a priority in America as well. This generation and those that will follow, deserve no less.

I look forward to your support.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. GEORGINE,
President, Building and Construction Trades Department; Chairman, Committee on Jobs, Environment and Technology.

LOS ANGELES TIMES CALLS ON JAMES WATT TO RESIGN

(Mr. LEVINE of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, the Los Angeles Times yesterday joined the growing list of responsible opinion leaders calling upon James Watt to resign from public office.

The Times called Watt a "Neanderthal conservative" and said:

We can think of only one reason why President Reagan would continue to tolerate James G. Watt in his Cabinet. He must agree with Watt's policies and he must still believe that the Interior Secretary has enough congressional support to carry them out.

I intend to attach the full editorial to the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. I commend it to my colleagues.

I also received yesterday a succinct letter from a constituent who said to me: "The problem is not James Watt; it is the man who hired him."

I urge my colleagues to keep reminding that man, the President, just how disgraceful it is for James Watt to remain in the Cabinet.

The editorial follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Oct. 3, 1983]

WATT AND CONGRESS

We can think of only one reason why President Reagan would continue to tolerate James G. Watt in his Cabinet. He must agree with Watt's policies and he must still believe that the Interior secretary has enough congressional support to carry them out.

But that explanation for the President's continuing forgiveness of Watt's insults and incivilities to women and minorities and to all who disagree with his Neanderthal conservatism went by the boards last Thursday in a congressional conference.

Senate and House negotiators dealt Watt a major defeat by rejecting his plan to open vast areas of California coastal waters to oil and gas exploration.

In addition to blocking a lease sale set for next February, the conferees agreed to a permanent prohibition against drilling within six miles of the Southern California coast and a one-year moratorium on drilling within 12 miles.

The California decisions, along with similar votes on sales off the New England and Florida coasts, could frustrate one of Watt's major policy initiatives—the leasing over the next five years of a billion offshore acres, virtually the entire outer continental shelf, for oil and gas exploration.

The conferees' action may not prevail. The restrictions on drilling must pass both houses of Congress and be signed by the President.

But this much is certain. Watt's boorish description last week of a federal advisory commission as having "a black, a woman, two Jews and a cripple" left him without Republican protection against rough treatment by committee Democrats.

A number of the negotiators, including Rep. Leon E. Panetta (D-Carmel Valley), said that Republican senators would not have given as much ground as they did if Watt had not brought further embarrassment to his party and the Administration. That was clearly the case.

There was no mention of a leasing moratorium in the Senate version of the appropriations bill, and its inclusion in the final recommendation was as much a repudiation of Watt as it was of his plans to sell the nation's coastline to the highest bidder.

A Republican senator—Pete Wilson of California—was responsible for yet another rebuff to Watt in the conference committee. Although the secretary rigidly opposes new parkland purchases this year, Wilson succeeded in adding to the Interior budget $15 million for land acquisitions in the Santa Monica Mountains.

We think that Watt has finally met his own criterion for resigning from the Cabinet: "When my liabilities outweigh my strengths, I should go." The only strengths Watt has brought to the Administration are the espousal of policies acceptable to the President and his appeal to the most conservative elements of the Republican Party.

The rejection of his policies is evidence that his unremitting derision of vast numbers of Americans on the basis of sex, religion, race and environmental philosophy impairs his ability to work with Congress.

And his abandonment by conservatives, in and out of Congress, is evidence that he is also becoming a political liability.

What is left? Loyalty to the President. And it's a strange loyalty that alienates huge constituencies crucial to Reagan's chances if he runs for reelection next year.

CASIMIR PULASKI

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MINISH). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BORSKI) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this special order to honor Count Casimir Pulaski, Polish patriot and general in the American Continental Army during the Revolutionary War. Known by many as the "founder of the American Cavalry," General Pulaski bravely served the cause of American freedom.

I joined with the people of Philadelphia this past weekend to commemorate General Pulaski. As we stood at Independence Hall, we remembered his dedication and tireless efforts on behalf of our liberty. We remembered that those ideals are still held dear today by his countrymen in Poland. The rememberance of General Pulaski is symbolic for all Americans, for it illustrates the pride we all feel for this country.

As a young man in Poland, Pulaski joined with his father to create the Confederation of the Bar, which lead the Polish rebellion to gain independence from Russia. Pulaski quickly established a reputation as a military leader through several decisive victories. The capture of the Monastery at Chestochowa was of strategic importance for it housed the Black Madonna, a painting of the Virgin Mary, the patron and Queen of Poland. This victory had a great effect on Polish morale, and almost lead to the forced withdrawal of Russian troops from Poland.

Sadly, Pulaski did not prevail in his fight for Polish independence, and was forced to flee to Paris in 1775. Like other political activists and adventures of the ERA, Pulaski was not content to wait in exile in hopes that Poland could once again be free. Penniless, Pulaski was introduced to Benjamin Franklin. Franklin urged Pulaski to come to the aid of the American revolution. Pulaski agreed to travel to America, for he recognized that our fight for freedom was similar to his own in Poland.

Pulaski's skill as a leader and soldier were quickly recognized by Gen. George Washington. Through Washington's efforts, the Continental Congress made him a general and placed him in command of the Nation's inexperienced cavalry.

Pulaski is credited with saving General Washington and much of the American Army at the Battle of Brandywine. He had scouted the British at great personal risk close to their formations. Although the British prevailed in the battle, Pulaski's actions contributed to the future success of the war. Pulaski was also instrumental in the important American victory at Haddonfield, N.J.

Although successful on the battlefield, Pulaski was frustrated in his attempts to organize an effective cavalry within the existing American forces. He urged Washington and the Congress to create an independent mounted force that is known today as the "Pulaski Legion." The force revolutionized American strategy by employing a mix of infantry and cavalry armed with lances. Pulaski proved the effectiveness of the force at the battles of Egg Harbor and Charleston, where he forced the British to retreat from their siege of that city. Like Pulaski, the legion was comprised of foreign exiles who had come to America to fight for freedom. Although from foreign lands, all assumed the struggle for America's independence. Pulaski personally assumed much of the operating costs of the legion, an indication of his commitment to the cause of liberty.

During a daring attack on British positions at the battle of Savannah, Pulaski made the ultimate sacrifice for his adopted country. Pulaski fell wounded, and died 2 days later on October 11, 1779. Legend has it that shortly before his death, Pulaski asked to be buried at sea in order that he might be carried back to his native Poland to continue the fight for its independence.

His final wish is being fulfilled in Poland today. We are witness to the continuation of that struggle. Pulaski's spirit is evident in the solidarity movement. It has brought to the world's attention the same demands for basic human rights that Pulaski sought to attain for Poland and the United States. One such right is that a nation must be free from outside control.

The concept of freedom does not recognize national boundaries. We as a nation are linked with the Polish people in their pursuit of liberty. Americans have experienced oppressive rule by a foreign government. It is only natural that we lend our full support to the Polish people today. We can not rest while others continue to be denied their right to be free from foreign control.

A commemoration of Pulaski's life also is a recognization of the accomplishments made by Polish Americans and the hundreds of thousands of other immigrants to the United States. They pledged loyalty to their new country and contributed in many important ways to this Nation's greatness.

General Pulaski thus is symbolic of the aspirations of millions, both in our Nation's history and for the future of people everywhere. He is symbolic of man's love for freedom. Yet he is also symbolic of the contributions made by the many immigrants who have come to call America their home. Perhaps President Kennedy best explained why so much attention should be placed on a foreigner who was in America for less than 2 years.

He represented a different culture, a different language, a different way of life. But he had the same love of liberty as the people of this country, and therefore, he was an American as much as he was a Pole.

His importance is evident both in the numerous memorials and towns named after him in the United States. He is a man whose contributions should not be forgotten.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this tribute to Casimir Pulaski, a patriot, a leader and, ultimately, a hero of the American Revolution.

A native of Poland, the young Pulaski fought in his homeland for many of the same ideals that dominate the political struggle in that nation today. The Polish Solidarity movement, in its battle against oppression and for human rights, reflects a similar devotion to justice and liberty.

Beginning as a volunteer member of Gen. George Washington's staff, Pulaski saw his enthusiasm and dedication to the cause of independence recognized when he was promoted to the rank of general, earning in the process the title "Father of the American Cavalry." He fought with distinction in the battle of Brandywine, and was later given command of the cavalry at Trenton and Flemington. Acting with Gen. Anthony Wayne, he played a major role in providing supplies to hungry troops at Valley Forge.

Gen. Casimir Pulaski died a tragic but gallant death while leading his cavalry at the siege of Savannah. It is a privilege to honor one who is clearly a hero not only to those Americans of Polish descent, but to the millions who believe love of country should go hand in hand with love of freedom.

The people of Poland, as events of the last few years have shown the world, believe, as Pulaski did, that to love one's country should be to love freedom. In honoring Pulaski, we pay tribute to the justifiably renowned spirit of the Polish people.

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, October 2, I was proud to be among the 100,000 people who marched up Fifth Avenue to celebrate the 47th annual Pulaski Day Parade. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, the Polish patriot, is best remembered as an American Revolutionary War hero. Distinguishing himself at the Battle of Brandywine, General Pulaski was authorized by George Washington to reorganize the Continental Cavalry, earning himself the title "Father of the American Cavalry."

As the Representative of 14,000 Polish Americans, I know that Solidarity is strong in the hearts of Polish people everywhere. As we marched up Fifth Avenue, the banners declared "Union of Solidarity Still Lives." It is indeed fitting for this House to take time out today to remember Gen. Casimir Pulaski who once helped us to achieve the freedom and independence that the people of Poland still seek.●

● Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, there is perhaps no way to completely and accurately catalog the contributions that the millions of Polish Americans have made to the history and development of this country. The Polish community in America has taken a back seat to no other group with regard to loyalty, patriotism, and dedication. You have to start somewhere and the Polish contribution to America started with Casimir Pulaski in 1775.

Casimir Pulaski came to America to help the Revolution. Bringing with him considerable military experience, he created this Nation's first cavalry. He suffered with the troops at Valley Forge, conducted himself with courage as he led the seige of Charleston, and later was mortally wounded in the cause of American liberty during the seige of Savannah.

A township in my district is named for this great American hero. It could not be more aptly named, as the people of Pulaski clearly embody the spirit of American independence and dedication that Casimir Pulaski died in the service of. Casimir Pulaski was a great Pole, a great American, and a great man.●

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, it is a particular pleasure for me to join in the special order honoring Casimir Pulaski, the Polish patriot and American Revolutionary War hero, because I represent a congressional district which includes many people with roots in a foreign land who have contributed so much to the United States. They were attracted by the freedom General Pulaski fought so heroically to establish during the American War for Independence.

General Pulaski was born in Poland and began his career as a military man at a young age. While still in his twenties, he led an unsuccessful uprising against Russia. Pulaski was arrested and condemned to death, but fortunately managed to escape to France. In France, he met that great patriot, Benjamin Franklin. Franklin was representing the American colonies and was a forceful advocate for the cause of independence for the American colonies. After talking it over with Franklin, Pulaski determined to travel to the United States and help fight for independence from England of the American Colonies.

Pulaski distinguished himself at the Battle of Brandywine. As a reward, Congress appointed him brigadier general in charge of cavalry. He organized an independent corps of calvary and light infantry that fought in the siege of Savannah. Pulaski was wounded during the battle for Savannah; he died there 2 days later.

It is a fitting memory to this Polish-American patriot that we recognize October 11 as Pulaski Day by act of Congress.●

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join with my colleague, Mr. BORSKI, in this special order commemorating Count Casimir Pulaski.

Count Pulaski came to this country in 1777, after having fought for his native Poland's independence. He soon obtained a commission as a brigadier general in the Revolutionary Army, and through daring and skill, won a number of important battles. Pulaski served in the Revolutionary Army with honor and distinction until he was mortally wounded in battle in October 1779.

Pulaski was a young man when he died, only 32 years old. He had been on these shores less than 2 years. He represented a different culture and a different way of life, but he had the same yearning for freedom and justice as every one of us here today. That love of liberty made him an American, as much as a Pole.

Like every country, America has had its share of immigrants seeking their fortune. But the United States is the only country in the world that attracts people, not for wealth or power, but for dignity. The Statue of Liberty urges the other countries of the world to "Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free." America's greatness lies in the millions of immigrants who, like Casimir Pulaski, have come here with nothing but a love of freedom.

Oppressed peoples across the world still dream of liberty. In Poland, Russia, Cambodia, and other countries, the people still long to come to America to enjoy the fruits of democracy. Our Nation is strong because people from all over the world have come to this country with the common goal of freedom. America will remain powerful as long as we continue to work together to maintain this freedom.

As we honor Casimir Pulaski today, let us also honor the millions of people who have worked and suffered for freedom in the United States and around the world. In their memory, let us pledge our hearts and souls to the cause of liberty here in the United States, in Poland, and around the globe.●

● Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, 206 years ago today, on October 4, 1777, brigadier general and first commander of the cavalry Casimir Pulaski fought in his first American battle in Germantown. He fought for freedom in the United States after unsuccessfully fighting for freedom in his native Poland. He was a man who tasted both freedom and oppression, but knew life could not exist without liberty. He was a Pole who spoke no English fighting alongside Colonialists with a passion for liberty seldom seen throughout history. He wrote, "I would rather live free, or die for liberty."

General Pulaski's tenure in the American Army was a turbulent and frustrating one. He resigned his commission to raise an independent cavalry corps. He gallantly fought several unsuccessful battles against insurmountable odds, and next week on October 11, we celebrate the 204th anniversary of his death. What we should learn from this brave man, who did not know his homeland would still be oppressed 200 years later, is that to maintain freedom we must be unselfish and persevere. To the people of Poland, I say be proud of your forefathers, men like Casimir Pulaski, who have taught you how to remain free in your hearts. Do not give up the fight because many unselfish Americans have also learned from General Pulaski and are beside you in your struggle for liberty.●

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great honor to rise today to honor the great Polish patriot and American Revolutionary War hero Casimir Pulaski on the 205th anniversary of his death.

Count Casimir Pulaski was a loyal son to both Poland and America, devoting his life to fighting for freedom in both lands. On October 11, 1779, he made the ultimate sacrifice for his new homeland by giving his life during the Battle of Savannah in the American Revolution.

Mr. Speaker, Casimir Pulaski made that sacrifice so the people of America could one day live in peace, with liberty and justice for all. The love for freedom was deeply ingrained in the soul of this Polish patriot. In Poland, at the young age of 19, Casimir Pulaski joined with his father Joseph in forming the Confederation of the Bar, an organization devoted to resisting the foreign domination of imperialist Russia.

The brave young man's forces were no match for the Russian troops, and Casimir Pulaski was forced into exile in Turkey. But the safety of exile was no place for a man of his drive and dedication. Hearing of Ben Franklin's call for volunteers to fight for freedom in the new colony of America, he immediately offered his services in the battle for justice against the British.

Upon his arrival in Boston, 1777, Pulaski, with his reputation preceding him, received the command of the Continental Cavalry from George Washington. Later, Congress made him a general and chief of the Cavalry Pulaski's leadership in such battles as Brandywine, Trenton, Flemington, and Germantown earned him the title of "Father of the America Cavalry."

Pulaski's death at the young age of 32 was a devastating blow to the emerging American Nation. But his desire for peace for all peoples served as an inspiring force to the troops that eventually gained American its independence.

The spirit of Casimir Pulaski is alive today in the hearts and minds of the people of his Polish homeland as they battle daily in their own struggle for freedom from the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed fitting that we pay tribute to this great Polish-American hero on the anniversary of his death.●

● Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join with my colleagues in honoring Casimir Pulaski. This Polish nobleman's never-ending dedication to freedom led him to forsake his aristocratic station in life to join the fight to rid his native country of foreign oppression, and to distinguish himself in the Revolutionary War fought by the American Colonies.

Pulaski, the soldier and revolutionary, was noted for his bravery, his skills as a horseman, and his passionate love of and dedication to freedom and liberty. As a member of the Confederation of the Bar, Pulaski was active in guerrilla warfare against Russian encroachment of Poland. His estate and wealth confiscated, Pulaski fled to Turkey, where he continued the fight, attempting to raise Turkish attacks against the Russians. Eventually, he ended up destitute in Paris, where he was thrown into debtors' prison.

High-ranking officials in the French Government came to Pulaski's aid, freeing him from prison and introducing him to Benjamin Franklin, who was representing the American Colonies in Paris. Franklin sent Pulaski to America, with a letter of introduction to George Washington. In a letter to a friend at this time, Pulaski wrote:

> I would rather live free, or die for liberty. I suffer more because I cannot avenge myself against the tyranny of those who seek to oppress humanity. That is why I want to go to America . . .

In America, Casimir Pulaski further demonstrated his military skill and dedication to the cause of liberty. He served first as a volunteer on General Washington's staff, not content to wait for a commission as an officer. In seeking that commission, Pulaski wrote to the Congress, ". . . I could not submit to stoop before the sovereigns of Europe, so I came to hazard all for the freedom of America." He was soon named brigadier general in charge of the American Cavalry Forces. And "hazard all" he did, distinguishing himself by repeated acts of courage.

But Casimir Pulaski's importance goes far beyond his military prowess. Yes, he is known as the "Father of the American Cavalry" and yes, he did form the renowned "Pulaski Legion," an independent militia. But while we remember Pulaski's contributions to many significant battles, he is important for more than his individual accomplishments.

Casimir Pulaski is a symbol. He personifies the intense love of liberty that characterizes the Polish people even today, as they continue the fight against Soviet oppression, a struggle not unlike the one led by Pulaski himself 200 years ago.

Pulaski's story is also a uniquely American one. He epitomizes our American heritage. We are a nation of immigrants, many of whom fled persecution in their native lands for an opportunity to live in freedom. Casimir Pulaski was one such immigrant. Ours is a nation founded on the principle that liberty is worth fighting for. Pulaski, as much as any other figure in American history, exemplifies that principle.

It is fitting that each year we honor Casimir Pulaski on the anniversary of his death in battle. In the city of Philadelphia, as throughout the Nation, parades and other festivities are held. I am proud for this opportunity to add my voice to the many others remembering Casimir Pulaski and his contributions to our history. He is a man worthy of our praise, our thanks, and our emulation.

Thank you.●

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues today as we commemorate one of our earliest heroes, Gen. Casimir Pulaski.

Born in Warka, Poland, in about 1748, Pulaski was the eldest son of a count. Left penniless after the Russian domination of Poland in 1772, Pulaski left his beloved homeland, first for Turkey, then on to Paris. It was there that he met American patriots such as Ben Franklin and Silas Deane. Convinced by them that his military experience would benefit the Revolution, Pulaski came to America in 1777. First volunteering with George Washington, he then commanded his own troop of cavalry, and died in 1779, while leading a heroic charge during the siege of Savannah.

Gen. Casimir Pulaski was born a Polish count, but he died an American patriot. Unable to free the land he loved, he chose to continue the battle for freedom nonetheless, for a country that became the symbol of freedom and liberty for people throughout the world. As the people of Poland pursue their struggle for freedom, let us remember that our tradition of sacrifice and struggle for that same goal was shaped in part by people like Casimir Pulaski. The bonds of liberty hold people more closely that those of tyranny. In those bonds, we stand by the people of Poland in their present struggle, as we share in the international search for individual freedom and justice.●

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, we join today to honor one of the great heroes of our War of Independence, Count Casimir Pulaski.

Our country owes a great deal to individuals like General Pulaski, who, inspired by the ideals of our fight for freedom, came to these shores to assist us in our valiant struggle.

General Pulaski fought many years to protect the independence of his Polish homeland and brought much-needed military skills to the American forces.

Pulaski served admirably on several colonial fronts, including in my home State of New Jersey where one of our major highways is named in his honor.

He not only commanded units of the American Army, but also used his vast experience with the Polish cavalry to raise an independent cavalry corps here, and later became known as the "Father of the American Cavalry."

Two years after coming to this country, Pulaski and his cavalry led a gallant but unsuccessful attack against the British at Savannah, Ga. This heroic action cost him his life, but Pulaski's memory lives on through local Pulaski Day observances and many other standing memorials.

It is right that we remember the heroes of that war, heroes like Casimir Pulaski who shared our dream of independence and helped our forefathers to realize it. We shall always be in their debt.●

● Mr. BOUCHER. Mr. Speaker, next Tuesday, October 11, is the anniversary of the death of one of America's lesser known Revolutionary War heroes, Count Casimir Pulaski. He was one of a select corps of foreigners who fought and died for the ideals of the American Revolution.

Casimir Pulaski was a Polish aristocrat who had long fought against the powers of tyranny and oppression in his homeland. Notwithstanding suffering defeat in his own country, he was determined to carry on the fight for liberty. He came to the American Colonies in 1777 to renew his struggle which ended when he gave his life for another country and a cause, an ideal—freedom.

After meeting with Benjamin Franklin in Paris, Count Pulaski arrived in America, commended to the Continental Congress by Gen. George Washington. Congress, sorely in need of military men of the Count's experience and caliber, entrusted him with the command of the newly formed cavalry. He later fought courageously in New Jersey, Delaware, South Carolina, and finally Georgia.

It was at the siege of Savannah, on October 11, 1779, while leading his cavalry against the enemy, that Count Pulaski was struck by grapeshot and mortally wounded. Thus ended the career of a great soldier and a champion of liberty.

To honor a patriot whose cause was not confined by national boundaries, the Commonwealth of Virginia formed a county in 1839, from parts of Wythe and Montgomery Counties in southwest Virginia, and named it after Count Pulaski. I am proud to represent Pulaski County in this body.

Mr. Speaker, I think all Americans should be thankful to those who came from afar to join the struggle for freedom. This struggle is a universal one, as the recent events in Count Pulaski's native land have demonstrated.●

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in my distinguished colleague, Mr. BORSKI's special order to honor Casimir Pulaski, the "Father of the American Cavalry."

Casimir Pulaski was a man who fervently believed in liberty. He lived during a time of high ideals and strong passions for freedom. His struggle in the cause for liberty was an international one, and he traveled or fought in revolutionary France, Poland, and America.

When he finally arrived in America in 1777, he immediately organized and commanded a joint cavalry/light infantry unit known as the Pulaski Legion. Two years and many critical battles later, Casimir Pulaski was killed as he led his Legion in a gallant assault against enemy lines during the Battle for Savannah on October 9, 1779.

His memory and legacy lives on in his native Poland, and here in the Republic which he died for. He deserves to be honored this day.●

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, the long history of the oppression of Poland by powerful neighbors has produced outstanding patriots committed to the cause of freedom, and I am very pleased today to participate in this special order of business to salute the memory of Count Casimir Pulaski.

He has a prominent and honorable place in American history because of his important role in the American Revolution for independence. He was a courageous cavalry commander, and he died of wounds sustained in combat against British forces.

We know of Count Pulaski because of his place in our history, but it is often forgotten that he was a rebel for freedom in his native Poland before he came to America. It was a time when the independence of Poland was being crushed by Russia and Prussia, and Pulaski joined his father and brothers in leading a revolt that failed. He made his way to France and then to America.

It is sad that 204 years after his death, Poland suffers under a military dictatorship that serves the imperial interests of Russia, but Count Pulaski would be very proud that Polish patriotism remains strong and the people of Poland continue their valiant resistance against Russian imperialism.

As we remember that Count Pulaski sacrificed his life in the struggle for our freedom, let us do all that we can to keep alive the hope for the freedom of Poland.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

SOVIET JEWRY: AN ASSESSMENT AFTER KAL 007

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a special order relating to the plight of Soviet Jewry, an assessment after the destruction of the Korean airliner.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN) for joining in setting aside time today for the House to assess the issue of Soviet Jewry in light of the recent destruction of the Korean airliner and the resulting death of 269 innocent civilians. This tragic incident has prompted a period of reassessment and redefinition of United States-Soviet relations.

It is clear that United States-Soviet relationships have soured due to the Soviet's irresponsible reprehensible action over Sahklin Island. Countries around the world have followed the U.S. lead in condemning the Soviet shooting and normal commercial activities between the Soviet Union and other countries have been disrupted.

Mr. Speaker, let no one misunderstand—this situation has been caused by the Soviet Government through its callous destruction of 269 lives and through its inexcusable excuses for its action. The Soviet Government has tried typical propanganda technique—hide the truth from one's own people and tell the big lie to the rest of the world. The Soviets have even tried to blame this tragic incident on our country. This coverup tactic has failed miserably—around the world.

In the same way, the Soviets have tried for years to coverup another tragic situation—their refusal to allow free immigration. For years, countries around the world have condemned their inhumane refusal to allow their own citizens exit visas—particularly their Jewish citizens. And, sadly enough, Mr. Speaker, for too many years the Soviets have made shameless excuses for this lack of regard for the human rights of its own people. We want today the Soviet Government to know that this coverup tactic continues to fail, even as they begin an even more vitriolic anti-Semitic propaganda campaign. In fact, I believe the incident with KAL 007 only reinforces the world's disbelief in the Soviet claim that there is no immigration problem because they have supposedly granted visas to everyone who wants to emigrate.

One consequence of worsening relations is that tens of thousands of Soviet Jews and other minorities who are trapped in the Soviet Union may now have less hope for their freedom in the immediate future.

Though I am less optimistic today than before August 31, we must remain hopeful. In this spirit, I hope that our special order today will send word to both the Soviet Government and the refuseniks that we in Congress have not forgotten them. I am reminded of several Soviet Jews who have been refused exit visas; I recently met with their relatives and I want them to know that they are not forgotten. They include Mr. Alex Khannuk; Alexander, Ludmilla, and Elana Prutkov Veniamin Nigin and Anna Levina; Galina and Yuri Pikovskiy Tatyana Brendis; Rita and Igor Vdovkin and their son Albert and finally, Abe Stollar, an American citizen.

To them, I say, we have not forgotten you and we will not forget until you and your fellow refuseniks are allowed to emigrate.

To my colleagues here, I remind you of a quote from a speech of John Kennedy in 1961:

> All our early Revolutionary leaders, I think, echoed the words of Thomas Jefferson that "the disease of liberty is catching." And some of you may remember the exchange between Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Paine. Benjamin Franklin said, "Where freedom lives, there is my home." And Thomas Paine said, "Where freedom is not, there is my home." I think all of us who believe in freedom feel a sense of community with all those who are free, but I think we also feel an even stronger sense of community with those who are not free, but who someday will be free.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN).

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my distinguished colleague from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) for taking this special order.

Mr. Speaker, the callous destruction of the Korean Air Lines passenger plane has prompted a period of reassessment in United States-Soviet relations. In light of this changing climate, my distinguished colleague from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) and I are particularly concerned that Soviet Jewry, to which Congress has always had a strong commitment, remain a high priority in American policy toward the Soviet Union.

While the destruction of a defenseless civilian airliner has not had a direct impact on the issue of Soviet Jewry, it does reveal a number of terrible truths about the Soviet Government and its system. Perhaps the most terrible truth is that the Soviet leaders do not share, nor do they care for, the basic human values that distinguish our own society. In recent years, this has been no more clearly illustrated than by the Soviet Government's treatment of its Jewish citizens, particularly those who have expressed a desire to emigrate. The refuseniks have become outcasts in Soviet society. They are trapped by a system that does not want them; nor is it willing to let them leave. And the situation continues to deteriorate. The number of Jews permitted to emigrate continues its sharp decline from previous years and there is little hope that the situation will improve in the near future. Moreover, the recently formed Soviet Anti-Zionist Committee has already begun to compare emigration with treason.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague and I have called for this special order today for two reasons. First, to continue to focus attention on the plight of those Jews wishing to emigrate from the Soviet Union and, second, to provide Members of this body with a forum to put forth and discuss practical initiatives that might be taken by the United States to help alleviate this tragic situtation.

Unquestionably, we have been most effective in focusing public attention—both here in the United States and abroad—on the problems of Soviet Jewish emigration. By doing so, we have let the Soviet Government know that Jewish emigration, and human rights in general, remain high priorities for the United States. Equally as important, we let the refuseniks know that they are not alone in their struggle, that they are not forgotten. For these reasons, it is crucial that we continue to focus national and world attention on this issue, whether it be at the grassroots level, in Congress, or through international channels such as the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Public opinion, however, while it can make a difference in specific cases, is not enough. If we are to bring about a significant change in the Soviet Government's official attitude toward its Jewish citizens, we must do more.

So the question remains, what practical initiative can be taken to encourage the Soviets to permit freer emigration, remove restrictions on religious and cultural practices and cease harassment of individuals who have requested permission to emigrate? Clearly, there are no easy or simple answers. In fact, it seems just the opposite. For those of us who for years have been deeply involved in this cause, the question of leverage in United States-Soviet relations has more often led to a great sense of frustration than to answers. We know that more must be done. What we do not know is how or what. Even among the Jewish refusenik community there is no clear consensus.

Yet, there are means available to us. By linking Soviet Jewry to other important United States-Soviet policy considerations, we can impress on the Soviets that the United States will not sit idly by in the face of blatant human rights violations.

Unfortunately, many of the most critical bilateral issues—such as nuclear arms reductions—are by their own right enormously complex and difficult to negotiate. Yet, there are other areas where it may be possible to influence the Soviets. Perhaps some of the areas in which the Soviets are most vulnerable are in the fields of science and technology. A number of refuseniks have asserted that Soviet leaders fear being cut off from the world scientific community and have suggested that by linking science and technology agreements and transfers to improvement in human rights conditions, we can, in fact, exert a great deal of pressure. Other areas which might be explored include cultural and educational exchanges. While these may not represent major foreign policy considerations for the Soviets, they are nevertheless important to them and may be an effective means of influencing that Government.

Whatever course we follow must demonstrate clearly to the Soviets that we are serious in our commitment and our determination. The lives of thousands upon thousands of Soviet Jews depend on our efforts.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. I yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to commend the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN) for arranging this special order this evening so that we may focus more specifically on the relationship between the destruction of KAL flight 007 recently, and the continued harassment and discrimination of Soviet Jewry by the Soviet Union.

There are several links that can be made. The most glaring, of course, is the blatant disregard the Soviet authorities have for human life and human dignity. Not only do they subject their own citizens to capricious arrest and imprisonment, hoping they will disappear from the eyes of the West into the infamous "gulag," but they exploit an innocent civilian airliner, shoot it down because it strayed into Soviet airspace, and cause it to disappear from air traffic control radar screens. The men and women whom the Soviet Union cause to "disappear" only increase our resolve here in the United States to insure that communication lines remain open, so that none of these innocent victims can be forgotten.

Mr. Speaker, today our House Post Office and Civil Service Committee conducted a hearing which was the culmination of our year-long investigation into the Soviets nondelivery of American mail. We received countless documents and heard supporting testimony that the Soviet Union would like nothing better than for Americans to forget that the Soviet Union violates international law time and again, and that it blithely ignores the conventions accepted by all civilized nations. The ongoing issue of the restrictions on emigration of Soviet Jewry continues to be a priority for the Congress, the State Department, and for our negotiators at the United Nations. The long-term effect of the shooting down of flight 007 on American-Soviet relations is not yet clear; the short-term effect is. It is important that we in this body continue to voice our indignation to the Soviet authorities at every opportunity. Let us not allow the issue of Soviet Jewry to be forgotten. In the wake of the flight 007 massacre, we must show the refuseniks and prisoners of conscience that we are still with them. The Soviet Union must know that it is up to them to improve relations with the United States by markedly increasing Jewish emigration from the U.S.S.R., desisting from the harassment of those individuals desirous of practicing their religion openly, and honestly admitting their complicity in the downing of a passenger plane. If we forget to press them on these matters, the rest of the world will forget as well. Since Scripture reminds us that we are indeed our brother's keeper, it is incumbent upon this body to keep the plight of Soviet Jewry in the forefront of our actions.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Texas (Mr. ANDREWS).

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, let me begin by expressing my appreciation to my distinguished colleagues, Mr. LEVIN and Mr. COUGHLIN, for calling this special order. It is important that we examine the status of Soviet Jewry and Soviet oppression of human rights in the wake of the downing of the Korean Air Line 007. It is important that we do not forget how the Soviet Government is treating its own citizens, even while our attention is focused on the tragic destruction of the civilian airliner barely 1 month ago.

Since the death of Brezhnev, and the rise to power of the former head of the KGB, Yuriy Andropov, life for Soviet Jews has gotten consistently worse. Today, the oppression of Jews in the Soviet Union is worse than it has been since the days of czarist Russia.

The right of Soviet Jews to emigrate to Israel and elsewhere in the West is guaranteed by the Helsinki accords. It is also guaranteed by Soviet law, which permits emigration for the purpose of family reunification or repatriation to one's homeland. The past couple of years have seen dramatic reductions in the number of Jews permitted to leave the Soviet Union. In 1982, only 2,688 Jews were allowed to emigrate. That figure, for all of 1982, is less than the amount which left in 1 month in 1979, the peak year for emigration. This year, the statistics are even worse. As of October 1, only 1,070 Jews had been permitted to leave. In some months this year the figure has been less than 100, and it is estimated that the total for the year will be less than 2,000.

Yuriy Andropov has closed the gates of freedom, and left behind are an estimated 300,000 to 400,000 Jews who still seek to emigrate. This figure includes those who have applied to emigrate but have been refused, those who have applied and have not received a reply from the Soviet authorities, and those who have the necessary letters of invitation from relatives in Israel, but have not yet started the application process. One such family, which has applied to emigrate but has been refused, and whose case I have adopted, is the Raiz family of Vilna, Lithuanian SSR. Vladimir and Carmella Raiz first applied to emigrate to Israel in 1972. Vladimir has a sister in Israel, so the request was legal under the provision which permits emigration for purposes of family reunification. Vladimir, a molecular biologist, worked at the Institute of Molecular Biology in Vilna. Carmella is a concert violinist. In March 1973, the Raiz family was refused the right to emigrate for security reasons, supposedly related to Vladimir's work at the lab. However, according to the director of the lab, Vladimir never had a security clearance, and therefore did not work on matters related to national security. When his emigration request was denied, Vladimir was fired from his job, and has had little succcess in finding new work. Vladimir and Carmella have been slandered in the local press, harassed by the KGB, and arrested for making a phone call to Israel.

What makes the current crisis for Soviet Jews so alarming is that the Soviets have gone a step further than they have in the past, and have begun a systematic and comprehensive campaign of government-sponsored anti-Semitism. Evidence of this campaign has been quite visible in the form of the recent publication of a book titled "The Class Essence of Zionism," a book filled with slanderous accusations that the Jews themselves were responsible for the persecutions and pogroms they suffered under in czarist Russia. The campaign is also quite repulsively visible in the creation of the notorious Soviet anti-Zionism Committee which we have all heard so much about.

Today, however, I want to talk about two elements in the campaign that have not been well publicized. The first is the discrimination against college-age Soviet Jews. This group has suffered from unique forms of discrimination which may forever alter their lives. To begin with, there are quotas restricting the number of Jews permitted to attend universities. These quotas are applied not only to those whose nationality is listed as Jewish. The Soviet authorities are now applying the quota to those who have one parent who is Jewish, and in some cases are even looking at the nationality of the grandparents when applying the quota. Thus, the discrimination affects even those whose nationality is not Jewish, but whose heritage might be partially Jewish.

In recent years, the Soviets have slashed the quotas, especially at the better universities, and have all but eliminated the possibility that a Jewish student might be allowed to study in one of the more important disciplines, such as math, physics, and other sciences. Thus, oftentimes, Jewish students must attend trade schools or institutions of lesser quality and reputation if they can get a higher education at all. In addition to the quotas, the Soviets attempt to reduce the number of Jewish students by making it harder for them to qualify, subjecting them to discriminatory entrance examinations and unusually difficult oral exams that can last up to 5 hours, as opposed to the usual 1- to 2-hour oral exams given to non-Jewish applicants. The result has been a reduction in the number of Jewish students in Soviet institutions of higher learning from 112,000 in 1969 to fewer than 55,000 in 1981.

The second example I want to tell you about has horrifying implications. It is a new game that is being played in some elementary schools in the Soviet Union called the concentration camp game. Reports about this game first appeared last March. A delegation of the American Jewish Committee traveled to Russia to meet with resfusenik families. Some of the families they met in Moscow and in Leningrad told the delegation of a new game that their children were being subjected to in school. The concentration camp game is played by assigning a Jewish child a number, and referring to him only by that number for days on end, as if it was tatooed into his or her forearm. At no time while the game is being played is the child referred to by their real name. The game, although not organized by the authorities, seems to have their tacit approval. According to the report of the AJC delegation, teachers in classrooms where the game is being played make no attempt to stop it, and usually look the other way, pretending that it is not happening. The game is, I believe, a symbol of just how deeply imbedded anti-Semitism is in Soviet society. It is indeed an ominous development that the state-endorsed hatred of Jews is so widespread that Soviet youth, the next generation, are already indoctrinated into anti-Semitic behavior.

What can we do about the worsening situation of the Soviet Jews? Well, it is in times like these, when the situation seems to many to be hopeless, that we must reaffirm our commitment to their struggle for freedom. We can appeal to the Reagan administration to put the question of Soviet Jews and their rights high on the agenda of any meeting with Soviet officials. We can continue to press the Soviet Government to loosen its grip on Jewish families who want to leave.

We in the Congress have a crucial role to play. Oftentimes it is our outrage, our letters to Andropov, that mean the difference between freedom and prison for Soviet refuseniks. We must continue to write letters of encouragement to refusenik families, for oftentimes it is our letters that keep these families from complete despair. We must show them that the world knows and cares about their fate.

There is no instant gratification in working for the cause of Soviet Jewry. This is a struggle for the long haul. But it is because the situation is so desperate now that we must not give up. The gates to freedom have been shut, but they will not stay shut forever—unless we stop clamoring for them to open. We can reopen them by showing that we in Congress are deeply committed to this cause and that we are not about to abandon it. No matter how hard the Soviets, through their oppressive measures, try to convince us there is no hope, we can show them through our actions that hope still lives, and that the struggle has not been abandoned.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. I thank our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ANDREWS), for his eloquent remarks.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to join in commending our colleague, the gentleman from Texas. He made a number of very excellent points. One very important point, I thought, was that the denial of emigration from the Soviet Union is in violation of treaties to which they have agreed, in violation of their own laws, their own agreements, and how difficult it is to make agreements with a power that is like that. That is something that we again explore as we look at how this project ties in.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to commend the gentleman's very, very eloquent statement that, indeed, does go to the heart of what is a tremendous problem in this world, that kind of lack of freedom, the problem for the Jews and others in the Soviet Union who want to leave that country and are not permitted to by a government which some say if they let some leave, they would have to let so many people leave that they would not have many people in the Soviet Union.

Others say that they will bargain their people for other things with the United States. It seems tragic that a nation should be like that, and it really only reacts to public opinion in this country, public opinion that made the Soviets see that there is a ground swell of public opinion that we can help generate; that then there may be some further reaction. That seems to have been the most effective things to date at least.

I congratulate the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman. I think he has put his finger on such an important factor. What we are saying together, the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself, is that together with so many others, we will persevere.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank not only my colleague from Texas (Mr. ANDREWS) who spoke so clearly and in ringing tones a few moments ago, but all of my other colleagues who are submitting statements for the RECORD.

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews. Since its foundation in 1970, the UCSJ has played an important role in focusing the world's attention on the thousands of Soviet Jews and refuseniks suffering under the racist and discriminatory practices of the Soviet regime. The Soviet Union should never underestimate the importance this country attaches to the plight of these persecuted individuals. Its leaders must also be reminded that, as signatories of the Helsinki Act of 1975, they have committed themselves to a greater respect for the rights of this small, but courageous minority.

Although I am deeply concerned with the fate of all Jews in the Soviet Union, I have taken a special interest in the case of Lev Elbert. As you may know, Mr. Elbert is currently being held in a Soviet prison on trumped-up charges of drug possession. In light of the Korean Air Line massacre, I believe that the release of Mr. Elbert could be an important first indication that the Soviet Union is seeking to improve its relations with the United States. Accordingly, I have requested the cooperation of a number of Soviet officials in securing Mr. Elbert's release and in allowing the Elbert family to emigrate. More recently, I have written a letter to the commandant of the camp in which Mr. Elbert is being held. I have provided a copy of that letter for inclusion in the RECORD:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., August 5, 1983.

Camp Commandant Colonel RYBMITSKY,
Ispravitelnutudovoy, Poseoluk Trudovoy, Vinnitskaya Oblast-Peschansky Rayon, Ukrainian S.S.R., U.S.S.R.

DEAR COLONEL RYBMITSKY: I am writing to you on behalf of Lev Elbert, his wife Inna and his six-year-old son, Karmi.

For over seven years, Mr. Elbert and his family have been attempting to emigrate to Israel. Yet, because Mr. Elbert had once been privy to classified information while serving in the army, his applications for an exit visa have repeatedly been denied.

Last May Mr. Elbert was called upon to begin service in the military reserve. Mr. Elbert agreed to perform his service; yet he requested that he not be exposed to any classified information. Such exposure, he felt, would further obstruct his attempts to emigrate. Shortly thereafter, Mr. Elbert was arrested, charged with "draft evasion" and sentenced to a year in prison.

According to official sources, Mr. Elbert now faces an additional charge—drug possession. Prison authorities claim to have found 25 grams of hashish on his person. Although Mr. Elbert has recently ended a five-day hunger strike, he still faces another three years in prison.

Colonel Rybmitsky, the fate of Mr. Elbert and his family is of vital concern not only to me, but to a great many other Americans as well. I would therefore like to urge your cooperation: first, in securing Mr. Elbert's release from prison; and secondly, in allowing the Elbert family to emigrate.

I look forward to hearing from you on this important matter. With best wishes, I am

Cordially yours,

SILVIO O. CONTE,
Member of Congress.●

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, with the exception of the Soviets and their client states, the outcry has been universal against the outrageous shooting down of the Korean jetliner carrying 269 innocent passengers. If the Soviets anticipated a different response, they were sadly mistaken. Their actions were inexcusable and reprehensible, and the world has registered these protests in no uncertain terms.

The destruction of flight 007 has prompted many observers to reassess the objectives and direction of Soviet-American relations. Some observers have called for the prompt imposition of strong sanctions against the Soviet Union, including cancellation of a new grain agreement; curtailment of diplomatic relations; adjournment of arms control talks; and elimination of all cultural and education exchange programs.

Yet, there is little reason to believe that such a perspective is likely to result in any positive changes for the 500,000 Jews in the Soviet Union who have expressed a desire to emigrate to the West. Since the invasion of Afghanistan and the imposition of martial law in Poland, relations with the Soviet Union have undergone a steady decline. At the same time, emigration figures for Soviet Jews have dropped by more than 95 percent.

The downing of the KAL passenger plane came at a time when there was growing evidence of a gradual improvement in Soviet-American relations. The conclusion of the Conference on Security and Cooperation meeting in Madrid and the granting of emigration visas to the Pentacostalists who were harbored in the U.S. Embassy for years were but two recent signs of an improvement in relations. They were also a small indication that such a trend can be tied to tangible progress in the area of human rights.

Ultimately, few options are available to us for influencing the course of official Soviet policy toward 3 million Soviet Jews. Rather than casting aside the limited altenatives that we have pursued in the past, we must refocus our efforts in bringing this critically important issue to the forefront of Soviet-American relations. I am convinced that we must make the issue of Soviet Jewry a primary concern in all future negotiations for the sale of grain to the Soviet Union. Members of this body must renew their commitment to travel to the Soviet Union and meet with officials on this issue, instead of curtailing or canceling such plans. The administration might also reconsider its recent decision to cancel the scheduled reopening of a new consulate in Kiev.

We should also examine closely the human rights provisions of the Madrid document which was concluded in early September. This important document contains a number of significant and worthwhile contributions in the area of emigration and family reunification. We must press the Soviet Union to comply with all aspects of this agreement, through both diplomatic and political channels.

The downing of flight 007 and the Soviet Union's mendacious response to this tragedy should come as no surprise to anyone familiar with the brutal history of that country. Over the years, the Soviets have massacred thousands of their own citizens and disregarded the human rights of millions more in their grand design for world dominance. Yet, we must be careful not to use this episode as a misguided excuse for abandoning the pursuit of constructive developments in our relations with the Soviet Union. Rather, we must use it as a reaffirmation of the need to continue to place the issue of Soviet Jewry high on the diplomatic agenda. To do otherwise would be a grave and potentially irreversible mistake.●

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the murder of 269 people on board KAL flight 007 serves to remind us of the ruthlessness of the Soviet regime. I join all of my colleagues in abhoring this vicious attack.

This cold-blooded murder is dramatic evidence of Soviet brutality. Yet there is an ongoing reminder of Soviet cruelty, one that occurs every day—the plight of Soviet Jewry. To be Jewish in the Soviet Union is to be hated, ridiculed, tortured. Jews who practice their religion or teach Hebrew and other Jewish studies are either imprisoned or internally exiled. Refuseniks, those Jews who apply for visas to the West, lose employment and are constantly harassed by KGB agents. Few are ever allowed to leave the Soviet Union.

These major human rights violations against Soviet Jewry are a crime against humanity. They violate many of the accords that the Soviet Union has signed, including the Helsinki accords and the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights. The Soviets have recently increased the attack on the Jewish community by forming the infamous Anti-Zionist Council and by slowing Jewish emigration to a trickle.

Recently, I received a letter from a constituent concerned over the Korean airliner murder and over the treatment of Soviet Jewry. He suggested that as partial restitution to mankind for the KAL murders that the Soviet Union pay the West with increased emigration of Soviet Jewry. This idea may strike some as bizarre. Indeed, it is absurd that we should feel compelled to beg them to grant their own people basic human rights, but it is precisely such a brutal system with which we must contend.

I would like to submit for the RECORD the letter I received from Scott Kane and urge all of my colleagues to continue to call attention to the abuses of human rights of Jews, and, indeed of all people, in the U.S.S.R.

DEERFIELD, ILL.,
September 9, 1983.

Hon. JOHN PORTER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PORTER: Some people say we should cut off their wheat supply; others say that Aeroflot should be prevented from landing anywhere in the world; while others demand monetary restitution to the families of the victims. All of these could be the civilized world's punishment of the Russians for their cold-blooded destruction of Korean Air Lines Flight 007.

But cutting off their wheat could hurt our farmers more than the Russian economy. The Soviets have proven in the past that they can go without our wheat . . . they'll just let their people starve a little bit more than they do now. Keeping their airline from using other international airports could only be a temporary measure, at best. And, having the Soviets make monetary restitution to the families of Flight 007 would have little effect on the treasury of the USSR.

OK, if these sanctions would have little or no effect on the Soviet Union, then what can we as members of a free society do to enact an effective punishment? Could we not devise a punishment that would provide retribution and at the same time further the cause of democracy? We need to attack, not at their military defenses, but at the core of their Communist principles; to expose their perfect society as the fraud that it really is.

Let the Soviets pay for the 269 lives with the lives of Soviet Citizens. Not in the manner of an "eye for an eye," but more in the form of a "contribution" to the free world. Where would these people come from? There are more than 200,000 registered Soviet Jews, or Refuseniks, now living in the Soviet Union who want out. These are the people who have formally requested exit visas from Russia, and who have been denied emigration. When they request visas, these people are fired from their jobs, ridiculed, and classified as non-citizens in the eyes of the Soviet Government. They, and their children, are constantly watched, harassed, and persecuted by the KGB.

Would it not be an appropriate punishment if the Soviet Union was forced to release 1,000 Refuseniks for every life lost on Flight 007? Imagine, over 200,000 people would be set free. This would certainly assure the free world that the 269 victims had not died in vain. Would this not demonstrate to the world that there are people living within the confines of the USSR that desire to prove that living the life as a Soviet Citizen is not as utopian as their leaders say it is.

The United States Government knows who these Refuseniks are, and it should do everything in its power to see that those who want to leave the USSR should be afforded the opportunity to do so.

Very truly yours,

SCOTT H. KANE.●

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, the downing of Korean Air Lines flight 007 by the Soviet Union was an act of blatant murder that has outraged freedom-loving people the world over.

The legacy that tragic incident left us in clear. We must not be lulled into any sense of false security in our Nation's dealing with Russia. There is now a strong feeling of suspicion among Americans in anything that has to do with the Soviet Union, be it political oriented, sports based, or even on the level of purchasing of Russian products.

Indeed, the shooting down of that Korean airliner has clearly redefined how our Nation will deal with the Soviet Union in the future.

Mr. Speaker, the brutality of the Soviet system has never been a secret to those of us who know the plight and suffering of the Soviet Jewish population. The brutal treatment of its Jewish citizens over the decades is a moral outrage to all humankind.

Despite the Soviets' signing of so-called human rights documents with varied Western nations, the vise around the neck of Soviet Jewry is tightening. Soviet Jewish emigration is at an alltime low, with only 2,688 Jews allowed to leave that nation in 1982 compared with over 51,000 in 1979. This year's emigration figures are indeed dismal. So far, the 1983 emigration totals are only half those of 1982.

What we are witnessing is the most blatant attempt to restrict the movement and religious and cultural activists of Jewish people since the era of Nazi Germany. We can only assume that it is the deliberate Soviet policy to break the will and spirit of Soviet Jewry.

More Jewish activities have been arrested, tried, and convicted over the past year than during the previous several years. The more well known names of those brave individuals like Anatoly Shcharansky, Ida Nudel, Iosif Begun, Alexei Murzhenko, Yuri Federov, and Victor Brailovsky, have become symbols of freedom to us all. And there are hundreds, perhaps thousands of other Jewish dissidents who are rotting in Soviet prisons and detention camps simply because of their desire to leave Russia and to practice their faith.

Mr. Speaker, the shooting down of that ill-fated Korean airliner has drawn worldwide attention to the Soviet Union and the policies of its leadership. Despite denials of guilt in the airline downing, the Russians know they have become vulnerable targets for criticism in all areas of Soviet life. Indeed, the time has never been better to raise the issue of the treatment of Soviet Jews and the denial of their right of free access to leave that nation.

Even prior to the Korean airliner incident, the Soviets have been undergoing the most severe economic and political turmoil since the Communist Revolution of 1917. The invasion of Afghanistan has backfired in their faces and the same can be said for the Soviet's disasterous attempts to block expressions of personal freedom in Poland.

Mr. Speaker, if the United States does not take a strong stand in support of Soviet Jewish rights at this critical time, Andropov and his leadership group in the Kremlin will take it as a sign of indifference on the part of our Nation. We must not allow that to happen.●

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, the wanton destruction of an unarmed Korean passenger jet by the Soviet Union stunned civilized people around the world. Our Nation is still in shock over the brutal destruction of the airliner by the Soviets, which took the lives of 269 innocent people.

In addition to the 269 who died, however, and their bereaved families and friends, there is another victim of this disaster; that victim is hope. For Jews in the Soviet Union, the situation in the wake of KAL flight 007 may seem hopeless.

We know that situation has never been graver. The rate of Soviet Jewish emigration has declined precipitously over the past several years, from a monthly average of approximately 4,000 in 1979 to less than 100 today. The government's harassment of Jews seeking to leave the Soviet Union has increased markedly in recent months; religious expression is punished severely. The number of arrests of Jewish citizens is soaring. Mail sent to Soviet Jews is being confiscated. Most discouraging is the formation of an official Anti-Zionist Committee, a government project designed to spread vicious propaganda linking Zionism to Hitler and Nazism.

The entire Jewish community in the Soviet Union is systematically being cut off from the rest of the world. In dealing with its own citizens, it has become the policy of the Soviet Government to eradicate distinction, and any individual freedoms. It has become the policy of the Soviet Government to eradicate even hope.

The devastating mistreatment of Soviet Jewry by the Government of the U.S.S.R. stands only to worsen in the wake of the destruction of KAL flight 007, and the reaction of nations around the world. Unless, that is, we in the free world renew and reinforce our commitment to strive for human rights. We must not give way in our demands for justice and fair treatment by the Soviet Government of its citizens. Our vigilance and constancy in this cause may be the difference between life and death for a crucial element—that element is hope.●

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I commend my colleagues, Mr. LEVIN and Mr. COUGHLIN, for making it possible for the many concerned Members of this body to join together at this time to discuss the U.S. relations with the Soviet Union in the aftermath of the downing of the Korean passenger plane, with special regard to the plight of Soviet Jewry.

The task now before us is to take all steps necessary to assure that such an incident will never happen again. We need to carefully examine the various possible measures that have been put forward, ranging from better warning systems for planes approaching Soviet air space to additional sanctions should they be needed to secure Soviet cooperation in protecting international commercial travel.

The tragic loss of life in this incident raises many questions about our relationship with the Soviet Union. The cruel and calculated destruction of KAL 007 outside of their country leads me to wonder how we can continue to remain complacent about the Soviet's treatment of people within their borders.

Jews in particular are suffering mounting repression at the hands of the Soviet Government and the KGB. Anatoly Shcharansky and Iosef Begun remain in prison, guilty only of being Jewish in a country which considers Judaism a crime. Others who speak out against the harsh Soviet emigration policies, participate in Jewish cultural activities, or simply attempt to teach Judaism are subject to arrest and are constantly harassed by the KGB. No one can say for certain how many more of the country's 3 million remaining Jews are awaiting the opportunity to emigrate with the Kremlin's 95 percent decline in permitted departures.

Mr. Speaker, none of this should be news to any of us. Not only have my colleagues and I spoken out on the plight of Soviet Jews before, but Members of Congress and of the American Jewish community have been doing so for many years. In spite of all of our efforts, and in spite of the remarkable fact that thousands of Jews have been allowed to leave the Soviet Union over the last decade, the Soviet's concerted effort to suppress Judaism, which has continued since shortly after their 1917 revolution, is as strong as ever today. Earlier this year the formation of the Anti-Zionist Committee of the Soviet Public was announced. It is clear that we have much work still to do in order to assist Soviet Jewry.

What can we do to protect Soviet Jews from harassment and arrest? How can we make it possible for them to emigrate in greater numbers? I think that the most effective means of coming to their aid lies in the organizational strength of the American Jewish community. There are two things we must concentrate on: Education and action.

Education is the factor which will make action possible. People in this country still do not know enough about the atrocities that the Soviet Union has committed against Jews, and Americans are not all aware of the numbers of Soviet Jews who are subjected to this as part of their daily struggle. The Soviet Union still has approximately 20 percent of the world's Jewish population. We must work to educate Jews, as well as concerned citizens of all religions. Without sheer numbers of people to express their outrage at the abhorrent Soviet policies, the Kremlin can easily shrug off the complaints of a relative few. One thing the Soviets understand is pressure, for it is one of the tactics they use best. Pressure is what we must put them under in order to free Soviet Jewry from the government's repressive grasp.

Action is to be our means of applying pressure. Americans must be encouraged to write to Soviet dissidents to express support and solidarity, and to write to Moscow to express their outrage at the Soviet's denial of human rights to Jews. As Members of Congress we must consider our economic and technological relationship with the Soviet Union as potential tools to achieve freedom for Soviet Jews, while working toward serious negotiations with the Soviet Union for arms control. We must be willing to take the initiative and to recognize the potential benefits to be gained, not only for ourselves, but for the Soviets and the rest of the world, by advocating and negotiating for a nuclear freeze. Only once the Soviets see that we have the will and the strength to negotiate seriously, without see-sawing back and forth on our policies, will they be willing to join us in pursuit of human rights and peace.●

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the discussions that have ensued as a result of the Korean airliner incident, there has been precious little dialog about the impact of this event on the Soviet Jewry movement. Unfortunately, American policymakers have discussed nearly every aspect of this issue while neglecting to include one vital aspect of American policy: our commitment to Soviet Jewish emigration and human rights. It is to the benefit of the Congress, and all Americans, that the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews has organized this special order. In the wake of the most recent vicious human rights violation perpetrated by the Soviets, we must not ignore this important aspect of United States-Soviet relations.

Although there is little of positive value that one can say about this incident, and the current status of Soviet-American relations, we must endeavor to see what possible actions can be pursued that will help to break the stalemate in Soviet-Jewish emigration. Mr. Speaker, the United States must continue to press the Soviets on this issue, in effect making Soviet Jewish emigration a test of Soviet intentions in their relationship with the United States. It is clear that the Soviets' blatant disregard for human rights is shaken by very little short of direct pressure which forces them to recognize the rights which are conferred upon all individuals under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Helsinki accords. Although the Soviets are signatories of these agreements, their actions display a wanton failure to adhere to principles which the world community considers to be the intrinsic rights of all people throughout the world. Mr. Speaker, unless we place the human rights issue at the top of our agenda with the Soviets, we will continue to witness the current low rate of Jewish emigration and a further deterioration in human rights conditions in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, this issue must remain a part of the ongoing negotiations between our countries. It is vital that the Soviet Jewry issue not be shunted aside as prisoners of conscience and Jewish refuseniks continue to languish in the Soviet Union. It is our duty, as the leading democracy in the world, to reassert our commitment to Soviet Jewish emigration.

Mr. Speaker, I call on President Reagan to heed the words of Soviet Jewry activists through the country who call on him to publicly affirm an American policy which is committed to utilizing all possible opportunities to achieve renewed progress in Soviet Jewish emigration.●

● Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, since the destruction of KAL 007 by the Soviet Union several weeks ago, United States-Soviet relations have rapidly deteriorated. Numerous measures have been introduced in this Congress to place severe restrictions on the Soviet Union for this senseless attack, and I support several of these bills. However, I am very concerned that United States reactions to this incident will further threaten the number of Soviet Jews allowed to emigrate.

Soviet Jewry must remain a top priority in American policy toward the Soviet Union. The United States must continue to discuss the issue of Soviet Jewry at international forums and work to secure freedom for Soviet Jews in our bilateral security negotiations with the Soviet Union. We, the Congress, must continue our efforts to secure freedom for Soviet Jews through resolutions, correspondence, and vocal support. It will be more difficult, now, to accomplish this goal due to the recent international tragedy; however, I believe through our constant efforts we can open the door for all Soviet Jews to have the opportunity to live in a free society.

As a member of the Coalition for Soviet Jewry, I have written several letters to Ambassador Dorbynin on behalf of Soviet Jews wishing to emigrate. Although these letters have never been answered, I know my efforts are not futile. We have witnessed results by reuniting families after years of being apart. This can continue, and I urge my colleagues to heighten their efforts in this cause.●

● Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, many of you have been active in efforts to assist Soviet Jewry, who collectively constitute the segment of Soviet society most deprived of their rights. On May 20 of this year I sent around a "Dear Colleague" to gain signatures for a letter to President Andropov protesting the solitary confinement of Samuel Zalmanson, a prisoner of conscience in the Soviet Union. The Oklahoma Commission for Soviet Jewry has routinely updated Samuel's brother, Israel, efforts on Samuel's behalf, including this one. Israel has been through the same situation as his brother and knows firsthand the harsh conditions in Soviet prison camps. Recently, he wrote to me, and I would like to take this opportunity to share with you some of his letter. Of particular interest to me were his comments about the illustration we used on our "Dear Colleague." In May, we felt that the artist's rendition of a POC's plight was a very grim and accurate depiction of conditions in the Soviet prison system. Apparently, this was not the case, and Israel, paints and even worse picture.

DEAR MR. SYNAR: I and my family appreciate very much your efforts to help release my twin-brother Samuel from the jail in Russia. I myself spent 8 years in prison, or more precise, in a "labor corrective institution" and know very well how it helps a prisoner morally when he has international support. The guards might hate him more, but they would be afraid to do the things to him that they do to those that don't have any backing. Besides, there is always hope that after public pressure the prisoner can be freed. . . .

By the way, the picture of the prisoner behind the bars, (on the letter you addressed to your colleagues) does not illustrate well enough the prison conditions in Russia. First, prisoners are not allowed to grow hair. Second, a prison window has so many gratings and shields that a prisoner can't see even a little bit of blue. . . .

This letter should remind us to redouble our efforts not only for Samuel Zalmanson, but all of those in the Soviet Union who suffer religious persecution. It is clear that the conditions in the Soviet gulags are barbaric. It is also clear that our efforts here are not in vain, and, that our continued pressure on the Soviet authorities can improve the plight of POC's.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to participate in this special order today on behalf of Soviet Jewry. This is an especially fitting time to remember the plight of these individuals. Little over 1 month ago, the world witnessed another example of the barbarity of the Soviet system in the shooting down of Korean Air Lines flight No. 007.

By providing clear and unmistakable evidence of the nature of the Soviet system, this action has highlighted the need in the Congress and across the Nation to continue our efforts to place before the world the sad treatment of Soviet Jews by their government.

As we are all aware, earlier this year the Soviet Government established an anti-Zionist Committee of the Soviet Public. While the full intentions of this organization are not yet clear, anti-Jewish propaganda has increased and indications are that the formation of the organization is a signal that Jewish emigration to Israel will be further reduced and that Soviet Jews will continue to be isolated from public life.

In light of these developments, it is our duty in this Nation of free men and women to continue shining the light of truth on Soviet actions. Despite the immediacy of the horror of the destruction of the Korean airliner, we must not allow the world to forget the Soviets' ongoing persecution of Soviet Jews.●

● Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, although the majority of the world has stridently deplored the destruction of the Korean airliner 007 and its 269 innocent passengers, the Soviet Union, far from offering the apology demanded by conscience, has adopted a stance defending its heinous act. In its refusal to admit its culpability, the Soviet Union yet again demonstrates its unwillingness to make concessions and its blatant disregard for the most basic tenets of human rights as laid out by the Helsinki accords. This behavior does not come as a surprise to those who have studied the long history of wrongs deliberately done to the Soviet Jews by their own government. In light of the inevitable tension between our country and theirs, we must loudly and publicly commit ourselves to their relief. The almost 3 million Soviet Jews have suffered greatly at the hands of a government which actively subjects that people to numerous indignities and violations of human rights.

In recent years the condition of the Soviet Jews has worsened considerably, as injustice, hostility, and outright harassment have escalated. Practice of the religion is nearly impossible, jobs commensurate with talent or experience are rarely offered, and even education is frequently denied. This mistreatment, however, pales in comparison to the plight of the refuseniks, whose hounding and persecution are likely to continue unrelieved now that emigration of Soviet Jews has dwindled to a slow trickle. Indeed, this year's figures indicate an appalling halving of the mere 2,688 emigrees of 1982. This summer the Soviet authorities claimed that the emigration was coming to an end because all of those who wished to leave already had, but this statement is patently false. The number of Jews who still wish to emigrate is estimated to be in the hundreds of thousands.

In order to help them, now more than ever we must take care not to lose sight of this issue. Keeping the condition of the Soviet Jews in the forefront of public awareness will serve to let both the Soviet Union and its Jewish citizens know that our commitment is as strong as ever. Instead of discouraging communication between our Government and theirs, we must strive to keep the channels open so that the issue can be raised, our concerns voiced, and conditions bettered. Traditionally, high points in the emigration pattern of Soviet Jews seem to have occurred during relaxations of tension between the United States and the Soviet Union. Though an opposite state presently exists, in the best interests of the Soviet Jews we must make the most of every opportunity to discuss their position with the Soviet authorities as well as among ourselves.

The importance of this issue, and of all human rights issues, should not be allowed to fade. With continuous reiteration of our faithful commitment, the likelihood that the Soviet Union can be induced to relax its tough emigration policy and allow its Jewish citizens to lead normal lives greatly increases.●

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the tragic downing of Korean Air Lines flight 007 has brought renewed focus on the state of United States-Soviet relations.

These relations have not been good and the Soviet attack on the civilian airliner, costing 269 innocent lives, has complicated these relations even further.

The aftershock has reverberated in many areas around the world, however, all the implications of this incident still are not known.

The many Members of this body who are solidly committed to the preservation and promotion of human rights for Soviet Jews and others, are understandably concerned about the effect of the KAL tragedy on the thousands upon thousands of Soviet citizens who are already suffering greatly under Soviet oppression.

In particular, we are outraged at the Soviet emigration policy, which, prior to recent events had already deteriorated vastly.

That the Soviets have ignored their family reunification and human rights assurances of Helsinki is a well-known fact. Now, we must logically fear that the Soviet Jewish community will suffer even more under the Soviet regime which uses refuseniks as pawns in the larger international struggle in which these innocent people have so great a stake.

We must not forsake our efforts for a more humane Soviet emigration policy in the wake of the KAL tragedy. The Soviet Union can never fully redeem itself of responsibility for this tragedy. While this fact will not change, the time is certainly ripe for an expression of humanitarianism from the Soviet Government.

There are countless forums where the Soviets might begin this process, including easing the pain of Prisoners of Conscience and the suffering of the many refuseniks who experience harassment and much worse for their dream of a better life.

I join my colleagues in urging the Soviets to do so, and in so doing begin a full, compassionate and long overdue reassessment of a policy of injustice and hate, a policy which fueled the tragic downing of the Korean airliner.●

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, our anguish over the recent Korean Air Lines tragedy must not cause our attention to stray from the Soviets' long history of violation of human rights in their treatment of the Jewish treatment currently living in the Soviet Union.

In the last year, the quality of life of Soviet Jews has degenerated to a new low. Activists are being rounded up and jailed in record numbers, prayer books and other religious materials are being confiscated with enhanced vigor, Hebrew teachers face the threat of imprisonment, and cultural self-study groups have been forcibly disbanded. Worse yet, in the face of such renewed hardship, Jews are being given even less of an opportunity to emigrate than at any time in the past 10 years. Jewish emigration, once reaching a highpoint of 51,320 in 1979, has come to a virtual standstill with only 2,688 Jews permitted to leave in 1982.

As we join with other nations in placing pressure on the Soviet Union so that its leaders are made to feel the consequences of their brutal act, we should also seek relief for the plight of Soviet Jewry. The Soviets could begin to improve their standing in the eyes of those nations concerned with human rights by respecting the rights of Soviet Jews.●

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleagues Mr. LEVIN and Mr. COUGHLIN for sponsoring this special order on the very pressing needs of Soviet Jews. It is a subject about which we can never say or do too much.

Religious persecution continues to be a fact of life for thousands of Jews in the Soviet Union. Over the past several years, what had been a steady stream of Soviet emigres has dropped to a trickle. Those remaining in the U.S.S.R. and practicing their faith are subjected to slander in the press, repression in the classroom, and harrassment by their fellow countrymen. Soviet Jews with the courage to speak out on behalf of their people are silenced; many are imprisoned. For 6½ years, the much publicized case of Anatoly Shcharansky has personified the injustices suffered by Soviet Jews seeking a chance to leave and practice their faith in peace.

Protesting the unduly harsh treatment and censure of Soviet Jews has become a national commitment in the United States. The President made Soviet Jewry a major topic of concern at the Helsinki talks in Madrid; many of my colleagues and I in Congress have "adopted" individuals applying to emigrate in an attempt to bring focused pressure on the Soviet Government to allow these people to join their families in Israel and other parts of the world; and citizens and groups all over the country have decried the continued imprisonment of many Soviet Jews who had the courage to stand up for freedom. But words of protest are not enough—relief of this international disgrace should be a condition we raise in every Soviet negotiation and contract.

We must not let our commitment to these efforts flag. At a time when our political and military relationship with the Soviet Union is tense and unyielding, we should redouble our efforts to seek a show of good faith from President Andropov that the Soviet Union takes seriously its signed commitment to human rights. We should demand a retraction of the Soviet Government's support of the recently formed anti Zionist committee, a blatantly anti Semitic organization. And we must demand a reasonable accounting of the plummet in Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union. We will not accept the ridiculous claims that all those who wished to leave have gone. There are well over 3,000 people waiting for approval, according to the New York Conference on Soviet Jewry, and our actions must not stop until those applications are accounted for.

Concentrated public pressure has had positive effects in the past, but we must not be satisfied with the release of a token few. I join my colleagues today in calling for a reversal of the tide in Soviet Jewish emigration, and a commitment from Mr. Andropov to put an end to his country's indefensible denial of religious freedom.●

● Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, only 3 months ago, I and a delegation of our fellow Members returned from a trip to the Soviet Union. At that time, I felt hopeful that our visit represented a small breakthrough in United States-Soviet relations and that, perhaps, the easing of tensions would soon be reflected in improved emigration statistics. Secretary Shultz' announced intention to discuss Soviet Jewry at the Madrid Conference, again, gave us reason to hope. But today, in the wake of the criminal downing of the Korean jetliner, things are dismal for those wishing to leave the Soviet Union. Although emigration numbers for September are roughly the same as August's, a discouragingly low 135 people, the deterioration of relations between our nations will be keenly felt by the refuseniks. It is my fear, Mr. Speaker, that once again these innocent people will become the victims in a dispute between our two nations, and that in this atmosphere of tense and chilly relations, they no longer have any reason to hope.

Mr. Speaker, one of our two countries must make a bold move to put negotiations back on track. The time has come for the Soviets to make a conciliatory gesture, and what better way for them to do so than to demonstrate a new regard for human rights by opening up the gates of emigration. Although the 269 human lives so senselessly lost can never be replaced, the Soviets now have an opportunity to grant a new life of freedom to thousands of refuseniks and Prisoners of Conscience. Let us hope that the Soviets will seize this opportunity for atonement and will demonstrate a desire to work toward improved relations with us and our allies. We have offered a challenge to the Soviets—a challenge to show a commitment to human life and dignity that is more than empty rhetoric. Let us hope that they will rise to our challenge.●

● Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to express my concerns about the plight of Soviet Jews. Although Mr. Andropov, the President of the Soviet Union, claims there are no more Soviet Jews who desire to leave that country, there are tens of thousands of documented cases which indicate otherwise.

In addition, Soviet Jews have complained in growing numbers that expected mail from the United States is not arriving. Letters and packages sent by Americans to Soviet Jews are being returned or are not being delivered. Soviet Jews cannot leave the U.S.S.R. without a written invitation sent through the international mail from an overseas sponsor. Such a document is the first requirement in the laborious emigration process. The delivery of mail is crucial to those Soviet Jews who seek to leave the U.S.S.R. as well as to enhance the will and the spirit of those persons.

These Soviet actions along with the callous destruction of the Korean flight 007 should encourage all of us in the United States to lend our support in any way possible. I have introduced a bill which memorializes the millions of victims of communism. By congressional actions which call attention to the plight of those victims of communism, additional focus can be directed on their current situation, with more public support and assistance being offered to those victims and their families.

I ask my colleagues to offer their support, not only for my bill but for any other means that they determine can and will be helpful in assisting the Soviet Jews and all victims of communism.●

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, it has been more than a month since the tragic Korean Air Lines incident and we have all had time to reflect on its implications and repercussions. Today, we are addressing one specific area—"Soviet Jewry: An Assessment After KAL 007"—and I would like to thank my distinguished colleagues the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. LEVIN, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. COUGHLIN, for sponsoring this special order and giving this critical topic the attention it deserves.

To say that the Korean Air Lines tragedy has caused the relations between the Soviet Union and the United States to deteriorate, and hence the plight of Soviet Jewry to worsen, would be to state the obvious. Our focus, rather, should be on what can we, as Congressmen, do in the wake of KAL 007. And the answer is: Exactly what we were doing before, only more.

Members who have plans to travel to the Soviet Union should do so and should make human rights a priority for discussion. Every Soviet Jewry group I have heard from and every American who has traveled to the Soviet Union bears the same message: That the refuseniks look upon Americans who speak out on their behalf as their only lifeline. They know about our remarks on their behalf in the RECORD and in speeches. They know about our resolutions and our dear colleagues. And the Soviet officials know, too, by the continued volume of mail, that we have not forgotten about the refuseniks, despite the difficult times.

In the name of human rights, we must keep up dialog with the Soviets through international forums such as the Helsinki Commission. To withdraw from such dialog would be to surrender to Andropov and those in the Soviet Union who do not wish to be accountable to international standards of human rights and morals. In an impassioned New Year's plea, Avital Shcharansky said, "The Soviet regime has not succeeded in extinguishing the spark kindled in our hearts, and that small flame has grown into a large fire * * * Support the heroic struggle of our brothers and sisters in the Soviet Union." They need our lifeline now more than ever. Thank you.●

● Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, slightly over 1 month ago the world bore witness to what can only be described as a flagrant violation of human rights and human life. Regardless of what Soviet motivations were during the early morning hours of September 1, the unavoidable fact remains that the lives of 269 people were disregarded by the leadership of a major world power. Since that day, many conclusions have been drawn from both the attack and the behavior of the Kremlin afterward about the nature of the Soviet military and the conscience of the Soviet leadership. We now must attempt to narrow the focus of our discussion in order to concentrate on what these events will mean for various facets of U.S.-U.S.S.R. relations.

The fact that the Kremlin views human life from a different perspective than the majority of the civilized world should not come as any great shock. There is no clearer example than the ongoing persecution of Jews in the Soviet Union. The issue of Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union has become a focal point of criticism for those who value the right to choose one's home and freely join one's family. I am deeply disturbed that as of August of this year, only 934 Jews had emigrated from the Soviet Union. This is appalling when compared to the first 8 months of 1979, when 33,553 left. We must make this escalation in human suffering a more integral part of our overall relationship with the Soviets. The Helsinki process, as perpetuated in Madrid, is one approach; the time has come to look for others.

Emigration is by no means the only problem besetting the Soviet Jew today. The Shcharanskys, Beguns, and Paritskys are many, and all are prisoners of a system that recognizes nothing about freedom of thought, freedom to celebrate one's heritage and freedom to practice one's faith. For these reasons, it is imperative that the Kremlin continue to hear from those of us who are concerned. It is equally important that the persecuted know that we are carrying their voices for them.

There is yet another, even more virulent and destructive malady which afflicts the Kremlin. I am referring to anti-Semitism, a disease that took root during the czarist period, but has returned to Yuri Andropov's Soviet Union in full force.

According to a recent Wall Street Journal article written by William Korey of B'nai B'rith, a book has recently been published in the Soviet Union called "The Class Essence of Zionism." This flagrantly anti-Semitic work has been endorsed by the official Soviet press. The book, written by Lev Korneyev, has been praised by Izvestia as "rich in factual material." An example of such factual material reads as follows: "Anti-Semitism in Russia was caused by the disgust on the part of the native population for the peculiar psychological and behavioral traits of the Jewish bourgeoisie." Endorsed by the Kremlin, such hateful statements are compounded only by a blatant implementation of their distorted message. The emergence of Yuri Andropov has ushered in a multitude of policy reversals, including the establishment of the Anti-Zionist Committee.

Since Chairman Andropov assumed his current role, contact between Soviet Jews and Jews abroad has been all but forbidden. The core of Jewish law and tradition, the Talmud and the Torah, have been branded "extreme fanaticism and chauvinism" by Soviet authorities and sychophants. A person whose name has become all too familiar to us, Iosef Begun, defied such policies by teaching the Hebrew language and culture. He now faces a criminal trial that could lead to a 12-year prison term.

What B'nai B'rith's William Korey called Moscow's Anti-Semitic Revival is symptomatic of a deeper, more insidious kind of persecution that threatens to smother the very vitality of a people. We need to follow the example of Anatoly Shcharansky who, though only half-way into his 13-year sentence, continues to stand for vigilance and freedom. His wife, Avital, also remains a beacon to the world that there is always hope and that no gain is too small.

We are truly in a period of rethinking our relationship with the Soviet Union. Our principal goals, however, must not change. The maintenance of global peace is still, and should always be, our prime objective. Peace is also a term that applies to individual human beings. This is why I believe it is incumbent upon all of us to continue to be vigilant and to speak with a clear voice when another nation defies universally agreed upon principles of human conduct.●

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, we meet on this solemn occasion to assess the status of Soviet Jewry in the wake of the downing of the Korean jetliner by the Soviets, an event that shook the world.

To those who care deeply about the plight of Soviet Jewry, this event can only cause grave concern. By now we are all familiar with the litany of facts about Soviet treatment of Jews: The lifeline to virtually all facets of Jewish culture has been nearly severed. There are no Jewish communal or social organizations. There are no Jewish schools of any kind. The teaching of the Hebrew language, the only language which has always been commonly shared by Jews everywhere, is not recognized by Soviet authorities as a legitimate profession and cannot be taught or studied by Jews. The freedom to practice religion is strictly controlled. Teaching Judaism to people under 18 is illegal. There are no seminaries to train rabbis. The doors to higher educational institutions are closing to an increasing number of qualified Jewish applicants as a result of discriminatory entrance examinations.

And then there is the area of emigration. One of the most graphic expressions of Soviet mistreatment of Jews and denial of their human rights can be seen in the decline of the emigration rate from the U.S.S.R. By now the statistics are all too familiar: During the last 12 years 249,235 Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate. The peak year was 1979 when 51,320 Jews were allowed to leave. However, by 1981 the number had fallen to 9,447, and by 1982 to 2,688. So far this year only 1,070 Jews have been allowed to leave. These numbers are pitifully and painfully small.

But what of the plight of Soviet Jews in the wake of the Soviets' barbaric and heinous deed? What does it bode for the lives and futures of Soviet Jews—those who have always been among the first to suffer the brunt of deteriorating East-West relations?

The sad answer is that at this point we just do not know what the effect will be on Soviet Jewry. But we must continue to be ever watchful of Soviet treatment of them and we must continue to speak out on their behalf. We must continue to do all we can to bring to the Soviets' attention the fact that those of us who are free and who value human rights will continue to speak out on behalf of Soviet Jewry and against the oppression that makes their lives so difficult. And difficult it is.

As cochairman of the 98th Congressional Class for Soviet Jewry I join my colleagues in expressing concern for the plight of Soviet Jewry. The murder by the Soviets of 269 innocent men, women and children has brought down upon that country the outrage of every country in the world that values the sanctity of human life. The Soviets will have a long way to go to regain the respect of the world community. They can begin by trying to understand the meaning of the word "humanitarian" and to conduct their affairs in a humanitarian way. They can begin in their own backyard by taking a more humanitarian attitude towards Soviet Jews by ending their oppression of them and by allowing those to emigrate who wish to do so.●

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, the ruthless destruction of KAL flight 007 with its 269 passengers stunned the world, and left it reeling from the impact of such unabashed and unashamed brutality. But champions of the cause of Soviet Jewry were perhaps not as shocked as others by the Soviet actions. They know that the Soviet contempt for human life is manifested daily in the Soviet's treatment of Jews, other minorities, and ordinary Soviet citizens.

It is still too soon to assess the long term effects of the KAL tragedy on human rights in the Soviet Union. Some feel that the increasing tensions between the United States and Russia will worsen the plight of Soviet Jews. Others, perhaps more optimistic, guess that the Soviets may become more lenient with their Jewish population in an effort to repair some of the damage done to their world image by the downing of the Korean airliner. Regardless of one's viewpoint, it is still too early to tell whose assessment is correct. One thing that is clear to all those who care about the fate of millions of Jews in Russia is that the KAL tragedy must not be allowed to overshadow our concern and commitment to Soviet Jewry. It must not be allowed to push that issue from the agenda of the United States and the Soviet Union.

Last month, only 135 Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate from Russia, and none of them were from Moscow. The Anti-Zionist Committee continues to spew forth its vicious and distorted propaganda about existing conditions for Soviet Jews in Russia. They maintain that the vast majority of Jews who wish to leave have already received permission to do so, and that reunification of divided families has been essentially completed. The Anti-Zionist Committee even maintains that anti-Semitic discrimination does not exist in the Soviet Union! Ida Nudel, my adopted refusenik, continues to languish in Moldavia, unable to find steady work, subject to periodic harassment, and denied her right to emigrate to Israel to be united with her sister Elana.

There is no doubt that as long as such conditions exist in the Soviet Union, the fate of Soviet Jewry must remain a high priority of the Congress and the administration. In one way, the senseless slaughter of 269 innocents will help us to do so. Now the whole world realizes that the brutality of the Soviet regime extends not only to its own citizens and to those countries within its sphere of influence, but throughout the world, to whoever gets in their way. Perhaps in vividly demonstrating the callousness of the Soviet regime toward 269 innocents, it will sensitize the world community to the callousness that the Soviet Union shows every day to its own Jewish population.●

● Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, the rights of our fellow human beings should always be of great concern to us. At the present time, however, the issue is more timely than ever. With the recent, brutal attack on Korean airliner 007, we were reminded of the vast differences in the values of the United States and the Soviet Union.

These differences extend into all aspects of human life and the basic rights of individuals are no exception. My most recent trip to the Soviet Union reinforced my feelings of skepticism and suspicion toward the totalitarian regime there. The downing of the airliner made it clear how little the Soviet regime values human life. This message is conveyed every day to Soviet citizens through torture, cruel punishment and denial of basic freedoms.

While in Leningrad and Moscow this past July, I was fortunate enough to be able to visit with some of the many refuseniks. I was struck by their incredible strength, determination, and courage. These people are willing to risk everything—their jobs, families and even their lives—for the hope of living in a place where they can worship, teach and learn as they please, and simply live without fear of persecution.

We cannot allow the atrocity of the KAL incident to halt our efforts on behalf of human rights. On the contrary, we must increase our efforts to achieve the widest possible level of respect for human rights throughout the world to remind the Soviets that we will not forsake our brethren there, nor will we ignore the blatant violations which are being committed in the Soviet Union.●

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues today in this special order concerning the status of Soviet Jewry after the Soviet destruction of Korean Air Lines flight 007. Ramifications of this horrible event are difficult to assess entirely for the long term, but it seems apparent that U.S.-Soviet relations are at an all-time low since two decades ago when the Cuban missile crisis occurred.

Many things can be and have been said about the Soviets following the KAL downing—facts many of us have been stating for years which have been acutely reinforced by this act. That the Soviets cannot be trusted, that they do not play by Western rules, that they lie about their actions and consider even the callous murder of 269 innocent civilians inconsequential to their supposed security needs—all of this is now achingly obvious to the remainder of the world. But how does this affect Soviet Jewry and the Soviet's emigration policy?

Those of us in Congress who have worked for the emigration rights of Soviet Jews over the years have always known we were walking a fine line in determining just what actions would best serve the cause of increased emigration. Pressure has been brought to bear through every forum available—through direct letters to Soviet officials, through urging our own government officials to address the issue with the Soviets, through the United Nations, through international conventions. Past unilateral actions by the United States, however, have met with little success as regards curbing Soviet behavior. This is why I supported the President's response to the KAL tragedy and believe that any future actions taken against the Soviet Union must be in concert with our allies in order to have a considerable and lasting impact on the Soviets.

I believe we must continue and in fact step up our activities on behalf of those wishing to emigrate from the Soviet Union, and to help protect their rights while still in the U.S.S.R. We also need to encourage our friends and allies around the world to do likewise. The moral outrage that the world community feels after KAL 007 should be translated into long-term actions which show the Soviets they cannot continue to act violently, aggressively, nor against basic human rights without incurring more outrage and becoming more and more outcast from the civilized world, upon which it realistically depends for important functions such as trade.

The Postal Operations and Services Subcommittee, of which I am senior Republican member, today held a hearing concerning Soviet interruption of U.S. mail. This is the first of a number of hearings which will address this matter, and the next will be held in Chicago this fall. The hearings will greatly help Congress continue to monitor Soviet interruption of mail and will solicit information from ethnic and religious groups which have evidence and knowledge of pertinent Soviet actions. Discussions have thus far included the possibility of having an interparliamentary meeting in Europe so that we can formulate a plan in conjunction with our European allies to pressure the Soviets to end their obstructive postal procedures. It is clear that the U.S. Postal Service also needs to become more involved in pressing the Soviet postal system to adhere to internationally accepted postal policies.

I will continue to work actively in committee to see this important problem addressed, as anyone dealing with those wishing to emigrate from the Soviet Union realizes how critical the receipt of mail from the free world becomes. In this particular issue, as well as others dealing with Soviet misconduct, our approach should be broadened to involve those around the world who share our concern for basic human rights and freedom.●

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to join my colleagues in this important discussion. It is essential that we review the effect the destruction of Korean airliner KAL 007 has had on United States-Soviet relations, and the impact of this development on Soviet Jewry. I commend the sponsors of this special order for their efforts in making possible our exchange of views, and I commend as well the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews for undertaking an indepth review of the problem at its annual meeting later this month.

One danger in the understandable outrage over the destruction of the airliner, resulting in the death of 269 innocent civilians, is that the increasingly serious plight of thousands of Soviet Jews may be, temporarily at least, lost to sight.

Such a result would be a tragedy. It is vital that the problems of Soviet Jewry remain a high priority in U.S. policy toward the Soviet Union. This human rights issue is a matter of world concern, and must never be relegated to the background in U.S. dealings with the Soviets.

Indeed, the horrifying and inhuman action of the Soviet military in destroying the Korean airliner is just another shockingly brutal demonstration of the contempt the Soviet leaders have for human rights. A contempt which has been exhibited over and over again from the time Lenin and his comrades seized power in 1917. From that day to this the leaders of the Soviet Union and their faceless minions have never hesitated to take the most brutal actions; actions which transgress all standards of civilized conduct and trample on the rights of the innocent. In so doing the Soviet leaders have repeatedly shown their total contempt for the basic human values which are the hallmark of a civilized society.

Nowhere has that contempt been demonstrated more clearly than in the Soviet Union's violations of the human rights of thousands of its Jewish citizens. These Soviet Jews seek only the freedom to practice their religion in the country of their choice. With increasing ferocity, the Soviet regime has imprisoned, harassed and persecuted thousands of innocent Jews, solely because they sought freedom. In the past 2 years, the Kremlin-directed measures of oppression have become harsher. Fewer and fewer Soviet Jews are being permitted to emigrate to Israel. Only a few hundred have been permitted to leave in 1983, a tiny fraction of the emigrants approved in the 1970's. In fact, in 1979, more Soviet Jews emigrated each day than have been permitted to leave in any month of this year.

And it is very possible that the paranoiac response of Soviet leaders to the worldwide protests over the destruction of the Korean airliner may cause even greater persecution of Soviet Jews.

In such ominous circumstances it is vital that the United States maintain and increase its rigorous efforts on behalf of Soviet Jews. It is imperative that we in the U.S. Congress do everything we can to impress upon the Department of State the necessity for the strongest possible representations to the Soviets on this issue. Further, we in the Congress must redouble our own personal protests—letters telegrams and other messages of protest to officials of the Soviet Union—as well as to increase our own messages of support and encouragement to the individual Soviet Jews imprisoned or persecuted because of their efforts to seek freedom.

Early this year, on an official congressional visit to the Soviet Union to discuss arms control measures with Soviet officials, I was able to meet with nearly two dozen Soviet Jews—all refuseniks—in Leningrad and in Moscow. As one, they repeated the same plea: "Tell every American what is happening to us. Keep working for us. You are our only hope."

My colleagues, let us all join in an increased effort to help these innocent victims of cruel persecution. Never has there been greater need for our help. Let us pledge here today that we will make that extra effort. We must do more to open wider the door to freedom for Soviet Jews.●

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, the Korean Air Lines incident serves as a timely reminder, if anyone needed reminding, of the callousness with which the Soviet Union conducts its affairs. It was essential that the world's attention focus on this incident, both because of the brutality of the act itself and because of the hypocrisy of official Soviet pronouncements.

Nevertheless, may I suggest that we run the risk that this incident may divert our attention from the more routine aspects of life in the Soviet Union: the persecution of the Jews is one example. It may not be as surprising as the shooting down of a civilian airliner, but it must continue to shock us. Although the persecution of Jews has become a commonplace in Soviet life, we cannot allow ourselves to become inured to their plight.

Mr. Speaker, conditions for Jews in the Soviet Union have taken a turn for the worse. Emigration has slowed to a trickle. A new anti-Zionist, which is to say anti-Semitic, campaign has been launched. Those of us in Congress who handle individual human rights cases increasingly find ourselves up against the brick wall of official Soviet intransigence: the Helsinki accords are flagrantly violated.

We cannot despair. Even with no visible progress, we accomplish much by exposing Soviet human rights abuses to the world. Not only does our show of solidarity give comfort to oppressed people in the Soviet Union and elsewhere, it also strengthens the love of liberty at home. Mr. Speaker, we must never allow our love of liberty to become lazy. By pricking our conscience with daily reminders of the abuses of human rights which unfortunately have become so common in so much of the world, we grow more alert to the many components of our own society which are essential to the maintenance of free institutions.●

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the Soviets' wanton and cold-blooded shooting down of the Korean airliner and its passengers and crew has enraged and revolted all people everywhere. There is no excuse, nor can there ever be an excuse—under any circumstances—for such a cruel and barbarous act. It is an act of madmen. And it betrays the terrible and dangerous extent of Soviet paranoia.

But sick or sane, the Soviets have once again violated international law and fundamental principles of morality. I believe that they must and will answer for this crime as they will answer for all their crimes against humanity. They will answer today because we have taken actions to sanction them, and even more, they will answer tomorrow because, in the long run, they will have lost the strength of moral conviction.

For those of us involved in the struggle for Soviet Jewry, the recent atrocity begins no new chapter in what is clearly a history of inhumanity by the Soviet Government. Their record in human rights has been despicable and has even worsened under the new leadership of Andropov. We must be aware of the continuity of Soviet injustices and not permit our justifiable indignation to cloud the essential need to understand the nature of the Soviet regime. For it is only through such an understanding that we can effectively act against Soviet crimes against the innocent. We must not defeat our efforts by moving any step closer to a cold, if not actual, war situation.

I would therefore like to share with my colleagues my own thoughts on the Soviet leadership after a recent visit to the Soviet Union. It has become obvious to me that many of the abhorrent actions of the Soviets can in some way be understood in a logic to their oppression. This is a logic that has been written in the darkest pages of history; a logic that has seen oppression used skillfully to bolster support and silence the destabilizing voices of reason.

Our congressional delegation visit, the first official exchange with the Soviet Union since 1979, took place at the invitation of the Supreme Soviet. Our discussions with the Soviets on human rights issues confirmed our worst fears. Representative HENRY WAXMAN of California delivered an excellent speech outlining the continued violation of international agreements embodied in Soviet treatment of Jews and other minority groups. The Soviet reaction to this speech was more eloquent than any formal response they could have delivered; during the presentation, many Soviets took off translator headphones and were generally boorish. I understand that subsequent human rights discussions were no better.

It became clear that we were witnessing less a demonstration of Soviet disrespect for the views of the United States and more a comment on the current consolidation of the power structure in the Soviet Union. While normalization of United States-Soviet relations would, no doubt, contribute positively to our efforts on behalf of Soviet Jews, there are other problems—internal problems—that appear to bolster the current repressive trend. Let me explain this point further.

I had previously visited the Soviet Union. In 1979, under Brezhnev, there was never any doubt as to who was in control of the Supreme Soviet. On this recent visit, there was visible backbiting between officials—an insecurity as to the constituencies of those with whom we spoke. In Moscow, I saw pictures of Stalin taped to the insides of taxis. It was explained to me that this is the individual's statement of a desire to return to the "old order," a time when people knew their place and roles were well defined.

That is clearly the regime of an ailing leader. Mr. Andropov has been unsuccessful in consolidating a power base and the repression we are witnessing is, no doubt, a direct result of this situation. Today, we see in the Soviets' attitude toward Jews what the world has seen for centuries—the Jew as scapegoat. Like their historical antecedents, the Soviets view crackdowns and repression as a way to bolster support in a nation that is basically anti-Semitic.

It was our meetings with Soviet Jews which provided our delegation with clear evidence of the success of the struggle for Soviet Jewry. The refuseniks spoke of their lives of oppression. Anti-Semitic diatribes in the press, they explained, are increasing. Attempts at Jewish history or cultural instruction are often broken up by police and arrests are common. Many friends and relatives remain imprisoned for their honest attempts to live out the cultural lives of their forefathers. And the children of refuseniks are deprived of opportunities as well. They stand little chance of acceptance at first or second-rate schools and universities. Young Jewish men will eventually be sucked into the "Catch-22" of military service—a period of service which will later be the grounds for denial of their emigration rights due to supposed knowledge of "state secrets." And, of course, these men and women spoke of their dreams for their children to live out their culture in peace and freedom with their relatives abroad.

In light of the KAL disaster, we must surely press for reparations for the families of the victims, for a full accounting from the Soviets, for a continued ban on all Aeroflot flights into our country, and for access to Soviet waters to conduct search, rescue, and salvage operations.

But no, we must not end our discussions on human rights or our efforts at arms control. We must remember the long-term interests of our own people and the interests of those who continue to live lives of suffering and cruelty and who find no surprises in acts of inhumanity by the Soviet regime.

In our visit to the Soviet Union, Members of Congress were struck by the amazing optimism of the refuseniks we met. Their spirit and continued hope made an impression on us that we shall never forget. So let us keep this spirit in mind as we move forward from the KAL disaster. And let this spirit temper us in our need for revenge and nurture in us the thoughtful presence of mind required to continue our efforts on behalf of Soviet Jews.●

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, the human rights atrocity committed in the Soviet destruction of KAL 007 deserves international condemnation. It does not, however, justify abandoning the necessary, albeit tenuous, dialog we have maintained with the Soviet Union concerning human rights. To punish the perpetrators of this tragedy by abdicating our responsibility to keep open communication would have the unwanted effect of severing whatever practical influence we have to address the plight of Soviet Jewry. At a time of heightened anti-Semitism, the death of 269 victims places the hope of imprisoned Soviet Jews on the precipice. If we turn away from the Soviet Union in revulsion, we will have allowed one tragedy to provoke another. We should resist the temptation to isolate the Soviet Union, for in so doing, we will also be isolating those people most in need of our continued commitment, Soviet Jews. They will become the inadvertent victims of our anger. We must show determination and patience in our struggle to improve Soviet emigration and human rights policies. Our initial revulsion at this criminal act must be tempered with the knowledge that if the present, rigid Soviet policy on Jewish emigration is to change, our response must be measured. We should reject bombast, as it will only reinforce those elements in the Soviet Union who wish to make Soviet Jews hostages to U.S. foreign policy.

As chairman of the 1983 Congressional Vigil for Soviet Jewry, I urge my colleagues to join me in rededicating our efforts to achieving a new dialog in human rights as a fitting tribute to the victims of flight 007.●

● Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, no one will soon forget, if ever, that on August 31, a Korean jetliner was callously shot down over the Sea of Japan by a Soviet fighter pilot after the commercial aircraft accidently strayed into Soviet airspace. It is important in the aftermath of this appalling and utterly inexcusable loss of 269 innocent lives, however, to remember that there are thousands of living innocents remaining in the Soviet Union whose lives are daily tragedies in the environment of that country's totalitarian regime.

Among these living innocents are nearly 500,000 Soviet Jews, many of whose only crime has been a request to emigrate to Israel or America, where they have the freedom to practice the religion they choose. The situation for Soviet Jewry has steadily deteriorated during the past year. Emigration has come to a virtual halt; only 639 Jews have been permitted to leave during the first 6 months of this year, a far cry from 1979, when 51,329 Jews emigrated. The 130 Jews who left during August were significantly fewer than the average number of Jews who left during a single day in 1979, the peak year for emigration. If this trend continues, less than 1,200 Soviet Jews will be allowed to leave in 1983.

I strongly supported the President's measured response to the shooting down of Korean Air Lines flight 007. Our administration acted with the restraint and wisdom that the moment required. Perhaps it is wishful thinking in light of recent events, but it remains my hope that the Soviets will now step back from their refusal to admit their guilt, and take steps to show they are ready to join the rest of the free world in respecting human rights. One way would be to honor the commitments they made under the Helsinki accords 8 years ago. Another would be to disband the Anti-Zionist Committee that announced earlier this year that all Jews wishing to leave the Soviet Union had been allowed to leave. This, needless to say, is totally and completely false, yet all too consistent with the falsehoods emanating daily from the Soviet Union.

As those within the Soviet Union continue to protest government-sanctioned anti-Semitism, so must we. Now is not the time to forget those unalienable rights our country was founded on. We must continue our efforts on behalf of those denied the basic freedoms that we take for granted. We must continue to speak out, to fight for Soviet Jewry, even in the face of the great odds and utmost adversity which we face today.●

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues today on this special order as we reassess the state of United States-Soviet relations in the wake of the callous destruction of KAL 007 and the murder of 269 citizens of several nations.

I am particularly disturbed by this action and what it will mean for the future of human rights, in particular, what it will mean for Soviet Jewry. This Congress and this Nation must maintain our strong commitment, and unbending support for the rights of Soviet Jews to emigrate freely. This is one of our highest priorities in our dealings with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, this concern for human rights in the wake of the Soviet attack is not just limited to the comments here on the floor today. I have just received a copy of a resolution adopted by the State Senate of Pennsylvania on September 19, 1983. This resolution clearly captures the abhorrance and revulsion we all felt over the past several days. I insert the text of this resolution at this point in the RECORD.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA—RESOLUTION

Whereas, the Soviet Union has perpetrated a wantonly barbaric act by destroying a Korean Airlines Boeing 747 without cause or provocation and has failed to acknowledge responsibility, convey any sense of regret or provide guarantees against future acts of aggression; and

Whereas, two hundred sixty-nine innocent persons lost their lives, including at least 60 Americans, causing tremendous grief and creating international outrage; and

Whereas, this incident defies explanation or justification, is contrary to all codes of international conduct and raises questions about the safety of future flights and other means of international transport; and

Whereas, this is the latest action in a string of Soviet human rights abuses and national sovereignty violations which disrupt American efforts to establish friendly relations and further jeopardize our goal of maintaining world peace; therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of Pennsylvania condemn Soviet conduct and memorialize the President and the Congress to continue efforts to obtain a full accounting from the leaders of the Soviet Union and to take appropriate steps to ensure the future safety of American air carriers and the lives of our citizens traveling on commercial air carriers originating in other countries; and be it further lies of the victims of this tragic occurrence and its hope that the world does not again experience such a loss.

It is actions of the Soviet Union that inspire resolutions like the one just read. But the problem of Soviet abuse of human rights is more than just these resolutions in the face of the downing of flight 007. There are people in the Soviet Union that need our help, now, today.

I draw my colleagues attention to one, Eitan Finkelstein. Eitan, along with his wife Alexandra, and daughter Miriam, has been refused the opportunity to emigrate from the Soviet Union since April 1971. Eitan is a physicist, Alexandra, an X-ray technician.

They have been refused the opportunity to emigrate because the Soviets have formerly classified his job as "second form" secret.

Eitan and his wife are outspoken advocates of the right for all Soviet Jews to emigrate, they are leaders in the refusenik community. The result of this has been oppression, constant surveillance, and police harassment.

The story of political and social oppression in the Soviet Union is not news, interrogation and detainment does not warrant the front page any more, the entire refusenik effort seems to be developing a callousness in some parts of this country—just what the Soviets want.

The main reason I remind my colleagues today of the plite of Eitan Finkelstein and his family is for the words he wrote in his 1981 book, entitled "A Guide to Would-Be Refuseniks." Eitan's words, "The main thing is—don't lose heart * * *. Keep on fighting and you will win through."

This special order, the resolutions that occur when acts of horror force us to speak out, reminding, telling the story, these are the things that will bring the ultimate victory. We in Congress who support and believe in human rights must keep fighting, we can not lose heart, we must—in the words of Ellie Wiesel—be able to tell the story for those that can not speak for themselves.

As a people of conscience, we must act. We can not stand and watch. Today, we have kept the faith, we are fighting and we will win.●

● Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having this opportunity to join my colleagues in the special order on behalf of the plight of Soviet Jews.

As world events in recent weeks have brought worldwide calls for sanctions against the Soviet Government, we must not allow the situation of Soviet Jews to be overshadowed.

The deprivation of rights which Soviet Jews endure daily in their country may not have received a great deal of public attention in recent weeks, and it is therefore crucial that we take this opportunity to refocus public awareness on the cruel injustices the Soviet Government imposes upon Jews who seek religious freedom and the right to emigrate.

I take this moment to reiterate my deep concern for the situation facing Soviet Jews and to remind the public that the maltreatment of Jews in the Soviet Union has not abated.

Our voices must continue to be heard. We must let the Soviet leadership know that we will be unceasing in our efforts to secure the freedoms that rightly belong to all men and women, regardless of their religious affiliation.●

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, the destruction of Korean Air Lines flight 007 has cast a pall over U.S.-Soviet relations at an inauspicious time for Soviet Jews. I wish to thank the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Pennsylvania for reserving this time for us to comment on the effect of this incident on the Soviet Jewish community.

The past year has been a grim one for Soviet Jews. Immigration numbers have hit rock bottom, and the Soviet authorities under Yuri Andropov have increased official actions against dissidents and minority groups of all types. In April, a letter in Pravda announced the formation of anti-Zionist committees in most Soviet cities. These organizations spread anti-Semitic propaganda and attempt to make the case that emigration for Jewish family reunification has been completed.

How will the KAL 007 incident affect Jewish emigration, already at its lowest level in a decade? How will it affect the quality of life of those Jews remaining in the U.S.S.R., as well as those who have applied to leave? A member of my staff, just back from the Soviet Union, reports that so far the matter has meant only increased jamming of VOA and BBC broadcasts. However, the long-term impact is not yet apparent; we should take this opportunity to consider just what can be done to further help Soviet Jews in this difficult period.

Let me briefly note a number of initiatives which can be helpful. First, we need to maintain open communication with Soviet Jews. At the executive council meeting of the Universal Postal Union earlier this year, Postmaster-General Bolger was somewhat successful in bringing to the attention of Soviet officials our Government's concerns about receipt of mail by citizens of the U.S.S.R. We need to continue these efforts, so that Soviet Jews can receive messages of support as well as material assistance from the West. For Soviet Jews, the psychological boost from receipt of mail and packages is enormous.

Next, the issue of Jewish emigration must remain a priority matter at every forum where representatives of our Government and the Soviet Union meet. The Reagan administration has a good record in this area; these efforts should be continued. No doubt our official exchanges will be reduced due to the KAL 007 incident. However, we should make up for this lack of frequency by calling even more regularly and vociferously for the release of the refuseniks and for the guarantee of basic human rights for Soviet Jews.

Finally, we should continue our own activities on behalf of Soviet Jewry. Congress has frequently written letters for refuseniks and dissidents and taken actions in specific human rights cases. The shooting down of KAL 007 was a violation of human rights to which the U.S. Government rightfully responded quickly, vocally, and harshly. We should react with similar force to the continuing, less publicized persecution of thousands of Soviet Jews. In short, the groundwork has been laid. Both in Congress and among the private groups, an impressive network of information and support exists to aid Soviet Jewry. The coming months, however, will present us with great challenges as U.S.-Soviet relations enter a new, uncertain period. Our only response can be to continue and increase our commitment.●

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, the downing of Korean Air Lines flight 007 is an event whose tragedy will not diminish with time. In fact, the implications will undoubtedly increase in severity. One far-reaching consequence will be tighter restrictions on an already strangled Russian society.

As we are well aware, the Soviet media is an official arm of the Government. Its role is to spread propaganda both at home and abroad. The manipulation of minds is unquestioned. I was in the Soviet Union when KAL flight 007 was destroyed, and can personally attest to this fact. The Soviet citizenry knew nothing of its occurrence. What then, is the future of citizens who wish to leave? They are becoming more and more isolated from the world in which they so valiantly struggle to remain a part.

Today's special order seeks to assess the plight of a people in this desparate situation, Soviet Jews. During my recent trip, I met with many refuseniks whose hopes are high despite increasing anti-Semitism and persecution. They truly believe we in the West, particularly the American Government, can make the difference between a life of continued persecution and suffering, or the chance for a full life in a free and democratic society. They want out. I believe we can help them.

This is a weighty responsibility, but one we cannot afford to ignore. We are the lone hope for people who only ask to know what we take for granted: free expression, freedom of religion, free thought, and free lives.

The tendency to think of imposing sanctions on the Soviets for their heinous crime is natural. I wholeheartedly agree that their brutality cannot go unpunished. Yet we must remember that certain action can harm people as innocent as the 269 who perished on flight 007.

Our course of action is clear. We cannot let Soviet Jewry get lost in an exchange of harsh and heated words. We must keep the issue on the international agenda. We need to recommit ourselves to this matter, and step up the pressure. We must strive to find new and innovative ways to convince the Soviet Union that allowing the emigration of those Jews who want to leave, is in its national and international interest. We must make this an issue that will not go away. We are a lifeline to thousands of people. We cannot let a cutoff occur.●

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleagues, Congressman SANDER M. LEVIN and Congressman LAWRENCE COUGHLIN, for scheduling this special order on Soviet Jewry: An assessment after KAL 007.

Such an assessment is very much needed at this time for I am very much concerned that our legitimate outrage at the murder of the 269 people aboard KAL flight 007 may blind us in our rage and set off an ideological jihad preventing us from pursuing the promotion and protection of human rights with the Soviet Union.

The promotion and protection of human rights is in the national interest and is central to our national integrity. One of the most important human rights is the right to emigrate as embodied in article 13 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Our effectiveness as a nation in promoting and protecting such human rights will be enhanced by heeding Alexander Hamilton's words that our Nation, great as it is, has not attained "an exemption from the imperfections, weaknesses, and evils incident to society in every shape." Hamilton went on to recommend that we "adopt as a practical maxim for the direction of our political conduct that we as well as other inhabitants of the globe, are yet remote from the happy empire of perfect wisdom and perfect virtue."

As we approach the Soviet Union, as we should continue to do, on their failure to implement the requirements of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, specifically, "that everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own," we should be somewhat chastened by our policy of interdiction of Haitian refugees on the high seas which is clearly in opposition to the spirit and intent of article 13 of that document.

On September 12, 1983, I urge my colleagues in response to the tragedy of KAL 007 to remember our Judeo-Christian heritage and the words of the prophet Isaiah:

If you do away with the yoke of oppression, with the pointing finger and malicious talk, and if you spend yourselves on behalf of the hungry and satisfy the needs of the oppressed, then your light will rise in the darkness, and your night will become like the noonday. The Lord will guide you always.

This is the spirit which I suggest for our great body as we continue to address the plight of Soviet Jewry.●

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, the horrendous destruction of the Korean airliner by the Soviet regime brought home to all Americans its total disregard for human rights. But this atrocity was not a revelation to Soviet Jews. They have been suffering indignity and inhumane treatment for decades.

This heinous act and the resultant reassessment of U.S.-Soviet relations should serve to focus international attention on the Soviet Union's treatment of its Jewish population. Emigration of Soviet Jewry in 1983 has dropped dramatically. Only 934 Jews have emigrated from the Soviet Union in the first 8 months of 1983. This figure is even more shocking and disturbing when compared to the 33,553 Jews who emigrated in the first 8 months of 1979. It is estimated that only 1,400 Jews can be expected to emigrate this year. This is less than 3 percent of the Soviet-Jewish emigration of 51,331 in 1979.

We must continue to work for the freedom of all Soviet Jews. I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to work together in this most challenging and important struggle on behalf of Soviet Jewry.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to contemplate for a moment the state of international affairs in light of recent events by the Soviet Union, most particularly the shooting down of the Korean airplane which killed all those aboard. I think it is necessary to examine some of the policies and actions of that country to fully understand the implications for the fate of all citizens of all countries.

Living conditions in the Soviet Union are deplorable for most Soviet citizens; for Jews they are many times worse due to the flagrantly repressive policies of the government. For those of us fortunate enough to be born and raised in a free country such as the United States, it is quite difficult to understand the plight of so many who are persecuted with such a vengeance.

The choice to apply to emigrate from the Soviet Union is a most painful one. Once the application is made, most applicants are fired from their jobs. They are monitored by the KGB, their phone service is cut off, and their mail is heavily censored and many times lost. Facing years of persecution, their applications for visas are turned down time and again for a variety of fictitious excuses: Access to classified information, husband's army service, no reunification of family, etc.

The case of Anatoly Shcharansky illustrates the typical plight of many who have applied to leave the Soviet Union. His first application was made in 1973 and denied in 1974, thus encouraging his personal crusade for human rights. His wife Avital was forced to leave the Soviet Union just 24 hours after they were married with the promise that her husband would follow in a few months. Many years later, it is obvious that there was never an intention on the part of the Soviet Government to honor that promise. The signing of the Helsinki accords in 1975 illustrated another promise broken. The changing of the kinship rule in 1979 to include only "first degree" kin did not exclude Shcharansky from joining his wife in Israel—Soviet persecution did.

In 1977 Shcharansky was arrested on false charges of treason and "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda." During a closed trial which allowed no lawyer of his choice and no defense witnesses, he was sentenced to 13 years in prison and labor camps. In fact, his only crime was his attempt to insure that his country uphold the Helsinki agreement to guarantee the right of family reunification and the free exercise of religious, political, and cultural freedoms. Anatoly Shcharansky has been subjected to brutal conditions while in prison: Solitary confinement, severe cold, and inadequate food, sleep, and health care.

The Soviet Government has not been letting up in its denial of basic human rights. The sharp decline in the number of emigrants from that country began after a record 51,000 were permitted to leave in 1979 and hit an alltime low last year at 2,700. The saying is true: "It's a tough place to live. It's a tougher place to leave."

The picture appears bleak. Americans would like to believe that the Soviet Government possesses a shred of humanity. The harsh reality came crashing down along with Korean Air Lines flight 007 and its innocent civilian passengers and crew scarcely 1 month ago. The Soviet Government deprived 269 citizens of other nations of the most basic internationally recognized human right—life. This blatant disregard for life was further compounded by an initial absence of comment from the Soviet Government followed by outright lies and accusations against the United States.

It has become increasingly clear that the Soviets are not content to repress their own people. The invasions of Poland and Afghanistan are relatively recent examples of that intent, as are the Soviet-backed Syrians in Lebanon and the barrage of Soviet weapons in Central America. The Soviet Ambassador to the United Nations has repeatedly used influence in that body to discredit the United States and to term it an "enemy of the peace." Yet, with the help of Third-World delegates, the Soviets succeeded in pushing through the General Assembly a resolution which "resolutely condemns policies of pressure and use, or threat of use, of force, direct or indirect aggression, occupation and the growing practice of interference, overt or covert, in the internal affairs of states." The timing of this resolution was just a month before the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

In times of much rhetoric when people worldwide fear the ever-present possibility of nuclear war, the Soviet Union remains an arrogant aggressor. It has shown time and again, that its promises are worthless, arms control is meaningless, and that its government values its sacred borders far more than it does any respect for individual human life.●

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, at this time when United States-Soviet relations are in a state of extreme crisis, it is especially important that we not forget the continuous crisis facing Jews in the Soviet Union.

Some Soviet Jews are fighting for their human right to rejoin families in other lands; millions more seek only to live their lives as Jews in their native land.

We must not allow these people—people like Ida Nudel and Lev Elbert and Yosif Begun—to become victims of the downing of Korean Air Lines flight 007. We must not allow our righteous outrage over this event to obscure the fact that the Soviet Union is a nation we must deal with forcefully and effectively if we truly care about human rights.

Our efforts to assert the rights of Jews and other ethnic minorities in the Soviet Union have been slow, plodding, and often extremely frustrating.

But these efforts must continue—both to let the Soviet Union know that human rights remain a top priority and to let the refuseniks and all 3 million Jews living in the Soviet Union know that they are not forgotten●

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw attention once again to the plight of Jews in the Soviet Union. I want to compliment my colleagues. The gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Pennsylvania for organizing this special order which reexamines the situation of Soviet Jews.

All of us here today have expressed outrage at the destruction of Korean Air Lines flight 007. This callous act of the Soviet Union once again brought to light the lack of respect for human lives exhibited by this regime. At first, this tragedy seemed almost unreal, beyond our conceptions of dignity and responsibility. However, the world soon condemned the terrorism displayed by the Soviets. It is now time that we set rhetoric aside and begin to reassess United States-Soviet relations and Soviet observance of human rights. Of particular importance in this area is the plight of Soviet Jews.

On July 14 I stood on the Capitol steps with many of my colleagues and joined in a prayer vigil for Soviet Jews. Presently, Jews in the Soviet Union are faced with cultural and religious repression, severe emigration restrictions, and increasing anti-Semitic statements in Soviet publications. In recent years, the situation has worsened. We cannot ignore the gross violations of human rights that are becoming greater every year. Only 4 years ago, over 50,000 Soviet Jews were permitted to emigrate, but now fewer than 3,000 Jews are permitted to leave the Soviet Union each year. This trend is indicative of the recent attack on human rights by the Soviet Government and there are no signs that the trend will reverse itself. Congress has always recognized the severity of the Soviet Jews' plight and it is absolutely necessary that we continue to be committed to their cause. The downing of KAL 007 should serve to remind us of the brutality of the Soviet system.

The Soviets may feel that we have no business commenting on how they treat their own people, but we must never forget that human rights is the centerpiece of American foreign policy. To maintain our moral authority, it is vitally important that the United States maintain an evenhanded human rights policy. We condemn the Soviets for their abuses, and rightfully so, but if our condemnations are to carry any force, the world must recognize them as consistent policy, not as selective, prejudiced attacks. If we openly support the violent regimes that rule some Latin American, Asian, and African countries while simultaneously attacking the Soviets as human rights violators, the world will view our protests as hollow gestures. Just as we are committed to the Soviet Jews and their struggle for freedom, we must also affirm our commitment to all oppressed peoples, regardless of the governments that rule them. Otherwise, our policies will be both ineffective and meaningless.

As the human rights situation in the Soviet Union continues to deteriorate, the task before us will obviously be a challenging one. This Congress must continue to demonstrate strong support for Soviet Jews and other oppressed groups. We must let these groups know that we are aware of their plights and that we are doing our best to help them. Today we renew our commitment to human rights in our foreign policy and we send a clear message to the Soviet Union that the United States is fighting for the rights of the oppressed in the Soviet Union and around the world. The Soviet Jews will not be forgotten—ever.●

GM (GLOBAL MOTORS) AND NEW RECORD TRADE DEFICIT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, the steel caucus had authorized this special order to discuss problems inherent with the steel industry and in conjunction with the problems of the automobile industry. I have in the Chamber with me today a fellow officer of the steel caucus, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HILLIS). I will make my remarks relatively brief.

Mr. Speaker, we are in the last quarter of 1983 and the experts predict the United States will set at least two new economic records in the next 2 years—a $60 billion trade deficit this year followed by one of $100 billion in the next.

Of course, these projections will hold true only if nothing changes.

And the really bad news is that some in the administration may be bent on making changes—changes for the worse; changes that would push the deficit above $100 billion.

There are well-founded fears that the administration is being pressed to negotiate—and will negotiate—an increase of almost 30 percent in the number of Japanese automobiles coming into the United States.

This would be done in the interest of extending the voluntary agreement with Japan for another year beyond its expiration in March.

It would put the seal of harmony on the President's visit there in November.

However, such a move at this time could well hamstring whatever kind of recovery we have going, and it is not much in the part of industrial America that I represent.

And such a move would do nothing to bring about harmony in the Congress or the Nation. The projection is that $29.6 billion of our $100 billion-plus deficits by 1985 will be with Japan in automobiles.

It will send body blows to automobile workers and steelworkers. It will stun all who are working to overcome the damage of subsidy and dumping and foreign industrial policies.

The impact would be felt directly by almost 550,000 workers, according to projections, and 18,000 would be in Pennsylvania, which already is hard hit by unemployment.

In my case, the vibrations could begin with suppliers of GM's Fisher Body Works at West Mifflin, Pa., in my district, and ring through the steel mills.

The officials and industrialists who want this 30 percent right now would step up the pace of what their policies are doing for industrial America.

And what they are doing for industrial America is what cutthroat deregulation has done for the air transportation system.

Our workers have taken pay cuts and rules changes to compete. Meanwhile, this Government stubbornly has done as little as possible to neutralize the unnatural advantages the foreign competition is given by overseas governments.

These unnatural advantages range from effective industrial development policy and targeting on down to simple massive subsidy.

One aspect of effective policy in Japan is low-cost capital for industrial development. It comes at rates as low as 2.25 percent and 4.5 percent, which I will discuss later.

This domesticated capital is one of their most powerful advantages.

But for now, Mr. Speaker, there are two other purposes in these special orders.

The first is to discuss with the House what is happening and the ramifications of such developments.

The second is to bring favorably to the attention of this body an excellent concurrent resolution introduced by Mr. HILLIS of the steel caucus and the automobile caucus.

The resolution would tell the administration in terms that cannot be misunderstood that this Congress does not want this 30-percent increase, or any increase.

As I understand it, an increase is in the wind to accommodate General Motors and three deals our giant has worked out. It also will accommodate those Japanese automakers who do not like the three deals.

First, there is the joint venture with Toyota to build 200,000 automobiles a year in California that will carry the Chevrolet nameplate. This will get GM into small cars and ultimately replace the Chevette.

I asked General Motors headquarters about the sources of parts and steel for those cars. I got two answers. They said that many of those things have not been decided yet and that the joint venture will make those decisions.

But we can assume the steel will be Japanese. We have no west coast supplier. So the steel most likely will come from Japan and most likely from the steel company in Toyota's trading-banking group.

Then there is the agreement with Suzuki Motors to import 200,000 cars a year with an American nameplate on them.

Suzuki, I read, had to borrow money to tool up for this push. If Suzuki followed the usual Japanese pattern it borrowed from the Government's Japan development bank and the mother bank of its trading group and all the institutions under mother's kimono.

And if Suzuki borrowed, it borrowed at rates that our industries can not find duplicated here, about which, more later.

And last, there is the agreement with Isuzu for 100,000 cars to be imported the same way. GM owns about 35 percent of Isuzu. It does not own more because the Government of Japan has never let outsiders own more.

In fact, the Government of Japan threw all foreign producers out of their country in 1937 to protect the market and develop its fledgling industry.

And the Government kept them out after the war until the industry was developed. They began allowing minority holdings in recent years. They still allow virtually no imports. And things are still tight. For example, there still would be no hope for anything like the GM-Toyota venture to be established in Japan to do business in Japan.

But there is no impediment here, and in those three arrangements we have 500,000 automobiles and the potential loss of 550,000 jobs.

According to projections of U.S. automakers the major employment losses will range from a high of 181,000 in Michigan to lows of 5,000 in Maryland and Alabama.

At Fisher in West Mifflin, Pa., they stamp body parts for most makes of GM automobiles. The 1,770 blue- and white-collar workers there will be affected to the extent that their Chevette production ends and nothing else takes up the slack.

Meanwhile, in steel, continuation of the agreement as it exists now will mean a rise in automotive use from last year's low of 16.2 million tons to a 1985–86 high of 21 million tons.

This 5 million tons of steel represents about 25,000 steelworkers jobs, and they are worth fighting for.

Meanwhile, I read there is strong sentiment among the unconnected Japanese automakers against having these 500,000 automobiles count against the total allowed under the voluntary agreement.

The agreement was made to give U.S. automakers a chance to steady up their operations and to make some very necessary profit in a recovering market.

After all, they need to make about $80 billion in investment. And investment capital in the United States—if not Japan—still demands a high return.

But that recovering market that was supposed to help them was stillborn.

Now it is developing, and it is a virtual certainty that a 30-percent increase would flatten it. And in that event, the same thing would happen to U.S. automakers, who have been doing what they promised to do.

It is a good idea not to change this arrangement until some other things change.

Change is needed in the enduring, chronic weakness of the yen against the dollar, where a $750 cost advantage per car is to be found.

Change is needed in the Japanese practice of forgiving taxes equal to 22.5 percent of the value of a car on export. It is a subsidy.

And this Congress needs to look with a cold and practical eye at the ways their Government applies and directs capital; and at what that means to pricing and market penetration.

After these things are done, maybe we can talk about modifying the agreement.

In steel, in automobiles, in everything we make or used to make, this is the only country that formally grants a share of the market to foreign countries.

In other countries, foreigners live on sufferance. Here they live on more than 20 percent of the market. We make market share virtually a property right, and they view it as an entitlement.

And this too should change.

But all we can do right now is to consider Mr. HILLIS' excellent resolution and to think once again of the coming $100 billion trade deficit.

A $100 billion merchandise trade deficit is an awesome thing. It means millions of jobs and $40 billion in new budget deficit due to lost taxes and increased benefit payments.

It also means a stalling economy.

Economist C. Fred Bergsten, a former Treasury official, stared at this monster for Dun's Business Monthly and saw that serious result.

Mr. Bergsten, now director of the Institute for International Economics, said this:

> An increasing trade deficit is an enormous reduction in GNP. When the trade deficit swings from $30 to $100 billion it takes 2 percent off GNP.

Furthermore, Mr. Bergsten estimated that the deficit will translate into as many as 3 million more unemployed.

Yet another 500,000 automobiles would increase the $100 billion foreign trade deficit by 3 percent. And it would add another $1.25 billion to our budget deficit.

This House passed a trade adjustment assistance bill just a couple of weeks ago. Just days ago we passed a jobs bill.

What sense does it make for the Government now to create 550,000 more unemployed to put the seal of harmony on a visit?

Furthermore, the massive import arrangements will be imitated if they are successful. Other American producers say they will be forced to make offshore arrangements just to stay in the competition.

I have seen no projections on the flight of jobs that will take place in this event. But I know it will be substantial.

Mr. Speaker, the House should embrace this resolution and move as quickly as possible to express our sentiment before the administration agrees to something with which no one can live.

I yield now to those of my colleagues who want to speak.

Mr. Speaker, the Japan Development Bank and the Ministry of International Trade and Industry recently announced a new policy that forecasts volumes about the kind of competition American workers face for the remainder of the century.

The policy is simple and potentially powerful.

The Ministry (MITI) and the bank (JDB) have plans to make available up to $42.5 million a year in Government venture capital for risky enterprises.

These are things the existing system will not handle.

The money is to be made available at 4.5 percent. The proposed payback period is 10 years. The money is to go to emerging high-technology industries and to high-technology applications in existing industries.

The idea is to put chosen applications into commercial production and use; that is, to prove them out and move them out.

The possessors of less risky, already proved techniques must do business with MITI and the JDB at the standard development rates of 7.3 to 7.8 percent. The JDB's standard business loan rate shoots all the way up to 8.4 percent.

MITI and the JDB listed 10 possible projects for the first loans when the program begins next April.

One of the 10 seems to be definitely steel technology and two others may have applications in steel technology. The remainder deal with nuclear power, ceramics, insecticides, fibers, and biotechnology.

As far as I can tell, this policy received notice in this country only in the July 19 English-language edition of the Japan Economic Journal. The facts I have cited come from the Journal's six-paragraph story.

Yet this could be as important as anything that has unbalanced the Japan-United States relationship thus far.

Venture capital is the vanguard in the advance of industry and technology.

Some who are familiar with Japanese customs and the culture have given me a cautionary note on this policy announcement. They say it could be only a trial balloon.

Well, trial balloons are there to be shot at; and this development—whether balloon or emerging hard policy—deserves a full barrage.

And it certainly warrants as full a review as possible of overseas capital policies.

By the way, I will speak in detail on the peculiarities of Japanese capital; and I do not speak in such detail to be critical of the Japanese. They are merely engaged in forging sharper and more effective instruments to carve out their security, stability, and growth.

Furthermore, the Japanese are not alone in finding more forceful ways to apply a new kind of capital, as I will explain later.

If there is criticism involved, it should be directed at the last 10 Congresses of the United States and at the last six administrations. All of these Congresses and all of these administrations have persisted in pretending that nothing of this nature makes any difference in what happens to the American worker or to a balance of trade that is bleeding industrial America dry.

It does make a difference.

And the first difference it makes is that it pits individual American workers against the deep pockets of foreign governments.

Furthermore, this new development says the pockets are going to get deeper and the competition is going to get more intense. It is a competition our people are losing because of the pretensions of the last 10 Congresses and the last six administrations.

Industries, particularly steel, that have been the foundation of this Nation are capital starved. They cannot earn or attract the kind of money they need to modernize.

This lack of high steel profit is not unique to the United States. Where you find strong and aggressive steel industries in the world you do not find private investment; you find government-granted or government-directed investment.

Our economists tend to look on steel as old and expendable. Theirs tend to look on them as rice industry that feeds other things and makes them grow strong. They do everything they can to keep their steel healthy.

This is only one of the differences.

Nevertheless, if you are going to talk about investment you have to think about money. Considering this, I decided to rummage in some reference works to refresh my memory on the nature of money and capital investment.

First I found a thinker who knew in 250 B.C.—as the Japanese and others around the world know how—that, "Money is the sinew of success in business."

Then I came across the Spanish genius, Cervantes, who noted, "The best foundation in the world is money."

Bad money, we know as a generally accepted rule, drives out good.

And, "All things obey money," according to the 16th century scholar, Erasmus. I suspect this is true for a critical period of time whether it is bad money or good.

Then I went to the original gospel on capital, and there I learned from Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" that a manufacturer's capital expected in return "something more than was sufficient to replace his stock to him"; and that those investing capital should have had "no interest to employ a great stock * * * unless his profits were to bear some proportion to the extent of his stock."

Furthermore, the greatest profit should draw the greatest stock;

And the higher the risk the greater the reward.

These are concepts our system reveres still; in fact, they are nothing less than commandments from the mount.

I understand that venture capital in the United States today is expected to return up to 20 percent, or more; the rate depends on the risk.

Clearly, the capital that MITI and the JDB are amassing and redistributing is not the capital Adam Smith identified and left for this age to deify.

Smith's capital was old testament; even today it remains demanding and jealous and fickle.

This MITI-JDB capital is tolerant and understanding.

Smith's capital was wide awake for new liaisons and impatient with old ones; and it is even more impatient today.

But this MITI-JDB capital will be almost hibernating at 4.5 percent. It is very patient capital.

I do not think it is patient by its intrinsic nature; it is patient by Government policy; it is gathered by Government policy; and it is given out by Government policy.

This patient capital policy (PCP), like the drug of the same name, can pump up the strength of the user to levels normal beings and enterprises will never realize.

Furthermore, PCP is part of Japan's industrial policy, and the pronunciation I suggest for this acronym of JIP is GYP.

Excuse the frivolity, Mr. Speaker, I could not resist. I meant no criticism of Japan in this either. Almost every nation we do business with has an industrial policy.

Why, we may even have one. The distinction is that ours, if there is enough coherence in it to be called policy, and theirs have different goals.

Our policy is geared to grimy things like maintaining a military establishment strong enough and versatile enough to defend Asia and Europe. The commercial and industrial benefits that may accrue are incidental. Their policies are geared to more politically useful things like productivity improvement and market penetration and full employment.

Therefore, it seems to me that an important question is, how did our partners domesticate this willful thing called capital? What did the Japanese do to temper its hunger and make it patient?

Once again, it looks like a matter of policy, which a lot of people with important titles and jobs with noble foundations are saying they really do not have any more.

One particularly expert expert who is not saying that is Dr. Chalmers Johnson of the University of California at Berkeley. Dr. Johnson has a highly commendable tendency to peer beneath the surface, and to probe.

So I want to offer this body a conclusion reached by Dr. Johnson recently in an analytical piece he wrote for a leading financial journal.

"There is something peculiar going on in the popular English-language press about Japanese industrial policy," he said.

"A passionate interest has developed in showing that Japan does not have an industrial policy," he went on.

"Or, if it does have one, MITI does not have much to do with it;

"Or that * * * if Japan does * * * and if MITI runs it, Japan's economic performance has been achieved in spite * * * of it."

Dr. Johnson cites an impressive number of examples, including articles by an economist for the President's Council of Economic Advisors and the Heritage Foundation.

"What is being ignored," Dr. Johnson points out, "is that Japanese capitalism has an entirely different structure from that in the United States."

And, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it has entirely different purposes and expectations than American capitalism. It is a powerful part of their policy.

Dr. Johnson goes on to say that, "Japanese managers do not need to pay as much attention to * * * the Tokyo Stock Exchange as their American counterparts do (to the New York Exchange) because of the central role of administered interest rates."

Let me interject here that the bulk of Japan's business and industrial expansion is done through loans; they do not use stock issues or other things we rely on here. About 85 percent of the financing of their juggernaut steel industry has been through loans. It was and is the "rice industry"—the sustainer.

Futhermore, I suggest that in the world today 4.5 percent is administered, and closely so. So is 7.8 percent for other development loans. So is the standard 8.7-percent loan rate.

In addition, a JDB loan amounts to a signal to everybody else with money.

It signals a need to join in to the city banks, to the banks' related trust banks, to their related life insurance companies, to their related marine and fire insurance companies, and to their related trading companies; and it is a signal for other government long-term credit banks to get aboard.

It is more like a vacuum than a beacon.

In addition, the preliminary findings of a case study that I have requested suggest that these loans—once signaled—will come in at rates that can be as low as 2.25 percent.

The chief object of this kind of capital cannot be profit; neither can it be impressing market analysts or satisfying the demands of a jealous and fickle market.

The object has to be the strength of the group, present strength and future strength.

As Dr. Johnson explained in his excellent book, "MITI and the Japanese Miracle," a group of enterprises borrows well beyond capacity to repay * * * beyond net worth * * * the bank overborrows from the Bank of Japan * * * the central bank is the ultimate guarantor * * *."

I ask you, how long would a Federal bank examiner put up with something remotely similar in the United States?

But Dr. Johnson had more to say. This, he went on, allows Japanese enterprises to "ignore short-term profitability * * * to concentrate on market penetration, quality control and long-term product development."

He calls it a "two-tiered structure of government guaranteed city bank overborrowing and government banks of last resort."

To my less-tutored mind it looks like an economywide version of a Chrysler loan guarantee with some variations; the terms are kinder and the capital is more patient; and the borrower need not be near death.

So 4.5 percent venture capital from the JDB and MITI is important. It says their policy still is in place and is pushing both old and new industries toward the future.

But, once again, this is not to single out the Japanese.

Similar systems flourish throughout developing Asia. There they have given the nickname of "tiger cubs" to those who are taking the same path to economic strength and stability. These "tiger cubs" may not be as far advanced in domesticating their capital, but they are effective nevertheless.

Dr. Johnson commented on some of these systems in a recent scholarly paper.

"One enduring (common) characteristic * * *," he said, "Is reliance on financial and monetary means to guide and control private activities.

"These * * * measures are often unorthodox by Anglo-American standards, particularly in their emphasis on the supply of capital through the banking system."

And I ask this House to remember, this system allows them to concentrate on market-penetration, quality control, and long-term product development; and it lets them thumb their noses at profit demands when necessary.

I think another benefit must be added to the list. It also gives them the means of maintaining and increasing whatever lead they have in productivity with a continuing modernization.

They can do big things like build a new steel mill.

Or they can do smaller things, like put $5.1 million in venture capital into wringing the last Btu of energy efficiency out of an improved continuous walking beam heating furnace. And if it works out, it can be spread throughout the steel industry. Such a furnace is marked down for one of the 4.5-percent loans.

In addition, I understand there are things such as government research and development loans; and that the tendency is to forgive these loans if the R&D does not pan out.

Let me emphasize that we are not talking about isolated instances of help. This is their system. It goes for everything they do whether smokestack or high tech or almost anything in between.

Certainly capital at 4.5 percent is very efficient if your goal is strength and not profit.

As Dr. Johnson said:

> The issue of national mobilization for economic goals is an important challenge to economic theories.

Mr. Speaker, one theory it tends to shake badly is the idea of comparative advantage in the classic sense; in the sense it is understood here.

Since we got comparative advantage from 18th century English economists, I will borrow and modify a phrase from a 19th century English writer to describe what is going on in the last half of the 20th century.

In the economics of today, it is them that make the advantage that get the advantage in this world.

There is advantage in patient capital. So it is reasonable to explore how the pace-setting Japan Development Bank gathers its capital for lending at 4.5 percent, at 7.8 percent, and at 8.7 percent.

The government's capital pool is something called the fiscal investment and loan program (FILP).

Money is fed into it from tax revenue and government bonds; from special welfare pension accounts; from a national pensions account; and the sale of other government-guaranteed bonds and borrowings; and from the postal life insurance and annuities special account.

But the biggest individual feeder to the FILP is the government's Postal Service Savings System.

The postal savings system is an efficient tap for the biggest body of money in any country: the savings of the people. It is about the only place they have to save in Japan. They have incentives. First, they do not have much of a social safety net system. And second, their accounts are exempt from taxes up to a certain amount. The interest is by law the highest available to individuals.

And the people respond. Total deposits in the Postal Savings System were $359 billion as of February 1982. And this is almost four times the deposits of the world's largest commercial bank.

Anyway, money feeds into the FILP from all of these sources and the FILP pumps it back out for use.

According to the charts I have seen, the Japan Development Bank receives from FILP each year an amount that is equal to the contributions of the Postal Service Savings System to FILP plus a little more.

So JDB directs the savings of the people. It directs them into low-interest industrial loans and, according to my chart, into equity investments as well.

Truly, it is no capital as we know it. Nor, with equity investment, is it banking as we permit it.

The capital is patient. The capital is docile. The capital is effective. And the government is understanding.

Where we try to limit strength, they build it. Where we try to prohibit concentrations of power, they invite it.

But this is more a criticism of Americans who will not look at the world than it is of the Japanese who must live in it.

And, as I said, the Japanese merely have the most developed technology in this field; everybody is working on something.

There is Korea, for example. For a quick look at Korea I will paraphrase a paper titled "Korea's Economy." It is published by the Korea Economic Institute.

In Korea, the government wanted rapid industrial growth. So it set up its own steel industry and other industries in areas where the private sector was reluctant to venture. The cause of the reluctance: little potential for returns on capital.

Government-controlled banks financed most of the growth, and much of the credit was lower than market rates. This was particularly true in the early years. This was accompanied by export target programs.

There also is a Korean Development Bank (KDB). It is financed by the Government of Korea and by international development banks, for which this Congress supplies funds. About 90 percent of all KDB loans are for capital equipment in industries that will create increased exports, according to the book, "Eastasia Edge."

Meantime, the Bank of Korea had $4 billion on loans to commercial banks in 1 recent year, and 54 percent of it was for the finance of exports.

Guess who takes most of Korea's exports. In steel, in 1978, the United States accepted more than 50 percent of the steel exported by this ally and trading partner.

Information is somewhat scarcer on Taiwan, but the book, "Eastasia Edge," offers some insight.

Taiwan's Bank of China has a key role. The government manages the economy through the bank, and the bank manages everything having to do with money, including foreign exchange.

The bank's chairman has another role; he also is Chairman of the Government's Council for Economic Planning and Development. The Council decides things like whether to add to new China steel's capacity. The Government owns the steel company.

So it might be hard for an outsider to determine who manages who.

Nevertheless, Taiwan is one of the countries where business gets capital from the banks; and, in addition, the small equity market they have is closed to outsiders.

Public corporations—that means Government-owned—are the foundation of Taiwan. The state controls steel, aluminum, shipbuilding, petroleum, railways, and electric power, for example.

Dr. Johnson considered many of these things in his paper. He looked at a couple of the "tiger cubs." He looked at Miti and the JDB.

He concluded that industrial policy is not being abandoned.

In my mind, the 4.5-percent venture capital idea underlines this conclusion; it also highlights it and sets it in boldface italic type for all to see clearly.

The idea is understanding of basic industries and of new industry. It creates; it modernizes; it keeps sharp the edge.

And, to encroach on Dr. Johnson's next conclusion, this PCP (patient capital policy) is one of Japan's most important institutional and industrial innovations. Like all originals, it is being copied widely.

Things are somewhat different in Europe; at least in steel they are. The Europeans are behind the times not only in steel technology but in the technology of capital. There they simply own or subsidize. The governments of Europe have subsidized to the tune of about $30 billion for steel since 1975. Just this year they have announced in the neighborhood of $5 billion more in subsidies to rationalize; but the year is not over yet and it may go higher.

This, Mr. Speaker, is what the American worker faces.

They are faced with it in the old industries and in the new ones that we all pray will develop.

Whatever it is, it is not "Adam Smith Capitalism."

However, it does supply huge amounts of capital.

Whatever it is, it is not free enterprise.

Nevertheless, it is enterprising.

And It may not be government money in the strictest sense of not being directly appropriated.

But the invisible hand and the discerning judgment of the market did not guide this capital into the investments where it now resides so patiently; the heavy hand of government did it. It is doing it as we meet today and it will continue to do it.

So, no matter how clever and sensitive is overseas management, remember this: They do not have market analysts and a herd of investors looking over their shoulders demanding to know why profits are not higher.

No matter how quick they are to jump on innovations in management and technology, remember this: Whatever they do they can do at rates of 2.25 percent or 4.5 percent or 7.8 percent.

Ready money can make even dull managers look good, I suspect.

And no matter what you read about the Asian work ethic and the devotion of overseas workers to their companies, remember this: Their miracles of production are done with machines put there at the lowest possible cost by their government.

Remember that their money is gathered in by the government and added to by the government to get them the best tools available at the lowest cost.

So, whatever the advantage in management,

Whatever the advantage in labor costs and docility,

The biggest and most important advantage is having patient capital.

In business, productivity does obey money, and the most money gets the best results.

Bad capital drives out good capital; and patient capital cuts off jealous capital at the knees.

Furthermore, it is true that those who make and take advantage have advantage.

I am not suggesting that the United States copy Japan or any of the "tiger cubs" or even the Europeans in its approach to basic industries.

The Japanese have paid a high price for their progress. I suspect the reason they are so obdurate in trade matters is that they are afraid the whole overleveraged castle may fall out of the sky if they do not keep going.

But American workers and American industry are paying an even higher price for the success of patient capital. Their system is collapsing on them.

And they will pay it into the next generation and the one after that unless something changes.

As another 19th-century Englishman, Lord Byron, said, "There are two pleasures for our choosing; the one is winning and the other losing."

American workers have been winners and they will be winners if they get the right tools to complete—to compete with the foreign governments that are trampling them.

It is time for this Congress to quit trying to pretend these things make no difference.

It is time to start thinking about how to win this thing.

□ 1800

Mr. HILLIS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I certainly am happy to be a part of this special order with him. I want to begin by complimenting him on the statement he has just made. I think he has summarized the problem that faces American industry, and particularly the steel industry and the automobile industry, just right.

We have had 3 long years of depression in steel and automobiles, and in the automobile industry alone it has put 260,000 auto workers out on the street and resulted in losses of more than $4 billion for the domestic auto companies in 1980 alone.

Our best guess now is that the total industry demand for 1983 and 1984 together will average about 10 million cars. And this, ironically, is just about the level that was expected in 1981 when the 1,680,000 limit was first set. The point there is that when that figure was not reached and fell so far below, the Japanese industry got actually a windfall of 800,000 cars over the percentage of the market that was anticipated that they would have when the 1,680,000 limit was first set.

My colleague has talked about the effect of the trade deficit and the effect on our jobs, and I agree with him very, very completely on this.

Over the past 5 years we have amassed as a country a $150 billion deficit in trade with the rest of the world while Japan has accumulated a trade surplus of $67 billion including $64 billion in trade with the United States and more than 80 percent of that trade imbalance with Japan, $54 billion, is in automobile products.

Now, there is a very clear fact here. Every Japanese car that comes into this country comes in with Japanese steel, Japanese rubber, Japanese glass, and every other component that goes into the manufacture of the car. There is no question that Japan has had a hothouse environment to foster its automobile industry. And partly from the fostering, partly from some labor rate differentials, partly from preartificial advantages of tax and currency systems, the Japanese industry on the bottom line has had a very substantial cost advantage.

In the face of unexpectedly low industry demand the U.S. automobile industry has kept its commitment to improve its competitiveness and during the years 1981 and 1982 the domestic auto producers of this country spent $22 billion on products and facilities and introduced 31 new vehicles, notwithstanding a total cash outflow from operations of more than $6 billion during that period.

As to present conditions, the imbalance between the yen and the dollar accounts for some $750 of overall Japanese cost advantage. One domestic company, Ford, has testified that its gains in narrowing the Japanese advantage by reducing costs and improving efficiency have been completely offset by the worsening misalinement of the dollar and the yen. And it is a situation we cannot cope with. We can talk about free trade and fair trade but as long as this artificial difference between the dollar and the yen exists there can be no fair trade.

While I could go on and on here tonight, the hour is late, I am very happy to be a sponsor of this resolution. I want to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague, Mr. GAYDOS, for joining with me as a cosponsor and taking this special order together, because I think the two industries, steel and automobiles, go shoulder-to-shoulder, wheel-to-wheel. Without one the other cannot survive and vice versa. And without both America cannot remain a free and strong country. And what we are seeing here is if it continues on, we are not going to see the production particularly of small automobiles remain in this country.

The transaction that my colleague has related to in California with the General Motors-Japanese Toyota will mean eventually I think some sort of other combination with the other manufacturers and probably eventually a complete offshore production of the small cars we know today. And this will lead again to another erosion of jobs, demand for steel, rubber, and everything else that goes into the car.

So, it is time that we act. As I say, the 1,600,000 figure was set based on a market projection that will hold true probably for next year and the year after. It is fair, it was negotiated to be fair on those numbers, and it will be fair to our competition from abroad. In fact, it will be overly fair.

You know, about 90 percent of the other countries in the world have some sort of an arrangement to keep their market from being flooded from abroad. And basically, it is imposed against Japan, negotiated automobile restraints with Japan. We are the only major country that has not done this.

I think in view of present circumstances we have no other choice but to move. If we do not do this, I think in time we will be forced to take a much more strenuous, a much more serious approach, and not only in this industry but perhaps in others and move into a position where we can have a free trade, because we have suffered from unfair trade for much too long.

So again I want to thank my colleagues for sharing this time with me, for his strong support of the auto restraint resolution, and together with the Auto Caucus and the Steel Caucus I am sure we will go forward to see a prompt resolve of this resolution before this House.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GAYDOS. I want to commend my colleague from Indiana (Mr. HILLIS) and I say this most sincerely. Because of the busy scheduling around the House it takes great effort and concentration, dedication to continue to study, to present, to make arguments and to pursue an active participation in this very sensitive field. Most Members find it difficult to adjust themselves to the very difficult interpretation of trade and trade issues.

It is a complicated matter. It is not the most pleasant matter to study, to read or to address. It is a matter that probably is most unrewarding in a way because it is intrinsically boring.

But it is so important. It is so basically and fundamentally important to the well-being of the Nation that it is unfortunate that it has that nature.

But I think my colleague makes an excellent point when he talks about other countries doing certain things, about keeping their markets free, or at least reasonably free from unreasonable foreign imports.

Japan is the greatest perpetrator of just that philosophy. Our Special Trade Ambassador, Mr. Brock, just went to Japan and used some rather strong language, I understand, recently when he went to the Japanese and said "You are going to have to change your present attitude. You promised in interpreting GATT, the General Agreement on Tariff and Trade, you promised us at those conferences that what you were going to do was that you were going to allow the Americans to bid on a lot of your telephonic and electronic needs in the country through your domestic markets, which you have been keeping American competitors out over the years." They have done this. In fact, for 35 years, since the war, and always have promised that they are going to let them in, and they are keeping them out and doing it in counterdistinction to the specific requirements of the international trade arrangement, both the act of 1972, the act of 1974, and the 1979 Trade Act, and in the consequential international conferences.

He said this in a formal manner to the Japanese on a formal, official visit, and yet the Japanese have been persistently promising and have promised that they will open their markets. They are going to open their markets and they always have pleaded that our industry is in its infancy and we cannot open it, we have to get a start. But this has been occurring for 35 years.

In the meantime, we look like Uncle Sucker. They have unbridled, uninhibited access to our markets, yet on the other hand, even to abide by the international trade arrangement and agreements that were negotiated, they refused to do it and refused to do it with impugnity. They are not embarrassed when they do it and they continually keep out of their country foreign products, because their list is very long. But they still have this specialized list of 100, of 100 items that today are exclusively and as a matter of record not permitted to be imported into Japan from any country.

So when you take a look at that you start wondering who is doing what where, whose interests are being benefited, and you question the overall integrity of international policy in this area.

Mr. HILLIS. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. GAYDOS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HILLIS. Certainly I agree with everything the gentleman is saying.

I would like to point out, of course, the Japanese now are trying to get up to 250,000 more units. That represents in our economy, if those were American units, one complete assembly plant. That carries with it all of the engine, the transmission, the steel, the rubber, and those equate to 50,000 American jobs. That is what we are talking about.

Last year's merchandise trade deficit, I am informed, of $36 billion cost our economy 900,000 jobs. That cost the U.S. Government $9 billion in lost tax revenues and an additional $4 billion in unemployment and welfare payments.

That 250,000 units, if they were our units rather than Japanese, would increase by $1½ billion our trade deficit. It would lower the cost to the U.S. Government, to local governments of the increase in employment cost, and it would mean more taxes, both Federal, State, and local.

So however we gage this, whether we want to talk in generalities of fair trade, it is really a pocketbook issue. It is something that affects very much the size of the deficit in this country, which affects the interest rates and the state of the economy and the recovery. It affects local business, local government, State government all up and down the line, and it is much to all of our interests. It is not just a Midwest issue or a Mideast, or Northeast issue, but from an employment standpoint and a tax standpoint, it is a total national issue, and every Member of the House would have a great interest to support this resolution.

Mr. GAYDOS. I think my colleague makes such a viable point, because again you take an automobile company and an automobile coming into this country. Forget about the numbers, but you have to look at the animal. You have to look at the rubber involved, the tires. You have to look at the little, small labor and the materials that go into making the cigarette lighter, the little knobs on the radio, the electronics and every item, every screw and nut and fastener, the headliner in the automobile.

It just seems this comes in an imperceptible form because it is all consolidated and people do not understand. Maybe our colleagues and the American public, if they would just stop and analyze what is that automobile made up of, what is coming in and what is affected, would understand. I can go into a million different descriptive items. Then maybe we would get the support throughout the Nation publicly for what we are trying to do to put some reasonable limitations, and maybe our colleagues in the House would be more sensitive to the problems as we have grown to know them.

There is no question about it. I can take one item, I can take a million items, but just one example. We had 15,000 to 18,000 people employed directly in women's costume jewelry in this country. Now we have none, none. We do not make costume jewelry in this country anymore. We import it all. It is 18,000 to 20,000 jobs, I think are the accurate figures, and all of the material again that is involved.

So you can take that and enlarge upon that with lightbulbs, or with Christmas ornaments and everything that used to go into the conglomeration of making jobs for this country, giving people the sinew to buy things with. We are talking about money, to have a job to earn money to buy things. All of those things are going down the drain.

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAYDOS. I yield to my good colleague and dedicated officer of the Steel Caucus and from the great State of Ohio (Mr. REGULA).

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is doing a great service to this body and to the Nation to focus attention on the problem of the trade deficit.

A recent issue of Business Week, August 29, 1983, had an article entitled "America's Hidden Problem." In this article they termed the trade deficit as having the potential to be "the economic disaster of the decade."

I think that is putting it mildly. As we look down the road, concern about the trade deficit is very real.

We are faced with a $200 billion budget which tends to obscure a deficit that is equally threatening to the economic well-being of the people of this Nation, and that is the trade deficit. The two are really interrelated. We have to deal with one to deal with the other.

Historically, Americans have taken our supremacy on international trade for granted. As recently as 1970 few Americans cared about trade. For the first time in 100 years, as a result of record high trade deficits, trade is becoming a major issue.

Given the huge domestic market, and an abundance of inexpensive natural resources this carefree attitude is understandable. And in fact between 1870 and 1970 the United States almost always exported more than it imported.

This began changing in the 1970's. This year the U.S. merchandise trade deficit is expected to reach $70 billion and $100 billion in 1984. The trade deficit is expected to reach $174 billion by 1990.

What does all this mean and why and how did it happen?

I was particularly disturbed by the comments of the Chairman of the International Trade Commission, Alfred Eckes in a recent speech. He referred to disconcerting trends in the changing composition of U.S. trade. "We are exporting more and more primary products and importing more and more manufactured goods. This, incidentally, is the traditional definition of a less developed country. Some might describe the emerging relationship as reminiscent of the colonial trade pattern this country had with Great Britain in the 18th century," Eckes said.

He used the example of American trade with Japan in 1982 where the U.S. leading exports were corn, soybeans, wheat, cotton, and coal and its five leading imports were autos, trucks, video recorders, oil well casings, and motorcycles.

Eckes' remarks are frightening and well they should be for they say clearly what we have avoided facing up to for nearly a decade. We as a country are rapidly losing our competitive edge in world markets.

In fact, we may never have had that edge because we were able to rely on an ever-expanding domestic market. But as our market began to be invaded by imports, domestic manufacturers were forced themselves to seek footholds in foreign markets. Their lack of success, in comparison to foreign penetration of our market is due to a number of factors including shortsighted policies of both labor and management, increased foreign government intervention in markets and our own Government's policies.

Part of the reason there is a severe trade deficit is, of course, the dollar/yen relationship, the dollar/mark, the dollar/pound relationships and the strong dollar. This is a result of high interest rates which result from huge budget deficits.

Since 1960 imports have more than doubled as a percentage of domestic consumption, from 5.8 to 12.5 percent in the first half of this year, according to the Commerce Department.

The recent surge in imports was expected as the recovery gained momentum and Americans' purchasing power increased. In addition, the swollen dollar makes imports less expensive here and American products more costly overseas.

A recent study by the Institute for International Economics found the dollar was overvalued by 24 percent when measured against other nations' currencies and compared with the relative purchasing power of the different countries' money.

The same study showed the Japanese yen undervalued by 6 percent and the German deutschemark undervalued by 5 percent.

So in many ways, the budget deficit and the trade deficit are interrelated and both are prescriptions for disaster for this Nation unless we address those problems.

□ 1820

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS) clearly pointed out, the serious threat to the United States of the loss of productive capacity. We have seen it happen in steel, very graphically. We have seen it happening in automobiles and in a lot of not so visible area. It is nuts, bolts, screws, fasteners, and a whole host of products that historically were made in the United States, components of the manufacturing process.

Because of this imbalance of payments resulting from the strong dollar, we have lesser and lesser ability to produce in this country.

Between the 1960's and 1970's, productivity growth in the United States dropped sharply increasing U.S. unit labor costs faster than in any other major industrialized country except Great Britain.

I think it carries with it another threat that we should carefully consider. That is the threat to the national security of the United States.

In World War II, the ability of the United States to produce, the capacity to make bombers at Willow Run, the capacity to produce ships by the dozens in the shipyards of America were the key, essentially, to protecting the free world, to maintaining the liberty and freedom of many people throughout the world.

If we lose that ability to produce—and that can be the result of continuing trade deficits which erode our industrial capacity—we have a serious problem in terms of national security.

I think another threat that results from this is the fact that it feeds on itself. When product is sold, be it a tractor, be it a bulldozer, be it a hospital system, whatever; when it is exported, sold into the world market, the United States has the aftermarket. When you need new tracks on the bulldozer, they would come from the United States. If you need a new engine, it comes from the United States. All that replacement market was fed by the strong export position of our country and the ability of American products to be the leader throughout the world.

The sad part of the trade imbalance and the result of a strong dollar, which is in part the result of a large budget deficit, is the fact that we are going to lose that aftermarket. As products are sold from other nations, in turn the replacement parts and the jobs that go with them will flow to other nations.

So I think there are a lot of things that we have to consider in this entire problem. Of course the most serious impact is on the employment of Americans.

Trade means jobs. The Commerce Department estimates that every billion dollars in exports equals 25,000 jobs. Translated, last year's $43 billion merchandise trade deficit cost the country at least 1 million jobs.

In a May study of jobs and trade the Commerce Department found that when manufacturing exports were growing, between 1977 and 1980, the growth accounted for 30 percent of the increase in private sector employment in the United States. Conversely, when exports fell off, between 1980 and 1982, that decrease was responsible for 40 percent of the rise in unemployment.

C. Fred Bergsten, head of the Institute for International Economics, looked ahead and projected that the predicted $100 billion trade deficit in 1984 could mean 2 million lost jobs.

If we ever had an even balance of payments, we would probably have an extra 2 million to 2½ million jobs in the United States. So as the merchandise account becomes more out of balance, we in turn lose more and more of the industrial opportunities for jobs in this Nation.

In many instances the United States has failed to adequately build and maintain market shares at home and abroad. European and Japanese competitors, conversely, preserve their foreign market shares at all costs.

Government policies must share in the blame. In large part I attribute this to the traditional practice of U.S. policymakers of responding to trade problems in an ad hoc manner. When domestic sugar growers were threatened, a quota was slapped on imported sugar. When the American automobile industry was severely depressed, voluntary import restraints were negotiated with Japan.

This ad hoc response is largely a result of no one single strong voice speaking for trade. The same ad hoc approach, which periodically results in temporary protectionism, also means that whenever a question arises that pits trade against other policy goals, trade comes up short.

For example, the trade weapon was used as an instrument of foreign policy in imposing a grain embargo on the Soviet Union to retaliate against that country's invasion of Afghanistan, leaving U.S. farmers devastated by the long-term loss of foreign market share. The curb dropped the U.S. share of the Soviet grain market from a preembargo peak of 74 percent to around 20 percent.

The reliability of U.S. suppliers was discredited by the attempt to undermine the Soviet gas pipeline by restricting exports of certain U.S. equipment and technology for the project.

Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige even lays part of the blame for the auto industry's problems with the Government:

> I am sure you can fault past management, but part of the blame has got to be laid on the Government's doorstep. Three times, the U.S. automobile industry tried to come out with small cars, and every time, the government let out a signal that energy prices were going to be kept down, that gasoline was not going to be allowed to rise to its true market level.

The result, according to Baldrige, was that twice the U.S. auto industry was stuck with large unsold inventories of small cars.

This strategy of "free trade, but" will no longer work. As I pointed out earlier, the trade scene has shifted significantly in the last decade and we too must change our posture to meet the new challenges of world trade. To do so we must clarify our international trade objectives and priorities and improve our trade policymaking.

In the Business Week article, Stuart Eizenstat, a former aide to Carter, pointed out what should have been, but clearly is not, obvious:

American companies cannot compete against foreign governments. The marketplace is not free with the governments of Britain, France, Germany, and Japan intervening heavily to aid their manufacturers.

The playing field must be leveled. The Government must move to help improve our trade posture and our position in an increasingly global marketplace.

I do not, however, necessarily advocate some of the "industrial policy" strategies that are currently in vogue. We should not abandon our free market philosophy which brought us to a position of industrial supremacy. The Government should not be in a position of picking winners and losers.

I think that we in the Congress have to address the budget deficit. I think it is essential that we do that. We have had special orders on that topic in previous evenings. I think it will require a bipartisan approach. I think that is a key element in addressing the trade deficit.

If we can do something about the budget deficit, I believe that we will see a resurgence of capital investment. We will see a balancing in the value of the U.S. dollars as it relates to other currencies, which will help our exports considerably and will diminish imports somewhat.

I think it is important that the international trade representative, Ambassador Brock, be very strong in the current rounds of negotiations in Tokyo in maintaining the quota for automobiles for the future year.

I think that is essential to give industry time to make the necessary adjustments to meet many of the requirements we have imposed, in this Chamber, which have made it difficult, in many respects, for them to compete.

I hope, too, that we will give consideration to the establishment of a Department of Trade within the Cabinet.

I strongly support the administration's efforts to create a Cabinet-level Department of Trade to consolidate trade policymaking functions, which are now scattered among a number of agencies.

This reorganization would enable us to fully develop our international trade opportunities and defend our international trading rights. For the first time, a single Cabinet Department would be responsible for both policymaking and policy implementation. It would enable development of a policy that emphasizes anticipation and coordinated action, rather than reaction and ad hoc trade restrictions.

It would also send a signal to our trading partners that we are serious about trade, serious about stopping unfair trading practices and serious about increasing our export market.

I think, as has been pointed out by previous speakers, so very eloquently, the issue of trade is one of the most important in terms of the future of this Nation, in terms of our economic health and in terms of providing employment opportunities for the young people of this country.

We cannot anticipate the kind of society in which we simply trade our services with each other. It would be a disaster for the defense of this Nation, for the security of this Nation if we let our productive capacity debilitate. It would be a threat to our economic base, it would be a threat to our social programs, to our educational system, all of the things that depend on tax revenues produced by the industrial economy of this Nation of ours.

So this problem of a trade deficit goes far beyond the issue of steel or autos; it goes to the very heart of our economic, social and political well-being.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS) again, for taking the leadership in bringing this tremendously important issue to the attention of our colleagues and to the American public.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague (Mr. REGULA) for all of his past efforts with the steel caucus on this subject matter. He is always there present, ready to respond when we need his services and expertise in this field.

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues today in expressing deep concern about the growing trade deficit problem and its impact on American industry. I believe this special order today is particularly timely insofar as our U.S. Trade Representative, Ambassador William Brock, together with his trade negotiators will shortly be paying a visit to our Japanese trading partners to discuss automobiles and other issues.

This past Thursday, the Congressional Automotive Caucus met with Mr. Philip Caldwell, the chairman of Ford Motor Co. I would like to share with my colleagues some of the concerns expressed by Mr. Caldwell with respect to the trade deficit issue.

Over the past 5 years, the United States has experienced a $150 billion trade deficit. During that same period, Japan had a $67 billion trade surplus. Of that amount, $64 billion existed with the United States. And of that amount, $50 billion constituted exports of automobiles to the United States. In other words, approximately one-half of our trade deficit problem over the past 5 years has been with Japanese automobiles.

Allow me to translate this in terms of the impact on the domestic steel industry. On average, for every automobile imported from Japan into the United States, approximately 1.13 tons enters the United States. Therefore, in addition to the 30-plus million tons of raw steel that was imported to this country over the past 5 years, approximately 5 million tons of steel came in the form of imported automobiles—16 percent more than the official figures indicated.

What we have here is an illusion that steel imports from Japan have been stabilized—the statistics show that Japan has sent an average of 6 million tons of steel per year to the United States for the past 5 years taking about 30 percent of the import market share. The truth is 7 million tons of steel a year have actually been entering this country as a result of the steel in automobile imports.

In terms of the impact on unemployment, this illusion fades away when you consider that approximately 25,000 jobs in the steel industry were lost due to steel entering this country in the form of automobiles over the past 5 years. Steel experts estimate that for every 1 million tons of imports, 5,000 steelworkers jobs are lost.

According to Mr. Caldwell, the most critical disadvantage that American automobile producers have with regard to achieving a full recovery is the misalinement of the dollar/yen relationship—specifically the yen is undervalued by approximately 25 percent with respect to the dollar thereby making U.S. exports unattractive in comparison to our trading partners imports. To better illustrate this with respect to automobiles, the dollar/yen misalinement alone constitutes a $750 per car artificial advantage. If you add this to approximately $600 per car in the form of their commodity tax rebate—a total of $1,250—one can account for well over half of the Japanese "cost advantage."

At this point, I would like to insert into the RECORD the comments of Mr. Caldwell for the benefit of my colleagues. Finally, I would like to express my support of the efforts of my colleagues on the automotive caucus in their attempt to assure that a fourth year of auto quotas is maintained at the 1.68 million level with no exemptions.

Until the issue of the dollar/yen relationship is resolved and the Japanese tax rebate system is eliminated, our Government must continue its efforts to preserve stability in the American marketplace.

REMARKS BY PHILIP CALDWELL, CONGRESSIONAL AUTO CAUCUS BREAKFAST, SEPTEMBER 29, 1983

Good morning. I'm delighted to have this opportunity to be here in an informal atmosphere, with congressmen who share the concerns of our industry and its employees.

Although this caucus and its predecessor—the House Auto Task Force—were formed during some of Detroit's darker hours, let me assure you that the need for such a group to focus on automotive concerns has not diminished with the industry's present resurgence.

Originally, I had planned to use this opportunity to focus almost entirely on long-range competitiveness—hoping to enlist your aid and counsel in getting some strategies out of the idea stage and into the action stage. That is still my goal today; but first, there are some pressing "current events" on the agenda. In the last several weeks, three issues have been receiving a great deal of both media and congressional attention—safety, fuel economy and Japanese export restraints.

Turning first to safety. At Ford, we're proud of our ongoing commitment to safety and our recent developments in safety technology:

We're the only bidder on a contract to supply the GSA with 5,000 driver-side air bag-equipped cars.

We have an on-the-road test fleet of cars equipped with new generation anti-lacerative windshields, which will also be installed on the GSA fleet.

Ford's 1983 and 1984 cars offer 5 mile an hour bumpers. These stronger bumpers, as well as other design and engineering features, have convinced one insurer to offer discount rates for two-thirds of our cars—by comparison, only one car from our five major Japanese competitors has earned a discount, and many are charged an extra premium.

Recent breakthroughs in microprocessor technologies and improved sensing systems will permit us to put new faster acting and more efficient anti-skid brakes on our 1985 luxury cars.

Over on the Senate side, the Commerce Committee recognized many of these technologies as having potential benefits. But they chose an unfortunate method of demonstrating this recognition—they want to mandate them. For a long-lead industry like ours, this approach leaves us no choice but to oppose the legislation vigorously because—among other reasons—the timing is impracticable. The judgments on the technologies are premature and legislating highly technical requirements so early may preclude development of the best approach.

We hope this is an idea whose time won't come. All of the safety technologies included in the Senate Commerce Committee bill are under development in the industry, and DOT has them under consideration and has the authority to accelerate this development and can regulate the timing and details of implementation, if needed.

My second "current event" is fuel economy.

At Ford we have improved our average fuel economy by more than 70 percent since 1975, and we're the only manufacturer with cars on all three of the EPA 1984 highest fuel economy lists—top ten overall, top ten gasoline and top ten domestic.

In real world driving, the 1984 Ford Escort and Mercury Lynx with their lively 2-liter diesels will give 1,000 miles of city driving for just over 24 gallons of fuel at a cost of about $29 at present prices. Most drivers will need to fill the tank only once a month.

Our full-size sedan for 1984 has better fuel economy than our smallest 1975 car.

Put another way, fuel economy improvements have more than offset real fuel price increases—the inflation-adjusted fuel cost to operate today's full-size car is 28 percent less than a comparable 1975 model. It's no wonder then that there has been some shift back toward larger cars. But it's not a return to the pre-OPEC way of living and driving. Large cars today only account for about 12.3 percent of new car sales.

Yet press reports have seemed to focus not on progress we've made, but on the fact that we will be short of CAFE standards. Ford expects to comply with the law by using flexibility provided in the law to apply credits from those years in which we exceed the standards. Let me assure you that the reason we're short of the standard is not a lack of technology or any diminished financial or engineering commitment to new fuel efficient products, but rather it is directly attributable to a change in what consumers are buying today.

As you know, you have provided NHTSA with administrative authority to make some adjustments; therefore, we have not urged any specific changes to the law at this time. Surely manufacturers—after all of our efforts and success in completely revamping the country's vehicle fleet—will not be unduly berated for something that is largely a matter of consumer preference.

The third of the three current issues is also the most critical to the recovery and competitiveness of the industry. We consider it imperative that Japanese auto restraints continue at the present level for at least the Japanese fiscal year beginning April 1, 1984. The September 15 letter to Ambassador Brock from your Caucus co-chairman couldn't have said it better:

It cited the handicaps of the current dollar/yen ratio and the beneficial commodity tax treatment granted Japanese manufacturers by their government as prohibiting the marketplace from correcting our automotive trade imbalance.

It called for an aggressive political response if we are to prevent further deterioration of our domestic automobile manufacturing industry.

It strongly recommended that Ambassador Brock insist that the Japanese agree to an extension of the current 1.68 million annual rate with no exceptions.

I urge you to keep the pressure on in case there is a tendency for backsliding. Your support is needed and timely; in the last few weeks it has become obvious that there are some in the Administration who would like to use the modest auto recovery as an excuse not to redress the obvious trading inequities under which we're operating.

As your letter to Ambassador Brock indicated, there's not much that auto manufacturers can do about the windfall advantage the Japanese get as a result of an out-of-joint exchange rate that reflects an undervalued yen and an overvalued dollar. That's the province of government. And so is the tax problem, which gives the Japanese an unfair advantage in this market and penalizes us in their market. Together, the dollar/yen misalignment and the tax inequity account for well over half of the Japanese "cost" advantage. This is a very serious problem for the domestic producers.

At Ford, we believe that the lion's share of the responsibility to be competitive belongs to us in the private sector and we're working hand in hand—management and labor—as hard as we know how:

When other industries were cutting back in recessionary times, we accelerated the pace of the product innovation, introducing 8 new cars and trucks in the brief span of 18 months—products which are leading the industry in quality, value, technology and fun.

Our quality has improved by more than 50 percent since 1980, and independent surveys show we are better than our U.S. competition and as good as, or better than, most of our foreign competition.

By reducing operating costs, raising productivity and moderating compensation, we have reduced our break-even point sharply, which is why we're in the black even with sales levels that aren't really worth celebrating yet.

But while we in industry pursue those product, quality, cost and productivity factors within our control, government has to make the same sort of progress in the areas only it can control. The long-term answer is to have a fully competitive auto industry in a competitive United States. The way to get there is to have a business environment and government policies that are competitive with those of our foreign rivals. I believe the top priorities for policy change are to correct distortions in exchange rates and inequities in tax treatment.

Although the dollar is overvalued against most major currencies, the greatest damage comes from the misalignment with respect to the yen. The misalignment is a problem for all industries competing with Japanese imports at home and abroad. The dollar/yen misalignment alone gives the Japanese an artificial advantage or subsidy of $750 a car. The first step toward resolving the problem is to get the Administration to pay attention—serious attention—to the impacts involved.

Loss of competitiveness in international trade reduces U.S. production and increases unemployment—both of which further increase the budget deficit. The $100 billion deficit in trade projected for 1984 means $25 billion in lost tax revenues and $15 billion in extra unemployment costs as 2½ million U.S. jobs disappear.

Your support of the "Williamsburg" yen resolution shows you understand the importance of this misalignment. I hope you will continue to urge U.S. policies to deal with this issue.

Further, the Japanese with their commodity tax, and most other industrial nations with their value-added taxes, have also discovered how to make their tax systems competitive in world trade. The United States has not.

Unlike the U.S., our major trading partners hold down their income and payroll taxes (which are themselves burdens on production costs) by imposing substantial sales taxes on consumption. Under GATT rules, these sales taxes may be rebated on exports and imposed on imports, whereas income and payroll taxes may not.

This really hits U.S. products and jobs where it hurts. U.S. cars shipped to Japan carry a full load of taxes when they leave our shores, and then Japan adds a sizeable commodity, or consumption-type tax when they get there.

Conversely, when a Japanese car is exported to the United States, Japan doesn't levy the consumption tax—which amounts to 17½ or 22½ percent—and there is no commensurate tax collected in this country. That's worth something like $600 a car to the Japanese. It's all legal under GATT regulations, but U.S. producers and their employees get hurt, and all taxpayers in the U.S. have to pay the bill.

These are the reasons—tax inequities and currency misalignment—that explain why the United States can't compete on equal terms against imports at home or in markets abroad.

I know there are some tax writing experts on the Caucus. It seems to me that short of recasting our entire tax system, the U.S. has to find a way to treat some of our taxes in a manner similar to Europe's and Japan's—that is, to reduce the burden on U.S. exports and to equalize the burden on goods imported into this country. The idea of a reciprocal tax came up in a House Banking Committee hearing on industrial policy—placing a U.S. tax on any imported goods that carry an unfair tax advantage. John Nevin of Firestone has offered another approach: adopt a federal excise tax and allow credit against excise tax liability for other U.S. taxes paid on domestic production.

Well, that's a pretty lengthy list of issues and I know you have other priorities, as we do. We still think, for example, that some of the Clean Air Act changes we supported make sense for the industry and consumers. Also, we understand that the House is waiting for the Senate to act on the issue of product liability reform, which is essential if this country is to provide a measure of certainty for the engineers and managers who make design decisions as to what they can expect to be held accountable for. When these issues get farther along I would like to meet with you again to discuss them.

We've seen examples of what can be done when government, industry and labor come together on critical issues in other countries and in other industries. By working together I am sure we can make progress here as well.

Now let me recap those items that I have mentioned today . . .

Continued Japanese auto restraint at present levels is top priority. This is the quickest, surest way to get U.S. auto workers back on the job and keep them there.

Action on yen and tax are critical if we're to get away from short-term remedies and have a competitive U.S. business environment. Perhaps you would consider establishing a working group to move these issues into the action phase.

We hope you'll help us get the message across about the progress being made in safety and fuel economy; surely we don't wish to revert to the adversarial way of addressing these mutual goals.

Clean Air Act revisions and product liability reform continue as issues of high importance to us and we hope that you will assist us when these items come before you.

One thing is clear: America is in a worldwide competitive race and running behind. It is up to all of us to do our part to put our country back in the running. We in the auto industry are glad to have you on our team.

One final note, we have our all-new Mark VII Outside . . . I hope you'll take the opportunity to take a quick look. It is the most technically advanced luxury car built in America. It literally rides on air.●

● Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues to speak on the problems to the U.S. economy caused by our growing trade deficit. The trade deficit threatens to choke off our economic recovery before it has barely begun to gather momentum. This deficit is seriously effecting a wide variety of American industries—electronics, automobiles, textiles, footwear, and one of the areas with which I am most concerned—steel.

In 1982, my home State of Indiana, due in large part to the output within my district, became the leading steel-producing State in this Nation. At the same time, however, it must be noted that Indiana's steel production is now one-third less than it was 5 years ago. This dramatic decline in production has been felt in almost every aspect of life in my district. Northwest Indiana has seen its reliance on the metal industries result in the loss of one of every six jobs by the end of last year. Many of these layoffs in turn affected service industries which need steel workers' paychecks to survive. In total, approximately 30,000 steelworkers in northwest Indiana and South Chicago have lost their jobs.

There are several individual factors slowing our recovery, but undoubtedly one of the major causes is the unprecedented level of market penetration by imports. Last year nearly 22 percent of the U.S. steel market went to imports, as compared to 2.3 percent in the 1950's, 9.9 percent in the 1960's and 15 percent in the 1970's.

Most of us are aware of the various unfair trade practices used by some of our trading partners. We know of government subsidization in the range of 20 to 40 percent, dumping margins ranging from 20 to 30 percent, coordinated industry targeting, and abuses of exchange rates, just to mention a few inequities. Furthermore, some governments sanction the development of export cartels where exporters may enter into agreements on price, quantity, quality or any matter of common concern.

How have our trade laws become so lax as to permit such transgressions against U.S. producers? Part of the problem is that trade laws that are on the books have not always been promptly and fully enforced. But it also has become clear to many industries that existing U.S. trade laws are in need of improvement. The procedures for filing an unfair trade petition need to be further streamlined and strengthened. The petition process and the granting of relief must be made less complex, less expensive, and less arbitrary.

Under present laws, the preparation of a petition simply costs too much. A successful petition should not have to be a financially burdening endeavor. Many smaller companies, already suffering great losses due to unfairly traded imports, do not have the resources needed for gathering the data now necessary for a successful petition. One constructive measure would be to clarify that the evidentiary burden resides with the party which possesses the information necessary to prove or disprove allegations at issue, and reimburse successful petitioners for their case-related expenses.

In addition to being too costly, current laws are all too frequently administered in an arbitrary or unpredictable manner. Congress and the Commerce Department must work together to make our trade laws clear and identifiable. Whether it is the issue of what is the appropriate timeframe to look at, industry to examine, or whether the effects of a case should be judged singularly or cumulatively, more precise guidelines are needed.

More effective trade laws will not, of course, resolve all the problems now facing American industries, or even the steel industry alone. If the flood of imports continues, however, the steel industry will not be able to recover quickly enough and more plants will close, more Americans will become unemployed. If we cannot now adequately enforce our trade laws, then Congress must take responsibility to enact the laws necessary to remedy this growing problem.

I lend my full support to all actions and proposals which will work to correct the current trade imbalance.●

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed sad that we must conduct a special order in order to draw attention to the trade deficit and its effect on our Nation's economic recovery.

The deficit, which is now estimated to range upward of $100 billion and which undoubtedly has eliminated millions of American jobs, is a continuing shame which also has a long-range effect on our national security. Others here today will, in great detail, explain how the deficit is affecting our steel industry. One of the significant factors in the steel industry downturn has been the continuing demise of our shipbuilding industry, a major consumer of steel and other metals.

Those of us who are concerned about the state of our merchant marine have observed with great alarm the export of tens of thousands of jobs resulting from the availability of low cost ships produced by nontraditional maritime nations. The result has been not only the loss of U.S. shipbuilding jobs and the multiplier effect of that formerly productive activity, but also the outflow of ownership interest in merchant shipping so that more U.S. owners now choose to register vessels under foreign flags than they do under the U.S. flag.

More and more, we have come to realize that the outflow of shipbuilding and other maritime enterprise is not attributable to low productivity in the United States. The rise in importance in other shipbuilding nations is a result of the trade policies of those countries which have provided subsidies and investment benefits of a magnitude which cannot be matched by the United States.

The contribution to the deficit by the demise of this maritime industry, while small in relation to the total, has an effect well beyond the immediate loss of revenues or loss of jobs. Our major concern now, as it has been for the past three decades, is that the merchant marine so essential to our defense for sealift and other auxiliary purposes will be unavailable should an emergency arise. Shipbuilding capability which can only be sustained by commercial ship orders will further deteriorate, leaving the United States in a most vulnerable position should the need arise, as it has in the past, to intensify any buildup of naval and naval support ship construction. I urge that all possible steps be taken to halt the noneconomically motivated outflow of business activity related to the maritime enterprise.●

● Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity today to participate in this special order, so that I might be able to add my support for greater efforts aimed at reducing our trade deficit, particularly the deficit which exists between the United States and Japan. Being from the State of Michigan, I am particularly sensitive to the cries of manufacturers who continue to have difficulty competing against products made in Japan, as well as other countries.

Of particular interest to my district is the machine tool industry. Nearly 23 percent of the national total of machine tool shipments are from Michigan, representing sales of $658 million. Needless to say, the industry is significant to our State. But, the last decade, the machine tool industry has been severely challenged by foreign competition. Domestic producers find that their share of the domestic market has fallen from over 90 percent in 1972 to less than 70 percent today. Because of this market share loss, and because of national security reasons, the National Machine Tool Builders Association has filed a petition with the Department of Commerce, asking that the Secretary of Commerce find, and the President concur, that recent dramatic increases in the foreign share of the United States domestic industry constitute a threat to national security. Machine tools are needed for ships, planes, tanks, missiles, and transport vehicles. Any further decline of the machine tool and metal forming machine tools will compromise our ability to react to security threats and will weaken our deterrent posture.

The future for the machine tool industry is not optimistic. Generally speaking, that industry is the last to recover from a recession, because of the tremendous capital needed to bring about the improvements in the industry. Japan has an enhanced ability to compete in this circumstance; enormous inventories of Japanese products are already warehoused in the United states.

I hope that our Secretary of Commerce is carefully monitoring the sentiment in the Congress. I hope the same is true of our U.S. trade representative. News that the Japanese have not voluntarily extended their automotive quotas would not be well-received by this Congress. I further hope that the Japanese do not underestimate the importance of proving to us that they are willing to help us lower our trade deficit. I can assure them that it would be in their best interests to do so, and I will be carefully monitoring Ambassador Brock's progress later this month.●

● Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman JOHN DINGELL has asked me to serve as a member of a special Subcommittee on U.S. Trade Problems with China.

During the 6 months I have been privileged to serve on the full committee—which has the broadest jurisdiction of any in the Congress—and two of its most important standing subcommittees, I have become increasingly aware of the complexities and the critical nature of U.S. trade policies. These policies are particularly significant with regard to the People's Republic of China, which presents us with the greatest opportunities for development of international commerce, and Japan, which unfortunately accounts for half of the 1983 projected U.S. trade deficit worldwide.

The Subcommittee on China Trade grew out of meetings of a small congressional delegation mission to China at the invitation of the People's Republic earlier this year. Although there was much agreement about the development of trade between the United States and China, most of which at this early stage would be advantageous to our country and its business community, a number of problems were revealed which hamper the full exploitation of trade opportunities.

It is essential that these problems be resolved as promptly as possible in view of the fact that China's ambitious development plan and its more than one billion people establish it as perhaps the most important potential market for U.S. goods, services, and technology in the remaining years of the 20th century.

Among the problems which will receive the immediate attention of the Subcommittee on China Trade are these:

First, resolution of U.S. problems regarding technology transfers in general, the preeminent problem that must be addressed by this administration if the Chinese market is to be fully developed.

Second, diplomatic initiatives to encourage Chinese adoption of a nuclear nonproliferation agreement which will facilitate commerce in areas involving nuclear technology.

Third, assistance from the Departments of State and Commerce in resolving Chinese barriers to trade which discourage U.S. businessmen from commercial involvement in China:

Lack of patent law, although Chinese officials have given assurances that the government is attempting to draft a law acceptable to the United States.

Inability of U.S. businesses to reach the proper decisionmaking levels in the Chinese Government, which control all People's Republic of China trade.

Price discrimination and the limitations imposed by "buy Chinese" provisions in business agreements.

Space limitations for U.S. businesses operating in China.

Fourth, decisions as to the most appropriate representation for U.S. businesses in China, which has a diverse and complex market and government structure. How can businesses best identify and gain timely access to markets, given the overlapping government jurisdictions and the still unresolved complex of controlled versus market economic structures?

Fifth, apparent failure of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to honor its commitments to the Chinese Environmental Protection Leading Group contained in a 1981 agreement. Apparently this is a result of political changes and budget cuts in the EPA.

Clearly, these are complicated questions requiring diligent efforts at resolution. The vastness of the Chinese market, especially for high technology items such as computers and telecommunications equipment and oil and gas production expertise and equipment, certainly make the attempt worthwhile.

Many of the businesses which would benefit immensely from expansion of trade between the United States and China are located in Dallas County and elsewhere in Texas.

Another important element in America's international trade picture—and one to which I have been devoting considerable attention—is that of trade imbalance with Japan.

Over the past several months, I have met with a number of Japanese trade ministers and officials of Nippon Telephone & Telegraph, the Japanese telephone monopoly, which is both a significant competitor and potential market for U.S. telecommunications and computer technology industries.

It is shocking to realize that, worldwide, the United States has a projected 1983 trade deficit of $60 billion, of which Japan will account for as much as $30 billion—an increase of almost 100 percent over 1982.

Trade with the Japanese and with other nations in the international marketplace must be a two-way street. The Japanese cannot expect us to continue providing them with an open market while refusing to reciprocate by purchasing American-made goods, services, and technology. Access to the market and competition free of the government subsidies and trade restrictions which have given Japan an unfair and predatory advantage are essential to continued U.S. preeminence in high technology.

Already we have witnessed the devastating effects of unfair competition from the Japanese in the automobile and steel industries, which has resulted in vast unemployment and plant closings. Lone Star Steel, which has major facilities in Dallas County and elsewhere in Texas, has alone suffered more than 3,000 layoffs. We cannot afford to have and must not allow those trade inequities to spread to the high technology industries in which the United States remains the world leader.

The House Telecommunications Subcommittee, on which I serve, has, as part of an ongoing effort to increase the sale of high technology products in Japan, been monitoring the purchases made by Nippon Telephone and Telegraph (NTT) since that company signed an agreement with the United States in 1981 requiring a system of open procurement.

The agreement was designed to open up the Japanese market to U.S. equipment manufacturers. Since the agreement was signed, Japanese purchases of U.S. communications equipment have increased from $16.5 million in 1980 to $48 million in 1982. But that is a minuscule increase when one considers that NTT has an annual purchasing budget of $3.3 billion.

It is clear to me that NTT and the Japanese Government, which subsidizes NTT's operations and its competition in the international market, have begun to increase opportunities for U.S. companies to sell their products in Japan. But the results have been far below our most reasonable expectations.

Unless the U.S.-NTT Procurement Agreement soon results in dramatic increases in U.S. sales to Japan, we must begin to reevaluate our own open market policy.

The United States currently enjoys a very modest surplus in its export of telecommunications equipment worldwide, although not in the Japanese market. And Japanese equipment manufacturers had sales in excess of $700 million in the United States in 1982.

The most rapid growth in demand for telecommunications equipment in the immediate future will be in Europe and the developing countries. Therefore, rectifying the U.S. trade imbalance with Japan is important not only in terms of sales of American technology in Japan, but because honest and fair competition in their home market will compel the Japanese to compete more fairly and openly in the larger world market.

I recently had the opportunity to question U.S. Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige about America's overseas trade initiatives when he appeared before the Telecommunications Subcommittee. I was surprised and distressed to learn that there exists no national policy or timetable for rectifying imbalances in our trade relationships with other governments, such as that of Japan, which unfairly subsidize businesses in competition with American companies.

We must establish a national policy with regard to the balance of trade. We must make the correction of trade imbalance with Japan our first priority. And we must develop the broadest and most extensive possible markets for American business in China. As a member of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce and the new special subcommittee I will work toward those ends, and I will welcome your counsel and assistance.●

● Mr. NOWAK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleagues for scheduling the colloquy this week to focus our attention on the serious impact of our country's increasing trade deficit, which is severely hampering our attempts for economic recovery.

Just last week, the Commerce Department released figures indicating a $7.19 billion trade deficit for the month of August, pushing the current deficit for 1983, thus far, to $40.8 billion. U.S. exports rose less than 0.19 percent in August while imports increased 3.6 percent. The forecast for the future is grim. The Commerce Department is expecting the trade gap to widen to $65 to $70 billion by year's end, and predicting a possible $100 billion deficit for 1984. Immediate remedial action is crucial to the economic well-being of this Nation.

First and foremost, we must increase the demand for domestic products, thus curbing the importation of foreign counterparts. This involves the strict enforcement of Federal and State buy American laws. The American steel industry recently gained an important victory in this area when the New York Metropolitan Transportation Authority, under pressure from New York State leaders, overturned a previous decision to use Korean steel, as opposed to American steel, for repairs on the Throgs Neck Bridge. The MTA's vote for American steel means $15.7 million in contracts, keeps countless steelworkers on the job and off unemployment lines, as well as avoiding the unnecessary importation of 15,000 tons of foreign steel.

Second, trade remedy legislation must be enacted to help prevent violations of our existing trade laws which only add to the already skyrocketing trade deficit. The Subcommittee on Trade of the House Ways and Means Committee will be introducing legislation shortly which should address foreign industrial targeting, unfair subsidy and dumping practices, streamline procedures to allow smaller companies the benefits of remedies, as well as reducing costs and delays in these procedures. Our Government must insist on existing import quotas, including those on Japanese automobiles presently under discussion by this administration. My colleagues on the Congressional Steel Caucus' executive committee have introduced the Fair Trade in Steel Act of 1983, a measure designed to stem the flow of imports into the domestic steel market. Additionally, domestic content legislation would extend relief to auto parts manufacturers and the rest of the domestic auto industry in proportion to the number of vehicles sold in America.

Trade remedy legislation will allow domestic industries the opportunity to recapture a competitive position in both the American and international markets.

Finally, our industrial competitiveness depends on continuous communication and monitoring of our position in the current economic arena. The President has agreed to reestablish the Tripartite Advisory Council which will oversee the entire steel industry, thus avoiding crisis management and decisionmaking. I have cosponsored H.R. 3681, introduced by my colleagues on the Northeast-Midwest Coalition, which would create a Transitional Industries Trade Board to observe present trade policies and to explore alternatives to increase the competitiveness of American industries. Both of these committees would be composed of Government, labor, and management to provide a well-rounded approach and wide range of expertise. A comprehensive industrial trade policy is the seed leading to increased exports and decreased trade deficits.

Our domestic industries desperately need help and guidance from our Federal Government if they are to remain viable competitors internationally and if our country is to overcome our dramatic and severe trade deficit.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD on the subject matter of this special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PATMAN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

IMMIGRATION REFORM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. McCOLLUM) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, I was appalled today to hear confirmation of the fact that the House Democratic leadership has decided not to allow the Simpson-Mazzoli Immigration Reform and Control Act to come to the floor for a vote this year which I take to mean in this Congress.

It has been well documented and we are all fully aware that the United States has lost control of its borders. Responsible estimates as to the count of illegal immigrants in this country at the present time range higher than 12 million. The most recent statistics from the immigration and naturalization service indicate an alarming and sizable increase in illegal border crossings just this year alone. There can be no doubt that the quality of life in America is gravely threatened by the failure of this Congress to act to restore control over our borders and produce immigration laws that once again work to allow reasonable numbers of immigrants to enter our country each year who can be absorbed and assimilated into our society.

The Senate has twice voted overwhelmingly for the Simpson-Mazzoli Immigration Act. The House Judiciary Committee reported it out 4 months ago. Virtually every editorial writer of every major newspaper in this country has urged its passage.

Despite major controversies over various aspects of this much-needed legislation, it has until this week maintained a strong, bipartisan support above the muddy waters of politics. Now it appears the House Democratic leadership has impaled it on the cross of partisan politics in a blatant effort in a Presidential election season to win support of some Hispanic leaders who have reacted to the key employer sanction provisions with blind emotion and unfounded fear of discrimination. Your unsubstantiated charges that President Reagan would veto this bill which he has repeatedly endorsed be patently observed. President Reagan released a press statement on this very point today. It read:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
October 4, 1983.

STATEMENT BY THE PRINCIPAL DEPUTY PRESS SECRETARY

The President was naturally disappointed today to hear press reports quoting Speaker O'Neill as saying that immigration reform legislation would not be considered by the House this year. The President hopes that the Speaker will reconsider and allow the House to vote on a bill that is essential to the future well-being of this Nation.

As we understand it, the Speaker commented that there was no discernible constituency for the bill, and that there had been mixed signals from the White House. We respectfully disagree with the Speaker on those points.

The Senate has twice passed immigration legislation—by overwhelming bipartisan margins. And in the Congress immigration legislation has also been considered and approved by four committees in the House, including the Committee on the Judiciary.

Administration officials have testified on the reform measures a total of 28 times.

This is not a political issue. It is not a partisan issue. It is an issue that concerns all Americans—and it is in the best interests of all Americans to have the nation regain control of its borders.

One final point remains to be made. The President sent the original immigration reform legislation to the Congress more than two years ago. He supported it then. He supports it today.

Mr. Speaker, your refusal to allow full House consideration of this measure makes a mockery of our system and reflects adversely on every Member of the House.

We have known all along that some Hispanic leaders and organizations object to employer sanctions, the critical enforcement feature at the heart of this bill. Their objection and tactics on the floor of the House kept the 97th Congress from passing this bill. To be opposed is their privilege, even in the face of polls showing 60 percent of the Nation's Hispanics favor the legislation. But, for this House not to even consider the bill is the height of irresponsibility and displays a complete disregard to addressing an urgent national problem.

Outside of the economy and the national defense, there is no matter of more importance to the future of our Nation that immigration reform and gaining control or our borders. The very quality of life which our forefathers worked so long and hard to give Americans as the greatest free nation in the history of the world will not be there for our children and grandchildren if we do not stem the flow of illegal immigration into our country not only will jobs for American citizens be lost in ever increasing numbers to illegal aliens, but the very fabric of our society—the melting pot—whereby people of all races and ethnic backgrounds have blended together their diverse cultural heritages to form one people of enduring strength dedicated to individual liberty and freedom—will be lost.

Mr. Speaker, for the sake of our country, and the future prosperity and happiness of generations of Americans to come, I implore you to reverse your decision and allow the House to consider the Simpson-Mazzoli Immigration Reform Control Act.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION'S ACCESS-CHARGE PLAN FOR LOCAL TELEPHONE OPERATIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Nebraska (Mrs. SMITH) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, thank you for providing this opportunity for me to express on behalf of my constituents deep concern about the effects of the Federal Communications Commission's access-charge plan upon local telephone rates, particularly in high-cost rural areas.

In my opinion, the Commission's access charge plan—with its rigid cost-based pricing—is in direct conflict with the goal of continuing to provide universal telephone service.

I am trying to persuade all my colleagues in the House that the effective date of the Commission's ruling ought to be postponed for at least 1 year, that is, until January 1, 1985. On July 26, 1983, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution No. 150 which calls for a 1-year delay in implementing the access charge plan. I invite Members to sign on to this resolution. A committee in the other body has already voted to delay the FCC access charge plan for 2 years.

A delay would give the Congress and the industry more time in which to study the still-murky consequences of the AT&T divestiture without the complications of dealing simultaneously with the ramifications of the Commission's access-charge plan. A year's delay will also give Congress a chance to study the tariffs filed by telephone companies yesterday, October 3, to better understand the consequences of the FCC access charge plan on universal service.

I say that we must have more time to make sure that we adopt as national policy, effective, wise legislation, and regulations that provide a regulatory framework and a rate structure that insures basic telephone service at reasonable rates and provides sufficient flexibility to deal with the bypass problem where it exists.

We need more time to consider whether the Commission's plan should be rejected outright and, instead, be replaced with a framework that reflects these principles, or whether we should modify the access-charge plan to insure universal service to high-cost areas, particularly rural areas, and to provide State public service commissions with the jurisdiction to adjust rate designs and depreciation methodologies that best serve the telephone customers in their States.

Mr. Speaker, the Census Bureau reports that by its definitions, some 80 million Americans live in rural areas. Now, not all of them will be hit by this access plan, but a huge majority are going to experience telephone bills that local managers in my district estimate will eventually double, triple, or even quadruple.

My constituent mail on this issue is beginning to accelerate. So far this year, I have received 662 pieces of mail expressing concern about future telephone service and increased telephone bills. Of course, a substantial amount of this mail was generated by local telephone companies. I understand full well that the FCC gave what under ordinary circumstances would have seemed more than adequate time for comment on its access-charge plan, but this is no ordinary issue.

In my State lots of rural telephone customers pay around $10 a month for service. The Rural Electrification Administration has estimated the monthly telephone bills for the customers of all its telephone borrowers as a result of the access charges. In their study, the REA used actual revenue information from 1981, imposed the FCC interstate access charges, and adjusted the revenues of its borrowers accordingly. This method provided estimates of what the monthly bills of local telephone customers would have been in 1981 if the system of FCC interstate access charges had been in effect then. The REA study showed that telephone bills in Nebraska would have ranged from $13.39 a month to $36.87 a month in 1981 if the access charge plan had been in effect. I will enter the whole chart for all the States showing these estimates under the access charge plan into the RECORD.

While urban leaders may find this difficult to believe, such an increase will result in many fixed income and low-income people in my district taking out their telephones and doing without. This will produce the widely discussed spiral effect—local telephone companies will try to offset the resulting loss of revenue by further raising their rates to cover their costs.

The Commission's access-charge plan will shift all of the fixed costs of providing and maintaining the local exchange and access lines previously borne by long-distance carriers to the local business and residential telephone subscribers.

The plan mandates that flat monthly fees be added telephone bills. The fee will increase until it covers all those costs previously paid for by the long-distance companies. This flat monthly fee is in addition to charges for making local and long-distance calls, and similar access charges required by the State agencies to cover the remaining fixed costs.

This would be a painful transition, indeed. By one calculation, the FCC itself estimates that interstate access charges will replace $10.7 billion in long-distance subsidies, some $5 billion of which will be tacked onto bills for local service over the next 6 years. The remainder will be borne by long-distance carriers as a cost of hooking into local phone networks. Intrastate access fees will impose additional billions in local charges.

The Commission justifies its access charge plan with its strict adherence to cost-based pricing as necessary to address the problem of bypass and provide competition in the telecommunications industry. Businesses which make a lot of long-distance interstate calls are switching from the telephone exchange to other systems such as MCI and Sprint for long-distance service. MCI and Sprint are able to provide long-distance service at a cheaper rate because their rates do not include costs of maintaining the local exchange facility. The FCC also maintains that the decrease in long-distance rates will offset the increase in local telephone rates—that this is just a rate restructure, not a rate increase—a position that I say is untenable.

Rural telephone customers will be especially hard hit by the Commission's plan—the access charges will be the highest out in the country but rural people won't share significantly in the benefits of lower long-distance rates.

This is true simply because the economies of rural service do not match those of densely populated areas. Similarly, small cities and rural areas probably would not benefit fully from competition in the long-distance business. They even may experience rate hikes on toll calls, contrary to national predictions of lowered rates as the toll subsidy of local monopolies is ended.

This is because toll prices depend on volume, and the largest declines in rates are likely to occur along heavily used routes between major cities. Indeed, perhaps 80 percent of all toll calls travel between 18 major cities.

As the representative of the Michigan Public Service Commission has testified before the Government Operations Subcommittee on Government Information, Justice, and Agriculture, the Commission's access-charge framework was not necessary to solve the bypass problem. Most small telephone companies serve sparsely populated rural areas that will never be threatened by residential or commercial bypass of the existing system. For the more than 1,400 rural telephone companies in our country, the problem of bypass, and hence the need for the Commission's shift of revenue from carrier to end user is just not necessary.

As for the impact upon my State, Nebraska, I submit for the RECORD a letter to me from Commissioner Eric Rasmussen of the Nebraska Public Service Commission. Commissioner Rasmussen demolishes once and for all the Federal Communications Commission's argument that its plan is merely a restructuring and not a rate increase. The basic reason is simply that reductions in interstate toll rates are extremely unlikely to be available because rural areas do not use long-distance telephones that much—certainly not in sufficient volume to offset the almost inevitable upward leaps of the cost of local service.

In closing, I wish to restate my position that we must not abandon the concept of providing a truly universal telephone service linking almost every household and business in this country. I say that the Federal Communications Commission's access plan with its rigid cost-based prices is in direct conflict with the goal of universal service.

I hold that we must at least defer the implementation of this ruling for 1 year to give Congress a more reasonable time to consider comprehensive legislation to address the consequences of the divestiture of AT&T.

At this point I include the following:

How rural telephone rates would be affected if the FCC access charge plan had been in effect in 1981.

The first column shows telephone company revenue requests granted by state utility boards or pending before those boards since January 1, 1983. The second column lists current basic residential rate in each state's largest city. The third column shows what rural telephone rates would have been in 1981 if the FCC access-charge plan had been in effect. This final column is based on actual 1981 telephone company revenues.

NEBRASKA PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION,
Lincoln, Nebr., April 19, 1983.

Congresswoman VIRGINIA SMITH,
Third District,
Rayburn House Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN SMITH: As you are aware numerous and major changes are taking place in the telecommunications industry. I am extremely concerned about the effects of these changes on the provision of telephone service in the State of Nebraska. Today I feel the goal of the 1934 Communications Act, to make telephone service available to all the people of the United States at reasonable charges, has been met by the industry through regulation. However, I am concerned that many of the recent regulatory decisions made at the federal level may have serious adverse effects on the current universality of telephone service.

During the past year, the FCC has issued several orders which will result in dramatic increases in the cost of basic telephone service. On December 22, 1982, the FCC adopted its third report and order regarding access charges (CC Docket No. 78-72, Phase I), which mandates an average $4 flat fee per local line per month for access to the interstate network. This order will become effective January 1, 1984 and contains provisions to escalate this flat fee over a period of five years to a level which may recover up to $7 per month per customer for access to the interstate network. In light of the FCC's decisions on interstate access charges, it is apparent that this Commission will be forced to consider implementation of intrastate access charges to replace revenues lost with the end of the toll separations and settlements process. Small telephone companies typically derive over half of their overall revenue from these toll separations, thus, when this process ends, at the end of 1983, this revenue will be recovered in ways which will increase the cost of basic telephone service. Therefore, all basic service customers will see the addition of an average of $8 in intrastate and interstate access charges to their bill they must pay merely to have local, basic telephone service. These charges will be assessed even if the customer makes no toll calls in a given month.

The FCC also issued an order in CC Docket No. 79-105, on December 22, 1982, which in effect adopted revised depreciation methodologies on intrastate and local plant of telephone companies and purported to preempt the state regulatory jurisdiction in this area. In other words, the FCC has taken the position that it can force states to adopt FCC-approved depreciation rates and methodologies for exchange and intrastate plant. It has been estimated that the recovery of depreciation reserve deficiencies over the expected remaining life of the embedded plant and the adoption of equal life group depreciation on new plant will cost the average local ratepayer $2 per month.

I recognize that each change taking place in the communications industry, when taken by itself, is designed to serve some useful purpose. However, in an attempt to resolve individual problems, the national policy making entities have failed to view the effects of their decisions in a larger perspective. The effect of the AT&T divestiture including the end of toll separations and settlements scheduled for the end of 1983, the FCC's preemption of state authority on depreciation and accounting matters, and the FCC's prescription of interstate access charges will be to increase substantially the rate which local subscribers must pay for basic telephone service.

The problems which these decisions, particularly the FCC's decision on access charges, pose for telephone users in Nebraska is complicated by the many independent telephone companies present within the state. I am especially concerned about the effects these changes will have on the local service rates charged by these small telephone companies in Nebraska. To emphasize the magnitude of the access charge problem, I again point out small telephone companies currently receive over half of their revenues from the toll separations and settlements process in effect today which will be discontinued at the end of 1983. These companies will be forced to recover this revenue from the local ratepayers through the FCC's prescription of interstate access charges plus a charge for intrastate access. Estimates show that the costs for intrastate access, while varying substantially between companies, will average no less than the costs of interstate access. Therefore $4 must be added to the customer's bill if the Commission decides that an intrastate access charge is appropriate, resulting in an immediate increase averaging at least $8 per month. Given prevailing local exchange rates in Nebraska, this means that the fixed portion of the telephone bill for the average Nebraska subscriber will increase at least 75 percent, and in some locations over 20 percent, in 1984. If 50 percent or more of local costs are currently recovered from toll settlements, the $8 access charge will not be adequate in most cases to make up the lost revenue resulting in additional local rate increases.

It is difficult enough for me to explain to telephone subscribers in Nebraska the need for any increase in telephone rates. However, when subscribers are faced with increases of this magnitude, which are required largely by federal policy, I find the explanation virtually impossible. These drastic increases will significantly reduce the number of subscribers to telephone service, thereby increasing the share of fixed costs which must be borne by the remaining users resulting in further rate increases.

The FCC stated that: "The implementation of access charges is not a rate increase, it is a rate restructure. Increases in access charges will be matched dollar for dollar by reductions in per message interstate toll charges." I believe that this statement by the FCC exemplifies the inadequate consideration given to the effects of their decision on rural telephone subscribers. To tell these users that their rates have not been increased, but merely "restructured", when those subscribers must pay an additional $8 per month for obtaining basic telephone service, makes little sense. Currently the combined interstate and intrastate access are in the $9 to $11 range per residential customer and these costs will increase in the future resulting in further substantial rate increases.

I am not aware of a plan to require either AT&T or any other interexchange carriers to reduce rates such that there is no net increase in revenues to the interexchange carrier. Unless interstate toll rate reductions are ordered, there is simply no truth to the FCC's statement that the implementation of access charges is not a rate increase. In fact, even if reduced interexchange rates do come about, they cannot be expected to help the rural telephone subscriber. It is difficult to determine the break even point without knowing what reductions, if any, in toll rates might occur, however, two important facts are nearly indisputable. First, most rural telephone subscribers cannot be expected to regularly reach the break even point. Even at the lowest possible average interstate access charge of $4 per month, assuming a 20 percent decrease in interstate toll rates, the local subscriber would need to make $20 worth of interstate toll calls per month in order to break even under the FCC's access plan. This is an interstate toll usage level higher than that reached by most residential telephone subscribers.

Any reductions in interstate toll rates that may take place are not likely to be over routes used frequently by telephone subscribers in Nebraska. Reductions by interexchange carriers can be expected over routes which are most competitive, and not over routes used by subscribers in less populated areas. Obviously the FCC's prescription of access charges will result in higher charges for toll service in rural areas such as Nebraska, while more densely populated areas of the country served by numerous interexchange carriers will have lower toll rates.

The FCC's actions have been prompted by the perceived problem of "bypass", however, the solution will not aid Nebraska in this regard. In Nebraska, usage will be low and the cost of providing access high, driving the access charge up. This situation would seem to further push the user toward bypass of the local network due to the ever increasing access charges.

"Bypass" is a problem largely non-existent in Nebraska today, however, fear of this problem prompted the FCC to formulate a system of access charges which will benefit primarily two consumer groups. Obviously, large users of interstate toll services on competitive routes will benefit because decreased toll rates will likely offset the access charges which these subscribers must pay. The other real winners in this game are the interexchange carriers who will benefit because billions of dollars currently paid out through the separations process will simply be retained by them. The real loser under this system is the telephone customer in a low density rural area, like Nebraska, who will be faced with ever increasing costs for access to a network which provides essentially the same service he receives today.

I applaud the attempts of Congress to focus attention on the serious problem of maintaining universal service through the Oversight Hearing on Universal Telephone Service Costs held by the Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection, and Finance, of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce. The nation needs to have someone at the federal level to address the problems and to find solutions. Congress is the appropriate body to pull together the pieces and evaluate the national economic impact on consumers.

The need for federal action to preserve universal service is parmount. I can see severe and potentially irreparable problems facing us in the immediate future. Ratepayers in every state in the country will be affected. We need a safety net for this highly turbulent transition period facing us in the next five years, and I feel Congress must help in designing one.

Regulators need to know what the exact effects of the FCC decisions and the AT&T divestiture will be. We need to know now that Congress is committed to the concept of universal service and is willing to act to preserve it.

In conclusion, the FCC, Congress, state legislators and state regulators need to keep in mind that the primary reason we have a regulated telecommunications system today is due to the fact the marketplace failed to originally serve the needs of the public. We must not destroy universal service simply because of our concern for economic efficiency without considering the adverse impacts on residential and small business users. There is still time for legislators to define "universal service" thereby setting national policy through congressional action. The welfare of the "public" must be considered in fine tuning the access charge plan and jurisdictional separations process to salvage "universal service."

Sincerely,

ERIC RASMUSSEN,
Commissioner, Fourth District.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. NELSON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, due to official business on Thursday, September 29, and Friday, September 30, I missed three votes.

On Thursday, September 29, if I had been present, I would have voted "no" on rollcall No. 368, a substitute for the amendment which would retain the Commerce Department law enforcement authority contained in the bill, but requiring a warrant and I would have also voted "no" on rollcall No. 369, which would strike provisions allowing for the Commerce Department law enforcement authority.

On Friday, September 30, if I had been present, I would have voted "yes" on rollcall No. 371, which was the rule to consider the Justice Department authorization.●

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois (at the request of Mr. MICHEL) for today, on account of personal matters.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. DREIER of California) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. HILLIS, for 60 minutes, today.

Mr. BETHUNE, for 60 minutes, today.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska, for 15 minutes, today.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. PAUL, for 15 minutes, on October 5.

Mr. LEACH of Iowa, for 30 minutes, today.

Mr. MCCOLLUM, for 60 minutes, today.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska, for 5 minutes, today.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S. 884. An act to provide for the use and distribution of funds awarded the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians in docket No. 15–72 of the U.S. Court of Claims;

S. 1148. An act to provide for the use and distribution of funds awarded the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Belknap Indians Community, Montana, and the Assiniboine Tribe of the Fort Peck Indian Community, Montana, in docket No. 10–81L by the U.S. Court of Claims, and for other purposes;

S. 1465. An act to designate the Federal Building at Fourth and Ferry Streets, Lafayette, Ind., as the "Charles A. Halleck Federal Building";

S. 1724. An act to designate the Federal Building in Las Cruces, N. Mex., as the "Harold L. Runnels Federal Building"; and

S.J. Res. 159. Joint resolution providing statutory authorization under war powers resolution for continued U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE (INADVERTENTLY OMITTED FROM THE RECORD OF OCTOBER 3, 1983)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to clause 4 of rule I, the Speaker pro tempore signed the following enrolled bills on Friday, September 30, 1983:

H.J. Res. 137. Joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to issue a proclamation designating the period from October 2, 1983, through October 8, as "National Schoolbus Safety Week of 1983";

H.J. Res. 368. Joint resolution making continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1984, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 3962. An act to extend the authorities under the Export Administration Act of 1979 until October 14, 1983.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 34 minutes p.m.), the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, October 5, 1983, at 10 a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1945. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a request for supplemental appropriations for the Veterans' Administration for fiscal year 1984, pursuant to 31 U.S.C. 1107 (H. Doc. No. 98-115); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

1946. A letter from the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Army (Installations, Logistics and Financial Management), transmitting notice of the Army's proposed decision to convert to contractor performance the commissary store operation at Yuma Proving Ground, Ariz., pursuant to section 502(b) of Public Law 96-342; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1947. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Shipbuilding and Logistics), transmitting notice of the Navy's decision to convert to contractor performance the administrative telephone service function at the Public Works Center, Norfolk, Va., pursuant to section 502(b) of the Public Law 96-342; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1948. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a report on the 1982 Youth Conservation Corps program, pursuant to section 5 of Public Law 92-597; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

1949. A letter from the Deputy Administrator, General Services Administration, transmitting notice of a proposed new system of records, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552a(o); to the Committee on Government Operations.

1950. A letter from the Deputy Administrator, General Services Administration, a draft of proposed legislation to amend section 207(c)(1) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, to change the criteria therein so that the provisions of section 207 shall not apply to disposals of surplus real property having an estimated fair market value less than $1,000,000; to the Committee on Government Operations.

1951. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Land and Water Resources, transmitting copy of an application by Douglas County, Oreg., for a loan and grant under the Small Reclamation Projects Act, pursuant to section 4(c) of that act, as amended; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

1952. A letter from the Deputy Associate Director for Royalty Management Operations, Minerals Management Service, Department of the Interior, transmitting notice of the proposed refund of excess royalty payments totaling $4,048,999.54 to Kerr-McGee Corp., Shell Oil Co., Pogo Producing Co., Cities Service Co., and ODECO Oil & Gas Co., pursuant to section 10(b) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act of 1953; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

1953. A letter from the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Territorial and International Affairs, transmitting reports by the Department of the Interior, Health and Human Services, Education, Housing and Urban Development, and Justice on the impact on the Virgin Islands of adjusting the status of certain nonimmigrants, pursuant to section 4 of Public Law 97-271; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1954. A letter from the Chairman, U.S. International Trade Commission, transmitting a report on trade between the United States and the nonmarket economy countries during April-June 1983, pursuant to section 410 of Public Law 93-618; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1955. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on weapons systems overview: a summary of recent GAO reports, observations, and recommendations on major weapon systems (GAO/NSIAD-83-7; September 30, 1983); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations and Armed Services.

1956. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a status report on the conversion to automated mail processing and nine-digit ZIP code (GAO/GGD-83-84; September 28, 1983); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations and Post Office and Civil Service.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. BEILENSON: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 329. Resolution providing for the consideration of H.R. 2968, a bill to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1984 for intelligence and intelligence-related activities of the U.S. Government, for the intelligence community staff, for the Central Intelligence Agency retirement and disability system, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 98-400). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MOAKLEY: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 330. Resolution providing for the consideration of H.R. 3324, a bill to authorize appropriations for grants to the Close Up Foundation and for certain law-related education programs (Rept. No. 98-401). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MOAKLEY: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 331. Resolution waiving certain points of order against consideration of H.R. 3958, a bill making appropriations for water resource development for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 98-402). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FROST: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 332. Resolution waiving certain points of order against consideration of H.R. 3959, a bill making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 98-403). Referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 5 of rule X and clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BONKER:

H.R. 4068. A bill to extend the authorities under the Export Administration Act of 1979 until October 28, 1983; considered and passed.

By Mr. BEDELL:

H.R. 4069. A bill to provide for an improved program for feed grains; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. COELHO:

H.R. 4070. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to require that income tax returns include space designated for the taxpayer to specify the amount of any cash contribution such taxpayer wishes to make to the Federal Government for reduction of the public debt and to establish a trust fund with amounts contributed by taxpayers for reduction of the public debt; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DELLUMS (by request):

H.R. 4071. A bill to clarify the use of resolutions by the Council of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FOLEY (for himself, Mr. MARLENEE, Mr. BEDELL, Mr. GLICKMAN, and Mr. LOWRY of Washington):

H.R. 4072. A bill to provide for an improved program for wheat; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HOPKINS:

H.R. 4073. A bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HUGHES:

H.R. 4074. A bill relating to the tariff treatment of tourist literature regarding Canada; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MATSUI:

H.R. 4075. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to exempt from taxation corporations which acquire and manage real property for certain other exempt organizations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. REID:

H.R. 4076. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, with respect to the provision of medical benefits and post and base exchange and commissary store privileges to certain former spouses of certain members or former members of the Armed Forces; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. WAXMAN:

H.R. 4077. A bill to amend part B of title XVIII of the Social Security Act with respect to information on physician assignment practices under the medicare program; jointly, to the Committees on Ways and Means and Energy and Commerce.

By Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii (for himself, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. JENKINS, Mr. CONABLE, Mr. RANGEL, Mr. DUNCAN, Mr. VANDER JAGT, Mr. MATSUI, Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. HANCE, Mrs. KENNELLY, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. FLIPPO, Mr. FUQUA, Mr. LUJAN, Mr. FISH, Mr. FAZIO, Mr. GLICKMAN, Mrs. SCHNEIDER, and Mr. DIXON):

H.R. 4078. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to extend the period for qualifying certain property for the energy tax credit, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BOLAND (for himself, Mr. CONTE, and Mr. MINETA):

H.J. Res. 381. Joint resolution to provide for appointment of Samuel Curtis Johnson as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. KEMP (for himself, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. MICHEL, Mr. FOLEY, Mr. BROOMFIELD, and Mr. BARNES):

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 2867

By Mr. SKELTON:

NEW AND INNOVATIVE TREATMENT TECHNOLOGIES

SEC. . (a) RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, AND DEMONSTRATION PERMITS.—Section 3005 is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(h) RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, AND DEMONSTRATION PERMITS.—(1) The Administrator may issue a research, development, and demonstration permit for any hazardous waste treatment facility which proposed to utilize an innovative and experimental hazardous waste treatment technology or process for which permit standards for such experimental activity have not been promulgated under this subtitle. Any such permit shall include such terms and conditions as will assure protection of human health and the environment. Such permits—

"(A) shall provide for the construction of such facilities, as necessary, and for operation of the facility for not longer than 180 days, and

"(B) shall provide for the receipt and treatment by the facility of only those types and quantities of hazardous waste which the Administrator deems necessary for purposes of determining the efficacy and performance capabilities of the technology or process and the effects of such technology or process on human health and the environment, and

"(C) shall include such requirements as the Administrator deems necessary to protect human health and the environment (including, but not limited to, requirements regarding monitoring, operation, insurance or bonding, closure, and remedial action), and such requirements as the Administrator deems necessary regarding testing and providing of information to the Administrator with respect to the operation of the facility.

The Administrator may apply the criteria set forth in this paragraph in establishing the conditions of each permit without separate establishment of regulations implementing such criteria.

"(2) For the purpose of expediting review and issuance of permits under this subsection, the Administrator may modify or waive permit application and permit issuance requirements established in regulations under other provisions of this section, except that there may be no modification or waiver of procedures established under section 7004(b)(2) regarding public participation.

"(3) Based upon review of data obtained from the operation of a treatment facility for which a permit was issued under this subsection (and based on such other information as may be available to the Administrator), the Administrator may—

"(A) extend such permit for one additional 180-day period, or

"(B) after notice and opportunity for a public hearing, extend the permit for an additional period of time as he may determine is necessary to complete the research, development, or demonstration.

In granting such extensions, the Administrator shall base his decisions on a showing by the applicant that additional operating time is required to determine the efficacy and performance characteristics of the innovative and experimental technology or process. In the case of an extension referred to in subparagraph (B), the decision of the Administrator shall take into consideration public comments submitted to the Administrator.

"(4) The Administrator may order an immediate termination of all operations at the facility at any time he determines that termination is necessary to protect human health and the environment.".

COMMUNITY RELOCATION

SEC. . (a) The second sentence of paragraph (23) of section 101 of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-510) is amended by inserting after "not otherwise provided for", the phrase "costs of permanent relocation of residents where it is determined that such permanent relocation is cost effective or may be necessary to protect health or welfare," and by striking out the semicolon at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a period and the following: "In the case of a business located in an area of evacuation or relocation, the term may also include the payment of those installments of principal and interest on business debt which accrue between the date of evacuation or temporary relocation and thirty days following the date that permanent relocation is actually accomplished or, if permanent relocation is formally rejected as the appropriate response, the date on which evacuation or temporary relocation ceases. In the the case of an individual unemployed as a result of such evacuation or relocation, it may also include the provisions of the assistance authorized by sections 407, 408, and 409 of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974;".

(b) Section 104(c)(1) of the Comprehensiver Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-510) is amended by inserting before "authorized by section (b) of this section," the phrase "for permanent relocation or".

TITLE III

AGRICULTURAL EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE

SEC. 301. Section 329 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1970) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Eligibility of an applicant for assistance under this subtitle based upon production losses shall be determined solely on the basis of the factors designated in this section and shall not be affected by the Secretary's failure to designate a county or counties for emergency loan purposes, except that the applicant must establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary that such losses were sustained as a result of such disaster. The determinations of the Secretary under this section shall be final unless found by a court of competent jurisdiction, on the basis of the administrative record, to have been arbitrary, capricious, or otherwise not in accordance with law or regulations issued in accordance with law.".

SEC. 302. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Agriculture shall, within thirty days of receipt by a county office of the Farmers Home Administration of an application for a loan under subtitle C of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1961 et seq.), advise the applicant for such loan, in writing, of approval of disapproval of the application. Failure to advise an applicant, in writing, of approval or disapproval of the application within this time period shall constitute approval of the application.

SEC. 303. (a) Any finding made by the Secretary of Agriculture under section 321(a) of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1961(a)), during the period beginning on July 1, 1983, and ending on September 30, 1984, that a natural disaster exists with respect to farming and ranching operations in an area shall be deemed to be a determination made by the Secretary that an emergency exists in such area for purposes of—

(1) section 813 of the Agricultural Act of 1970 (7 U.S.C. 1427a), and

(2) section 1105 of the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2267).

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture shall exercise his authority—

(1) under—

(A) section 913 of the Agricultural Act of 1970 (7 U.S.C. 1427a), without regard to any limitation specified in subsection (c) or (d) of such section, to sell grain at a price not less than 75 per centum of the current basic county loan rate for such grain in effect under the Agricultural Act of 1949 (or a comparable price if there is no such current basic county loan rate), or

(B) section 1105 of the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2267) to provide assistance, or

(2) in accordance with both subparagraph (A) and subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) to sell grain and provide assistance, to eligible farmers and ranchers for the preservation and maintenance of foundation herds of livestock and poultry (including their offspring) until September 30, 1984, or such earlier date that the Secretary determines such emergency no longer exists.

(c) For the purposes of this section, the term "eligible farmers and ranchers" means farmers and ranchers who are eligible to receive loans under section 321 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1961).

By Mr. BARTLETT:

—Page 8, after line 5, insert the following new section:

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION SERVICES

SEC. 202. For the purposes of section 100(b)(1) of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, $1,037,800,000 is appropriated for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984.

By Mr. BEVILL:

(Substitute amendment.)

—at the appropriate place, insert the following:

CLINCH RIVER BREEDER REACTOR

For construction and operation of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor project authorized by Public Law 91-273 as amended, $1,500,000,000, to be available until expended but contingent upon commitments, satisfactory to the Secretary of Energy, for utility and private sector financial participation for a minimum of 40 per centum of the Department of Energy estimate of remaining capital costs as reported to Congress on March 15, 1983. In addition to the amounts herein appropriated and in consideration for such financial participation, the Secretary is authorized to contract to (1) provide to participants ownership interests in the project, products, services and/or revenues from the project, (2) repay funds invested by the participants subsequent to the passage of this Act, plus interest, if the project is not completed, not licensed for operation, or terminated at any time, (3) insure revenues from the project for the repayment of debt, and (4) indemnify participants and the operator against uninsured liabilities with respect to the project. Such contracts may be assigned and shall be enforceable against the United States in accordance with their terms except in the case of fraud by the assignee. Participation in the project shall not subject a participant to regulation under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935. All monies received by the Secretary under this heading may be retained and obligated for the purposes of the project and shall remain available until expended. Of the $1,500,000,000 appropriated by this heading, up to $270,000,000 may be obligated during fiscal year 1984, of which $135,000,000 may be obligated notwithstanding any other provision of this heading; and up to the following amounts may be obligated during the following fiscal years: $285,000,000 during 1985; $290,000,000 during 1986; $290,000,000 during 1987; $185,000,000 during 1988; $75,000,000 during 1989; $105,000,000 during 1990 and beyond: Provided, That at least $90 million of the total funds available shall be used for negotiating or otherwise letting contracts or subcontracts to minority business enterprises.

By Mr. CONTE:

—On page 8, after line 5, insert the following new section.

Funds appropriated in the Department of Education Appropriations Act, 1983 (Public Law 97-377) for "Special Programs" shall remain available until September 30, 1984: Provided, That of the amount appropriated in said Act, $28,765,000 shall be available only to carry out the programs and projects selected by the Secretary of Education, in accordance with the Secretary's priorities and procedures, including the National Diffusion Network, and Law Related Education, authorized under subchapter D of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act; $24,000,000 shall be available only for grants to state education agencies and desegregation assistance centers authorized under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; $19,440,000 shall be available only to carry out the activities authorized under the Follow Through Act; $5,760,000 shall be available only to carry out the activities authorized under Title IX, Part C of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act; $1,920,000 shall be available only to carry out the activities authorized under section 1524 of the Education Amendments of 1978; and $960,000 shall be available only to carry out the activities authorized under section 1525 of the Education Amendments of 1978: Provided further, That the Department of Education is directed to obligate these funds immediately for the purposes specified herein.

By Mr. COUGHLIN:

—Page 5, after line 5, insert the following new paragraph:

"No part of the funds appropriated under this Act may be obligated or expended for the continuation of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor Project or, except to the extent specifically authorized in legislation hereafter enacted, for the implementation of an alternative financing arrangement with respect to such Project.".

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

WILLY BRANDT TESTIFIES ON INF

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, on September 29, 1983, former West German Chancellor Willy Brandt testified before a special forum I chaired on the INF negotiations in Geneva and the proposed U.S. deployment of Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles in Europe.

This forum was one of a series of congressional meetings being held on the Euromissile question. On September 22, 1983, a distinguished group of European parliamentarians, who are deeply concerned about the planned deployment, also testified at a public forum.

Chancellor Brandt is one of the preeminent statesmen of Europe. He was mayor of West Berlin from 1957 to 1966 and was Chancellor from 1969 to 1974. And in 1971, Chancellor Brandt was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for his tireless efforts on behalf of East-West détente.

I commend Chancellor Brandt's testimony to my colleagues. He has had many years of experience in dealing with the Soviets. His testimony reveals that the proposed Pershing II and ground-launched, cruise missile deployment will bring Europe and the rest of the world less, not more, security.

The testimony follows:

WILLIE BRANDT TESTIFIES ON INF

The negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union are of crucial importance to us. In Europe, East and West confront each other at arms length—they are not separated by mountains, deserts or oceans, there is just a fence of ugly walls and barbed wire.

And it is such a tiny area, although densely populated; one tends to forget that my own country is just the size of Oregon but has almost 60 million inhabitants. And on both sides of the demarcation line one finds a higher concentration of nuclear warheads than anywhere else on this globe. Nobody in Europe wants a new arms race and this certainly is not a Party issue.

But on behalf of my political friends perhaps I state with more emphasis than others that we do not want the existing situation to become more tense, we do not want that one simply capitulates in the face of the driving forces of the arms race. It must be possible, we believe, that political leaders gain control of this course of events.

And I sincerely hope they will succeed by the end of this year. If they do not manage to do so they should continue to negotiate rather than to enter into an operation which certainly will be followed by another round of Eastern deployment. One does not have to deploy new missiles simply because deadlines and schedules had been fixed four years ago—under assumptions which at least partially turned out to be dubious.

I believe that political rationality must not fall victim to fixed schedules. And obviously it would be rational to postpone deployment if it turned out that there has just not been enough time for serious negotiations. But I am the first to admit that political will is even more important than the time-table.

It is true to say that an agreement in Geneva to a certain degree is being blocked by the existence of British and French nuclear weapons—which of course belong to the West and not to the moon—then there are only two ways of reaching a solution: either one abolishes them, which I am not proposing—but for this there are no prospects at present—or one finds ways of ensuring that they do not pose an obstacle for agreements between the US and the USSR.

Merging the two sets of negotiations, INF and START—as demanded in the Freeze-Resolution passed by the House of Representatives—or at least coordinating them effectively appeals to me as utterly plausible. And I think this also might be acceptable to our French and British friends. German Social Democrats in general agree with this proposal for the following reasons:

Merging or effectively coordinating INF and START can avoid a situation where limitations in one area are blocked or bypassed by adding new arms in the other area;

Merging negotiations might allow to deal with mutual threats within one general context; and the necessary consideration of the nuclear systems of third states would be facilitated;

Merging INF and START also would accord with the substantive content of NATO's dual-track decision, namely that negotiations on medium-range systems should take place 'within the framework of SALT III'.

Now I have heard people say—even before my stay here in the United States-that we in Germany had asked for the missiles in the first place and that our present Chancellor still very much wants them. And that we must not forget the threat posed by the Soviet SS 20s.

Let me take the last point first: The Soviet build-up of SS 20s certainly must be brought down. And my reading of recent Soviet statements is that they admit having gone far beyond what is reasonable and acceptable. I have told them that it would be not only reasonable, but even wise, if they made a beginning exercise of unilateral reduction.

My own experience tells me that when dealing with Soviet Leaders, who by the way have human reactions too, you need firmness combined with readiness to cooperate and respect for the prestige of that other super power. In my judgement these points of orientation were already observed by presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy over 20 years ago.

As far as the Federal Chancellor is concerned, I am not entitled to speak on his behalf. But I believe one should not exaggerate his enthusiasm. Apart from that it is correct: we Social Democrats supported the dual-track decision in 1979.

I gave my personal support—because I supported Chancellor Schmidt and because we saw it as a chance of getting the arms race in Europe under control.

Immediately before we took our decision the governments of the United States and the Soviet Union had concluded SALT II, the agreement to limit Intercontinental Weapons. Our support for the dual-track decision was also to prevent the SALT II agreement from being undercut by an arms build-up in the medium- and short-range weapons sector. That was Helmut Schmidt's worry, that was my worry, too. In addition to this we supported the NATO decision because it allowed time for negotiations—we thought our side should not immediately react with armament measures.

At that time it was impossible to foresee that opportunities were going to be lost and that precious time would be wasted—not for the development of missiles, but for negotiations.

For us in the SPD the dual-track decision was also acceptable because we could attribute it to the work and influence of our Federal Chancellor and our responsible Ministers that NATO agreed on the following principles (Communique of 12 December 1979):

The decision was intended to "promote the process of détente";

The decision stipulated that arms control was "to promote stability in Europe", namely "on the basis of what had been achieve through SALT II" and "within the framework of SALT III".

The decision did not involve an isolated regional balance since this harbored the danger of a decoupling from the United States and her central strategic deterrence. At the center really was the limitation of the additional threat from Soviet SS 20s which had been increasing since 1976.

Let me add this point: When we adopted the dual-track decision, Western Europe had already lived for more than 20 years in the shadow of about 600 nuclear warheads mounted on Soviet medium-range missiles. NATO had until then not deemed it necessary and meaningful to counter this with additional arms in this specific area. The dual-track decision only concerned the increase on the Soviet side, the number of additional warheads which had been, and were still being, mounted on the SS 20s.

In formulating their resolutions the German Social Democrats took this objective of the dual-track decision very seriously. And we clearly defined as the aim of negotiations that the USSR must reverse the threatening build-up since 1976 in order to render superfluous the deployment of additional American systems in Western Europe. That was our zero-option in 1979 to which we had committed ourselves. And that has remained our zero-option ever since.

In other words: We have never changed our position concerning the above mentioned components of the dual-track decision.

Therefore, our present discussion about the dual-track decision—almost as serious as your quarrels in certain areas of security—have a different origin: We had to realize that there has occured a complete change in the political environment and in conditions and assumptions on which our original decision had been based.

(a) Instead of a ratified SALT II Treaty and envisaged follow-up agreement we have a continuation of the arms race at every conceivable level.

(b) Our American friends found it necessary to opt for the complete modernization of their strategic weapons.

(c) The production of neutron weapons has been resumed—which many of us in Europe noted with concern.

(d) Now even the production of binary chemical weapons has been decided.

Similar efforts are noticeable on the Soviet side. And nobody should try to give me lessons about Russian stubbornness and the over-developed Soviet security-complex.

Now, on our side, arms control, worries about stability and the willingness to make every effort to achieve successful results in negotiations—all this does not harmonize with the public announcement of doctrines based on the option of a "limited" or "protracted" nuclear war.

In an atmosphere of confrontation it is very difficult, in my view, to conclude any agreement on détente in the military field.

It was recently mentioned that I had had reservations from the very beginning regarding our support for NATO's dual-track decision. That did not prevent me from supporting my successor in the chancellorship. But I am afraid that events vindicated my feelings of scepticism.

The dual-track decision was based on the assumption that for the following four years East-West relations would remain more or less the same as they were in 1979. Today, it is becoming more and more apparant how profoundly international conditions have changes. However, attractive the dual-track decision appeared in 1979 as a 'time-table for arms control', it has in fact been impossible to anticipate the change which happened since. For that reason, I rather favour delaying the deployment of the missiles if no agreement becomes possible by the end of the year.

I really believe that part of what President Reagan said at the UN earlier this week, also speaks in favour of flexible time-limits. Because if you include Forward Based systems and especially planes—and I think this a constructive approach—then you face new problems of verification which probably can not be settled within the next few weeks to come. But I still would very much prefer if a bilateral agreement could be reached during the weeks ahead of us.

The armament part of the dual-track decision was to achieve two things: first, to bring the Soviets to the negotiating table; and second, to exert pressure and create an incentive for them to reach a positive result at the negotiations.

To a certain degree this already worked: the Soviet Union has agreed to negotiations and had later moved away from some of its starting positions.

The Soviets even went as far as making an offer to scrap a significant number of their SS 20s. In other words, the pressure has led to results. Recently the Soviets even declared to be as ready for a total Freeze as for reductions and destroying of their SS 20s. So far as I am informed, this was not offered in Geneva but by statements vis-a-vis Europeans partners. We should try to force the Soviets to stick to the proposals they made. Reflecting this context I have personally made a proposal which could take into consideration both, Soviet reductions and a halt of the nuclear arms race and it could take into account certain verification problems:

(a) The two nuclear superpowers USA and USSR jointly declare that, each of them from a specific date of time, will announce and practice a total freeze on the testing and deployment of nuclear weapons. As is well known, both the testing of nuclear weapons and their deployment are verifiable by national means.

(b) As from the beginning of such an agreement testing and deployment of new nuclear weapons, the USA also declares their renunciation of the deployment of new medium-range systems in Western Europe, while the USSR simultaneously declares the beginning of the reduction and destruction of its medium-range missiles targeted on Western Europe. These measures of renunciation and dismantlement are also verifiable with national means.

(c) The USA and USSR begin negotiations on measures for verifying their agreement also on the production of new nuclear weapons, with the aim of agreeing a mutual and verifiable freeze on nuclear weapon production within one year.

(d) The USA and USSR merge or effectively coordinate the two sets of negotiations, INF and START, so to agree on a plan of reduction of armaments, which at first would focus on a reduction in the number of the most destabilizing weapon systems.

The important issue now is to concentrate on the outcome of the negotiations. At the same time, we should realize two things: we cannot have all of our proposals and projects fulfilled, and we must remain willing to compromise.

Let me warn you about any hopes of expecting the Soviet Union to be prepared to make more far-reaching concessions once deployment will have started.

I believe this to be an illusion, and I base this judgement on my experience since 1949. It is in the weeks ahead—before new missiles are deployed—that there might exist a chance for reaching a satisfactory outcome.

There is another point: highly accurate American missiles which only take a few minutes to reach the Soviet Union, deployed on the territory of a country which invaded Russia twice with terrible effects—may perhaps have a great trauma for the Soviet Union as Soviet medium-range missiles on Cuba were for the USA. And this might be taken into account.

Thus there are also dangers which might result from individuals getting out of control or from failure of the computer system. If following a Pershing II deployment, the Russians decided to put their missiles into a "Launch-on-warning-position," this could introduce another factor of extreme uncertainty. The way out would obviously not be to provide the Soviets with more advanced American computers. . . .

Let me conclude by saying that nothing is gained for the Alliance if we deploy some additional missiles and loose the support of the hearts and minds of millions of people concerned. This support is also a factor of strength and security.

Nothing is gained if we, in a hurry, cement the dividing line between East and West in Europe, instead of making an uttermost attempt to promote cooperation wherever possible. It is easy to applaude dissidents.

It is also easy to make the Iron Curtain a new and terrible and long-lasting reality.

It may be interesting to note that both German states—in spite of all their deep-rooted controversies—have adotped a similar view on the question of avoiding a new arms race on German soil, in this case: first on their side, then on ours, then on theirs again. The noticeable improvement in relations between the two Germanies in recent months is clear evidence of this common interest.

As different as the political and social systems are in the two German states, they share a common interest in survival. We do not approve of their political and social system—in fact we reject it; but our future is tied to theirs: only together can we survive.

And much beyond the interests of my own people: I propose we should pay attention to the objective interest in common survival. And without neglecting those important issues of Western security, we should pay great attention to the obvious interdependence between armament and development and even the world economic crisis.●

YOU MUST FIGHT CONGRESS ON CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, recently, Mr. Morton M. Kondracke, executive editor of the New Republic, spoke some very important words concerning the effort of President Ronald W. Reagan to articulate to the American people the importance of their survival of freedom in the Western Hemisphere.

I would like to share a few of those words with my colleagues:

As a liberal, I hope Mr. Reagan succeeds in winning military aid increases for El Salvador and defeats efforts in Congress to cut off assistance to anti-Sandinista guerrillas in Nicaragua.

Opponents of U.S. efforts in Central America say they are trying to avoid "another Vietnam," but it is precisely the example of Vietnam which suggests that Mr. Reagan's policy is basically right. Eight years ago President Ford appealed to Congress for $700 million to save South Vietnam from collapse. It was just money, but it was refused.

We liberals cannot avert our eyes from what ensued: three million murders in Cambodia, total deprivation of human rights in Vietnam (and corruption at least as bad as in President Thieu's time) and a falling of dominoes. North Vietnam has taken over South Vietnam, Loas and Cambodia; now it is shelling Thailand.

It's now known—the legendary Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap revealed it on French television—that North Vietnam began planning to take over Indochina as early as 1959, long before the American troops arrived on the scene and supposedly disrupted the region's history.

We are under warning about Central America now. The Sandinistas in Nicaragua openly proclaim that they are part of a "revolution without frontiers." In 1980, the late Salvadoran communist chief Cayetano Carpio asserted that "the revolutionary process in Central America is a single process. The triumphs of one are the triumphs of the other. Guatemala will have its hour. Honduras its. Costa Rica, too, will have its hour of glory. The first note was heard in Nicaragua.

Liberals should note the designs on democratic Costa Rica, a country without an army—and also note Costa Rica's recent expulsion of Nicaraguan diplomats identified by a terrorist as having furnished him bombs and money. Costa Rican officials have complained about armed incursions from Nicaragua, too.

Central America is more ethnically homogeneous than Indochina, so the dominoes there may fall faster.

And Central America is close to our borders. If many American communities objected to the arrival of Vietnamese refugees and if Florida became divided over the arrival of 125,000 Cubans in 1980, we might well quake at the consequences here if hundreds of thousands of Central Americans begin streaming toward the U.S.

If Mexico, too, becomes unstable, the numbers could be in the millions, resulting in an internal security-civil liberties nightmare, not to mention job competition and ethnic frictions. To defend a hostile southern border and a threatened Panama Canal and U.S. coastline would swell the defense budget, at a cost to domestic programs.

President Reagan is asking for only money for Central America, and it's worth spending to avoid the necessity of some day sending in U.S. troops. Direct American involvement didn't work 10,000 miles away in Vietnam, but it has worked before in Central America and is an option in the future if money fails.

Opponents of the Reagan policy object that our money is being spent the wrong way—that negotiation, economic development, human rights and reform are our only hope and that financing military solutions will fail as in Vietnam.

The opponents are right to the extent that the U.S. cannot succeed if its only policy is military, but Mr. Reagan is correct in saying that there can be no reform or democracy in Central America without U.S. military aid. There is also little hope of persuading Nicaragua to stop spreading communist revolution unless the U.S. aids groups applying pressure on the Sandinistas.

The possibility exists of building a national consensus around a policy that combines military aid, regional negotiations and internal reform, but such a consensus cannot form unless President Reagan wins his fight in Congress.

If he loses, and if Central America goes communist, it will be liberal values that lose the most.●

SOMETHING IS MISSING: THE CIVIC MISSION OF AMERICAN EDUCATION

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, with the national debate over educational reform becoming increasingly heated, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues the Council for the Advancement of Citizenship. I am inserting in the RECORD an article by Prof. R. Freeman Butts, a senior fellow of Kettering Foundation, a visiting scholar at Stanford University's Hoover Institution, professor emeritus from Teachers College, Columbia University, and, I proudly add, a constituent in the 11th District of California.

Dr. Butts draws our attention to the importance of our tradition of education for civic responsibility, for participation as citizens in the governance of the Nation. With the spotlight on technology and computer literacy, the essential civic mission of public education in America is eclipsed.

SOMETHING IS MISSING: THE CIVIC MISSION OF AMERICAN EDUCATION

(By R. Freeman Butts)

There is great value in the rising tide of commission reports on what ails American schools. The importance of education is being put where it belongs—up front on the nation's public agenda. Five national task forces have reported to the American people in the past three weeks, and they have deservedly received considerable attention in the national media.

Surprisingly enough, in all of the discussion to date, there is still something missing—something enormously important as we once again seek educational reform. Missing is the forthright and pervasive recognition of the primary purpose of free, universal, compulsory and common schooling. Missing is sufficient emphasis upon the civic mission of American public education. Its prime purpose is to prepare informed, rational, humane, and participating citizens in a democratic republic.

Instead, the public discussion so far has made it seem that the most important reform is to require more courses, especially in science, mathematics and computer technology. Computer literacy somehow seems more important than civic literacy. This is not entirely the fault of the reports themselves. Much has been made of selected parts of the reports by the press and TV commentators. And the recent parading of electronic enticements for schools has tended to color the discussions. Two days before the report of the President's Commission on Excellence in Education was issued, the spring survey of the New York Times proclaimed "New Priority: Technological Literacy." Most of the 80-page issue was devoted to articles and ads about schooling and "high tech." On the last two pages there were short plaintive articles on "Leave Some Room for the Liberal Arts" and "Feeling Low about High Technology."

It is not surprising that the National Task Force on Education for Economic Growth and the Business-Higher Education Forum should stress science, mathematics, and computer literacy in their efforts to promote greater productivity in jobs, markets and the economy. But the publicity given to the President's Commission on Excellence also stressed the economic risk to the nation: "Our once unchallenged preeminence in commerce, industry, science, and technological innovation is being overtaken by competitors throughout the world."

This, of course, is attention-getting and newsworthy, especially in the current state of the economy and politics. But it tends to overshadow what comes along in the little-noticed later section which includes the following:

"Our concern, however, goes well beyond matters such as industry and commerce. It also includes the intellectual, moral, and spiritual strengths of our people which knit together the very fabric of our society. . . . A high level of shared education is essential to a free, democratic society and to the fostering of a common culture, especially in a country that prides itself on pluralism and individual freedom."

Other references to the civic function of public education were overlooked when President Reagan upstaged the report by re-emphasizing his own proposals for reform of education: tax credits, vouchers, prayer, and the abolition of the Department of Education, issues the Commission report did not discuss.

Something similar happened to the Twentieth Century Fund's Task Force on Federal Elementary and Secondary Education Policy. The front page story of the New York Times played up a recommendation that federal bilingual-education funds should be shifted to English-teaching for non-English speaking children. And too little attention has been given to the forthright recommendation for a core program for all students which includes a "knowledge of civics, or what Aristotle called the education of the citizenry in the spirit of the polity."

And, I am sure that advocates of private schools, tuition tax credits, or vouchers will wish to overlook the Task Force's explicit repudiation of such proposals and its clear affirmation that "the public schools . . . constitute the nation's most important institution for the shaping of future citizens" and "the provision of free public education must continue to be a public responsibility of high priority, while support of nonpublic education should remain a private obligation."

Finally, the report in Education Week (May 18) of the College Board's recommendations for the six academic subjects and six intellectual skills necessary for college-bound high school students properly stressed a balance between the humanities and mathematics/science, but the civic learning required of prospective college students seemed muted at best.

Now that education has the public's attention once again it is sure to be a major political issue in the 1984 campaign. Dare I suggest that we need yet one more blue-ribbon commission made up of scholars, educators, and public leaders steeped in the humanities, law, and the social and political sciences to undertake (1) a serious and sustained reexamination of the historic idea and values of American citizenship and the technological challenges it faces; and (2) a reassesment of the role that education should play in shaping the civic values, knowledge and skills of American citizens in the coming decades?

We now have before us structural proposals for educational reform dealing with academic excellence and quality, higher standards and requirements, increased financing, and the like. All to the good. But we still need to deal with the substantive ideas, content, and spirit of educational programs that will lead to the civic discipline and commitments essential for achieving the common purposes of our constitutional order.

Just before World War I, William James called for "a moral equivalent" to war: "The only thing needed henceforward is to inflame the civic tamper as past history has inflamed the military temper."

As we look past Orwell's 1984 toward the Bicentennial years of the Constitution and Bill of Rights, this is what is missing in our current debates over educational reform.●

COOPERATIVE EXTENSION SERVICE PLAYS UNIQUE ROLE IN HELPING TO DEVELOP ARLINGTON COUNTY FAIR

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor recently to attend and formally open the 1983 Arlington County Fair in the 10th district of Virginia. The first fair was held in 1977 and since then, this urban county fair has continued to grow and succeed in bringing together the Arlington community.

The Virginia Cooperative Extension Service has played a major and unique role in helping to develop the fair and I would like to share with my colleagues the following history of the partnership between the Extension Service and the Arlington County Fair.

THE VIRGINIA COOPERATIVE EXTENSION SERVICE AND THE ARLINGTON COUNTY FAIR

THE BEGINNING

For years the Arlington Unit of the Virginia Cooperative Extension Service had sponsored "4-H Exhibit Days," an annual event where projects made by the 4-H'ers were displayed. As the Community Garden program flourished with Arlington families raising vegetables and flowers, inquiries were received about exhibiting produce. As a result of these inquiries the Extension staff, under the leadership of C. Francis Lay, Extension Agent, conceived the idea of an "urban" county fair, which would provide an opportunity for youth and adults to exhibit their objects of pride.

In the fall of 1976 a group of interested citizens met together at the Extension office and the Arlington County Fair Board was organized. Soon after the board incorporated. The first Arlington County Fair was held in August 1977 at the Thomas Jefferson Community Center, a 45,000 sq. ft. facility. The only public funds (state or local) spent on the fair organization was Extension staff time.

The Extension Service was a logical choice to be the sponsoring county agency of the Arlington County Fair for several reasons: (1) Extension had a reputation for excellent volunteer management; (2) the purpose of the fair was educational; (3) the Extension staff was well trained in organizational development. The success of the first fair was due in large part to the capability of the Arlington Extension staff in recruiting and organizing the volunteers.

THE GROWTH

The initial planning group determined that the purpose of the fair should be to allow citizens of Arlington, and its public and private agents to proudly display what they produce or do. The intent was to involve the widest variety and largest number of participants as possible. As a result a competitive exhibits area, a booth exhibits area, and an entertainment area were designated. Competitive exhibits consists of exhibits in vegetables, baked goods, canned goods, clothing, quilts, photography and arts and crafts. Over 1,000 items were exhibited in 1983. The Extension staff assisted in determining the classes, recruiting participants and judges. Booth exhibits consist of handicrafters, civic, service, church, and political groups who purchase space to sell their homemade crafts or publicize their group.

Perhaps one of the unique features of the Arlington Fair is the opportunity that local, area, state government agencies and their support groups have to tell what they do for the citizens of the county. Local talent provides free continuous entertainment during the fair, and pony and mechanical rides are provided for the children.

HOW IT IS DONE

The Extension office serves as a base of operation for the fifteen member board and its committees. Staff telephone, meeting space, organizational support is provided for the eight to ten months of intensive planning for the fair. Coordination is needed for the activities of the facilities, entertainment, public relations and volunteer committees in order to produce an event that lasts 3½ days and attracts more than 70,000 people.

The Arlington County Fair is an excellent example of how a federal, state, and local agency's resources are used to assist local people to organize, plan, and implement an event that provides an opportunity to share with neighbors what residents of Arlington can do for themselves and for others.●

CHAIRMAN CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the Members' attention an article from the New York Times of September 25, 1983, describing the important role the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the Honorable CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI, played in helping to shape a resolution on the continued presence of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon. This article is a just tribute to Chairman ZABLOCKI's many abilities and leadership.

Last week, the Congress gained executive branch recognition of the War Powers Act as it decided on the future commitment of U.S. forces in Lebanon. Chairman ZABLOCKI led this initiative in the Foreign Affairs Committee and on the House floor. Throughout the debate he domonstrated his strong convictions about bipartisan foreign policy and the national interest. Such guidance and leadership are qualities the Congress has come to expect from Chairman ZABLOCKI. They are also qualities which are sincerely appreciated in this article.

The article follows:

ZABLOCKI TAKES THE CREDIT AND THE HEAT

(By Steven V. Roberts)

WASHINGTON.—Representative Clement J. Zablocki, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, was leaning back in his big chair, beneath a massive portrait of himself staring down from the wall. The Wisconsin Democrat had just piloted through a resolution that would invoke the War Powers Act but allow American marines to remain in Lebanon for 18 months, and rebellious Democrats were denouncing the measure as a sellout to the Administration. "They must be sticking pins in Zablocki dolls," the lawmakers said.

By his own account, Mr. Zablocki has spend most of his 33 years in Congress "plodding along," cultivating his constituents in the Polish neighborhoods on the South Side of Milwaukee and slowly working his way up the seniority ladder. Today, at age 70, he finds himself in the center of some of the stormiest issues on Capitol Hill, and he is clearly enjoying himself.

Yet Mr. Zablocki sometimes seems out of step with the younger and more aggressive members of his committee, who are eager to widen the Congressional role in foreign policy, "Clem has had a difficult time," said Representative William S. Broomfield of Michigan, ranking Republican on the Foreign Affairs panel. "There are people on this committee, the young liberals, who want to embarrass the Administration whenever they can. But Clem has always prided himself on his belief that there is only one President at a time, and he's got to work with him."

When he describes his own approach to the Congressional role in foreign policy, Mr. Zablocki uses words like cautious, balanced, bipartisan, consensus. Some of his younger colleagues see a value in that approach. "When he takes a position on an issue like nerve gas or the nuclear freeze," said one liberal on his committee, "he helps enormously to establish credibility with more moderate members." But when he strays from his cautious instincts, the Wisconsin Democrat can get into trouble. He agreed to lead the floor fight for a resolution endorsing a nuclear freeze. But he admits that he was uncomfortable with the concept, and when Republicans bombarded him with questions he could not answer, the younger troops had to come to his rescue.

Mr. Zablocki's approach is best summed up by his record on the War Powers Act. Most sponsors of that legislation drew the lesson from Vietnam that no President should ever be allowed to take the country into an undeclared war. But Mr. Zablocki remained a supporter of the Vietnam War to the end, and today says: "Do you know why we lost Vietnam? We weren't resolute. Our boys were fighting with one hand tied behind their backs." During the debate over the War Powers measure 10 years ago, Mr. Zablocki helped water down a Senate version that would have placed even tougher restrictions on Presidential initiative. But his moderating influence may have helped build the consensus that was able to override President Nixon's veto.

In recent weeks, as Congress has tried to apply the War Powers Act for the first time, Mr. Zablocki has led the negotiations for House Democrats with the White House. He admits that to some liberals, he has appeared "too easy" on the Administration. But his aim, he said, was to find a realistic compromise. "We certainly want to avoid a constitutional confrontation, and we have avoided that," he said.

A COOPERATIVE INSTINCT

"Clem's instinct is to be cooperative," said Representative Lee Hamilton of Indiana, a senior Democrat on the Foreign Affairs panel. "He came out of the World War II generation, out of a bipartisan foreign policy tradition." Moreover, Mr. Zablocki shares the experience and outlook of many of his constituents, children of immigrants who struggled for an education, and lived by the sort of maxim the lawmaker learned from his father: "You don't get something for nothing." He worked his way through college playing the organ at church, and he has a deep pride in his neighborhood.

"I think my constituents are more conservative than some of my Democratic colleagues," he said. "They're supportive of a strong national defense and are fiercely anti-Communist, and in that respect I reflect their views to a tee." Yet many of his people are telling Mr. Zablocki that they do not want any troops in Lebanon, and when he leads the floor fight this week for the War Powers compromise, he will be trying to convince his constituents as well as his colleagues that there is no alternative. "Sometimes you've got to lead," Mr. Zablocki said. "Sometimes you've got to listen to your conscience."●

HON. PARREN J. MITCHELL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan's Proclamation on Minority Enterprise Development Week, October 2–8, 1983, should summon all Americans, and especially the Reagan administration itself, to ponder the larger implications of this observance.

The magnitude of these implications compels me to offer—at this crucial time in America—some words of caution and admonition that, I hope, will bring all Americans to see in this observance the seriousness of purpose that it warrants.

For the truth of the matter is that the Reagan administration itself is waging the most vicious assault ever in the history of this country against minority enterprise and the economic empowerment of blacks and other minorities. My colleagues, the proof of this costly assault is borne out by the record of this administration.

Not in 50 years have the social and economic achievements of blacks and other minorities begun to erode so rapidly. In fact, the record of this administration is one of brazen and systematic attack on minority gains. With unfaltering regularity, the Reagan administration, in agency after agency throughout the Federal establishment, is attempting to contravene and violate existing laws designed to further equal employment opportunity and minority entrepreneurship. And more broadly, the Reagan forces are continuing to chart an unlawful course of regulatory abuse that frustrates and hampers minority entrepreneurship and economic empowerment.

The record, for example, of the U.S. Small Business Administration (SBA) under the Reagan administration reveals a pattern of blatant inequality against small minority entrepreneurs in the dollar value of direct and guaranteed loans as well as in the rate of loans to small minority business. During the first 6 months of fiscal year 1983, for example, minority firms received a mere 13 percent of the number of SBA loans and only 9.5 percent of the funds.

The President's pious proclamation notwithstanding, this is a contemptible and inexcusable modus operandi in the wake of a 50-percent annual rate of failure among minority business enterprises, due to an epidemic of capital shortfalls. Very clearly, Mr. Reagan is not serious about small minority business.

As if withholding funds to small minority businesses were not enough, the administration persists in its attempts to undermine minority entrepreneurship under provisions of Public Law 95-507. Currently, a concern of mammoth proportion to minority small business is the administration's position in favor of curtailing participation in the 8(a) program by setting artificially restrictive limits on the length of time a small minority firm is allowed to reach a level of economic viability for reasonable competition in the economic mainstream of this great Nation. The administration, in its haste to graduate firms from the 8(a) program, threatens continued growth, and indeed, the survival of prematurely graduated firms. The administration's position clearly undermines the purpose of the 8(a) program, which was established under Public Law 95-507 to foster business ownership and competitive viability among socially and economically disadvantaged firms.

President Reagan's proclamation states:

> Our challenge today is to enhance the ability of minority Americans to participate more fully in the market economy and to achieve greater economic independence.

Indeed, the challenge today is, perhaps, greater than it was 3 years ago because this administration's policies are more antiminority than prominority business development.

I believe that those of us in the legislative body who have sought enactment of fair and progressive legislation to aid small minority business have acted out of a sense of justice as well as out of recognition of what is fundamentally right for America. We have acted out of the knowledge that minority enterprises are the cornerstone of community viability throughout this Nation. We have acted out of the knowledge that 80 percent of all new jobs are generated by a small business, many of them minority owned, and that these firms are uniquely victimized by today's depressed economy, Unfortunately and tragically, our Nation's leadership, retrenching on human and domestic programs, only gives lip service to the spirit and the letter of this week's observance.

I assure you that enactment of minority set-aside programs, such as my 10-percent set-aside under the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 and my earlier set-aside proposal under the 1977 Public Works Act were responses to Federal inaction and inequality in the expenditure of funds and technical assistance to small minority business.

I am pleased with recent legislative victories for small minority business that have come out of this legislative body.

Federal procurement activity of small minority businesses should increase as a result of the recent enactment of Public Law 98-47 and Public Law 98-72. These statutes represent significant new leverage for minority businesses seeking to increase opportunities for Federal contracts, which average billions of dollars annually.

The foes of small minority business deny America and the 600,000 small minority businesses in this country the benefit of economic recovery born of access to the basic right of equal opportunity, guaranteed by the 14th amendment to the Constitution. The cost of deferral of this right is tragically reflected in underproduction, joblessness and visible evidence of refusal to invest in social programs.

I call on this administration and Mr. Reagan personally to abandon the reckless and destructive assault on minority enterprise and to recognize the obvious benefits of viable minority enterprises to our free enterprise system.

I pledge continuous leadership in this struggle and challenge you to the same.●

A DEMOCRATIC PERSPECTIVE ON CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. TOM LANTOS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the honor of leading the U.S. congressional delegation in meetings with members of the European Parliament. Our discussions covered the whole range of international issues of concern to Western Europe and the United States. My distinguished colleague from Ohio, Mr. SEIBERLING, was a member of the American delegation, and he prepared remarks on Central American issues for our discussions. I commend these remarks to my colleagues in the House:

A DEMOCRATIC PERSPECTIVE ON CENTRAL AMERICA

(Remarks by Congressman John F. Seiberling to the 22d annual U.S.-European Parliament meeting, Homestead, Va., Sept. 24, 1983)

I'm happy to present a perspective on U.S. policy toward Central America. I hesitate to call it a Democratic perspective because, while I believe it represents a general viewpoint shared by a majority of the Democratic Members of Congress, I believe it is also shared by a significant number of my Republican colleagues, as well as distinguished Republican outside Congress. However, it diverges from the basic tactics, and probably the underlying philosophical approach of the Reagan Administration toward the problems of Central America.

On July 19 of this year, the House of Representatives met in an extraordinary secret session to discuss U.S. involvement in Nicaragua. Following an exhaustive debate, the House voted on July 28 for the Boland-Zablocki Resolution, to cut off covert assistance to the anti-Sandinista Nicaraguan guerrillas, and to ask the President to convene a meeting of the Organization of American States to deal with the related security issues. This vote was a follow-up to the Boland amendment, adopted by the House last December by a vote of 411 to 0, prohibiting the President from using CIA funds for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Nicaragua. While congressional efforts to redirect President Reagan's policies may be of limited success, these efforts reflect a determination not to be backed into another costly and divisive counterinsurgency war.

To understand Latin American reactions to our current policy, it is essential to have some historical perspectives. Leaving aside the war with Mexico in 1846-48, major armed interventions by the U.S. in Central America began in 1854 when the U.S. Navy destroyed the Nicaraguan town of San Juan del Sur. During the first third of the century, such unilateral armed diplomacy by the United States became commonplace, with interventions in Cuba, Panama, Mexico, Honduras, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, and, repeatedly, in Nicaragua. Nicaragua was occupied by U.S. Marines from 1912 to 1925 and reoccupied again in 1927.

In 1954, the CIA backed a coup which toppled President Arbenz of Guatemala from power. The political process in Guatemala thus brutally interrupted, that country has been condemned ever since to a cycle of repression and coups by one military dictator after another.

As recently as 1965, President Johnson dispatched over 30,000 U.S. troops to the Dominican Republic. After widespread criticism of this last intervention, the U.S. sought approval from the Organization of American States for the creation of an international peacekeeping force which subsumed American troops.

During the two decades of the Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S Truman Administrations, 1933-53, U.S. relations with Central America were dominated by a different approach best described, in Roosevelt's words, as the "Good Neighbor" Policy. This emphasized efforts to establish relations with the nations of Latin America on the basis of mutual respect and non-interference. When the government of Mexico expropriated that nation's oil resources in 1938, Roosevelt, instead of theatening or invading Mexico, accepted the takeover and negotiated a settlement.

In 1948, the Organization of American States was founded as a regional organization within the framework of the U.N. In addition to providing for collective self-defense, the O.A.S. charter calls for the peaceful settlement of controversies and prohibits interference by member states in each others' affairs.

The most recent embodiment of the Good Neighbor approach was the Panama Canal Treaty, negotiated under Presidents Nixon and Ford, and completed and ratified during President Carter's administration. The treaty provided for joint control of the canal and its eventual return to Panama. The result has been a genuine improvement in relations, not only with Panama, but with Latin America generally.

Unfortunately, much of the goodwill generated in Latin America by these past efforts is being replaced by fear and resentment generated by the Reagan Administration's tendency to return to unilateral, military approaches to the problems of Central America. These approaches have aroused deep fears in the people of the United States.

It is not that there is not widespread concern over the possibility of Cuban or Soviet military presence in Central America. This is strongly opposed by most people, and has been played upon by President Reagan. In his speech to the nation on April 28, President Reagan even described the situation in Central America as having global ramifications. "If Central America were to fall, what would be the consequences for our position in Asia and Europe, and for alliances such as NATO?" he asked.

Nevertheless, the people in the United States are, in overwhelming numbers, fearful of being dragged into another Vietnam. The House of Representatives clearly reflects this view. There is also a widespread recognition that the Reagan approach fails to address adequately the causes of instability in the region, notably pandemic poverty, illiteracy, and social injustice. There is a strong conviction that any intervention, whether overt or covert, that does not address these problems will only make matters worse.

The public in the U.S. is also revolted by flagrant abuses of human rights by governments receiving U.S. support or by elements in those governments. This is a serious problem in El Salvador which is not made better by President Reagan's cynical certifications every six months, required by U.S. law as a condition of continuing aid, that human rights practices there are improving. It has been a problem in Guatemala, as it was in Nicaragua under Somoza. It is no answer to point out abuses of human rights by Communist regimes, since they are not being supported by U.S. aid. Americans have become skeptical about governments that, in the name of anti-communism, justify the grossest of abuses, which, in a by-now classic pattern, outrage and alienate decent people, further polarize the population, and weaken the possibility of building democratic, centrist alternatives to the extremes of the right and left.

Many Americans, and particularly the Reagan Administration, become confused in dealing with Latin American revolutions because of a tendency to feel that any socialist or Marxist-oriented movement will inevitably pose a security threat to the U.S. There is also the feeling that any diminution of U.S. influence weakens us in the global competition with the Soviet Union.

Finally, there is, on the part of many of our national leaders, an inexcusable ignorance about Latin American culture and history. From the Latin American perspective, security involves mainly achieving national integration and freedom from outside interference, whether by Moscow, Cuba, or the United States. Central American countries today are trying desperately to break free of the bonds which have inhibited the development of social justice and basic political rights for so long, and which have condemned them to a seemingly endless cycle of bloodshed and repression. The longer regimes we aid fail to respond to the pressures for education, for freedom from hunger and physical abuse, for freedom of speech and thought, the more people are pushed to support the insurgents whose cause we find so threatening. Mexico had a long and painful transition to democracy, one that was exacerbated by U.S. hostility and interference. Accordingly, we had a long history of difficult relations with Mexico. This experience, together with past experience with military and political intervention by the United States, colors the thinking of all Central America.

One must be skeptical about the newly appointed Presidential Commission on Latin America headed by Dr. Henry Kissinger. However, the Commission could perform a genuine public service if it could articulate fairly and understandably the way our Latin American neighbors look at their problems and at us.

The action of the Reagan Administration in providing "covert" assistance to the contras in Nicaragua is in clear violation of U.S. law, the Rio Treaty, and the charter of the Organization of American States. Moreover, even if the Reagan policy toward Nicaragua were to succeed in bringing about the ouster of the Sandinista Regime, it would tend to confirm the fears of the countries of Latin America about continued unilateral interference and domination by the "Colossus of the North," it would weaken the O.A.S. and other inter-American institutions, and it would contribute to further alienation of all Latin America from the United States. Such a turn of events would do far more to promote the objectives of Cuba and Moscow than the existence of a Marxist regime in Nicaragua is likely to do.

In short, we cannot go it alone in Central America, especially if our policies are geared toward armed intimidation and intervention, rather than conciliation and negotiation. We should use this country's power, working with other governments in Latin America, to achieve a prompt cessation of hostilities in El Salvador and Nicaragua, followed by negotiations between all parties. We should do our utmost to build on the modest proposals of the four Contadora nations, including the mutual cessation of arms shipments into the region, the mutual withdrawal of foreign military advisers from the region, and a mutual guarantee that the territory of one nation in the region will not be used as the base of operations for aggression against other nations in the region. Maximum use should be made of the opportunity afforded by the O.A.S. for consultation, international peace-keeping operations, and supervising the implementation of security agreements. Finally, our policy in the region must be consistent in condemning gross human rights abuses, whether of the left or the right. Our aid should be premised on a meaningful commitment by the aided government to avoid or eliminate such abuses.

The countries of Central America are indeed at a crossroads. There is no political law which says that a revolutionary movement in any country in the region will inevitably land that country in the Soviet camp. However, as the Mexican writer Carlos Fuentes said recently, "If nothing happens but harassment, blockades, propaganda, pressures and invasions against the revolutionary country, then that prophecy will become self-fullfilling."

The Boland-Zablocki Resolution was a clear sign that Members of the House have been listening, learning, and thinking constructively about Latin America. One must hope that President Reagan and his advisers are capable of the same kind of effort.●

REGARDING THE THIRD BLACK AMERICAN VISUAL AND PERFORMING ARTS RENAISSANCE

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the California Black Cultural Assembly for organizing the Third Black American Visual and Performing Arts Renaissance which will be held on October 14, 15, and 16 in the Florin Shopping Mall in Sacramento.

The Visual Arts Renaissance is intended to provide exposure for the works of African-American artists; encourage young African Americans to get involved in art; promote community enrichment and lay the groundwork for a permanent annual African-American Visual Arts Renaissance; give the residents of the greater Sacramento community an opportunity to learn about African-American art; and create a wider community awareness, understanding, and appreciation of black Americans' contribution to the arts in this country.

The Visual Arts renaissance gets its inspiration from the Harlem Renaissance period which occurred between 1929 and 1939. This represented the rebirth of black American artistic expression in this country, and the spirit of this era is what the sponsors of the Visual Arts Renaissance hope to foster in the visual arts.

Mr. Speaker, this is an ambitious and much needed undertaking. It deserves our full support.●

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO PROVIDE INFORMATION ON PHYSICIAN ASSIGNMENT PRACTICES

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that will help medicare beneficiaries to control their own health costs. By providing information on physicians who accept medicare payments as payment in full, this proposal will allow the elderly to control their personal medical bills and to find doctors who will serve them at a price they can afford.

For years, the elderly have been well aware of the diminishing share of medical bills that medicare covers. Overall, medicare covers only about 55 percent of the physician costs of the elderly. The Federal Government establishes regional screens—or upper payment limits—of "usual, customary, and reasonable charges." But many doctors bill patients without regard to the limits of medicare. As a result, beneficiaries—many of whom live on fixed incomes—are left on their own to pay the rest, however they can.

Such limitations add a financial insult to physical injury. Making things even more complex, it is often difficult for patients to find out in advance whether physicians will accept medicare's payment.

The legislation I am introducing requires that the Secretary of HHS publish annually a list of all physicians who have agreed to accept assignment for all medicare claims for the following year. In addition, the Secretary is to provide a local list of such physicians to each medicare beneficiary.

This information will not be difficult for the Health Care Finance Administration to compile. It is readily available as part of the auditing and billing information for each year. And, once it is available to the elderly of the country, it should do much to allow them to find doctors who will treat them carefully and affordably.

H.R. —

A bill to amend part B of title XVIII of the Social Security Act with respect to information on physician assignment practices under the medicare program

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1842 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395u) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsections:

"(i)(1) The Secretary shall compile annually a list of physicians serving individuals enrolled under this part indicating the share (by decile or quartile) of claims which each physician has accepted on an assignment basis (described in subsection (b)(3)(B)(ii)) in the preceding year.

"(2) The Secretary shall make available the information compiled under paragraph (1) for the local geographic area in each office of the Social Security Administration no more than six months after the end of each year and, upon request, by mail from each carrier. The Secretary shall, when such information becomes available, annually notify each individual enrolled under this part of the availability of such information.

"(j)(1) The Secretary shall publish annually a list of all physicians who have agreed in accordance with this subsection to accept payment under this part on the basis of an assignment (described in subsection (b)(3)(B)(ii)) for all services furnished under this part during the following twelve-month period to individuals enrolled under this part.

"(2) To permit the publishing of the list provided under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall annually, before the beginning of the twelve-month period, offer physicians a reasonable opportunity to sign an agreement that they will accept payment under this part on the basis of an assignment (described in subsection (b)(3)(B)(ii)) for all services furnished under this part during the following twelve-month period to individuals enrolled under this part.

"(3) The Secretary shall annually provide to each individual enrolled under this part and residing in a local geographic area a copy of the list of all physicians in that area who have signed such an agreement for the following twelve-month period.".●

PRESERVING AMERICAN JOBS

HON. JAMES T. BROYHILL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, the textile import situation is bad and is getting worse. Despite the bilateral agreements which have been reached with low-cost foreign suppliers of textile and apparel, U.S. textile and apparel outputs in pounds in the United States has declined by over 10 percent while imports have gained nearly 23 percent in the last 10 years. Over the same period, textile and apparel employment in this country dropped 10 percent—which translates into 500,000 jobs.

I wish to bring to my colleagues' attention a speech which was recently given by my good friend, Mr. Hoyt Bailey, executive vice president of Dover Textiles in Shelby, N.C.

Hoyt is a 1950 graduate of North Carolina State University where he received a degree in textile management. Following his graduation he was employed for 11 years by J. P. Stevens, working in all phases of textile manufacturing, planning, research and development, and sales.

In 1962, he joined Dover Textiles yarn sales division as vice president of sales and marketing. Under his direction Dover Textiles has become a market leader in the development and marketing of new yarn styling concepts and innovation. Currently, as executive vice president, his responsibilities include the sales and marketing of spun yarns, dyed yarns, and fabric dyeing and finishing. Dover Textiles employ over 3,000 people in its 7 plants located in Shelby and Cherryville, N.C.

Hoyt has devoted much study and research on the effect of textile imports on the American market and I commend his remarks to your attention:

PRESERVING AMERICAN JOBS

(By Hoyt Q. Bailey)

Recently an observant writer gave this rather humorous definition of an American.

"An American is a fellow who drives home in a Japanese car, slips off his Hong Kong suit and Italian shoes, puts on his English robe and Mexican slippers and sips Brazilian coffee while sitting on his Danish furniture. Then he writes a letter on Canadian paper using a Korean pen complaining about the unemployment in the country." This definition while meant to be humorous is far more factual than even the writer imagined.

Now, let me read from the November 19, 1982 issue of the Wall Street Journal a less humorous Japanese version of an American as quoted by Toshio Soejima of Nippon T & T Public Corporation—"The Japanese are a people that can manufacture a product of uniformity and superior quality because the Japanese are a race of completely pure blood, not a mongrelized race as in the United States."

This crass racism is too important to go unchallenged. Therefore, I am one mongrel who will not patronize Mr. Soejima's pure race. So let it be with all mongrelized Americans.

"Oh, what a feeling"—"we are driven"—"we make it simple". All of us have been inundated by the above slogans on TV for various Japanese cars. We are now told by the Japanese that a bill in Congress to put some of the same import restrictions on Japan as they put on us will create protectionism. Protectionism? With a 16.8 billion dollar trade deficit with Japan last year, they talk about us having protectionism. With over 2.5 million Americans out of work in the automotive and related industries, we still allow the Japanese to ship vast quantities of these automobiles into our country. Yet, we can't even sell our beef in Japan since their farmers are protected with prices of $30 to $40 per pound for prime beef.

The equivalent of only one days production of Florida's oranges are allowed to be shipped to Japan each year and they are readily sold at ninety-five cents each. Now, they have said our spray cans of deodorant and hair spray, are too large to be accepted by their government standards. Protectionism: Japan has the greatest means of protectionism of any country in which we sell our goods. A Pontiac Firebird sells for almost twice the price in Japan as it does in America due to their tariffs and tax protectionism. Who is the culprit? Our textile industry experienced over 27% more imports in 1982 over 1981 and 17.8% more already in the first quarter of 1983 over first quarter of 1982. While we have massive unemployment in the textile and related industries. Many U.S. business men believe the Japanese have even manipulated the exchange value of their currency to be about 35% under valued as reported in the February issue of Dun's Business Month magazine. This in itself produces a principle price advantage which they have over American industry. Economists predict a U.S. trade deficit of $100 billion in 1983 with 25% of the inbalance with Japan.

"Free trade" is the cry from Washington, when all governments but ours subsidize their industries. "Free trade"—there is no such thing. Let's just ask for fair trade.

So now when we hear those TV commercials for Japanese cars, let's add a few words to express what is really happening—How about, "oh what a feeling"—to be out of work—or, "we are driven to the unemployment line—or "we make it simple"—to lose your job.

At the current rates, imports in textiles have equaled the output of 600,000 Americans. Without effective restraints imports will put another 100,000 people out of textile jobs in the next year alone. When American auto workers lose their jobs the textile industry loses a potential customer and the domino effect in lost jobs continues.

One segment after another is being hurt by imports. According to Department of Commerce figures, one-half of all sweaters sold in the United States are imported. One out of every three knit shirts and brassieres are imported. About one-third of all woven dress shirts and tailored clothing is coming in from low-wage countries and the percentage is rapidly rising whereas just a few years ago all were domestically produced. There is no longer even one manufacturer of dress gloves in this country. All such gloves are imported, and there are now only a token number of domestic producers of worsted suiting fabrics operating in this country due to imports.

Surveys show that a higher mark-up is added on imported goods, so it's not always the consumer who benefits from the low cost of production in low-wage countries.

The average textile wage in the United States is some 5½ times greater than Hong Kong, and 8 to 10 times greater than Tawain and Korea.

Even with this tremendous advantage our textile industry could still compete without government interference. Hong Kong probably thinks OSHA is a new Chinese name in town. Tawain and Korea prosper by our minimum wage law. Many Far Eastern countries thrive on child labor. Malaysia's version of medical insurance and retirement program is a pick and shovel to dig the grave. In China, the cost of selling a product is determined by how low they have to go to get the business.

We need our great textile industry, since one in ten manufacturing jobs in the United States is represented by the textile and apparel industries. Textiles will amount to $1 out of every $10 of the total spent for goods and services in our entire economy. There are over 2 million people employed in this country as a result of textiles and apparel industries. Even the State of Michigan which is known mainly for its auto industry employs some 100,000 people in some phase of textiles. The corn producing State of Iowa employs 38,000 people in textiles, and don't forget the corn starch used for sizing. But our own North Carolina is responsible for over 300,000 jobs in textiles.

For many people entering employment for the first time, textiles and apparel are a traditional first step in obtaining employment and becoming responsible members of society.

In this country's textile and apparel plants, 16% of the employees are black; in apparel manufacturing 81% are women. Where can these jobs be replaced?

Textile and/or apparel plants are located in every state in the union. The textile industry is vital to our national defense. If a Far Eastern country declared war on us, would we ask them to sell us uniforms for our military or weave our parachute material? And now, China looms as our greatest threat to the extinction of our textile industry unless a realistic quota system is put into effect.

When imports take over 1,000 textile jobs in a community you have a domino effect for you also wipe out 3,000 other jobs and the equivalent of the following businesses: 17 eating places, 13 food stores, 11 gas stations, 6 apparel shops, 6 furniture stores, 4 general merchandise stores, 3 automobile dealerships, 2 hardware stores, 2 tire and auto accessory stores, 2 drug stores, 1 sporting goods store, and 1 jewelry store.

These same 1,000 textile jobs support 19 doctors and 5 dentists. So you can see that each of us can be effected when textile jobs are taken by imports. Equating this projection to Dover Textiles we have 9,000 other jobs created by the 3,000 employees of our company—12,000 jobs in our area as a result of the existence of Dover Textiles.

I have seen the 1982 final statistics on several apparel items. Listen to these:

(1) 438 million shirts—over 4 for each man and boy in the U.S.

(2) 162 million sweaters.

(3) 105 million sets of underwear.

(4) in just these three items alone, we have the equivalent of 362 million pounds of yarn or equal to 6 years production by Dover Textiles. (3,000 employees)

On November 25, 1977, I made a speech to the Shelby Rotary Club and I gave a scenario of what could happen in ten years to my home town if the then current rate of imports were allowed to continue. Admittedly, I thought I was a little overly dramatic and that it would be a farfetched happening. Now, five years later, I find that this scenario is more right than wrong—let me repeat my seemingly impossible 1977 projection with one-half of the ten years now gone:

"If the current rate of imports and government interference continues for the next ten years, let's look at Shelby, N.C. in 1987:

"Where once a happy people worked and received an honest days pay for an honest days work, buildings deteriorate since no longer can you hear the hum of spindles. And OSHA has accomplished its goal of quieting noisy looms, for now they are silent, permanently silent. And yes, you can breath clean air for the unemployment lines are so long they require standing in the cold clean winter's breeze. Our manufacturing force of some 20,000 people has been reduced to 10,000 . . . yes, we are a ghost town. What about other industries taking the place of textiles? What else is so labor intensive that it could absorb so many people? Then, these new industries have their import problems—other victims of so called free traders in Washington."—That from my speech of a little over five years ago—let's see where we are now regarding the possibility of 10,000 people out of work in ten years.

Fiber industries over 2,200 jobs gone.

PPG almost 800 jobs gone.

J. P. Stevens—closed—500 jobs gone.

Lily Mills—closed—400 jobs gone.

Shelby Seamless Hosiery closed—300 jobs gone.

L. & K. Company—200 jobs gone.

Supporting businesses such as supply houses canteen operators, service people—400 jobs.

5 year total 4,800 jobs.

Well, I hope my supposedly overly dramatic scenario doesn't continue to come true at the present rate or we will have 9,600 lost jobs of the 10,000 predicted. I don't deserve to be 96 percent accurate.

In summary: if I sound bitter—I am bitter. We hold up the construction of a billion dollar dam in Tennessee because some environmentalist group is worried about the extinction of a Snail Darter fish which is nothing more than a sardine. Yet, we sit by and watch the extinction of an American industry and the loss of a livelihood for many Americans. Yes, I am bitter at our own government for allowing two sets of rules to exist with regard to the balance of imports and exports. We must act now before the "American dream" becomes the "American nightmare". We are on a collision course with trade wars—trade wars lead to hot wars. We won the last big hot war. Will we win the trade war? Let's have fair trade—not free trade. If we are to become a service oriented country, from what source will we have a gross national product? Currently, 7 out of 10 people are employed in service sectors. We must produce goods to preserve some measure of self-sufficiency, to avoid complete dependence on others. Mark Twain once said, "No group of people can survive by taking in each other's washing".

I recently wrote Senator JESSE HELM'S Office to tell him to get out of the abortion clinics and tobacco fields and get into America's textile mills and save the jobs of those who elected him. He did inform me that he voted against "most favored nation" status for China in 1980 and that China's shipments of textiles to this country have increased 200% since being recognized as a most favored nation.

What can we do to help our textile industry?

(1) Write, phone, wire every Senator and Congressman in Washington. Increase our lobbying with them to impose reasonable quotas on imports.

(2) Support "made in America" campaigns. The slogan "Remember Pearl Harbor" might never have been used if we had created the slogan "Prevent Pearl Harbor". We must reach the people with our message. Use printed slogans on your yarn cases. Make speeches to local civic clubs. Ti-Caro runs ads congratulating local businesses for not selling imports. The job you save may be your own.

(3) Push for the same special tax breaks for textiles and apparel as granted other industries. Currently, our industry is taxed at a rate of 31.9% and apparel at 39.7%, while the average of all industries is 20.5% due to special tax breaks. Labor intensive industries get the fewest breaks while capital intensive industries get the greatest breaks. This should be reserved if unemployment is to decline. For instance, commercial banking, transportation, and shipbuilding have a minus tax status while textiles and apparel carry the tax burden. (Dun's Business Month's May 1983 carries an excellent article on this situation.)

(4) Continue automation wherever possible to reduce costs as a competitive measure against imports.

(5) Push for the elimination of government interference in its demands through regulations, reports, and red tape, at least allow tax breaks to cover our "Government Interference Factor."

Let me conclude with this:

Each $100 of consumer spending generates an average of 5.4 hours of work in the United States. However;

(A) $100 worth of milk generates .7 hours of work.

(B) $100 worth of food generates 3.2 hours of work.

(C) $100 worth of automobiles generates 4.5 hours of work.

(This would mean one Japanese car would equal almost two months of work for an American—6 cars then equal the loss of one job.)

(D) $100 worth of apparel generates 10 hours work. Therefore, $400 worth of clothes provides 1 week's work for an American.

So you can see every shirt, every dress, every pair of pants, every garment of any kind you purchase from abroad adds up to lost American jobs. Let's work together in our own AYSA along with other organizations to form a united front to save American jobs. Thank you.●

AFA'S 1983-84 STATEMENT OF POLICY, ADOPTED UNANIMOUSLY BY DELEGATES TO AFA'S ANNUAL NATIONAL CONVENTION ON SEPTEMBER 12, 1983

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, recently the delegates to the Air Force Association national convention unanimously adopted a strong statement on the importance of strategic modernization to achieving real, verifiable arms control and hence, global nuclear stability and peace. In its 1983-84 statement of policy, AFA states:

"If we want to lower the risk of nuclear war, we must build and maintain the forces that prevent it. This logic may not be comfortable but it is sound, for the principle of deterrence is as old as the history of warfare and has not been changed by the advent of nuclear weapons. What has changed is that the stakes of deterrence have increased in step with the deadlines of nuclear arsenals . . . this Association's long-standing contention that the U.S. can no more negotiate from a position of weakness than it can deter through inferiority is as valid as ever. Arms control objectives and strategic capabilities must be shaped for mutual support and serve the common goal of a stable military balance and, hence, peace.

The statement of policy of the 200,000 member Air Force Association is designed to give voice to the objectives of the association and to support armed strength, adequate to maintain the security and peace of the United States and the free world.

I include the text of the association's statement of policy:

AFA'S 1983-84 STATEMENT OF POLICY ADOPTED UNANIMOUSLY BY DELEGATES TO AFA'S ANNUAL NATIONAL CONVENTION ON SEPTEMBER 12, 1983

United States military policy is, and throughout history has been, defensive. Our armed forces, and the doctrines that guide them, are structured accordingly. We don't create huge military arsenals to conquer or coerce. Our forces exist to keep others from using force against us and our allies. We seek to deter rather than fight wars. But hollow deterrence based on bluff weakens rather than strengthens peace reliable deterrence is achieved only if potential aggressors know clearly that they would confront determined, combat-ready forces they cannot defeat. Our overriding concern obviously must be deterrence of the most destructive form of conflict, nuclear war. The world today lives in the shadow of nuclear weapons; we cannot wish them away or disinvent them even though the abhorrence of nuclear war and the desire to prevent holocaust are shared by rational people. And yet, we must remember the last conventional global war cost 40,000,000 to 50,000,000 lives, and that this nuclear shadow has prevented conventional war between major nations for thirty-eight years, the longest period in modern history.

If we want to lower the risk of nuclear war, we must build and maintain the forces that prevent it. This logic may not be comfortable but it is sound, for the principle of deterrence is as old as the history of warfare and has not been changed by the advent of nuclear weapons. What has changed is that the stakes of deterrence have increased in step with the deadliness of nuclear arsenals. The central requirement of effective nuclear deterrence is for the Soviet leadership to remain convinced that we have the capability and will to respond to aggression by denying Moscow its political and military objectives and impose on the USSR costs that outweigh any potential gain. In turn, this requires that we have the capability to hold at risk that which the Soviet leadership itself values most—Military and political control, military forces, both nuclear and conventional, and that critical industrial capability which sustains war. Moreover, we must maintain this capability, at appropriate countervailing levels, whether the Soviet Union consents to equitable arms reduction or not.

This Association's longstanding contention that the U.S. can no more negotiate from a position of weakness than it can deter through inferiority is as valid as ever. Arms-control objectives and strategic capabilities must be shaped for mutual support and serve the common goal of a stable military balance and, hence, peace. Effective arms control can and should be an essential tool for lessening the danger of nuclear war. But no negotiations can change the fact that this country and the Soviet Union are ideological and geopolitical adversaries.

The Soviet Union regards arms control as a competitive process which serves both political and military objectives. Politically, the Soviet Union poses as a champion of peace and frequently advances propagandistic arms-control initiatives. Many of these are one-sided, impractical, unverifiable, and not really intended to control armaments or even to be adopted in practice.

At the same time, the Soviet Union also advances proposals that are aimed at achieving military as well as political benefits. The Soviets seek to place constraints on U.S. technological advantages while protecting their own military advantages.

It follows that arms-control agreements with a highly secretive adversary like the Soviet Union cannot be based simply on trust. There must be effective means of verification that enable the U.S. to know with confidence whether the terms of agreements are being honored. In practice, this means the U.S. must be able to monitor activities in the areas covered by these treaties in order to detect any violations at a very early stage. Arms-control agreements that cannot be verified and enforced effectively are worse than no accords at all.

This Association believes also that U.S. arms-control policies must not focus on the threat of nuclear war to the exclusion of the threat of totalitarian imperialism. We must prevent the former while containing the latter. At the same time, arms-control policies must not become entangled in domestic partisan politics. The formulation of this nation's arms-control policy is not a contest between supporters of peace and supporters of war, but an issue of statecraft that preserves both liberty and peace. There is reason to fear that the national discourse over arms control is being subverted into sloganeering exercises by those who favor arms control at any price. Arms-control accords that do not lessen the danger of war and undermine further the strategic balance—or especially a unilateral nuclear freeze—may serve temporarily the propagandists of the peace movement. But they do not serve the cause of peace. In fact, they increase the risk of nuclear war.

The positions taken by this Association previously on this issue are worth repeating: Domestic and international groups promoting simplistically an immediate nuclear freeze are achieving ends diametrically opposed to their own professed goals of nuclear stability and arms reduction. Such a freeze would leave us with a permanently weakened deterrent posture and perpetuate the very vulnerabilities and inadequacies we are making great efforts to correct.

A nuclear freeze would decrease strategic stability and grant the Soviets, without incentive to reciprocate, their major objectives in the START (Strategic Arms Reduction Talks) and INF (Intermediate-range Nuclear Force) negotiations. Concurrent with the nuclear freeze movement is a campaign against the first use of nuclear weapons, especially so far as NATO is concerned. The claimed Soviet "no-first-use" policy is deceptive. The North Atlantic Tready Organization is a defensive alliance, with a longstanding policy that no NATO weapon of any kind will ever be used for aggressive purposes. NATO's doctrine of deterrence and flexible response links the U.S. strategic forces with NATO's conventional and nuclear forces in Europe to deter aggression of any kind.

The Soviets continue to maneuver toward a joint pledge of no first use of nuclear weapons, an idea that is finding a sympathetic echo in the U.S. and other NATO countries. A no-first-nuclear-use policy would undermine the Alliance's strategy of flexible response, necessitate large increases in expenditures for conventional forces, foster the impression that the U.S. commitment to NATO has been reduced, and leave entirely to the Soviets the initiative and timing of conflict escalation. This Association believes that NATO's policy of no first use of military force is more effective, credible, and workable than a promise not to use nuclear weapons after an attack has begun.

Therefore, deployment of the full complement of U.S. Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles must proceed on schedule to offset the destabilizing, one-sided Soviet advantage in intermediate-range nuclear force in Europe. There is no inconsistency in deploying these weapons while the U.S. and the Soviet Union engage in negotiations that seek balanced, equitable, and verifiable reductions in the two sides' arsenals.

The central harsh lesson of past arms negotiations with the Soviets is that they have yet to give up an advantage that they did not have to give up. The way to peace is through painstaking negotiations from a position of U.S. strength. In the strategic nuclear sector, recommendations by the President's Commission on Strategic Forces, adopted in full by the Administration, provide the formula for rebuilding this strength. This plan provides for an integrated, mutually reinforcing approach to modernizing the nation's strategic forces consonant with our arms-reduction policy. We urge Congress to adopt the Administration's recommendations in their entirety and provide the long-term funding needed to bring these vitally needed forces and weapons into being. Deletion of any one element of this integrated modernization proposal could cause its unraveling. The consequences to the nation's ability to deter nuclear conflict could be grave. The Administration's five-pronged strategic force modernization program—consisting of ICBMs, strategic bombers, the Trident force, improved, survivable command and control systems, and revitalized strategic defenses—will ensure that the nation's nuclear forces could survive a Soviet first strike and retaliate. At the same time, this program provides essential leverage for equitable arms reduction; it does not move the world toward nuclear war but away from it.

Modernization of U.S. military capabilities, this Association believes, is imperative because of the scope and tempo of the Soviet weapons programs that outdistance this country's efforts in vital areas. The Soviets, over the past year, have begun testing new models in almost every class of nuclear weapons. They are dramatically expanding their Navy and Air Force. Their ground forces are being trained and equipped for preemptive attack. And they are using their military power to extend their influence and enforce their will—directly or with the help of surrogates—in every corner of the globe.

Exacerbating the problem is Soviet progress in narrowing or eliminating the technological gap between us and them. A key reason for this advance is that the Soviets have the world's largest R&D manpower—estimated at more than 900,000 scientists and engineers—compared to fewer than 700,000 on the part of the United States. The percentage of Soviet R&D manpower engaged in defense-related work is between fifty and seventy-five percent of the total number.

Supporting this force is the world's largest military-industrial base that includes more than 150 major plants located throughout the USSR. In turn, these key facilities are supported by a network of thousands of feeder plants. In recent years, the military has absorbed about fifteen percent of the Gross National Product of the USSR, compared to less than seven percent for the U.S., and, if current trends continue, the Soviet military share of the GNP will approach twenty percent by the late 1980s. Soviet military investments over the past decade were eighty percent higher than U.S. investments; in terms of R&D spending, the Soviets topped the U.S. investment by about seventy percent over the same period.

The main role of the Soviet war machine clearly is to undergird the step-by-step extension of Soviet influence and control by instilling fear and promoting paralysis, by sapping the vitality of collective security arrangements, by subversion, and by coercive political actions of every kind.

The latest manifestation of Soviet power politics is the crisis they and their surrogates are fanning in Central America. Enlightened self-interest—including our own national security requirements and those of our allies and friends—necessitates that the United States counter by diplomatic, economic, and other means Soviet, or Soviet-aided, efforts to set up Marxist governments anywhere, but especially at our doorstep. Military assistance, including training of anti-Communist forces, must be intensified to keep Moscow and its surrogates from toppling non-Marxist governments in that area and transforming these countries into Soviet satellites.

Our national security policy seeks to deter war at any level and of any kind. It follows that our military forces must be structured to provide an umbrella of military power that extends from strategic nuclear war and deterrence of space combat through conventional combat to special operations. In this context, this Association has, and continues to advocate, vigorous and prudent tapping of technological opportunities to provide our armed forces with the most potent tools and capabilities for deterring or, if need be, for winning wars. But the pursuit of technology must not become a substitute for sustainable, field-proven capabilities. Theoretical technological feasibilities at some uncertain future date are no substitute for forces in being and prudent development of technology that fills requirements established and formulated by combat-tested military professionals. Shunting aside technological evolution that builds on sound military doctrines and experience in favor of speculative approaches of uncertain military validity is likely to yield both poor defense and poor technology. The nation can afford neither.

The cause of deterrence is served best by increasing the warfighting capabilities of the armed forces. There is need for continued improvements in the readiness and staying power as well as modernization of the general-purpose forces, enhancement of mobility and airlift capabilities, and expansion and modernization of tactical forces. In turn, these capabilities must be built on the bedrock of readiness and sustainability, top-notch, realistic training, and, first and foremost, the dedication, motivation, and professionalism of the men and women serving in the Air Force and the other services. The nation must safeguard the central advantage that underlies our defense posture—the well-trained experienced professionals of its armed forces

The Air Force Association applauds increased recognition of the total, joint character of national defense and concerted efforts to avoid separate, narrow approaches that duplicate capabilities. No service fights alone. They must plan and exercise together just as they would fight—shoulder to shoulder.

This Association sees, as the overriding national security requirement, continuation of a steadfast national commitment to rebuild and maintain essential defense capabilities. The progress that is being made must continue through steady growth in defense funding levels in line with sound, long-term planning strategies. The preservation of America's heritage of freedom and liberty is well worth this price for, in the words of President Eisenhower, "in the final choice, a soldier's pack is not so heavy a burden as a prisoner's chains."●

GENOCIDE IN THE SOVIET UKRAINE

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 28, 1983

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in sorrowful commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the great genocidal famine in the Soviet occupied Ukraine. I wish to commend my colleagues, the Honorable DON RITTER of Pennsylavania and the Honorable GERALD SOLOMON of New York, for scheduling this special order so that the level of understanding on this cruel episode of history might be increased.

Few Americans are aware that in 1932 and 1933 an estimated 7 million persons lost their lives during an artificially created famine in the Ukraine, a nation which was the breadbasket of central Europe as a result of its fertile soil and productive farmers. The obscurity of this heinous crime against humanity is due to the fact that the famine was implemented in attempted secrecy and has since been vigorously denied by Soviet authorities. Despite numerous eyewitness accounts and press reports by Western journalists who were in the Ukraine at the height of the famine, only recently have accounts of this atrocious, Communist-planned genocide begun to appear in free world publications.

In 1932 under the ruthless leadership of Joseph Stalin, the Soviet regime ordered the Red Army into the Ukraine to confiscate all grain from the rural countryside. The grain was shipped to other parts of the Soviet empire or sold on the international market. The Soviet leadership was pursuing several objectives in this action. They needed hard currency to finance the Government's rapid industrialization program. Stalin also wished to decimate the independent will of the Ukrainian peasantry by destroying its most nationally conscious segment, the free Ukrainian farmer, through forced collectivization of agricultural output.

Watchtowers were erected so that authorities could better detect attempts at hoarding of foodstuffs. Peasants who refused to turn all their grain over to the state were executed. Farmers were physically prevented from leaving their fields and fleeing to the cities in search of food. Soviet authorities even went so far as to establish border checkpoints to prevent Ukrainians from entering the Russian Republic and to prevent anyone from bringing food from the outside into the Ukraine. Without food, without grain, without seeds, the peasant farmers began to starve. Within months, millions of persons were dead or dying. Some resorted to cannibalism to survive. The horror of this deliberate genocidal policy is compounded when one realizes that approximately 10,000 men, women, and children perished each day during the great famine.

While Moscow continues to deny that unusual demographic changes took place in the Ukraine, census figures from 1926 and 1939 conclusively reveal the magnitude of the catastrophe. While the total population of the U.S.S.R. increased by 15.7 percent—from 147,027,900 to 170,557,100—the number of persons in the Ukrainian Republic decreased by 9.9 percent over the same period—from 31,195,000 to 28,111,000. Such denial of events despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary is sadly reminiscent of recent Soviet behavior surrounding their massacre of the Korean passenger airliner.

As a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Baltic States and the Ukraine, I believe Ukrainian Americans and the world population as a whole deserve greater knowledge of this despicable tragedy. I certainly support the congressional measures which have been introduced to foster wider recognition of the Ukrainian genocide of 1932-33. I can do no less, for the evidence of this artificial famine in the Ukraine is further proof of the inherently diseased mentality of communism and the totalitarian state.●

CARL YASTRZEMSKI: THANKS FOR 23 GREAT YEARS

HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, October 2, Carl Yastrzemski played his last game for the Boston Red Sox.

"Yaz," as he is known to millions of baseball fans, ended his major league career in the manner in which it began—playing left field in Fenway Park and contributing a single to the Red Sox offense. For many sports enthusiasts, the Red Sox and Carl Yastrzemski were synonymous. In 23 big league seasons, Yaz played the game of baseball with uncommon skill, dedication, and enthusiasm. The statistical record of his tenure as a player reflects his success: most games played in the history of baseball, Golden Glove awards for excellence in fielding, the Triple Crown award for best performance by a hitter, the Most Valuable Player award as the best player in the American League and participation in 18 All-Star games.

Statistics alone, however, do not adequately depict what Yaz meant to the Red Sox. In an age when players change teams with distressing frequency, Yaz made a virtue of constancy. He was the bedrock upon which the Red Sox were built, and the success which the franchise has enjoyed since 1961 is due in large part to his efforts. He was the leader on the field, a fact acknowledged by his selection as team captain, and a respected representative of Boston and the game of baseball off the field.

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to envision the Boston Red Sox without Carl Yazstrzemski; to imagine the home team in Fenway Park without No. 8 in the lineup. Red Sox fans, and all who admire people who make the most of the talents they have, will miss him. The magical moments of his great career will not, however, be forgotten.●

ST. CASIMIR'S CELEBRATES DIAMOND JUBILEE

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, next Sunday I will have the pleasure of attending the concelebration of a mass of thanksgiving that will solemnly mark 75 years of dedicated service by St. Casimir's Church to the city of Newark, N.J.

The presiding celebrant at the noon mass will be the Most Reverend Peter L. Gerety, archbishop of Newark. There will also be a testimonial dinner to celebrate St. Casimir's Diamond Jubilee at the Polish Falcon Hall at 5 p.m.

The history of St. Casimir's is a dynamic and colorful one. From its humble beginnings as a parish, built on the toil and sacrifices of Polish Catholic immigrants, to its current day, the parish has consistently maintained a tradition of teaching the Catholic faith to the people in the Ironbound section of Newark.

Three-quarters of a century have passed since St. Casimir's first became a reality. And, today, it stands as one of the most beautiful and flourishing parishes in all of Newark.

The St. Casimir's of today is vastly different from the one built several decades ago. Yet, it has very much the same purpose today, as it did then, which is "a place of witness and service, a community of brotherhood and friendship."

In the city of Newark, the Polish people first built the parish of St. Stanislaus. Soon the Ironbound section of Newark, "below the railroad tracks," was populated to the point that it was necessary to conceive a second Polish church. Rev. Vitus Masnicki, then pastor of St. Stanislaus Church, realized the practicality of a church in the Ironbound, and purchased a plot of ground for the establishment of a second Polish parish.

Rev. Julius Manteuffel was appointed pastor of the second church for the Polish community, by the Most Reverend John O'Connor, bishop of Newark, and celebrated the first mass in St. Benedict's School Hall, on Sunday, September 6, 1908.

In July 1920, two years after the cornerstone was blessed, a new edifice, fully equipped, was dedicated and blessed by Bishop O'Connor. Celebrating the first mass in the new church was Rev. Vitus Masnicki. The Reverend Dr. Dworzak delivered the sermon. And the entire community had joined together honoring St. Casimir's Church as one of the largest Polish churches in the diocese of Newark.

With the building of the new church out of the way, Rev. Paul Knappek, who became pastor in 1912, now set out to build a new school which was started in March 1924, and completed that fall, at a cost of $121,000. The new school building was built not only for the current time, but also for the future as it was able to accommodate 2,000 pupils.

One of the remaining tasks, the painting of the church, finally took place in July 1925 and was completed in January 1926. It was beautifully redecorated with religious paintings depicting the life of St. Casimir. Five years after the painting of the interior of the church, Reverend Knappek made improvements on the sanctuary and sacristy. The nuns' convent, the last of the major building efforts, was completed in 1930.

Realizing the need for community gatherings, a clubroom beneath the church was constructed for the youth of the parish. Six bowling alleys, pool tables, shuffleboards, and other recreational facilities were purchased. With this, the building program was completed, with all buildings constructed to meet any possible future expansion.

Then on August 6, 1936, fire damaged the entire ceiling of the church proper. The cost of repairing the damaged ceiling was approximately $30,000, and also necessitated the redecoration of the church interior, with the installation of a new lighting system.

Keeping in mind the importance of having the parishioners closely knit, Reverend Knappek encouraged the organization of many church and secular societies. Most of these societies are still functional.

During these hard-working years, Father Knappek was appointed monsignor. Over his final years acting as pastor, Monsignor Knappek continued with the remodeling and renovating church properties until his death on May 5, 1964.

A month later Archbishop Thomas A. Boland appointed the Reverend Adalbert Kiczek as pastor of St. Casimir's. During his short reign as pastor, Reverend Kiczek made various improvements to the church properties, including the building of a library for the schoolchildren. Then on September 23, 1967, Rev. Adalbert Kiczek, at age 63, was fatally stricken as he began the 7 a.m. Mass. His assistant, the Reverend Edmund A. Zajac, died the following day at age 45. Rev. Theodore Czermak, who was assistant pastor at that time, became acting pastor until the appointment of the Reverend John J. Kulaga on January 20, 1968. Reverend Kulaga is still the pastor.

First order of priority on Reverend Kulaga's agenda was the major school renovation which was required due to deterioration over the years. In addition to the school, major improvements were required in the church.

Today, the parishioners of St. Casimir's are a very strong and proud group of Polish Americans. St. Casimir's is proud of its history, the sacrifices needed to build the physical plant, and the parishoners, who have continually supported it.

Mr. Speaker, I am looking forward to participating in this Diamond Jubilee celebration, and I want to commend all the persons who worked so hard to make this celebration a memorable one. These include Thad Zjawin and Sister Mary Joanita, cochairpersons of the Diamond Jubilee Committee; the honorary chairpersons: Reverend Kulaga, Rev. Adam Figula, Rev. Joseph Szklarski, Joseph Zepka, and Kay Linek; and the members of the committee: Henry Grzybowski, Florence Garlewicz, Walter Eustachewich, Mary Zjawin, Mildred Rucki, Julia Miktus, Helen Miktus, Brenda Cwiakala, Emelia Wisniewski, Julia Bozek, Eleanor Mirandi, Loretta Eustachewich, Patricia Check, Bernadette Kociolek, Stanley Zawacki, Genevieve Guziejewski, Alice Schreiner, Victoria Wesolowski, and Mary Pilecki.

I would also like to include in the RECORD the program of the testimonial dinner, as follows:

National Anthem: in English and Polish.

Invocation: Rev. Adam Figula, Associate Pastor of St. Casimir.

Introductory remarks: Thaddeus Zjawin, Parish Trustee of St Casimir.

Welcome: Henry Grzybowski, Parish Council, President.

Toast: Sister Mary Joenita, Congregation Sisters Saint Felix.

Speakers: Councilman Henry Martinez; Rev. Msgr. Alexander Fronczak, Pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Wollington, N.J., Rev. John J. Kulaga, Pastor of St. Casimir Church.

Dance Group: Presented by the children of the Polish Falcon Club.

Benediction: Rev. Joseph Szklarski, Assso-ciate Pastor of St. Casimir's Church.●

SUPPORT THE "CHEMICAL PEOPLE" PROJECT

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, on two successive Wednesdays, November 2 and 9, 1983, one of the most significant programing efforts in the recent history of public broadcasting will take place. On these two evenings, communities across the Nation will have an opportunity to join together to combat school-age drug and alcohol abuse as PBS broadcasts "The Chemical People."

Joining other PBS stations nationwide, the Central Valley's PBS affiliate, KVIE-TV in Sacramento, has organized town hall groups so that parents, students, and community members concerned about the use and abuse of drugs and alcohol can join with others in their community in viewing the programs, discussing the local challenge, and organizing continuing task forces.

This unprecedented offering will use television as a catalyst to initiate a valuable, widespread, ongoing effort to save youth and families from the destructive, heartbreaking effects of drug and alcohol abuse.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all of my colleagues to participate in "The Chemical People" projects in their communities. This is an ambitious undertaking that deserves our full support.●

CIANBRO CORP.

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, many of my colleagues are pleased that construction has been completed on the Wilson Bridge. I would like to give public credit to the Cianbro Corp. of Pittsfield, Maine, the firm responsible for completing the repairs 7½ months ahead of schedule.

Area residents are all familiar with TV and radio traffic reports chronicling the endless delays on this major commuter artery. Up to 130,000 vehicles use the bridge every day, the bulk of them being commuters in the Washington metropolitan area and long-distance truckers. Although repairs have been needed for years, local transportation officials delayed the work for fear of overtaxing surrounding bridges should the Wilson Bridge need to be closed during the day.

Cianbro Corp. devised an innovative means of repairs which minimized the inconvenience to commuters. Workers replaced the bridge's deck with prefabricated concrete slabs installed at night. The bridge was cleaned in time for rush hour each morning.

What is most striking about this contract, however, and almost unheard of in these days of cost overruns and endless delays, was that Cianbro Corp. completed the $23.2 million job 7½ months ahead of schedule. Government planners estimated that the work would take at least until next January, but expected that it would continue through next April. As an incentive Cianbro Corp. was offerred a $9,200 bonus for each day the project could be completed before May 1984. Other incentives were provided if Cianbro completed the job before January. The company rose to the challenge and earned $1.42 million as a result.

I know all Wilson Bridge users feel a sense of relief that the bridge has been completed. I would like to add a special commendation to the fine Maine firm of Cianbro Corp. for its innovative and efficient work.●

KIWANIS CLUB OF WILKES-BARRE CELEBRATES 65th INSTALLATION OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, October 8, the Kiwanis Club of Wilkes-Barre will celebrate its 65th installation of the board of directors. At that time, my friend, Dennis C. Garvey, will be installed as the 65th president of this Kiwanis Club.

In its 65 years, the Kiwanis Club of Wilkes-Barre has played a major role in the social, political, and medical well-being of the community. It is the founding club of the Wheelchair Foundation, a major contributor to local camperships, and has been involved, in differing capacities, in all of our valley's major charitable organizations.

A review of the roster of any local organization will find a Kiwanian or two serving actively. In all of the local schools and colleges, one will find Key Clubs and Circle "K" Clubs sponsored by the Kiwanis Club of Wilkes-Barre.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the point of the Wilkes-Barre Kiwanis Club is "to serve" and this meets the motto of Kiwanis, which is, "We Build."

And so it is my pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to salute the Kiwanis Club of Wilkes-Barre on its 65th anniversary and to congratulate my friend, Dennis C. Garvey, on his installation as president, and to congratulate, as well, his wife, Nancy, for having made it all possible.●

OFFICERS OF WILMINGTON, MASS., AMERICAN LEGION

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House the installation of officers of the American Legion Post No. 136 of Wilmington, Mass. This fine organization, like American Legion posts throughout our Nation, provides sound advice and a helping hand in times of need to veterans and their families. Post No. 136 in particular has established itself as an important part of the town of Wilmington, and a great deal of the credit should go to the post's outgoing Commander Paul Pintrich. I am certain that newly installed Commander Leslie J. Gauthier will maintain the post's extraordinary record of service.

I ask my colleagues to join me in commending the past work of Post No. 136 and in extending very best wishes for a fruitful and fulfilling future.●

MINNESOTA'S MEDAL OF HONOR

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, October 3, 1983, I was privileged to participate in a very special and solemn ceremony at Arlington National Cemetery, at which Gov. Rudy Perpich presented the Minnesota Medal of Honor for permanent display in the display room at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. The Minnesota Medal of Honor now takes its place along with those from other States in commemorating the sacrifice of the 13,000 Minnesotans who have died in the Nation's wars. From the Civil War battlefields of Gettysburg and Missionary Ridge, to Manila, Champagne-Marne, Pearl Harbor, to Inchon in Korea, and to Hue in Vietnam, Minnesotans have distinguished themselves in serving their country in our Armed Forces. Minnesota counts one-half million living war veterans among its 4 million citizens.

The Minnesota Medal of Honor was authorized by an act of the Minnesota Legislature in 1980. A special commission was appointed by the Governor to oversee the design and creation of this Medal of Honor. This commission was chaired by Judge Daniel F. Foley, a former National Commander of the American Legion, and also included former Lieutenant Governor Lou Wangberg, State Senator Bob Lessard, State Senator Robert Schmitz, State Representative Richard Kostohryz, Major General James G. Sieben, and the Honorable William Gregg, Commissioner of the Department of Veterans Affairs. Special mention should also be made of the support for this project given by numerous groups, including the Minnesota National Guard, the American Legion, AMVETS, the Disabled American Veterans, the Jewish War Veterans, the Military Order of the Purple Heart, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Veterans of World War I. These individuals and organizations deserve to be commended for their efforts in the creation of the Minnesota Medal of Honor. A duplicate of this medal will hang in the State Capitol Rotunda in St. Paul.●

GOODWILL AMBASSADORS

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, during the first session of the 98th Congress, there have been a considerable number of people from the Sixth Congressional District to visit our Nation's Capital. Their visits to the House and Senate chambers have been the highlights of their trips to Washington. I believe this is attibutable to the "goodwill ambassadors" of the Capitol—the Doorkeepers and Capitol Hill Policemen, who make an extra effort to see that our visitors remember their stay.

I particularly would like to pay tribute to Irvin "Obie" Oberman, Dorothy Miller, Donn Larson, and Arthur Curran. These individuals are perfect examples of the type of goodwill ambassadors who serve House and Senate vistors.

I personally want to express my appreciation for their courtesy and outstanding service. I am sure my colleagues will join me in praising and complimenting these fine public servants.●

ST. MARK'S EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF NESCOPECK, PA., CELEBRATES 75TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, October 8, St. Mark's Evangelical Lutheran Church of Nescopeck, Pa., will celebrate its 75th anniversary.

The congregation was organized on October 8, 1908, by 39 men and women who had been attending St. John's Lutheran Church in Berwick, and who decided a church was needed in Nescopeck because of the difficulties and uncertainties crossing the Susquehanna River to attend services.

The first pastor was the Reverend John A. Schofer, and under his guidance and with the work provided by members of the congregation, the original church building was constructed and dedicated on Sunday, December 20, 1908. Under the second pastor, Rev. John H. Young, the church experienced a time of remarkable growth. A number of church organizations were formed and the building itself was renovated. A pipe organ was presented by Andrew Carnegie.

On Christmas Eve, 1925, a fire destroyed the church building. But Pastor Earl S. Erb and the congregation were determined to rebuild. In less than 4 months, a parish hall was constructed and was used for worship until the new church building was dedicated on Easter Sunday, March 31, 1929.

A children's chapel was completed in the church basement and that was dedicated on September 14, 1952.

In 1969, St. Mark's decided to withdraw from the parish arrangement with Mt. Zion and St. James congregations, both also of Nescopeck. And so, after 61 years, a pastor was called to serve St. Mark's, alone.

On July 16, 1978, the Reverend Harold L. Hand, Jr., was called to the pastorate. Under his administration, the church has been carpeted, a newsletter and church directories have been published, the pipe organ has been extensively renovated, and new hymnals purchased.

But beyond its physical achievements, Mr. Speaker, is the intangible good which has been done to the entire Nescopeck community by the presence of St. Mark's, its pastors, and its congregation. Theirs has been an influence for good, for charity, for love of God, and fellow man.

And so, Mr. Speaker, it is an event of significance for all of the Wyoming Valley that St. Mark's Evangelical Lutheran Church celebrates its 75th anniversary on October 8. It is my honor to congratulate Pastor Hand and all of his congregation on that achievement and it is my pleasure, today, to share this happy event with my friends and colleagues in the House.●

GERALD D. ROBERTSON—A DEDICATED PUBLIC SERVANT

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, Saturday, September 10 was a very special day in the city of Brewer in Maine's Second Congressional District. The day was set aside by its 9,000 residents to honor one of their own who has given unselfishly of his time for the betterment of the community.

Gerald D. Robertson is one of those very rare individuals who has made a commitment to public service, devoting more than half of his lifetime to serving in public office.

He has been a member of the Brewer City Council for 37 years, and for 11 of those years served as mayor. He has worked hard to improve the economic base of his community and those efforts were recognized when the city council designated the main road through the city's industrial park as Robertson Boulevard.

Mr. Robertson's efforts in other areas have been untiring. As a specialist in housing and as executive director of the Bangor Housing Authority, he has used his expertise to improve housing for residents of Maine. He is also a member of the Housing Executives of Maine, and the Maine chapter of the National Housing Authority. Mr. Robertson currently serves on the advisory committee of the Maine Municipal Association and is a member of the housing committee of the Penobscot Regional Planning Committee.

Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to add to the honors bestowed on Gerald D. Robertson. For his years of dedication to public service, he deserves much gratitude, esteem and emulation.●

THE UKRAINIAN FAMINE: STALIN IN ACTION

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, let me recommend a Washington Post article to all of my colleagues concerning the tragic Ukrainian famine of 1932-33. Yesterday, thousands of Ukrainian-Americans from all over our great country marched here in Washington in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of that holocaust. Many of those who marched know from firsthand experience the reality of a totalitarian regime. They appreciate the importance of freedom and the wonderful democracy which we Americans enjoy.

As we in Congress still agonize over the tragic loss of 269 men, women, and children at the hands of Soviet pilots, memories of that terrible famine bring all of us to the realization that the two events are connected. These barbaric acts against the innocent reflect a definite bahavior pattern on the part of the Soviet Union. This is a lesson that has been painfully learned. We should not forget it.

As many of you know, the Ukrainian famine is by far one of history's greatest genocides. Fifty years ago, over 7 million Ukrainians died during the period from 1932 to 1933 in one of the first artificially engineered famines the world has known.

Stalin was intent on breaking the spirit of the Ukrainian peasantry in his drive to collectivize agriculture and crush Ukrainian nationalism. Some statistics show that nearly 14 million people may have died during the entire collectivization period from 1926 to 1937.

It is difficult for us in this Nation of affluence to imagine the enormity of the suffering. As their grain was confiscated and shipped to Europe on the orders of Stalin, millions of Ukrainians perished. Villagers attempting to leave the region were turned back at gunpoint while those who resisted were shot or exiled. The remaining villagers starved to death. This provided an economical solution to the nationality problem. Domestic and international assistance programs were not permitted by the Kremlin. The great irony of the planned famine is that it occurred during a period of agricultural abundance in the Ukraine.

A government willing to exterminate millions of its own citizens does not hestitate to kill another 269 for reasons of state or whim. The Soviets protected their airspace last month by downing an unarmed civilian aircraft and defended the principles of communism by planning a famine. The brutal behavior of the Soviets in the 1930's has changed little in the intervening years. Names and faces have changed, but the ideas are still the same. Our Government must keep this fact first and foremost. This knowledge of Soviet motivations and values must guide our negotiators and our leaders in any future dealings with the Soviet Union. In our arms control talks, we must never lose sight of the importance of verification so that we as a free people will be able to see for ourselves if the Soviets are keeping promises.

With these sobering thoughts in mind, I suggest that all of my colleagues read this brief article. I also want to pay a special tribute to the patriotic Ukrainian-Americans who came from near and far to honor the memory of those who perished. I salute the work of the National Committee to Commemorate Genocide Victims in Ukraine, 1932-33. Let me assure them that we will never forget.

UKRAINIANS COMMEMORATE VICTIMS OF 1933 FAMINE

(By Eugene L. Meyer)

Thousands of Ukrainian-Americans, from as close as Arlington and as far away as San Diego, massed at the Washington Monument yesterday, then marched to within 500 feet of the Soviet embassy to commemorate the millions who died in a 1933 famine they described as a "holocaust" perpetrated by the Soviet government to crush its political opposition.

At the Monument grounds, they listened to a series of speakers, many of them declaiming in Ukrainian but including also a Russian dissident, a Polish Solidarity leader in exile and a representative of the American Jewish Committee.

They also were read a message from President Reagan endorsing their remembrance of "those who suffered and died during the farm collectivization and subsequent forced famine and period of severe repression.

"That attempt to crush the life, will and spirit of a people by a totalitarian government holds important meaning for us today," Reagan's message said. "In a time when the entire world is outraged by the senseless murder of 269 passengers on Korean Airlines Flight 007, we must not forget that this kind of action is not new to the Soviet Union.

While the events that brought the Ukrainian Americans here happended half a century ago, for many they were as vivid as yesterday.

"I've lived with the famine as long as I can remember," said Halyna Hrushetsky, 41, who had flown in from Chicago to participate. "My mother lost four of her children in the famine."

She, her older sister who survived and their parents wound up in a German labor camp during World War II, spent the early postwar years in France and emigrated to the United States in 1956. She said Eleanor Roosevelt "saved us from repatriation. The only thing I remember of the camps were the bodies of the people who committed suicide rather than go back.

"My mother passed away last June. Her last words: 'Don't forget and don't forgive and pass the facts about these atrocities on to your children.' "

Yesterday's gathering and march were the culmination of a week-long observance sponsored by the National Committee to Commemorate Genocide Victims in Ukraine 1932-1933, a coalition of about 70 Ukrainian organizations, D.C. police estimated the crowd at 8,000. March sponsors said it was 10,000 to 15,000.

Speakers recalled the period when Stalin, in his drive to collectivize agriculture, ordered harsh government measures against farmers who were resisting his policies. Despite a reduced harvest in the fertile Ukraine, briefly independent but now one of 15 Soviet republics, its crops continued to be exported and there was widespread starvation, according to academicians.

Many of the marchers carried signs saying, "Seven Million were Starved by Moscow" and accusing the Soviets of a 50-year long "cover-up." "When these millions died, bells did not toll, and nobody wept for these people," said Dr. John Flis, president of the Ukrainian National Association.

To help rectify that, young and old, American-born and naturalized Americans born in the Ukraine, participated yesterday. They wore the colorful garments of their ancestral land, carried black balloons, waved yellow and blue flags, chanted "Freedom for Ukraine" and sang the Ukrainian national anthem, a 19th century composition which begins, "Ukraine has not died yet."

"There are all professions, all classes here, young people, old people, really a cross-section of the Ukrainian community," said Orest Deychakiwsky, 27, a congressional aide who read a "letter to the Kremlin" at 16th and K Streets, a block from the Soviet embassy. "These people are not war-mongers, they're people of all political persuasions."

"We marched to remember the seven million who died in the Ukraine," said Ivan Bilaniuk, 11, of New York City. "Russia is the worst country in the world. They have no feelings or anything, 'cause lots of people died, including little children."●

OFFICERS OF MALDEN, MASS., AMERICAN LEGION

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House the installation of officers of the American Legion Post No. 69 of Malden, Mass. This fine organization, like American Legion posts throughout our Nation, provides sound advice and a helping hand in times of need to veterans and their families. Post No. 69 in particular has established itself as an important part of the city of Malden, and a great deal of the credit should go to the post's outgoing commander, Louis A. White. I am certain newly installed Commander Thomas Flynn will maintain the post's extraordinary record of service.

I would also like to recognize the other newly installed officers—auxiliary president, Pauline Ross; auxiliary senior vice president, Catherine Ferguson; junior vice president, Mildred Crowell; secretary-treasurer, Josephine Moran; and chaplain, June Hirtle; Legion senior vice commander, Stephen Karigianis; junior vice president, Robert Flynn; adjutant, Alberta Langley; finance officer, John L. Gallant; historian, Thomas R. Toomey; graves registration officer, Charles Eggleston; trustee, John Demasi; and finance committee member, James Maher. The post's newly installed auxiliary executive board members are Regina Walsh, Helen Eggleston, Marie Miller, and Pamela Hirtle. The newly installed Legion executive board members are Joseph Regan, Thomas Murphy, Thomas Edwards, and Dennis Bourque.

I ask my colleagues to join me in commending the past work of post No. 69 and in extending very best wishes for a fruitful and fulfilling future.●

USING FEDERAL BANKRUPTCY LAW TO BREAK UNION CONTRACTS

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, last week Continental Airlines, the Nation's eighth largest air carrier, announced that it had reached the end of its financial rope and filed for bankruptcy under chapter 11 of the Federal Bankruptcy Act. Continental attributed its financial decline primarily to high labor costs and increased competition from other air carriers with lower operating costs. By filing for bankruptcy under chapter 11, Continental came under the protection of Federal law. The corporate assets remain intact, beyond the reach of the creditors, until the bankruptcy court is able to review and approve a rescheduling of the company's debts. Meanwhile, several thousand Continental employees have been laid off. These employees, unlike their employer, cannot delay payment on their home mortgages, electric bills, car loans, and all of the numerous other normal living expenses which we all incur.

Only a few days later, Continental announced that it was reopening for business on a much smaller scale, offering air service to only 25 cities rather than the 78 cities which were served prior to its bankruptcy. At the same time, Continental announced that it would recall only about 35 percent of its work force and that those who returned would have to accept wage reductions between 50 and 60 percent. Immediately on the heels of Continental's action, the Nation's largest air carrier, Eastern Airlines, announced that it would also file for bankruptcy unless its 37,500 employees agreed to accept an immediate 15-percent pay cut.

Mr. Speaker, there is no question that these two companies have experienced severe financial difficulties in recent months. The deregulation of the airline industry has sharply increased competition among various air carriers and has also led to a proliferation of new carriers flying new routes in competition with established carriers such as Continental and Eastern. Many of these new carriers are operating with nonunion personnel who typically work at lower salaries than employees who are covered by union contracts, such as those at Continental and Eastern. Unfortunately, a trend has developed whereby union carriers which face financial difficulties immediately lay the blame for their condition upon their employees. The standard management explanation has been to point the finger at "the unions" as the root cause of their financial problems, despite the fact that in most instances organized labor has sought to work with management to improve their competitive posture in the industry. As an example, Minnesota-based Republic Airlines has reached agreement with all of its unions to accept wage reductions and new productivity rules in the workplace, including longer working hours by flight personnel and mechanics. Union airline employees understand that their jobs depend upon the financial wellbeing of their companies and they have demonstrated that they are willing to work with management to achieve financial success. The cost of labor is only one of the many costs which is associated with the successful operation of an airline. In recent years, the cost of jet fuel has more than doubled, along with increases in the interest rates which airlines and other businesses pay for new equipment. Additionally, the deregulation of the airline industry has assured that the airline business will never be the same again.

The employees of Continental Airlines, who also happen to be union employees, have worked hard for their company and have sought to cooperate to maintain their company and their jobs. Continental claims that bankruptcy was its only option if the company was to survive in any form. But Continental has succeeded in nullifying its outstanding labor contracts simply by filing for bankruptcy. The workers at Continental and other airlines have improved their wages and working conditions over the years through the collective-bargaining process. What we have now seen, however, and may see again, is that what management cannot win at the bargaining table they may be able to win in Federal bankruptcy court by filing under chapter 11 and thereby nullifying their union contracts with their employees. Bankruptcy must be viewed as a "last resort," not as an incidential means of breaking union contracts and unilaterally imposing new wages and working conditions upon employees without collective bargaining. During the late 1800's and the early 1900's, before the passage of Federal labor laws, employers skillfully used the legal device of the injunction to prohibit employees from bargaining collectively. I hope that we will not see our Federal bankruptcy laws used in a similar fashion to nullify union contracts which result from the collective-bargaining process.●

VISIT TO RUSSIA

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, during the August recess, I had the opportunity to visit Russia. The highlight of that visit was a meeting with a group of refuseniks.

In a meeting packed with emotion, frustration, and great courage, I was asked to convey to the Congress their situation in Moscow. Each one with whom I spoke has been refused permission to leave Russia. Two individuals among the group held valid U.S. passports. They, too, were refused permission to leave Russia.

In our meeting, I was asked to publish two statements—one a letter to President Reagan, and the other dealt with the plight of one of those who holds an American passport—and to publish their names. I am exercising my discretion with the latter request, and will not publish their names for fear of retaliation.

Mr. Speaker, the plight of these people cry out for help. We, in this country, must do everything to expedite their exit to countries to which they have chosen to migrate.

I am attaching the two statements referred to earlier. I trust they will shed further light on this very deplorable situation.

EIGHT YEARS A HOSTAGE IN MOSCOW

(A statement by A.S.)

June 1983 marks eight years of my family's captivity as hostages in Moscow. No one in my family is a Soviet citizen. We were Soviet citizens till May 1975, when our citizenship was taken away so that we could emigrate.

I was born in Chicago, USA, in 1911, came to Russia in 1931 at the age of 19. I was immediately made a Soviet citizen without my knowledge or consent. I was invalided in the Soviet army in World War II. I worked as a translator. My Russian-born wife, Gita Rosovsky, now a citizen of Israel, was an analytical chemist, retired in 1973. Our son, 24, holds derivative U.S. ctiizenship, never having had any Soviet papers whatsoever. In captivity we can neither study nor work.

Upon receiving exit visas to Israel in May 1975, we shipped off all the belongings allowed us. We had to spend all our money and forfeit Soviet citizenship; emigrants from Russia to Israel must go penniless and stateless.

At the plane on our way out in June 1975, we were turned back on the pretext that my wife had allegedly been doing secret work. The place where she worked had confirmed in writing that she had not been doing secret work. Without security screening we could not possibly have received exit visas.

The Visa Office rescinded our visas on false pretenses, announcing that we were not being allowed out till June 1977. Since then, no reason at all is given for holding us.

Without the right to work, we have been living on charity for eight years. We complained endlessly to every conceivable office and official concerned. There has not been a single meaningful reply, only irrelevant formal rubberstamp refusals. Every single office and official is deaf to our problems. In all these eight years, no one has shown the least interest in our moral and material distress.

All our earthly belongings have been waiting for us in Israel for eight years. We complain regularly that we were unjustly stranded without clothing or any other belongings; we had no beds or beddings, no money, no documents essential for merely being in the USSR, let alone earning a living or studying. The Soviets refuse to register us under their laws as aliens, with the right to live, work, and study. My rights as a disabled war veteran are denied.

The Soviets refuse to say at least orally why they are violating our human rights and their own Constitution and laws. Why are they holding us captive a full ten years since my wife stopped working altogether? Why are they holding us six years after the term they themselves officially set for letting us free—June 1977?

My family demands to be released immediately from this heartless, unnatural detention in unfriendly circumstances. We demand that the authorities comply with our exit visas of May 1975 and their official decision of June 30, 1975, to set us free in June 1977.

Moscow, U.S.S.R.,
July 17, 1983.

HON. RONALD REAGAN,
President of the United States, The White House, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Tens of thousands of people who have applied to emigrate from the country where they live have seen signs of hope. Thanks to the principled stand of the countries participating in the Helsinki process, a joint decision has been taken to hold an international meeting to consider the problem of reuniting families. On the success of the meeting will depend the fate of people now deprived of rights guaranteed in many acts recognized the world over, including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

I write to you not in order to greet you on the achievements of the negotiations, but with concern about actual success in the fight for the right to emigrate. Success will be complete only when a mechanism is worked out to ensure the actual right to emigrate in practice, when each individual, with his little personal problems, is guaranteed the right to a judicial consideration of his case, when every instance of an unlawful refusal of the right to reunite with one's family stops (as guaranteed in the Helsinki Accords section on Cooperation in Humane and Other Spheres, paragraph 1, point 8).

In this connection, I would like to make the following suggestions:

1. It is necessary that the countries that signed the Helsinki Accords stop refusing anyone by sheer lawlessness and judicially unlawful pretexts, the right to reunite with their families, pretexts such as inexpediency, lack of motives for reunion, and so on. Every individual should have the right to choose for himself with which of his relatives he shall live.

2. Every individual prevented from emigrating because of a connection with state secrets should be given precise information how long he is to be restricted, what organization restricts him, and how to appeal against the restriction. Every individual must have the right and the possibility, if he finds that lawlessness is inflicted on him, to protest and in a set time, say, no longer than one-month, to receive a founded reply to the substance of his/her appeal.

3. It should be established that the countries party to the Helsinki process assume an obligation not to detain anyone for a period of more than five years.

At the present speedy rate of technological progress there can be no secrets of more than five years duration. Thus, detention for a longer period, as is common practice at present, is a manifestation of that very lawlessness. It is all the more impossible to detain people who applied to emigrate more than five years ago, without having had either then or now any access to sensitive information. Such people must immediately be ceded the right to reunite with their relatives.

4. It seems to me it would be most effective for countries to oppose with a consolidated stand all others that violate the points of the Helsinki Accords on the right to reunite families, so that all countries at once could examine particularly glaring unlawful cases. Such consolidation, and as much publicity about the relevant talks, since they do not touch upon any country's security, military or industrial status, could help put an end to the practice of unlawfully detaining people in the country where they live.

5. It would apparently be advisable to set up a special international commission of observers to supervise cases of refuseniks in any country who so desire, the commission to enjoy the right to contact any refusenik who applies to it, and with access to the emigration documents to an extent that would not interfere with the lawful, but lawless, interests in any country.

I am deeply convinced that it is in the power of the nations and their chosen governments to see that the word "refusenik," a disgrace to decent people everywhere, disappear from every language.

With sincere respect,

A POSSIBLE SECOND SOLAR SYSTEM

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute today to Dr. Fred Gillett, a brilliant scientist at the Kitt Peak National Observatory in Arizona.

Dr. Gillett's affiliation with Kitt Peak National Observatory has only enhanced the excellent reputation of this Tucson-based institution. Funded by the National Science Foundation, the observatory has made significant contributions to United States and international astronomy.

Dr. Gillett has recently made some important astronomical discoveries, from data obtained by NASA's Infrared Astronomical Satellite (IRAS), which could provide answers to some of our most basic questions about the origin of our solar system and the existence of other life in our universe.

I would like to share with my colleagues the following description of those discoveries.

A POSSIBLE SECOND SOLAR SYSTEM

Ever since Man first raised his eyes to the heavens, the human race has pondered its seeming uniqueness. Are there other suns, other solar systems, other planets, other life, other intelligent beings? Now, evidence has been found that hints our solar system perhaps is not alone in the cosmos. NASA's Infrared Astronomical Satellite (IRAS) has discovered a shell or ring of large particles surrounding Vega, the third brightest star in the Earth sky at a distance from our Sun of 26 light years. It is being postulated that this material could be a solar system at a much earlier stage of development than our own. Vega is thought to be less than a billion years old, less than one fourth the age of our Sun and its family of planets; scientists believe that our solar system, in its infancy, was a cloud of dust, gas and meteorite fragments that formed initially into a disk and then into objects as large as moons and finally planets. It is this shell or disk stage of evolution of the Vega system that is believed to have been discovered by IRAS.

Vega is one of the most-studied stars in the sky, and is a standard against which other stars' brightness and spectra are measured by astronomers. Like the sun, Vega is an ordinary, main sequence star; it is about twice the size of the sun and 60 times more luminous. Working with telescope data at the IRAS tracking and data acquisition center at the Rutherford Appleton Laboratory in Chilton, England, IRAS scientists Dr. H. H. Aumann of NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory, Pasadena, California, and Dr. Fred Gillett of Kitt Peak National Observatory, Arizona, studied Vega as a source for calibrating the telescope. They made the serendipitous discovery that Vega appeared very much brighter and larger in infrared light than expected from IRAS observations of other, similar stars. The two scientists soon determined that the radiation is coming from an extended region around the star stretching some 7.4 billion miles out from the star.

From theoretical considerations, the two scientists determined that the material must be much larger than cosmic dust grains, because such small particles would have already been gravitationally drawn back into the star, leaving intermediate- and large-scale debris in orbit around Vega. If a reasonable size distribution is considered and if the leftover material is evolving like our solar system, it may have coalesced into planets or small bodies. In addition, astronomers estimate that the system's total mass could rival that of all the planets, moons, asteroids and other bodies traveling around our Sun.

The genesis of IRAS goes back to 1800 when the astronomer Sir William Herschel deduced that radiant heat was a natural part of the continuous spectrum of electromagnetic energy. Because our vision is tuned to the particular lighting conditions of the Earth, we "see" only a few of the many "colors" of the universe; most of the electromagnetic spectrum is invisible to the human eye. The spectrum is divided into several categories, each with different wavelengths: at one end are the low-energy radio waves with wavelengths up to tens of thousands of meters; at the other end are the gamma rays where wavelengths are smaller than the diameter of an atom. The smaller the wavelength, the greater the energy of the radiation. Between the two extremes lies the infrared region with wavelengths from the shortest radio wave to the longer waves of visible red light.

Virtually every astronomical object radiates, emitting its energy over a wide range of wavelengths. The hotter an object is the more its energy output is concentrated in the short end of our spectrum; so that hotter stars appear blue (short waves) while cooler stars appear red (longer waves). When an object is not quite hot enough to shine in visible light it emits the bulk of its energy in the infrared. Infrared astronomy is thus the study of relatively cool objects that astronomers believe account for a significant amount of the universe's total energy output.

The newly-found mass of material around Vega is part of the cold, non-luminous matter of the universe; such material, with temperatures somewhere between absolute zero and a few degrees Fahrenheit, gives off little or no light. Yet it is likely to be as important cosmically as is the hotter, luminous material of the stars. The Vega ring, with a temperature 300 degrees below zero Fahrenheit, shines brightly in the IRAS infrared data.

Yet with all the information contained in infrared light, most of the waves, after billions of miles of uninhibited travel through all parts of the universe, are blocked from view as they reach the Earth, being absorbed by the atmosphere. Although since 1960 infrared observers benefited from new techniques and higher locations afforded by balloon, plane and rocket, the real solution to Earth's interfering atmosphere was to place an infrared telescope above that interference where it could be exposed to pure, unfiltered infrared radiation. The solution developed into the IRAS project, a joint venture between the United States, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom. The satellite was launched January 25, 1983, with a life expectancy of one year.

According to modern theory, a star is formed from a cool cloud of interstellar dust and gas that is somehow triggered to begin condensing. The mutual gravitational pull of its particles causes the cloud to contract further and heart up. Eventually it collapses into a hot, dense sphere, and internal pressures and temperatures reach a point where nuclear fusion processes begin. A star is born.

The unique contribution of infrared astronomy is that it can detect these proto-stars long before the "turn on" in visible light by sensing the heat they emit as they contract. The first proto-star with 10 times the mass of the sun was discovered by infrared astronomers in the mid-1960's. IRAS should be able to locate proto-stars that are much smaller over much of the galaxy. By detecting and identifying the distribution of these dusty proto-stars and other infrared emitters, the IRAS survey will allow astronomers to estimate the rate at which stars are forming in our galaxy and, by inference, in other galaxies. Conversely, IRAS can take inventory of stars dying and fading from visible light. The material ejected from these fading stars in turn resupplies the large clouds that will eventually become new stars. By mapping the galaxy-wide distribution of this dust, IRAS will be an important key to understanding the ongoing natural processes of stellar birth, death, and the recycling of matter.

Infrared also opens up an important region of the sky nearly invisible to optical astronomers—the center of our Milky Way galaxy, located in the direction of the constellation Sagittarius; with its ability to see through the thick dust in the plane of the galaxy IRAS can map previously unseen structure at its core.

Still more intriguing will be the information IRAS returns on certain unusual objects otuside the Milky Way that astronomers know already emit large amounts of infrared energy. Quasars and Seyfert galaxies, for example, pour out unexpectedly large amounts of energy for their size at all wavelengths. Some galaxies are known to have particularly large excesses in the infrared, and the reasons why are not clear. The IRAS survey is able to catalog such unusual sources so that their energy output in the infrared can be compared with that at other wavelengths. Most intriguing to date has been the discovery of another sun with a postulated evolving planetary system.

Approximately one year after IRAS ends its survey in space, NASA plans to release the primary mission's final products—maps of the infrared sky and a catalog of all major infrared sources, along with critical information on each one. This information will be available to the entire scientific community worldwide.

The IRAS maps, when completed, will show as much different sky than our familiar array of constellations, a different sky even than the one astronomers know from previous infrared study. We can only speculate on the total number of new sources that will be discovered. It is even quite possible that IRAS will discover whole new classes of astronomical objects whose only signature is in the faint infrared radiation they emit. As we learn to open our electronic eyes to the many "colors" of the electromagnetic spectrum, we come closer to putting together all the clues to understanding the great and deep complications of the universe.●

NATIONAL EMPLOY THE HANDICAPPED WEEK

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to note for the benefit of my colleagues, that this week has been declared "National Employ the Handicapped Week" to not only encourage the advancement of the disabled community in the workplace but also to bring to national attention the many achievements of handicapped individuals to the American work force.

As one of the original authors of the Rehabilitation Act of 1983 which helped to secure the right of all individuals—regardless of handicap—to access to jobs and job opportunities. Prior to enactment of this landmark legislation, few avenues existed to encourage employment of handicapped individuals, much less to provide them the opportunity to do so. I am proud to note that since 1973 a host of subsequent initiatives at the State and local levels of government have brought the disabled community into the mainstream of American life—where they always should have been.

This week will provide the opportunity for us to show that the disabled, thanks to American technology which has assisted in providing access to employment, can now look for and gain meaningful work. I encourage my colleagues to take the time to learn of the special work of the disabled in their own communities. In every city and town in our Nation, their contributions have and continue to be meaningful and substantial. We should rededicate ourselves to insuring that this opportunity remains so.●

TRIBUTE TO HENRY VISCARDI, JR.

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to one of the most remarkable men on Long Island. Dr. Henry Viscardi, Jr. is widely regarded as one of the foremost authorities in the fields of rehabilitation and education. He has committed his entire life toward assuring that handicapped and disabled persons are forever given the chance to reach their fullest potential. Dr. Viscardi has best summed up his crowning achievement:

It is the acceptance of disabled people as people, that they have the right to the same opportunities as other people.

During much of the 20th century, handicapped individuals were still generally regarded as societal outcasts, destined to a life of minimal fulfillment. Thanks to such extraordinary men and women as Dr. Viscardi, however, we have made tremendous strides in recent decades in accepting the handicapped, allowing them to grow and become active and vibrant participants of our society.

Hank Viscardi was born with only stumps for legs. Yet with great determination, he eventually learned to walk on artificial limbs. He attended Fordham University, married and became the father of four daughters. In 1952, he gave up his job, borrowed $8,000, and started Abilities, Inc. in Albertson, N.Y. This industrial plant was designed to employ handicapped persons and soon proved to the world that if given the opportunity, the disabled could succeed in industry. Today, the plant employs hundreds of workers who undertake a wide range of activities from design to electronics to data processing. Since its inception, over 6,000 people have left Abilities, Inc. to take jobs in the outside work force.

In 1962, Dr. Viscardi opened the Human Resources Center, a school for physically disabled children, which he still considers his greatest accomplishment of all. Over the years, the center has taught hundreds of students and has become a leading institute for research in the field of rehabilitation and training for the handicapped. Since opening the center, Dr. Viscardi has gained an international reputation as a leading educator of the handicapped, while the center has attracted thousands of visitors each year from schools, industries and governments from throughout the world.

Dr. Viscardi's awards and honors are numerous. He received the 1983 Horatio Alger Award in recognition of his years of exemplary service to our Nation. Most recently, Dr. Viscardi was appointed to serve on the Congressional Award Board along with such distinguished figures as former President Gerald Ford, Douglas Fraser, and Shirley Chisholm. While he retired as active president of the Human Resources Center in 1981, Dr. Viscardi continues to serve as chairman of the White House Conference on Handicapped Individuals and as a member of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped. Since World War II, he has written eight books, advised every President and received close to 20 honorary degrees.

While the list of his many achievements can go on and on, it is Dr. Viscardi's remarkable compassion and understanding for all inhabitants of this Earth, regardless of their human condition, which separates him from the rest and makes him one of the most outstanding men of our time.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud that the institutions founded by Dr. Viscardi are located within my congressional district on Long Island. I am equally honored to represent a truly distinguished man, Dr. Henry Viscardi, who has proven beyond question that all human beings should and must be judged not on their disability, but on their ability.●

A BILL TO HELP TAX-EXEMPT ORGANIZATIONS

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to help tax-exempt organizations and pension funds diversify their investments by enhancing their ability to invest in real estate. This bill will be particularly helpful to colleges and universities, pension funds, and foundations with relatively small endowments, and will result in no revenue loss to the Treasury.

Foundations, private colleges and universities, and other institutions face severe financial pressure. Federal budget cuts and diminished tax incentives for certain contributions have reduced funds available to charities. We need to act to help these groups survive, especially the smaller ones. Facilitating diversification opportunities in real estate investments is one way to help.

Diversification of investments is essential to protect the corpus of tax-exempt organizations. Many of these institutions suffered significant losses in the 1970's because the current tax restrictions on real estate investments limit their investment alternatives to bonds and securities. The real estate investment option is necessary to allow a tax-exempt organization to protect its corpus through diversification. In addition, such investments by these organizations can help expand funds available for real estate construction and renovation.

This bill creates a new section 501(c)(24), which will erase a number of inconsistencies in the current tax law that discourage if not completely prohibit investments in real estate. These inconsistencies have arisen haphazardly over the years.

The inconsistencies make it particularly difficult for smaller tax-exempt entities to invest in real estate. Under present law, they cannot combine their investments with pension funds in order to purchase property. This limitation particularly handicaps exempt organizations with relatively small endowments which rarely have sufficient funds to invest in real estate themselves in order to achieve a measure of diversification. Diversification by these organizations will be made possible by allowing several charities and pension funds to share in ownership of a real estate corporation. Under this bill, more than one (501)(c)(3) organization or pension fund would be permitted to own stock in a new section 501(c)(24) real estate holding corporation.

In addition, this bill provides that section 501(c)(24) organizations will be eligible for the acquisition indebtedness rules enacted in 1980 for pension plans thus removing an obstacle to the pooling of real estate investment funds.

At a time when Government funding of private foundations and other tax-exempt institutions is decreasing, it is important to remove burdensome, unjustified limits on the investment opportunities of these organizations. This bill will facilitate such investments with no revenue loss to the Treasury as a result.●

RESOLUTION CONDEMNING MARCOS REGIME

HON. SALA BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I am gratified that President Reagan has chosen to delay his trip to the Philippines in the wake of the murder of President Marcos' leading political opponent. I hope this administration is more forceful than it has been in telling Marcos that the United States will not tolerate or tacitly approve of the brutal tactics of his regime.

It is important that not only the President, but all Americans, express their abhorrence of such heinous deeds. I bring to my colleagues' attention a resolution passed by the San Francisco Democratic Central Committee, calling on the city's board of supervisors to end San Francisco's sister city relationship with Manila, the capital of the Philippines. I commend Agar Jaicks, former chair of the committee for his efforts to bring this issue to the attention of the people of San Francisco.

The resolution follows:

Whereas, on September 21, 1972, President Ferdinand Marcos, with pretext, declared martial law and eliminated the fundamental elements of Philippine democracy and

Whereas, Marcos immediately began the jailing of his political opponents and

Whereas, responsible reports continue that Marcos agents murder and abduct Philippine citizens without trial and

Whereas, on August 21, 1983, former Philippine Senator Benigno Aquino, an opponent of President Marcos and a leader of the democratic forces of the Philippines, was assassinated at the Manila International Airport while in the custody of Philippine government security and

Whereas, there were a number of eyewitnesses to Aquino's murder all of whom maintain Senator Aquino was killed by the Philippine military and

Whereas, continued silence about these atrocities in the United States implies acceptance of these acts and

Whereas, San Francisco has a sister city relationship with Manila which suggests approval of the Marcos regime, therefore

Be it now resolved, That the San Francisco Democratic County Central Committee calls upon the Mayor and the Board of Supervisors to suspend San Francisco's sister city relationship with Manila until all democratic institutions are restored to the Philippine people.●

DEFICIT IN THE INTERNATIONAL MARKETPLACE

HON. DONALD JOSEPH ALBOSTA

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, in recent years, the United States has experienced a large trade deficit in the international marketplace. One reason for this imbalance has been unfair trade barriers, placed by countries like Japan, on our Nation's products. High tariffs are placed on U.S. goods—discouraging their sale in foreign countries and protecting domestic industries. I strongly believe that free trade must be fair trade, or this country will continue to wind up on the short end of the stick. I believe the Congress must work to remove these barriers and require countries like Japan to end their unfair trade barriers.

The current trade deficits will continue to undermine any possible economic recovery in this country. Industries such as automobiles, steel, footwear, and metalworking are especially being hurt by these practices, causing a large loss of jobs and adding to our already high Federal deficit. As a Representative of the 10th District in Michigan, many of my constituents have been directly affected by these large trade deficits and I believe that the Congress and the administration must take steps to curtail these unfair trade practices and provide a vital economic boost to our domestic economy.

During the upcoming trade negotiations with Japan, the United States must make clear its intention to resolve this critical trade deficit problem and remove the barriers to fair and free trade. In addition, the recent decision by the Japanese Government to remove automobile quotas will probably harm future negotiations between these two countries.

It is time that this country stop being the dumping ground for the rest of the world. If the United States does not stand up for its own basic industries such as steel, automobiles, metal working, and footwear, no one else will and we will fast become a second rate nation. Trade policies go right to the heart of our national security and this country better wake up before it is too late and our basic industries, vital to our national security, disappear.

As I said in the beginning, free trade must be fair trade. Public officials, economists, and others who believe the foreign trade system is fine should get back in touch with reality and see what unfair trade practices like those practiced by Japan, Taiwan, and England have done to the automotive, textile, and steel industries. Enough is enough.

Americans want to work and be part of our Nation's economic growth. Without changes in our present trade laws, other countries will continue to keep their trade barriers up to American products, particularly agriculture commodities, while dumping their surplus in the United States. This Nation cannot afford to continue to suffer large trade deficits and economic problems for years to come. Changes in our trade policies can help to reduce unemployment, the Federal deficit and fairness to the export market.●

IN SUPPORT OF BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL POST OFFICE BUILDING

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House unanimously passed H.R. 3238, a bill to designate the U.S. Post Office Building in Flushing, N.Y., as the Benjamin S. Rosenthal Post Office Building.

As one who served with Ben in the House, I am pleased that the House has bestowed this high honor on one of the most effective Members ever to serve in this body. For more than 20 years, Ben Rosenthal provided the highest quality representation to the people of the Borough of Queens in New York. For 10 of those years, I also represented an area of Queens and worked especially closely with Ben Rosenthal.

Ben was one of the pioneers of the consumers rights movement in this Nation, serving with great distinction as chairman of the Government Operations Subcommittee on Commerce, Consumer and Monetary Affairs. He was a crusader on behalf of all consumers and was viewed as a champion by consumer groups.

Ben was also a valued member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and left a legacy of legislative accomplishments there as well. He was an effective advocate for peace—and for the right of the State of Israel to exist as a sovereign nation. He led the fight which resulted in a suspension of arms to Turkey for their illegal invasion and occupation of Cyprus. He led the effort to provide humanitarian aid to the Cypriot people.

Ben was a familiar face in the Queens community. He was an accessible public official—always appearing at functions no matter the day or the time. He would conduct informal meetings on the streets of Queens—he was an avid listener and activist on behalf of solving people's problems.

It is fitting that this post office be named after Ben. It is a central feature of the Flushing community as was Ben for so many years. It will serve as a constant reminder to the people of Queens who were served so long and so well by Ben Rosenthal.

Ben Rosenthal was an excellent Congressman and a good friend. He was a man of commitment, competence, and compassion. He is missed by all of us who had the pleasure to know him.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE REVEREND ROBERT J. VITILLO OF THE DIOCESE OF PATERSON, N.J., 1983 MAN OF THE YEAR, FEDERATION OF ITALIAN SOCIETIES

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, On Sunday, October 9, the residents of my congressional district and State of New Jersey will honor an outstanding community leader, good friend, and esteemed executive director of social ministries of the Diocese of Paterson, the Reverend Robert J. Vitillo, whose standards of excellence throughout his lifetime have earned him the highly coveted citizens award of one of our most prestigious Italian American organizations—the 1983 Man of the Year of the Federation of Italian Societies of Paterson, N.J.

Mr. Speaker. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join in extending warmest greetings and felicitations to Father Vitillo and share in this testimonial to all of his good works with distinguished representatives of the city of Paterson, St. Anthony's Parish of Hawthorne, and the Federation of Italian Societies—

The Honorable Frank X. Graves, mayor of Paterson; Monsignor Joseph A. Ciampaglio, pastor of St. Anthony's; Anthony DeSopo, federation president; Carmello Corallo, dinner chairman; Philomenia DeSopo, ticket chairman; William J. Pascrell, master of ceremonies; and all of the members of the Federation of Italian Societies as they gather in tribute to Father Vitillo during the celebration of Columbus Day on October 9.

Mr. Speaker, as a nation comprised of all people of all nationalities and regions throughout the world, each singularly, and rightfully so, proud of his or her individual heritage and united in common endeavor of freedom, justice, and a good life for all, we can most assuredly be proud of the exemplary achievements that the people of Italian heritage have contributed to America's greatness.

As we all know, Columbus Day is a day of special importance to Americans of Italian heritage when all Americans should join in recognizing the great contributions of Italian Americans to our country's cultural, scientific, athletic, and commercial achievements, and religious vitality. The selection of Father Vitillo as the Man of the Year of the Federation of Italian Societies during the observance of Columbus Day 1983 is applauded by all of us.

Mr. Speaker, our Man of the Year, Father Vitillo, we are proud to boast, is a native of New Jersey. He completed his undergraduate studies at Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wis. He pursued graduate studies in theology and psychology at the Catholic University of America and received his M.S.W. degree at Rutgers, the State University, New Jersey.

Father Vitillo joined the staff of Catholic Family and Community Services, Paterson, N.J. in 1971 for residential treatment and executive director. He presently serves as the executive secretary of the social ministries secretariat of the Diocese of Paterson. Father Vitillo is a member of the NCCC Program Committee and also serves on its Jane Gallagher Award Committee. In addition, he is chairperson of the Research Committee of the Northest Coalition of Italian Apostolates, serves on the board of the National Committee for Adoption, and is chairperson of the New Jersey Committee for Adoption. He also chairs the New Jersey Conference of Catholic Charities.

In 1982 Father Vitillo completed a study of the pluralistic structures of Catholic charities organizations for NCCC. He has also published articles on residential treatment, refugee resettlement, and international aid efforts.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed appropriate that we reflect on the deeds and achievements of our people who have contributed to the quality of life here in America. As we join today in saluting Father Vitillo, may I also take this opportunity to add the deep appreciation and gratitude of all Americans for the wealth of wisdom and cultural enrichment that the people of Italian heritage have contributed to the quality of our way of life here in America.

With heartiest congratulations and best of wishes to Father Vitillo and deepest of appreciation for all of his good works on behalf of our people, we do indeed salute a distinguished citizen, good friend, and great American—the Reverend Robert J. Vitillo, 1983 Man of the Year of the Federation of Italian Societies.●

CHRISTMAS CAME EARLY ON FRIDAY

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, in an average week, my office gets about one grant announcement from a Federal agency reporting on some expenditure of funds in the Ninth Congressional District.

One should never look a gift horse in the mouth, but Friday, the last day of the fiscal year, we received six such announcements: from the Air Force; from the Navy; from HUD; from Transportation; from Interior; and from Commerce.

There was no partridge in a pear tree, and the seven maids a milking had all their product in a Government warehouse, still awaiting disposal.

I am glad to see created in the Ninth Congressional District, and I am sure that all the grants in my district were wise and sound ones. But when you multiply this type of frenzy by 435 congressional districts, Uncle Santa Claus is sure to have made some mistakes and unsound decisions. Such haste is sure to make waste, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps it is time for Congress to discipline this last-minute grantmanship and mandate that agency spending in the last month of a fiscal year cannot be more than, say, 10 percent of the agency's annual budget.●

RICHARD GORDON WILSON: A CALIFORNIA TRAIL BLAZER

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, California is a land of great contrasts. This is true not only of its topography but also of its people. We have beaches and mountains, deserts and forests, great expanses of agricultural land and two of the most densely populated urban areas in the country. Our political philosophies could be characterized as anchoring the two extremes of the political spectrum. And so it is with our social and economic philosophy. To the rest of the Nation, California is a symbol of opportunity, freedom, and liberty. It appears to be the home of the most liberated, the freest of the free.

But even in this land of liberty, there are freedom trails yet to be blazed. There are paths leading to social and economic equity that are unexplored. And the pioneers who first mark these trails for others to follow are as courageous in their way as were the pioneers who led the way to California.

Richard Gordon Wilson is one of California's modern trail blazers. He is one of those leading the way toward economic equity for all citizens in our State. Californians' love affair with the car is well known. Through his auto dealership in Huntington Beach, Richard Wilson has bestowed on many Californians the mobility they so much cherish. Shockingly, in Orange County, where Wilson's dealership is located, there has not been a black member on the board of directors of any major dealership. Richard Wilson has just changed that. On August 17 of this year, he appointed Vernal Claiborne of Carson in the 31st Congressional District to the board of directors of his dealership. Mr. Claiborne holds a MBA from UCLA and was formerly president of Bank of Finance.

Wilson's appointment of Claiborne will open to black business persons an area of commerce previously not accessible to them in Orange County. Equally importantly, one dealership in that county now has a board member able to identify personally the concerns and desires of black consumers.

Beyond establishing a unique link with the black community in southern California, Richard Wilson has created a forum in which the considerable skills of black business persons may now be demonstrated for all to see. In so doing, Mr. Wilson has blazed the path toward a new land of opportunity for minorities in southern California. His courage and his example are significant and fully deserving of recognition by everyone in this House of Representatives. It is, therefore, with pride that I call the attention of my colleagues to Richard Wilson's pioneering act. It should serve as a marker of fairness and enlightened business practice not only to automobile dealers, but to all those who until now have hesitated to set their businesses on the path toward economic equity for all. Mr. Wilson, our thanks for pointing the way.●

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the great opportunity to hear first-hand the learned views of one of Europe's greatest statesman, former Chancellor of West Germany, the Honorable Willy Brandt. The remarks, delivered at a congressional hearing sponsored by my good friend and distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, Representative EDWARD MARKEY, outline a European perspective on the current arms control talks between the United States and the Soviet Union. I am sure that my colleagues will agree that the substance of Mr. Brandt's talk is of profound significance. It underlines what many of us have held for some time; that arms control issues are geopolitical and of vital importance to all people of all countries. I would like to insert these remarks in the RECORD.

The testimony follows:

WILLY BRANDT TESTIFIES ON INF

The negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union are of crucial importance to us. In Europe, East and West confront each other at arms length—they are not separated by mountains, deserts or oceans, there is just a fence of ugly walls and barbed wire.

And it is such a tiny area, although densely populated; one tends to forget that my own country is just the size of Oregon but has almost 60 million inhabitants. And on both sides of the demarcation line one finds a higher concentration of nuclear warheads than anywhere else on this globe. Nobody in Europe wants a new arms race and this certainly is not a Party issue.

But on behalf of my political friend perhaps I state with more emphasis than others that we do not want the existing situation to become more tense, we do not want that one simply capitulates in the face of the driving forces of the arms race. It must be possible, we believe, that political leaders gain control of this course of events.

And I sincerely hope they will succeed by the end of this year. If they do not manage to do so they should continue to negotiate rather than to enter into an operation which certainly will be followed by another round of Eastern deployment. One does not have to deploy new missiles simply because deadlines and schedules had been fixed four years ago—under assumptions which at least partially turned out to be dubious.

I believe that political rationality must not fall victim to fixed schedules. And obviously it would be rational to postpone deployment if it turned out that there has just not been enough time for serious negotiations. But I am the first to admit that political will is even more important than the time-table.

It is true to say that an agreement in Geneva to a certain degree is being blocked by the existence of British and French nuclear weapons—which of course belong to the West and not to the moon—then there are only two ways of reaching a solution: either one abolishes them, which I am not proposing—but for this there are no prospects at present—or one finds ways of ensuring that they do not pose an obstacle for agreements between the US and the USSR.

Merging the two sets of negotiations, INF and START—as demanded in the Freeze-Resolution passed by the House of Representatives—or at least coordinating them effectively appeals to me as utterly plausible. And I think this also might be acceptable to our French and British friends. German Social Democrats in general agree with this proposal for the following reasons:

Merging or effectively coordinating INF and START can avoid a situation where limitations in one area are blocked or bypassed by adding new arms in the other area;

Merging negotiations might allow to deal with mutual threats within one general context; and the necessary consideration of the nuclear systems of third states would be facilitated;

Merging INF and START also would accord with the substantive content of NATO's dual-track decision, namely that negotiations on medium-range systems should take place 'within the framework of SALT III'.

Now I have heard people say—even before my stay here in the United States—that we in Germany had asked for the missiles in the first place and that our present Chancellor still very much wants them. And that we must not forget the threat posed by the Soviet SS 20s.

Let me take the last point first: The Soviet build-up of SS 20s certainly must be brought down. And my reading of recent Soviet statements is that they admit having gone far beyond what is reasonable and acceptable. I have told them that it would be not only reasonable, but even wise, if they made a beginning exercise of unilateral reduction.

My own experience tells me that when dealing with Soviet Leaders, who by the way have human reactions too, you need firmness combined with readiness to cooperate and respect for the prestige of that other super power. In my judgement these points of orientation were already observed by presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy over 20 years ago.

As far as the Federal Chancellor is concerned, I am not entitled to speak on his behalf. But I believe one should not exaggerate his enthusiasm. Apart from that it is correct: we Social Democrats supported the dual-track decision in 1979.

I gave my personal support—because I supported Chancellor Schmidt and because we saw it as a chance of getting the arms race in Europe under control.

Immediately before we took our decision the governments of the United States and the Soviet Union had concluded SALT II, the agreement to limit Intercontinental Weapons. Our support for the dual-track decision was also to prevent the SALT II agreement from being undercut by an arms build-up in the medium- and short-range weapons sector. That was Helmut Schmidt's worry, that was my worry, too. In addition to this we supported the NATO decision because it allowed time for negotiations—we thought our side should not immediately react with armament measures.

At that time it was impossible to foresee that opportunities were going to be lost and that precious time would be wasted—not for the development of missiles, but for negotiations.

For us in the SPD the dual-track decision was also acceptable because we could attribute it to the work and influence of our Federal Chancellor and our responsible Ministers that NATO agreed on the following principles (Communique of 12 December 1979):

The decision was intended to "promote the process of détente";

The decision stipulated that arms control was "to promote stability in Europe", namely "on the basis of what had been achieved through SALT II" and "within the framework of SALT III."

The decision did not involve an isolated regional balance since this harbored the danger of a decoupling from the United States and her central strategic deterrence. At the center really was the limitation of the additional threat from Soviet SS 20s which had been increasing since 1976.

Let me add this point: When we adopted the dual-track decision, Western Europe had already lived for more than 20 years in the shadow of about 600 nuclear warheads mounted on Soviet medium-range missiles. NATO had until then not deemed it necessary and meaningful to counter this with additional arms in this specific area. The dual-track decision only concerned the increase on the Soviet side, the number of additional warheads which had been, and were still being, mounted on the SS 20s.

In formulating their resolutions the German Social Democrats took this objective of the dual-track decision very seriously. And we clearly defined as the aim of negotiations that the USSR must reverse the threatening build-up since 1976 in order to render superfluous the deployment of additional American systems in Western Europe. That was our zero-option in 1979 to which we had committed ourselves. And that has remained our zero-option ever since.

In other words: We have never changed our position concerning the above mentioned components of the dual-track decision.

Therefore, our present discussion about the dual-track decision—almost as serious as your quarrels in certain areas of security—have a different origin: We had to realize that there has occurred a complete change in the political environment and in conditions and assumptions on which our original decision had been based.

(a) Instead of a ratified SALT II Treaty and evisaged follow-up agreement we have a continuation of the arms race at every conceivable level.

(b) Our American friends found it necessary to opt for the complete modernization of their strategic weapons.

(c) The production of neutron weapons has been resumed—which many of us in Europe noted with concern.

(d) Now even the production of binary chemical weapons has been decided.

Similar efforts are noticeable on the Soviet side. And nobody should try to give me lessons about Russian stubbornness and the over-developed Soviet security-complex.

Now, on our side, arms control, worries about stability and the willingness to make every effort to achieve successful results in negotiations—all this does not harmonize with the public announcement of doctrines based on the option of a "limited" or "protracted" nuclear war.

In an atmosphere of confrontation it is very difficult, in my view, to conclude any agreement on détente in the military field.

It was recently mentioned that I had had reservations from the very beginning regarding our support for NATO's dual-track decision. That did not prevent me from supporting my successor in the chancellorship. But I am afraid that events vindicated my feeling of scepticism.

The dual-track decision was based on the assumption that for the following four years East-West relations would remain more or less the same as they were in 1979. Today, it is becoming more and more apparent how profoundly international conditions have changed. However attractive the dual-track decision appeared in 1979 as a "timetable for arms control," it has in fact been impossible to anticipate the change which happened since. For that reason, I rather favour delaying the deployment of the missiles if no agreement becomes possible by the end of the year.

I really believe that part of what President Reagan said at the UN earlier this week, also speaks in favour of flexible time-limits. Because if you include Forward Based systems and especially planes—and I think this a constructive approach—then you face new problems of verification which probably can not be settled within the next few weeks to come.

But I still would very much prefer if a bilateral agreement could be reached during the weeks ahead of us.

The armament part of the dual-track decision was to achieve two things: first, to bring the Soviets to the negotiating table; and second, to exert pressure and create an incentive for them to reach a positive result at the negotiations.

To a certain degree this already worked: the Soviet Union has agreed to negotiations and had later moved away from some of its starting positions.

The Soviets even went as far as making an offer to scrap a significant number of their SS 20s. In other words, the pressure has led to results. Recently the Soviets even declared to be as ready for a total Freeze as for reductions and destroying of their SS 20s. So far as I am informed, this was not offered in Geneva but by statements vis a vis European partners. We should try to force the Soviets to stick to the proposals they made.

Reflecting this context I have personally made a proposal which could take into consideration both, Soviet reductions and a halt of the nuclear arms race and it could take into account certain verification problems:

(A) The two nuclear superpowers USA and USSR jointly declare that, each of them from a specific date of time, will announce and practice a total freeze on the testing and deployment of nuclear weapons. As is well known, both the testing of nuclear weapons and their deployment are verifiable by national means.

(B) As from the beginning of such an agreement testing and deployment of new nuclear weapons, the USA also declares their renunciation of the deployment of new medium-range systems in Western Europe, whilst the USSR simultaneously declares the beginning of the reduction and destruction of its medium-range missiles targeted on Western Europe. These measures of renunciation and dismantlement are also verifiable with national means.

(C) The USA and USSR begin negotiations on measures for verifying their agreement also on the production of new nuclear weapons, with the aim of agreeing a mutual and verifiable freeze on nuclear weapon production within one year.

(D) The USA and USSR merge or effectively coordinate the two sets of negotiations, INF and START, so to agree on a plan of reduction of armaments, which at first would focus on a reduction in the number of the most destabilizing weapon systems.

The important issue now is to concentrate on the outcome of the negotiations. At the same time, we should realize two things: we cannot have all of our proposals and projects fulfilled, and we must remain willing to compromise.

Let me warn you about any hopes of expecting the Soviet Union to be prepared to make more far-reaching concessions once deployment will have started.

I believe this to be an illusion, and I base this judgement on my experience since 1949. It is in the weeks ahead—before new missiles are deployed—that there might exist a chance for reaching a satisfactory outcome.

There is another point: highly accurate American missiles which only take a few minutes to reach the Soviet Union, deployed on the territory of a country which invaded Russia twice with terrible effects—may perhaps have a great trauma for the Soviet Union as Soviet medium-range missiles on Cuba were for the USA. And this might be taken into account.

Thus there are also dangers which might result from individuals getting out of control or from failure of the computer system. If following a Pershing II deployment, the Russians decided to put their missiles into a "Launch-on-warning-position", this could introduce another factor of extreme uncertainty. The way out would obviously not be to provide the Soviets with more advanced American computers . . .

Let me conclude by saying that nothing is gained for the Alliance if we deploy some additional missiles and lose the support of the hearts and minds of millions of people concerned. This support is also a factor of strength and security.

Nothing is gained if we, in a hurry, cement the dividing line between East and West in Europe, instead of making an uttermost attempt to promote cooperation wherever possible. It is easy to applaud dissidents.

It is also easy to make the Iron Curtain a new and terrible and long-lasting reality.

It may be interesting to note that both German states—in spite of all their deep-rooted controversies—have adopted a similar view on the question of avoiding a new arms race on German soil, in this case: first on their side, then on ours, then on theirs again. The noticable improvement in relations between the two Germanies in recent months is clear evidence of this common interest.

As different as the political and social systems are in the two German states, they share a common interest in survival. We do not approve of their political and social system—in fact we reject it; but our future is tied to theirs: only together can we survive.

And much beyond the interests of my own people: I propose we should pay attention to the objective mutual interest in common survival. And without neglecting those important issues of Western security, we should pay great attention to the obvious interdependence between armament and development and even the world economic crisis.●

THE CONSERVATIVE CAUCUS POLL

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues—in case they missed the announcement—the results of a poll run by the conservative caucus on cutting the U.S. contribution to the United Nations.

A few weeks ago, a friend and former Republican opponent of mine, the Reverend Neil Snider, of Bellingham, Wash., sent me his copy of this poll, the accompanying fact sheet and his comments, which I would like to share with you:

If the Conservative Caucus ever had any credibility, and I guess that it does with some people, only the intellectually blind and ignorant will remain loyal to an organization that attempts to control the results of a poll and then distribute the results as though they represented something meaningful. * * * It seems strange to me that an organization that speaks so strongly against communism adopts tactics so closely resembling those of communism, that is, controlling a poll so as to achieve a pre-determined desired result. Those kinds of tactics are equally reprehensible to me whether they are used by the extreme right or the extreme left, which frequently seem to me to be so similar * * *

I will not introduce the 10 pages of material that the conservative caucus included to inform poll recipients of how they were expected to vote. The dullest of Communists receiving instructions from the Politburo could have no more doubt as to the correct party line than anyone receiving the conservative caucus poll. Over and over, the United Nations is declared "anti-American," "Marxist," and that "the overall goal of the United Nations is the establishment of world socialism."

The caucus' national director assures recipients of the poll that:

I'm confident some people I write will send $100 so I can poll 300 additional people * * * Our goal is to receive one million ballots. No Senator or Congressman dare ignore 1,000,000 concerned voters.

And lo and behold, last week the conservative caucus released the results. The returns were a tiny fraction of what they were expecting. Yet they couched the results as "Most Americans believe * * *." Finally, they concluded that of those responding 96.6 percent favored cuts in U.S. funding to the United Nations.

96.6 percent is certainly a most impressive figure—it is about the same figure by which Bulgarian commissars traditionally win their elections.●

SACRAMENTO AREA FIREFIGHTERS, LOCAL 522, CELEBRATES 46TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, the Sacramento Area Firefighters, Local 522, are celebrating this year their 46th anniversary of their charter.

The citizens of the Sacramento area appreciate the selfless dedication of the men and women firefighters who daily face the lifethreatening emergencies in our community. Over the last 46 years, the role of firefighters has grown. The cumbersome horse-drawn, boiling fire wagons have been replaced by elaborate high-technology, diesel engines and even helicopters. Bucket brigades have long since been replaced by chemical weapons to deal with burning substances unknown to our predecessors. Advances in medicine demand that firefighters be acquainted with the latest paramedical training. Firefighters must have the psychological training, stamina, and compassion to deal correctly and efficiently with persons in high-stress situations. Decisions which can change people's lives must be made in precious seconds.

In order for Sacramento area residents to continue to have confidence in their emergency response providers, this community must continue to express its confidence and support the labor unions which promote the highest standards for public service employees.

As Sacramento has grown, and as the duties of firefighters have grown so has the role of local 522 become increasingly important. As the resources to compensate public service employees diminish, and as the stature of these same employees is unfairly tarnished by fiscal critics, the need for strong union organization and leadership becomes vital.

So it is with great pleasure that I therefore bring to the attention of the Congress and the American people the 46th anniversary celebration of the Sacramento Area Firefighters, Local 522. In so doing, I wish to recognize the long hours and many years of dedicated service which the firefighters of the Sacramento area have given to our community. May all Americans give firefighters their utmost respect and support as they continue to perform their most important work for all of us.●

MANHATTAN BEACH WELCOMES JASA'S SCHEUER HOUSE

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, on October 9, the Jewish Association for Services to the Aged will officially dedicate its newest housing for the elderly, Scheuer House in Manhattan Beach.

Scheuer House was created by a major renovation of the old Manhattan Beach Hotel under a $7.7 million Federal 202 housing grant and with a $750,000 gift from the S. H. and Helen R. Scheuer Foundation. The facility fills a critical need in our community for safe, affordable housing for our senior citizens.

I am proud to have played a role in bringing the Federal funds to Brooklyn for this housing, and I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the many dedicated people at JASA who worked to make this housing a reality. Without the tireless energy, dedication, and imagination of Bernard Warach, JASA's able executive director; of Morris Stutman, the director of housing management; and of Rabbi Jerome Fishman, the Brooklyn Borough director, the rebirth of the old Manhattan Beach Hotel into this exemplary residence for the elderly would never have been accomplished.

Scheuer House-Manhattan Beach provides safe, attractive, and affordable housing for 250 elderly and handicapped New Yorkers in its 150 subsidized apartments.

Many of the residents formerly lived in dilapidated and rundown buildings under the most difficult conditions. For these seniors the opportunity to find new homes at Scheuer House has literally provided them with a new "lease" on life. Rentals are fully subsidized under the Federal section 8 program, and all residents had to meet the income eligibility requirements before they could be considered for an apartment in this development.

The critical need for senior citizen housing in our area can be demonstrated by the fact that 6,500 applications were received for the 150 apartments at Scheuer House. A lottery system was devised under the close scrutiny of HUD to provide all applicants with an equal opportunity to obtain an apartment. After exhaustive efforts by JASA, the apartments were quickly occupied, while many thousands remain on the waiting list.

Scheuer House is fortunate to have a senior alliance center operated by JASA. The center provides 205 hot meals each day to residents and senior citizens from the community. In the last year, the meal program at the center documented a 99-percent use rate of the meals allocated by the New York City Department for the Aging—indicating this nutrition program fills an important community need.

The senior alliance center also provides a wide range of recreational programs and services to its members, many of whom live alone. In addition to a full-time social worker, JASA has added a part-time social worker to provide services during evening hours and on Sundays—often the loneliest time for many of our elderly.

As a Manhattan Beach resident, I have had the opportunity to watch this project come to completion and to see the once proud hotel again become a positive influence on the neighborhood.

I want to commend all those who made today's dedication possible: Mayor Ed Koch, Boro President Howard Golden, and the many community leaders who worked with JASA to make this day a reality.

May all the residents and center members at Scheuer House enjoy many more years of health and happiness in their new surroundings, and may the people at JASA continue their efforts to build additional units of this much needed housing for the many senior citizens in our community.●

THOMAS DOWNEY COMMENTS ON FCC DEREGULATION

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, setting national communications policy is one of the most important responsibilities we will have during the next decade. Our legislative decisions will affect the amount and quality of information the public receives, and that in turn will affect how the public thinks.

We have always prided ourselves as a nation in which a rich exchange of ideas is encouraged and protected. Providing the public with a diversity of information sources is the cornerstone of the first amendment, and is a fundamental precondition of the robust marketplace of ideas that must characterize a free and democratic society. This should continue to be our Nation's foremost communications goal.

Unfortunately, the Federal Communications Commission's Chairman, Mark Fowler, has advanced policies that undermine the diversity and competition so necessary to our broadcasting industry. Indeed, he has pushed the FCC into a headlong rush to deregulation. The financial interest and syndication rules are casualties in that deregulatory crusade.

Few Members have looked at the rules as carefully as Representative TOM DOWNEY, the chairman of the Congressional Arts Caucus. As debate on their repeal has unfolded, he has persistently asked the key question: where is the public interest in repealing the rules?

I want to take this opportunity to commend Representative DOWNEY for his efforts, and to bring to the attention of my colleagues the comments he has filed with the FCC regarding the financial interest and syndication rulemaking. His thoughts are a most valuable contribution to the current debate.

The comments follow:

COMMENTS OF CONGRESSMAN THOMAS J. DOWNEY OF NEW YORK ON THE TENTATIVE FCC DECISION

As the Congressman from the second district of New York and as Chairman of the Congressional Arts Caucus, I have a longstanding and abiding interest in the Commission's disposition of BC Docket No. 82-345 relating to the Financial Interest and Syndication Rules. I can think of no issue now pending before the Commission that will have a more immediate and dramatic impact on the quality and diversity of programming available on the public airways to the constituents I represent. Moreover, the production of movies and other programming for television is an important industry in my state. In New York City alone, some 10,000 people are employed in the production of motion pictures and tapes for television. Since 1972, just after these rules were promulgated, there has been a 62.6 percent increase in employment in this industry.

I am alarmed at the apparent willingness of the Commission to eliminate these rules in favor of a plan that would vest the three major networks with virtually unlimited power to determine the nature and content of television programming available to the American public. It is this threat to quality programming, competition and diversity in the television marketplace that has given rise to the introduction of legislation in both the House of Representatives and the Senate to halt any Commission action on these Rules for a period of five years. The House bill, H.R. 2250, which was introduced by Representatives Henry Waxman, Tim Wirth and Carlos Moorhead, is cosponsored by more than 120 of my colleagues in the House, 70 of whom are on the Congressional Arts Caucus. In the Senate, S. 1707 was recently introduced by Senator Pete Wilson and will begin to focus the attention of that body on the seriousness of this matter.

We are concerned about the concentration of power and the opportunity for abuse of such power by the three major networks in determining what we see when we switch on a television set. As a public official, I am constantly faced with statistics indicating that the American public relies upon television as its principal source of entertainment, cultural events, sports, educational programming and news. Regrettably or not, the television marketplace has become one of the most important forums in which ideas are tested and values are shaped. The outcome that the public interest demands from this proceeding is greater diversity in programming and a greater number of outlets independent of network control on which to view this programming. There is sufficient evidence in the record to find that the current rules have served these twin goals admirably and I believe that the networks have failed to sustain their burden that the television marketplace is sufficiently changed to warrant repeal or modification of these rules.

I would note, in this regard, a letter filed with the Commission by William J. Donahue, Commissioner of Commerce from my home state of New York. Originally, prior to reviewing the record of this proceeding, he filed comments supporting repeal of these rules. Following an exhaustive study of the record and the comments submitted to the Commission, he withdrew his support for repeal noting that New York independent TV stations, advertisers and producers believe that retention of the Rules will promote competition, diversity and quality programming on New York television.

I believe that this is the same message that many in Congress wish to transmit to the Commission. We have not prejudged this issue and that is why the relevant legislation before the Senate and House merely proposes a moratorium on Commission action until the Networks can provide concrete facts to support their contention that the television marketplace is sufficiently competitive to warrant relaxation of these Rules. Today's 80 percent market share captured by three networks, with the "competition" divided among numerous unaffiliated stations and fledgling cable services, is not, in my view, a competitive industry. See "Telecommunications in Transition: The Status of Competition in the Telecommunications Industry," Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection & Finance, November 3, 1981.

Nor does the Tentative Decision which is the focus of this round of comments constitute a reasonable regulatory regime to govern the television marketplace while network claims are studied further and verified over time. The proposed Rule eliminates the financial interest rule altogether, and substitutes a convoluted new rule which will only affect programming initiated before 1985. Implementation of this regulatory scheme will cause immediate harm to independent stations, producers, advertisers and syndicators. Maintaining the status quo while the new video landscape is permitted to unfold, however, will cause no public interest harm.

Allowing networks to "negotiate" for financial interest and syndication rights, as the proposed rule would allow, is premature. Why cripple independent stations when they are just beginning to stand on their own? Why risk increased advertising rates? Why take a "Father Knows Best" attitude toward producers when they themselves overwhelmingly deny the attractiveness of "risk sharing" with the networks?●

BAR MITZVAH—A CONTRAST

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, on October 8, 1983, Paul Meyers of Buffalo Grove, Ill., will be celebrating his bar mitzvah. This Jewish ceremony marks the symbolic passage from protected innocence to adult responsibility. It is an occasion which is both joyous and solemn.

I call attention to Paul's bar mitzvah because of the special meaning this ceremony has for Paul's family, and a Jewish family in the Soviet Union, the family of Ilya Boim. Unlike Paul, Ilya's family has been refused the right to practice their religion, to celebrate publicly Ilya's bar mitzvah or even to observe the Sabbath in their home.

The sharing of a bar mitzvah, or "twinning," is a meaningful event for both the Soviet and American families. It serves to dramatically contrast the freedoms we have in the United States with the oppression and denial to practice religion those in the Soviet Union are subject to.

I praise Paul for sharing his personal celebration with another young man, who, to this day, remains trapped in the Soviet Union. Let us all pray that in the near future Ilya will be able to practice his religious beliefs without any restrictions in an atmosphere of freedom.●

LOUIS A. THOMPSON: LEADER OF SCOUTING IN SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and privilege to call the attention of my colleagues to the work of Louis A. Thompson, one of our truly outstanding civic leaders in southern California. Louis Thompson had been a resident of Lynwood, Calif., for over 33 years, and every one of those years has been packed with service to the citizens of Lynwood and the 31st Congressional District of California.

Mr. Thompson began his professional career as a teacher in 1940. He possesses lifetime credentials in elementary and secondary education as well as in educational administration. His devotion to the moral, physical, and educational development of young people has long been known. In recognition of this devotion, he was awarded an honorary life membership in the Parent-Teacher Association in 1954, and was recognized as Lynwood's Man of the Year in 1966. In Louis' honor, the sports complex at Hosler Junior High School, which was dedicated in 1979, is named the "Louis A. Thompson Sports Complex."

Somehow, in between the time he has spent as an assistant superintendent of schools, president of the Rotary Club, president of the Chamber of Commerce, chairman of the board for his church, a city councilman, and mayor of Lynwood, Louis has found time to be a member and promoter of Midland District Boy Scouts. Since 1953, Louis has worked to build scouting in the 31st district. I think Louis is especially proud of his contribution to scouting and is most pleased with developments in scouting in the Midland district within the past year.

Two charitable foundations have recently seen fit to recognize with a grant of money the value of a strong scouting program in the Midland district. Thanks in great part to Louis' work, our district has 63 separate scouting units and over 1,100 Boy Scouts presently. A generous grant from the Ralph M. Parsons Foundation will now make it possible to bring professional Scouters to our area on a permanent assignment to assure that scouting will remain a successful venture in the 31st district.

Scouting is a means for instilling in our young men the values and character that are held in highest regard in our Nation. Honor, patriotism, compassion, leadership, service, and self-sufficiency have built a strong America. And these are the qualities of character that Scouting promotes. That is why Louis and his fellow Scouters are excited by a grant from the Western Gear Foundation that will make possible a character education program in grades one through six of Lynwood Unified School System. The program will build motivation in our young people. This project, taken together with a blossoming of other in-school Scouting efforts, give Louis, and, indeed, the community of Lynwood, reason to expect great things to lie ahead for our young people.

It is an understatement to say that the citizens of Lynwood and of the 31st Congressional District owe Louis Thompson a debt of gratitude. He has taught our children, built character in our young men, promoted enterprise, and has led Lynwood City government. I am proud that the 31st District of California has a man like Louis Thompson. And I wish to acknowledge before my colleagues in the U.S. Congress my gratitude for his many years of service to southern California.●

ST. MARYS COUNTY AND MARYLAND'S 350TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago there was published a warning against all that is dehumanizing in modern society: our split-second technology, our atomizing organizations, our need to conform. I am speaking about an essay by George Orwell, and perhaps its most troubling thesis is that these dehumanizing tendencies rest on a foundation of forgetfulness, of society's neglect of the past. His essay was entitled "1984," and for many, that year has already become a symbol of social amnesia.

It is with pride and pleasure, therefore, that I take this opportunity to point out that 1984 is also the 350th anniversary of the founding of colonial Maryland. Marylanders have not forgotten their past nor that the former colony was unique in its origins as the New World's first settlement to be founded on the principle of religious tolerance. Individualism and freedom of conscience are not merely empty phrases, but are the bedrock of the State's heritage.

On the southern tip of St. Marys County, Md., is a small town that was once, 300 years ago, the State's capital. The deserted village of St. Maries is now the locus of a community-financed archeological excavation, for on that site was constructed, in 1638, the first Catholic church in the Thirteen Original Colonies. The foundation stones of this structure have recently been unearthed and are now being reconstructed.

St. Mary's City is the State's oldest settlement, and its citizens are justifiably excited by these findings. Mr. and Mrs. Fred McCoy, two good friends from Scotland, Md., have recently sent me an excellent description of these remarkable excavations, and I respectfully invite my colleagues to ponder the richness of our Nation's past as reflected in that narrative. Beth McCoy's description and interpretation of the meanings revealed by these excavations is enlightening. And her commitment to the Church-Field project is eloquent testimony that the past, in southern Maryland, is not forgotten.

The description follows:

In St. Mary's City, Maryland, archeaologists are conducting an extremely interesting excavation. They are exposing the massive foundations of the St. Maries Chapel and an adjacent schoolhouse. Both were substantial, brick buildings. Dating probably from the 1660's, they may have been the first brick buildings in Maryland. The foundations are being outlined and marked so they will be seen by the thousands of visitors to St. Mary's City, the first Capitol of Maryland, in 1984, on the anniversary of Maryland's first settlement.

A few months ago at the "deserted village" of St. Maries, the St. Mary's City Commission, an agent of the Free State of Maryland, obtained the Chapel-field from private ownership. No plans were made to have an archeological exhibit or historical signs ready for the great celebrations of 1984, nor were there funds in the State Budget to do so. Concerned citizens of the area took it upon themselves to collect funds to have the foundations of the ancient Chapel, Priest-House and school, and cemetery located and marked for 1984. Over one-half of the needed money has been raised for this Chapel-Field project and the Committee is anxiously soliciting small and large donations for its completion.

The Chapel-field is located in the original townlands of the village of St. Maries, just south of the reconstructed State House and next to the home of the first Governor Leonard Calvert. In this field, the first Catholic Chapel was built, as well as a Priest's House and school. In the field is a cemetery which contains the graves of Father Thomas Copley, S.J., Father Gravener, S.J., and Brother Gervase, S.J., as well as other early English missionaries and distinguished Colonial Catholics. The long searched-for final resting place of Governor Leonard Calvert, who died at St. Mary's City in 1647, is probably in this cemetery, adjacent to his home and suitable for his interment in his church's consecrated ground.

Although the Chapel was Catholic and the leaders of these Pilgrims were English Catholic gentlemen, Maryland was not a Catholic Colony. Jamestown was an Anglican Colony and Massachusettes, a Puritan Colony, but Maryland was unique, it was a haven for all Christians. All her colonists were free to follow the dictates of their conscience in religious matters. Maryland was the first place in the world where religious toleration was made a matter of government policy.

These colonial excavations are interesting to all Americans but especially to Catholics who can trace their American roots to the Chapel of St. Maries, and their school system to a building in the Chapel-field. Here was the first Catholic Church in the Thirteen Original Colonies, built prior to 1638. It succeeded the Indian lodge used by Father Andrew White, S.J. as a place of worship.

This week a great sixteen inch, six-plow tractor, working slightly deeper than the small tractors and horse-plows of the past, turned up the foundation bricks. They had been covered for over two and a half centuries, when in 1704, the Royal Governor Seymour, appointed by the King, padlocked the Chapel and castigated Father Hunter, S.J., for saying Mass, when he should know that religious services were available in the newly established Anglican Church. It was then that devout Catholics took the bricks from the Chapel and transported them down-river to the St. Inigoe's Manor farm of the Jesuits, where tradition has it they were incorporated into the St. Inigoes Manor House.

Professional archaeologists will discover the exact measurements of these old buildings and can evaluate the artifacts churned up by the deep plow. They can ascertain when and where the last chapel was built circa 1660, and then, the previous one, perhaps burned by Pirate Ingle in 1645, and down to the earliest, prior to 1638. They will explore the cellar of the Priest-House and the school, grudgingly mentioned by Governor Nicholson in 1697 to the English Board of Trade, "few schools, and those but very mean ones either of Master or House: But the Jesuits and Priests had some, especially one brick one at St. Mary's". Perhaps in the future, they can identify those early graves in this, the oldest Maryland town in our State. However, today's experts did not "find" these foundations. Legend and hearsay from generations of Marylanders have made the Chapel-site common knowledge. Archaeological studies of Henry Chandlee Forman in the 1930's outlined the Church building. Bricks from the foundations were used in the Father Andrew White Memorial, across the river from the city in 1934, the 300th anniversary of our founding. Artifacts and bricks were placed in the cornerstone of the "America" national magazine building in New York City in the 1960's. This building was dedicated to Father John LaFarge, S.J., renowned inter-racial leader, author, editor and educator, who served as Pastor of several Southern Maryland parishes in the early 20's and 30's.

Since 1704, the field has been in agricultural use and privately owned. Efforts to purchase or even mark the field were unsuccessful. Much frustration has been experienced by historians, Catholic and non-Catholic alike, about the lack of identification of this known Colonial site where Catholics had a Church, a Priest-House, a school and a cemetery. Tourists, visiting St. Mary's City, are shown the stones marking the outline of the original State House, which at the time of the abrogation of the Toleration Act was turned over to the newly-established Church of England. The Capital of Maryland was then moved to Annapolis.

The "Noble and Pious" Experiment of the Calverts was ahead of its time. George Calvert, the first Lord Baltimore, had had experience in colonization. He had been involved in both the Virginia and Massachusetts Colonies and in his own Colony of Avalon in Newfoundland. Experience had taught him much. He knew that his Maryland adventure must be well-planned and be economically sound if his altruistic purpose of founding a Land of Sanctuary was to succeed. He died, however, before the venture could be completed, but his son, Cecil Calvert, the second Lord Baltimore, was more than adequate in fulfilling his father's dream.

Cecil Calvert firmly believed in the ancient institutions of old England, in the "Magna Carta" and the "Petition of Rights" which had given every Englishman liberty of person and security of property. He also was sufficiently wise and perhaps brave to realize that these ancient rights, so sacred to old England, were of no avail without "liberty of conscience," a right then being denied in the Mother Country. The Lord Baltimore had to contend with not only the views of various Protestant denominations, who wished freedom of religion for themselves but not for others, but also, with his own Catholic Church, which had been for so many centuries the only Christian Church, and who jealously held to her age-old perogatives. Now, Catholics must live in a world of other churches which they perceived as heretical. To settle these conflicting church matters, Cecil Calvert is believed to have relied heavily on his friend, the English Jesuit Provincial Henry More, a man of foresight. Calvert and More together settled difficulties with the Jesuit missionaries and plowed new ground in what was to be the church's policy in countries with plural religions. Henry More, S.J. was the great grandson of Sir Thomas More, the "King's Good Servant" and author of "Utopia," who lost his head when King Henry the Eighth demanded "not only the things that were Caesar's but also the things that were God's." Cecil Calvert was determined to found his Utopia in Maryland and worked out a "Modus vivendi" that would fit a country made up of persons of various faiths. His experiment, with the brief exception of Ingle's and the Puritan rebellion, was a success. From 1634 until 1687, at the time of the so-called "Glorious Revolution," Catholics and Protestants lived in harmony. When the Calverts were replaced by royal governors, the penal laws of England were enforced, priests were persecuted, Catholics were fined for their religious practices, disenfranchised and those of all faiths were taxed to build and support the King's Churches, now the established State religion. No wonder Catholics, like the Carrolls, laid their lives and their fortunes on the line to support the American Revolution to recoup their freedom enjoyed in early Maryland. No longer the "Land of Sanctuary," they were joined in their rebellion by the Presbyterians, the Quakers, Methodists, the Reformed and Lutheran Churches and also many parishioners of the King's Church who saw the justice of freedom of religion and who were saddled with an inept clergy sent over from England.

The valiant Jesuit missionaries, some of whom came on the Ark and Dove, lived and died in this Chapel-field. They should be named and honored. Maryland is deeply indebted to them for the success of the colony. Father Andrew White, S.J. is the acknowledged narrator of the voyage and faithful reporter on the Indians, the flora, the fauna, and the terrain of the new colony. The "Blackrobes," as they were called by the natives, were soon beloved by them for their spiritual and physical ministrations. The well-being and safety of the colonists in their relations with the Indians was effected primarily through the Jesuit Fathers, in great contrast to the hostilities suffered in the earlier English settlements of Massachusetts and Virginia. For well over three hundred years, the Jesuit Fathers of Maryland served in the mission field. Their houses were the focal point of religious, cultural and social enrichment of the area. From St. Mary's they went forth up the rivers and bays to their Indian missions and English settlements on Kent Island and the Eastern Shore, at Mattapany, Newtown, White's Neck, Port Tobacco, Piscataway and Anacostia. From here they went to Pennsylvania and to New York State. Their mission schools were the nucleus of Georgetown University of 1789. They established churches, schools and the universities in Maryland, Pennsylvania and New England. After the revolution, they were in the vanguard as missionaries and teachers as the frontier pushed farther and farther West. Yes, it was in the Chapel-field in St. Mary's City that the first foundations were laid. These first roots, so gently planted in the loam of Colonial Maryland, have yielded a harvest of a thousand-fold.

Project Chapel-field is well underway. The archaeologists are excited as they, daily, unearth a bit more knowledge of Maryland's beginnings. Those seeking donations to finance the exhibit are not surprised at the great interest being shown in this project. After all, here are the beginnings of our great State of Maryland, whose experiment of 1634 lived on in the Bill of Rights of our American Constitution. There is a message here at St. Mary's City for the whole world, and the Chapel-Site, is a vital part of the whole picture.●

SOCIAL POLICY UNDER THE GUN

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, the logic that propels the Reagan administration's attacks on income maintenance and other social programs has little to do with balancing the Federal budget, Frances Fox Piven and Richard Cloward demonstrate in the following paper, "Social Policy Under the Gun," which was prepared for the Institute for Policy Studies' forthcoming study of the Federal budget. In the paper Dr. Piven, professor of political science at CUNY, and Dr. Cloward, a Columbia University sociologist, examine the myths and assumptions that underlie current U.S. social policy and propose alternatives. The paper follows.

SOCIAL POLICY UNDER THE GUN

(By Frances Fox Piven and Richard A. Cloward)

In the aftermath of the election of 1980, the Reagan administration and its big business allies declared a new class war on the unemployed, the unemployable, and the working poor. By the summer of 1981, congressional approval had been obtained to slash $140 billion in social programs during the years 1982-84, more than half of it from the income-maintenance programs that provide low-income people with cash, food, health care, and low-cost housing. At the same time, the Reagan administration insisted that additional social program reductions of $45 billion and $30 billion would be necessary in 1983 and 1984, respectively, in order to achieve a balanced budget in 1984. At this writing, the outcome of the negotiations over the actual 1983 budget have not concluded. Although the cuts in the social programs will be less than requested by the Reagan administration, they will nevertheless be large.

Although popular dissatisfaction with social programs did not play a major role in determining the outcome of the [1980 presidential] election, or in giving Reagan a mandate to slash them, the dissatisfaction is real. One source is the perception that social welfare programs encourage malingering. The programs are said to foster the poverty and dependency they were designed to ameliorate. This is a very old view, expounded with particular vigor by nineteenth century philanthropists during the period of rapid expansion by industrial capitalism, and for quite self-serving reasons: However, this view is not directed against programs that support the aged, although those are by far the most costly of the social welfare programs; nor is much animus directed against programs that support the disabled or temporarily unemployed. Hostility is mainly directed against something people call "welfare," and what that means is Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC). It needs to be said that this program does not comprise a significant portion of social welfare expenditures nor does it have very many adults beneficiaries. Before the Reagan cuts, about $14 billion (including state and local shares) was spent to assist slightly more than 11 million AFDC recipients, of whom more than 7 million were children.

Presumably the malingerers are among the 3.8 million adults who are mainly the mothers of these children. But those caring for the 36 percent of AFDC children under the age of six cannot be treated as malingerers, since most Americans would not endorse sending mother of small children out to work. Other mothers work while on the rolls, although at wages too low to bring them above AFDC eligibility levels, so they are not malingerers either. Still others have worked recently and will work again. Studies of the work patterns of AFDC family heads show that many women remain on welfare for only a short time, (27 percent have been on the rolls less than a year, and 55 percent less than three years), to cope with temporary unemployment, illness, or other family crises. Their numbers would no doubt decrease if unemployment levels dropped. What remains, then, is the minority of AFDC mothers whose life experience has demoralized them, whose experience of persistent unemployment and social disorganization has made them "dependent" and whose children may, if these conditions persist, grow up to be "dependent" as well. Welfare is not a good solution for these people. It may keep them from starving, but it does not enable them to reconstruct their self-respect. Eliminating welfare payments in the absence of other economic and social opportunities is, however, a worse solution.

* * * * *

There are problems with the welfare state programs. But no serious investigation of "fraud and abuse" would begin with the unemployment, food, and welfare programs. It might begin with defense contracts or the tax system, in which fraud and profiteering are normal rather than merely rampant, and in which the profits are enormous. And one might go on to the private vendors associated with the Medicaid and housing programs. For the Reagan adminstration, however, fraud and abuse are not the real issue, and the budget cuts are not directed at these problems. They are directed at the recipients of welfare state benefits.

* * * * *

The programs that provide a national minimum income floor are being cut back as one part of a larger strategy to increase business profits. There is not much doubt that the Reagan policies increase profits. What is doubtful is the promise that increased profits will lead to widespread economic improvement. The American economy has real problems; inflation and unemployment, which erode living standards, are symptoms of them. But there is no real evidence that these problems result from the lack of capital. Between 1960 and 1978 available corporate capital increased by 662 percent, according to Miller and Devey, and the annual rate of corporate savings did not decline. Business Week magazine reported in 1978 that "The nation's biggest corporations are sitting atop a record $80 billion pile of cash that could finance a giant boom in capital spending." However, no boom occurred, because corporations have been channeling their profits into short-term financial markets and real estate ventures; into commodity futures that increased fifty-fold in value between 1960 and 1978; into mergers that raise speculative values without increasing productive capacities, a form of investment which, according to the Wall Street Journal, accounted for a record $61 billion and 1,807 transactions in the first nine months of 1981 alone; and into international investment; which increased twenty-fold between 1950 and 1978, reaching $377 billion in 1978. As a result, the United States lags behind Europe and Japan in its rate of investment in the domestic machinery, structures, and technology that increase productivity and employment.

This trend cannot be attributed to shortages of capital resulting from excessive taxes or from large government deficits. Not only is there no capital shortage, but effective rates of taxation on American business have been falling sharply for several decades. Nor is there evidence that the size of government deficits bears any regular relationship to productive investment. To be sure, lower taxes and less regulation will increase profits, and lower deficits will release capital. These policies may well spur investment, and they are likely to spur speculation as well. What they are not very likely to do is channel capital into new domestic capacity. They are therefore not likely to alter the trend away from those forms of capital investment associated with slower rates of growth in the productivity of the American economy and with the lower real incomes and higher unemployment that sluggish growth brings in its wake.

* * * * *

The Reagan program identifies and solves the alleged problems of capital shortage and declining investment, neither of which appears to exist. And the way these alleged problems are to be solved is by reducing the share of the national product that goes to the working class—by cutting taxes on business and wealthy, by dismantling government regulation of business, and by cutting the income-maintenance programs. The argument that taxes and government programs are to blame for the deep-rooted problems in the economy is a way of attempting to make this redistribution of wealth palatable to the American people. David Stockman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, conceded as much when he incautiously confided to a journalist that Reagan's tax bill was a "Trojan Horse" full of tax benefits for the rich, and that supply-side economics is nothing but traditional Republican "trickle-down" economic theory in disguise. Cutting social programs is a crucial part of this strategy. If the tax cuts redistribute funds to business and the wealthy, reductions in social programs ensure that these funds will be taken from the incomes of the poor and the working class.

* * * * *

The connection between social programs and the labor market is indirect, but not quite clear. To see the connection, it is necessary to consider the relationship between unemployment and worker bargaining power. Large numbers of unemployed exert a downward pressure on wages because people searching for work are forced to underbid the wages of those still working. A mass of unemployed also undercuts the ability of workers to make other workplace demands, since workers are less militant when there is a long line of job applicants outside the factory gates. Because the unemployed exert a downward pressure on wages and other labor costs, the existence of a large pool of unemployed tends to maintain and enlarge profits. (This effect is moderated by union contracts at one end of the wage scale and by minimum wage laws at the other end, but it is not eliminated.) By contrast, when the unemployed are absorbed and labor markets tighten, wage and workplace demands push against profits, as some analysts say happened in the late 1960's at the climax of the long post-World War II boom.

The relationship between unemployment and wage levels was described by Karl Marx when he stated that the unemployed constitute an "industrial reserve army of labor" used by capitalists to weaken and divide the proletariat. But most American analysts scoffed at the notion that large-scale unemployment represented an advantage for capital, much less that this advantage was sometimes deliberately contrived. Instead, the fact the the United States has had consistently higher rates of unemployment than other Western industrial countries, except during wartime, was attributed by more conservative analysts to "frictional" unemployment—that is, to the exceptional mobility of the American work force as people moved from job to job to take advantage of opportunities to improve their circumstances. Unemployment, in short, was taken as a symptom of prosperity.

Prosperity also brings to the labor market large numbers of people who presumably do not seriously need or want work (teenagers, women, blacks), and their consequent job instability also contributes to an artificial appearance of high unemployment. Unemployment, in short, is caused by the unemployed themselves, an argument developed in purest form by Milton Friedman, who put forward the thesis that unemployment always settles at its "natural" rate over the long term.

Liberal analysts following the economic theory set out by John Maynard Keynes developed a very different interpretation of unemployment, however. They postulated that joblessness was caused by overall levels of economic activity. Unemployment was seen as the consequence of sluggish business and consumer demand. Tighter labor markets, in turn, were the result of swelling business and consumer demand. The significance of this perspective, which acquired considerable support in the post-World War II period, was that it defined unemployment levels as susceptible to government policy, for unemployment could be lowered by policies to stimulate aggregate demand.

But although high levels of aggregate demand are associated with lower unemployment rates, they are also associated with rising wage and price levels. And the very same formulation that led economists to think that unemployment levels could be controlled by government intervention to stimulate the economy also led them to think inflation could be controlled by government intervention to reduce aggregate demand. In other words, unemployment and inflation came to be seen as trade-offs, for one could only be controlled at the expense of the other. This formulation was embodied in the well-known Phillips curve (published in 1958), which showed a correlation between levels of unemployment and wage levels. When unemployment falls, wages rise; when unemployment rises, wages fall. The Phillips curve was thus consistent with Marx's thesis regarding the industrial reserve army of labor, for it suggested that high levels of unemployment weaken the bargaining power of workers. However, economists did not define the trade-offs between unemployment and wages as a reflection of conflicts about the distribution of wealth; they tended instead to see it as describing a relationship existing in nature—in economic nature.

* * * * *

This conception of an unemployment-inflation trade-off was incorporated as an instrument of American public policy in the years after the Great Depression. Government planners tried to moderate the extremes of the business cycle with fiscal and monetary policies that regulated aggregate demand. Instead of business cycles that careened from trough to peak to trough, relatively moderate recessions occurred every few years which increased unemployment without pushing it to staggering levels. In turn, higher unemployment rates produced lower wage and price levels. Government intervention to promote intervals of something less than depression levels of unemployment thus became a major instrument of economic stabilization, and the publication of the Phillips curve lent this strategy scientific legitimacy.

* * * * *

For two decades following World War II, the new techniques for managing the business cycle appeared to work. The relationship embodied in the Phillips curve varied to order, as the economist Robert H. Haveman shows for the period from 1952-68, during which cyclical increases in unemployment rates were matched by the expected falloff in the rate of wage and price increases. Then, toward the end of the 1960's, the relationship began to erode as prices spiraled upward despite high levels of unemployment. By the early 1970's, the relationship between unemployment and wage and price levels had disappeared. Barry Bosworth, head of Carter's Council on Wage and Price Stability from 1977-79, commented on this development when he said that an unemployment rate of 6 percent failed to have an effect on inflation in the recession of 1969-71:

Economists, at first, viewed the problem as one of lags in the response of prices and wage rates; they recommended patience and a continuation of restrictive policies. By the beginning of 1971, however, wage rate increases had actually accelerated slightly despite the high unemployment; and, once excess inventories had been disposed of, the rate of price increases also picked up (emphasis ours).

Government economic stabilization policies failed, in short, because price and wage levels could no longer be moderated by unemployment levels.

* * * * *

The timing of the disruption of the unemployment/wage level trade-off coincided with the great expansion of social welfare benefits in the late 1960's and the 1970's. This suggests that social welfare benefits support wage levels despite high unemployment. The reason is easy to see. If the desperation of the unemployed is moderated by the availability of various benefits, they will be less quick to take any job on any terms. In other words, an industrial reserve army of labor with unemployment benefits and food stamps is a less effective instrument with which to deflate wage and workplace demands.

Many economists have recognized this. They now attribute the breakdown in the relationship between unemployment levels and wage levels to the great expansion of income-maintenance programs. As Haveman recently put it, the unemployed can now "prolong job search . . . refuse to accept work except at higher offered wages and cease active labor market participation."

* * * * *

The effects of income-maintenance programs in reducing economic insecurity and increasing the power of workers is not restricted to wage levels. Because insecurity makes workers vulnerable, it also saps their strength to make other demands in the workplace. When people fear for their subsistence, they accept onerous and dangerous working conditions. They work harder, and they work longer. They more readily submit to humiliation, orders and discipline. An insecure labor force is thus a more productive labor force and a cheaper one, quite apart from wage levels. (The new regulations denying food stamps to striking workers, and to entire welfare families when a working member goes on strike, seem intended to have exactly this effect.) Conversely, a labor force that is made more secure by the possibility of alternative means of subsistence is less docile, less productive, and more costly.

* * * * *

There is an emerging recognition among analysts of all political persuasions that social programs have weakened capital's capacity to depress wages by creating economic insecurity, especially by manipulating the relative numbers of people searching for work. In effect, the income-maintenance programs of the welfare state have altered the terms of struggle between capital and labor. As a result, unemployment has lost some of its terrors—both for the unemployed and for those still working. Despite unemployment rates in the 1970's ranging between 6 and 10 percent (not including 1 million "discouraged" workers), there was no significant downward pressure on wage levels. Economists now generally agree that it requires an increase in unemployment of at least a million individuals for a two year period to reduce inflation by a single percentage point. Because of the social programs, in short, the reserve army is no longer quite as ready to be called up in defense of profits.

* * * * *

The reduction of subsistence resources will have three general effects: economic insecurity will be intensified among the unemployed; large numbers of persons now exempted from work will be thrown into the labor market, thus creating additional unemployment; and economic insecurity among the working poor will worsen significantly.

* * * * *

Throughout this analysis, we have interpreted the Reagan administration's assault on the social programs as a rational strategy to increase profits. The problem of determining whether political leaders understand and intend the effects they create is always a delicate one. Although officials in the Reagan administration have not publicly stated that they intend to drive wages down by creating more unemployment, it is nevertheless the case that the labor market effects of the social programs are understood among many analysts, including prominent economists who have been, or are now, associated with the government either as employees or as recipients of government research funds in private "think tanks."

* * * * *

When the major policy initiatives of the Reagan administration are considered as a whole, something of a coherent theory does emerge. It is not a coherent theory of the workings of the economy. Economic science has taken on the character of medieval theological disputation as economists of various faiths argue the true nature, causes, and probable effects of various Reagan policies and practices. Instead, the coherent theory is about human nature. It is the archaic idea that people in different social classes have different natures and thus different basic motivations. The affluent are one sort of creature and working people another. It follows that these different sorts of creatures require different systems of incentives and disincentives if they are to be prodded to greater economic effort. The affluent exert themselves in response to rewards—to the incentive of increased profitability yielded by lower taxes. Working people respond only to punishment—to the economic insecurity that will result from reduction in social programs.

In the face of this theory, the growth of the welfare state was a considerable achievement. In simple and human terms, the welfare state has reduced some of the hardships and insecurities generated by a continually changing market economy that sloughs off the people it no longer needs like any other surplus commodity. People have not usually believed that they have a right to subsistence. And they have sometimes fought for that right. The programs of the welfare state are the fruits of these struggles. Moreover, these programs have turned out to be an achievement in another and more fundamental sense than protecting the subsistence of those who market position is weakest. The programs of the welfare state have expanded to the point where they intrude upon the dynamics of the labor market, altering the power relations of workers and owners as well. That is why they have become the target of a concerted attack by the privileged and powerful.●

SPORTS COMPETITION ACT

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have added my name as a cosponsor of H.R. 3094, the Sports Competition Act. H.R. 3094 has a simple purpose—to repeal the unjustifiable antitrust exemption which the Supreme Court granted professional baseball in 1922, an exemption the Court has denied to every other professional sport.

Professional baseball is a big business which generates hundreds of millions of dollars of revenue each year in ticket sales, concessions, television contracts, and advertising. It is the only major industry in the United States which is wholly exempt from the antitrust laws, which protect consumers by fostering competition and prohibiting price fixing and other monopolistic practices.

There are many reasons why professional baseball's antitrust exemption should be ended. It is unfair that the owners of only one industry, one professional sport, should be given a preference denied to all others. It is unfair to allow monopolistic practices that deny certain cities and would-be professional teams an opportunity to participate in professional baseball. And it is especially unfair to condone business practices that deny baseball players, particularly minor league players, a chance to compete and seek a fair wage for their services and talents.

Major league baseball players are represented by an effective union, which has helped to raise their salaries and improve their working conditions significantly. By contrast, minor league players are not represented by a union and are hurt by anticompetitive agreements among the teams which keep their wages and benefits very low. Such agreements would be illegal were it not for the antitrust exemption.

The Supreme Court has admitted that its 1922 decision granting the antitrust exemption to baseball was erroneous and an aberration. The decision was based on a finding that professional baseball was not an interstate business, a position which no one supports. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court's traditions do not permit it to overrule its earlier decision, and the justices have suggested that Congress remedy the problem.

I agree with Congressman SEIBERLING, the author of H.R. 3094, that there is no place in a free enterprise economy for an unregulated monopoly. It is time for Congress to restore equitable treatment of every sport and every business. Professional baseball should be subject to competition like every other major industry in America. Its antitrust exemption should be repealed, and I urge each of my colleagues to cosponsor and support H.R. 3094, the Sports Competition Act.●

FIRE PREVENTION WEEK 1983 AND THE FALLEN FIREFIGHTERS' MEMORIAL SERVICE

HON. GERALD B. H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan has proclaimed Fire Prevention Week 1983 to be October 9 to 15 throughout the Nation. This particular week is an important recognition of a serious national problem. While progress has been made in reducing the tragic losses from fire, most people in the United States are unaware of the enormity of the human and economic losses caused by fire each year. About 7,000 people are killed; thousands are injured, and 5 billion dollars' worth of property is destroyed by fire each year.

Although fire fatalities have been reduced significantly from the 10,000 or more reported a mere decade ago, Government and industry have had to work very hard to bring about this decline in fire death rates. Yet, more than 100,000 American households still suffer the loss and trauma of a dwelling fire each year. In fact, 80 percent of all fire deaths occur in the home. The total dollar cost of fire, when one includes the cost of municipal fire departments, insurance overhead, and building construction features required by codes, added to the direct and indirect losses, amounts to over $21 billion per year.

The United States, along with Canada, has the highest per capita fire death rate of all major industrial nations. While fire protection and control is a State and local responsibility, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), through the U.S. Fire Administration, was given a mandate by Congress to help reduce these losses in the Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974. They report that the fire problem has been significantly reduced. It is believed that these reductions are a reflection, to some degree, of the relatively new Federal fire focus. The Fire Administration has achieved breakthroughs in quick acting sprinkler systems, smoke detection and fire protection systems, firefighter health and safety, and in arson awareness and prevention. Local fire service leadership has been enhanced by 3 years of operation of the National Fire Academy collocated with the Fire Administration in Emmitsburg, Md., as well as by the extension and strengthening of networks for fire prevention education, and local and regional task forces to combat arson.

It should be noted that FEMA is concerned with civilian and firefighter problems in relation to fire safety. The Fire Administration has pursued progress in the improved design of firefighter protective clothing and fire prevention technology. And, the National Fire Academy has achieved academic advances in firefighting training on the Academy campus at FEMA's National Emergency Training Center (NETC) in Emmitsburg, Md. Thousands of fire personnel from all over the Nation have received advanced training at the Academy, and the Academy's programs have received a highly positive review from attendees.

On October 16 at 11 a.m., FEMA will sponsor the second annual National Fallen Firefighters' Memorial Observation Service. The service will take place at the Fallen Firefighters' Memorial at NETC in Emmitsburg. FEMA's Director, Louis O. Giuffrida, is to be highly commended for the creation and the continued sponsorship of this memorial observance service in conjunction with the National Volunteer Fire Council and the International Association of Firefighters AFL-CIO. The Memorial is dedicated to the memory of America's firefighters who have lost their lives while serving the people of their communities. It is an ongoing tribute to the too often unheralded gallantry and personal sacrifice of our country's firefighters who risk becoming our Nation's forgotten fatalities. Director Giuffrida's continued support of this important event deserves congressional recognition.

I would also like to commend Mr. Fred Villella, FEMA's Associate Director for training and fire programs. It is under Mr. Villella's progressive leadership that the National Emergency Training Center has made great strides in enhancing the Federal contribution to fire and emergency preparedness. He has achieved this through his adept direction of the work of the National Fire Academy, the U.S. Fire Administration, and the Emergency Management Institute. Additionally, I wish to recognize two other outstanding figures in the fire service community for their fine contributions: Mr. Joe Donovan, Superintendent of the National Fire Academy, and Mr. Ed Wall, Acting Administrator of the U.S. Fire Administration.

Finally, the Congress must be congratulated on its support of funding for effective Federal fire programs. It is hoped that the additional funds for fiscal year 1984 will be used for programs which will unite the Nation's fire service, the volunteer agencies, the private sector, community-based groups, and the Governors of all the States in a national fire prevention program. A new program could incorporate Federal and industry support for the creation of community-based volunteer efforts to attack the household fire problem and make the Nation's homelife more safe.●

ARMY'S CHIEF OF HOUSE LIAISON PROMOTED TO BRIGADIER GENERAL

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. WOLF. I would like to share with my colleagues the good news about the upcoming promotion of Col. William H. Roche. On September 12, 1983, the U.S. Army announced that its Chief of House Liaison had been selected for promotion to the rank of brigadier general.

We all know how hard Colonel Roche works here to make sure that we use well every resource provided to us in fulfilling the mission of the Army Liaison Office. Because of his professionalism, dedication, and attention to the many details associated with the operation of the Army Liaison Office our jobs are a lot easier and our constituents are better served. Colonel Roche is without a doubt among our Army's finest, and I know that this example is an inspiration to those under his supervision and those of us in Congress who are privileged to work with him.

I know my colleagues join me in offering congratulations to Colonel Roche and commending him for the outstanding service his office provides to Members and their staffs. I am including some biographical information on Colonel (soon-to-be Brigadier General) Roche.

Again, our congratulations and best wishes for continued success in Colonel Roche's military career.

Colonel Roche is a native of Florida with over 25 years of Active Army service and holds B.S. (1958) and M.S. (1968) degrees from Florida State University.

Early in his career, Roche served with the 82d Airborne Division at Fort Bragg and as a tank company commander in Europe. In 1968 he was a senior district adviser in Vietnam. Two year later he moved to the Pentagon, serving first in the Military Personnel Center, then as military assistant to the Secretary of the Army. In 1975 Roche was a tank battalion commanding officer with the 2d Infantry Division in Korea. In May 1977, Roche returned to the Pentagon to work as Deputy Chief of Army Liaison to the U.S. Senate. Two years later he served as an armor brigade commander with the 1st Cavalry Division at Fort Hood, Tex. Roche returned to Washington in 1981 as Chief of Plans and Operations Division for Army Legislative Liaison, and then was selected to head up the Army's House Liaison Office.

Roche is a graduate of the Army Command and General Staff College and the National War College. He wears the Legion of Merit, the Meritorious Service Medal and the Army Commendation Medal, each with oak leaf cluster. He also wears the Combat Infantry Badge.●

PUBLIC SERVICE CO. OF NEW MEXICO

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, Public Service Co. of New Mexico recently announced a bold business move designed to bring much needed jobs to my home State of New Mexico.

In 1981, P.N.M. established Meadows Resources, Inc., an investment subsidiary which engages in nonutility business activities. One of Meadows' first investments will be in Pulse Systems, a New Mexico corporation headquartered in Los Alamos, which is within my district. Pulse Systems manufactures pulsed gas lasers for research and industrial use throughout the world. Gas lasers are the fastest growing portion of the laser market, and Pulse plans to lease a large manufacturing facility in Albuquerque which will employ 50 people by 1984.

Mr. Speaker, P.N.M.'s venture into nonutility businesses has caught the attention of the business community. An excellent article on the company's diversification activities under the direction of P.N.M. chairman and president J. D. Geist recently appeared in Business Week magazine. I ask that the article be reprinted in the RECORD at this point so that my colleagues may have an opportunity to learn more about P.N.M.'s creative business strategy for the future.

The article follows:

[From Business Week, Aug. 23, 1983]

PUBLIC SERVICE OF NEW MEXICO: CALMING THE CRITICS AS IT DIVERSIFIES

Many electric utilities, faced with a slowdown in demand growth, have decided to diversify—and have often run into opposition from customers who fear they will end up subsidizing the new ventures. But when Public Service Co. of New Mexico (PNM) began talking about diversification in 1981, it stirred up a real hornet's nest.

Along with ratepayers' complaints, small businesses charged PNM—the state's largest company and the only New York Stock Exchange-listed corporation based in New Mexico—with unfair competition. The state legislature slapped a 15-month ban on diversification. "Their unusual size and clout in the capital markets, relative to other New Mexico companies, give them an unfair advantage," says State Senator Thomas E. Lewis. Shareholders argued that the utility could boost dividends or reduce its debt load rather than diversify.

Nevertheless, Jerry D. Geist, PNM's chairman and president, has embarked on an enlighted "geographic strategy" that he hopes will assuage even his most vehement critics. The plan had enough appeal to defeat Lewis' bill to extend the moratorium beyond this month.

OFF LIMITS

Under Geist's plan, PNM will launch only those ventures that promote economic development—and spur electricity demand—in

New Mexico, bring jobs and capital to areas of high unemployment, and furnish venture capital for homegrown businesses. Moreover, PNM promises not to use its clout unfairly. Last year, for instance, it had offered its corporate helicopter for lease in direct competition with an Albuquerque helicopter company. That type of competition is now off limits.

Geist argues that diversification is crucial to the future growth of PNM, which last year posted operating revenues of $426.5 million and netted $115.8 million (high for a utility because PNM's capitalization is unusually large and its rates are linked to return on equity). Riding the tide of an enormous growth in energy demand during the 1970s, the utility's total assets climbed nearly tenfold to $2.1 billion. But demand growth is now forecast at only half the pace of the past decade. With its capital spending program virtually complete, PNM is generating lots of cash. By 1988, Geist wants new nonutility ventures to account for 20% of profits. That would boost return on equity from 13.6% to as much as 15%. (Return on equity is not regulated for nonutility ventures.)

Before the ban on diversification expired in mid-August, PNM was moving ahead with projects that predated the law. It launched a $60 million medium-density fiberboard manufacturing plant in Las Vegas, N.M., an old railroad town in the northeastern part of the state. The venture, Montana de Fibre Inc., was chosen to satisfy a demand for high-quality board for furniture, mainly for sale outside New Mexico. It is expected to be in production by mid-1984 and profitable by 1975. Just as important, Montana will provide 200 direct jobs and an annual payroll of $6.2 million in a town of 15,000 where unemployment stands at 10% to 12%. The plant will also create indirect jobs: It has already spawned a small resin plant.

Now Geist has taken the next step: On Aug. 1, James F. Jennings Jr., a former Phelps Dodge executive, became president of Meadows Resources Inc., the subsidiary designed to keep outside ventures at arm's length from the utility's rate base. PNM is funneling some $118 million in retained earnings, raw land, coal leases, and borrowed funds into Meadows. Geist says Meadows' debt-to-equity ratio will not exceed 2:3.

Meadows will also run a 50% stake in Bellamah Coummunity Development, which sells land for development in five Southwestern states. For the first six months of 1983, Bellamah turned in $50 million in revenues. Meadows is exploring the idea of a learning center in nearby Santa Fe where executives could concentrate on physical and mental health and study new management ideas.

A SWITCH

Because of its proximity to Sandia Laboratories in Albuquerque and the Los Alamos National Laboratory, PNM is also looking at new projects in medical equipment and telecommunications. The utility would provide venture capital and management expertise for ideas developed at the research laboratories, see them through the startup stage, and then take them public.

The strategy won over one outspoken critic of diversification, State Senator Les Houston, who switched to PNM's side in the last legislative session. "It didn't seem very smart in a capital-short state," he says, "to pass a law making utilities take their money out of the state in dividends while at the same time the legislature was going outside trying to bring in jobs."

Ultimately, jobs will convince critics that PNM's diversification is good for the state, whose unemployment rate is 10.6%. "We're very serious about thinking we can bring some real job development to New Mexico," says Geist.●

BLUE SPRINGS HIGH SCHOOL WINS AWARD

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I have the distinct pleasure today to submit for the RECORD an article lauding the educational achievements of the Blue Springs High School in Blue Springs, Mo.

In recent months, national attention has been drawn to the problems in American education. The Blue Springs High School is to be commended for having surmounted many of the obstacles which are plaguing other schools in our Nation. They did this by making a consciencious effort to involve parents in the education of their children, and by actively building an incomparable staff.

Blue Springs School Superintendent Gale Bartow, Assistant Superintendent Gene Dexter, Principal Robert Blaine, and Board of Education President Geri Choate, together with the teachers and parents deserve a pat on the back and high recognition for their success in bringing excellence to Missouri education.

BLUE SPRINGS HIGH SCHOOL WINS AWARD

Blue Springs High School was one of 152 schools to receive awards Wednesday from U.S. Secretary of Education Terrel H. Bell citing them as top secondary schools in the nation.

The awards—blue and white banners bearing the presidential seal and the words "Excellence in Education 1982-83"—were presented in ceremonies on the White House lawn in Washington. President Reagan spoke to educators after the presentation.

Accepting the award for Blue Springs were Superintendent Gale T. Bartow, High School Principal Robert V. Blaine and Geri Choate, Board of Education president.

Mr. Bartow is president of the American Association of School Administrators.

Other schools in Missouri honored were the Horton Watkins High School in La Due, Kickapoo High School in Springfield, and Parkway West High School in St. Louis County.

A committee of educators and residents appointed by the U.S. Department of Education selected the schools.

Assistant Superintendent Gene Dexter attributed the quality of Blue Springs High to "tremendous participation of parents and an excellent staff."

Blue Springs High School has an enrollment of 1,750 students.●

A PROPHET IS NOT WITHOUT HONOR

HON. FERNAND J. ST GERMAIN

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, it is often said that "A prophet is not without honor, save in his own country, and in his own house." I am pleased to report that this age-old adage does not apply to the Columbus Citizen-Journal editorial of September 30, 1983, which acknowledges the leadership role of CHALMERS P. WYLIE, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, in support of our efforts to maintain and strengthen the IMF and our international regulatory structure.

The editorial referred to follows:

[From the Columbus (Ohio) Citizen-Journal, Friday, Sept. 30, 1983]

SAVING THE IMF

If the issue weren't so deadly serious, President Reagan's frantic efforts to persuade Congress to approve a loan of an additional $8.4 billion to the International Monetary Fund would be amusing.

Part of the Reagan administration's headache is of its own making. In 1981 and 1982 it criticized the IMF for allegedly lax lending policies. That helped build anti-IMF sentiment on Capitol Hill.

Since then, however, the administration has recognized the key role the IMF plays in assisting debt-ridden nations to avoid default, which could rock the world monetary system. Thus it strongly supports a bill to increase the IMF's lending capacity.

U.S. Rep. CHALMERS P. WYLIE of Columbus, the ranking Republican member on the Democrat-dominated House Banking Committee, has been leading floor debate on the measure for the White House.

But while the administration fiddled, a strange liberal-conservative bedfellowship arose to oppose the IMF bill as a bailout for big banks that had made imprudent loans. The other day Ralph Nader on the left and Sen. JESSE HELMS on the right jointly denounced the bill. We think it has merit.

In their eagerness to bash the banks, critics overlook the fact that the banks were prodded by their governments to step up lending to poor countries to help them with the oil-price boosts of 1973 and 1974.

In any case, the IMF bill passed the Senate and squeaked through the House by six votes when the National Republican Congressional Committee performed an act of great stupidity: It sent out a letter accusing 20 liberal Democratic lawmakers who voted for the bill of having supported communism.

Naturally, the 20, who had voted as the Reagan administration wished, felt betrayed by the GOP smear. They are threatening to vote no when the bill comes up again, as it must. House Speaker THOMAS P. O'NEILL is insisting that Reagan personally apologize to the Democrats, even though he played no part in the campaign committee's blunder.

Somehow or other, the IMF loan may survive despite its friends and foes, making the international and U.S. economies somewhat more secure. But the way the matter is being handled must raise doubts abroad about our reliability and competence.●

TEAMS MOVE, TAXPAYERS LOSE

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, the Big Apple is getting the Big Raspberry from Leon Hess, owner of the New York Jets. According to New York City Mayor Ed Koch, Mr. Hess has decided to move the Jets football team out of New York, regardless of what the city offers to attempt to make them stay. Nobody can stop Mr. Hess.

So why does anyone care except Jets fans? I do, because this same thing has recently happened in my district. Al Davis, owner of the Oakland Raiders, moved the football team to Los Angeles, leaving behind upset Oakland fans, several hundred unemployed stadium workers, and a city with $35 million in unpaid bonds.

Mayor Koch says New York and New York fans will not be left without a football team. This is not an idle threat. This game of football musical chairs is the free enterprise version of the domino effect: Teams that are unhappy where they are, are open to being "raided" by New York, or any other city for that matter which offers a sweeter, taxpayer-backed deal. The Colts in Baltimore are on a year-to-year contract. The Dolphins say they are unhappy in Miami. Indianapolis has a stadium with no team. In fact, ironically, and Oakland Raiders fans would say with poetic justice, there have been rumors that the Raiders would abandon Los Angeles for Shea Stadium in New York, sticking Los Angeles with the cost of millions of dollars worth of taxpayer concessions. The Raiders could truly become like the pirates on their helmets, looting from city to city.

Currently, any major league team, football, basketball, hockey, and so forth, can move whenever they want. They can abandon fans, cities, and stadiums at will with the taxpayer the loser. I hope that this latest development encourages the Committee on the Judiciary to hold hearings on H.R. 2041, and stop this random movement of major league teams.

Let us give the fans something to cheer about.●

PROCLAMATION: STATE OF FLORIDA EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, TALLAHASSEE

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting for the benefit of my colleagues, the proclamation of Gov. Bob Graham of the State of Florida, designating October 15, 1983, as Poetry Day in Florida. Many of the States of this country have adopted and set October 15, 1983, as "Poetry Day" each year. I am pleased to submit Governor Graham's proclamation saluting poetry and the poets who have enriched our heritage and the lives of each of us.

Frances Clark Handler, Ph. D., is the national director of the National Poetry Day Committee, Inc., at Tallahassee, Fla. Dr. Handler has worked diligently since 1947 for the cultural achievement of a Presidential proclamation for a National Poetry Day on October 15. While her efforts have not yet met with success, I agree with Dr. Handler that the designation of October 15 as National Poetry Day would be an appropriate recognition of the great contribution poets and poetry have made to the enrichment of all our lives.

Whereas, poetry permits the expression of human emotion with special grace and beauty; and

Whereas, many of our citizens enjoy this form of literature, and many also are talented and write poetry; and

Whereas, this form of expression is taught in our schools and used in many special activities in our lives; and

Whereas, poetry has been honored as an art and as an important part of our society's culture;

Now therefore, I Bob Graham, by virtue of the authority vested in me as Governor of the State of Florida, do hereby proclaim October 15, 1983, as Poetry Day in Florida and urge all citizens to join in saluting the contributions of poetry and poets to our everyday lives and our civilization.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Great Seal of the State of Florida to be affixed at Tallahassee, the Capital, this 16th day of June in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eigthty-three.

BOB GRAHAM,
Governor.●

ATTENTION: TELEVISION NETWORK EXECUTIVES

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, I am one of the many people who were quite upset with the television networks during the 1980 Presidential election. We were upset because one of the networks projected the results of that election while people were still voting, not only in the West, but in many parts of this country.

Various legislative solutions have been proposed to address the problem in future elections, but the difficulty with each of them is that it is either not effective, or would be difficult to draft without infringing on the first amendment rights of the networks.

By far the best solution to the problem would be for the networks themselves to voluntarily refrain from projecting national election results until all polls are closed across the country. That simple solution, however, they steadfastly refuse to implement.

Recently, the case against the network position was very well stated in an excellent article in the New Yorker. I hope all the network news executives read this fine article, and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues, as well.

The article follows:

[From the New Yorker, Sept. 26, 1983]

NOTES AND COMMENT

In his books, the psychiatrist Frederick Perls stresses the importance of what he calls owning our own projections—understanding how we attribute to others what we secretly are, want, need, or fear. The person who cannot express his aggressive impulses will see the world as a threatening place, failing to realize that the sense of threat comes from within; the person who is greedy but won't admit it will see himself as a benefactor, and accuse others of making incessant demands. At House hearings in Washington recently, news executives for the nation's three major television networks discussed their own brand of projections—the ones on Election Night in which exit polls of voters are used to make educated guesses about who will be the next President. In 1980, the networks projected Ronald Reagan as the winner before the polls had closed on the West Coast. Some political observers feel that the projections discouraged significant numbers of voters in the West from casting their ballots—people who saw no point in contributing to or voting against what already seemed a landslide. This line of thinking was rejected by the television-news executives, who defended not only the validity of network projections but the need for them. A man from NBC insisted that failing to report such news would be inconsistent with traditional journalistic practices. "We believe the public expects this kind of performance from us," he said. A man from ABC spoke of his network's responsibility to bring the public as much accurate information as possible as quickly as possible. A man from CBS acknowledged the existence of a "perceived problem" but said he didn't know if it was a real problem. His network, he said, plans to make similar projections in its coverage of the 1984 elections. By traditional standards of journalism, however, network projections are not news. They are speculations based on news. To be sure, they're carefully systematized speculations, with strong predictive power. But they do predict, rather than report, and the prophecies, like all prophecies, carry the danger of fulfilling themselves. The only practical purpose they serve is to elevate the networks' income by heightening the electoral drama. The audience doesn't need them. They're fun to follow, a bit of icing on the Election Night cake. But actual results can be fun to follow, too. Remember when something wasn't over until it had happened?

No one has fully measured the impact of network projections on voters. Common sense suggests that it was not decisive in 1980—that Jimmy Carter had suffered an irretrievable loss well before the networks declared him the loser. Common sense also suggests that projections could be a problem in future elections if the results were close. But the network-news executives, in refusing to consider the case against Election Night projections, called attention to a wider problem: television's inclination to dramatize the news, then blame the audience for its own excesses. Trapped in a mad race for revenue, television-news people insist that the viewers demand speed. Enthralled with the sales potential of violence, they constantly remind us of how violent the world has become. Like the patients described by Frederick Perls, these network executives can't tell the difference between their projections and the real world, between what they want for themselves and what they've come to believe that the public wants from them.●

THE HERITAGE FOUNDATION

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend President Reagan for his encouraging remarks on the 10th anniversary of the Heritage Foundation. Last night, the President spoke at the Heritage dinner here in Washington, and praised the rise of conservatism in America and the fine work of the Heritage Foundation and its president, Edwin J. Feulner, Jr. I want to join President Reagan in saluting the efforts of this great institution.

As many of you know, Heritage was founded in 1973 by conservatives who were seeking solid and reliable information to support their positions on the major issues which were facing our Nation. From a small budget in its early days, Heritage has grown to a foundation with an annual budget of over $10 million.

When the foundation began, conservatives in Washington were a small minority whose voice was not frequently heard. Thanks to the excellent work of Heritage, this is no longer the case. Its solid and scholarly research is used by conservatives and like-minded members of both the executive and legislative branches of the Government. I have been particularly impressed by the reliability and timeliness of Heritage's final product, and often read that organization's background papers and its policy review.

Conservatism is an idea that has come of age in America. In the past, our Nation moved dangerously far in one direction. Our basic values and the structure of our society were under attack and showed signs of severe strain. On the international scene, our allies around the world began to doubt our commitments and our national direction. Our enemies delighted in our foreign policy failings and our inability to understand the use of power.

When Americans all over our Nation began to see the failings of our domestic and international programs, they expressed their dissatisfaction in an overwhelming vote of confidence for a more conservative approach to Government, and world affairs.

I believe that the new approach is working. The past few years have brought low inflation rates, and an improving economy. America again has established its credibility on the international scene. For a change, the world now knows what our country stands for.

Thanks to the superb work of the Heritage Foundation, conservative ideas are having a great and positive impact on America. I salute the accomplishments of Ed Feulner, his staff, and of his board headed by Frank Shakespeare. I look forward with confidence to their continuing success in the future.●

RECOGNITION FOR JUDGE FRANK OCHOA

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues a recent event of local historic significance in my California congressional district. The Honorable Frank J. Ochoa, Jr., became the first jurist of Hispanic ancestry in Santa Barbara County history.

A graduate of the University of California at Santa Barbara and the Martin Luther King, Jr. School of Law at the University of California at Davis, Judge Ochoa served as directing attorney and staff attorney for the Legal Services of Northern California, Inc., in Woodland prior to assuming the directorship of the Legal Aid Foundation of Santa Barbara County in 1980.

On October 14, the citizens of Santa Barbara take time to recognize Judge Ochoa's record of service to the people of this community. I ask my colleagues in this body to join with me in commending Judge Ochoa for his service and his notable appointment to the municipal court of Santa Barbara.●

AMBASSADOR W. TAPLEY BENNETT, JR.

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I want to call my colleagues' attention to the fact that Ambassador W. Tapley Bennett, Jr., recently concluded his service as the U.S. Permanent Representative on the Council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Ambassador Bennett is one of our most outstanding career diplomats and is credited with many tremendous achievements during his long and distinguished career.

I am sure the Members are very pleased that the President has announced his intention to nominate Ambassador Bennett to serve as Assistant Secretary of State for Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs, another honor which is in recognition of his renowned diplomatic abilities. In view of the fact that the Members will be working closely with him in this capacity, I am submitting for the RECORD Ambassador Bennett's farewell remarks made June 16, 1983, to the North Atlantic Council.

The remarks follow:

FAREWELL REMARKS OF AMBASSADOR W. TAPLEY BENNETT, JR. TO NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL ON "SOME REFLECTIONS ON AMERICA AND ITS FOREIGN POLICY"

Now, after more than 45 years of travelling back and forth across our common ocean, I am going home. Perhaps you will indulge me today in a bit of reflection—one final try at interpreting that trans-Atlantic phenomenon, the United States of America. For it is commonly accepted that we Americans are different—novus ordo seclorum, as we ourselves proclaimed in youthful pride.

The United States is not an homogenous ethnic nation. It is not the heir to some historic monarchy or empire. It is not a unified religious community. It is not a simple linguistic group; it does not have a particular cultural tradition reaching back through several millenia. The United States represents an act of will. Its creation in the late 18th century by a remarkable generation of men and women, thoroughly grounded in the liberal and humanistic traditions of French, British, German and other European philosophers and political scientists, and believing deeply in the Judeo-Christian ethic, was a conscious intellectual effort.

We Americans continue to regard ourselves as a still young and developing society—and others so regard us. But as a consistent and stable system of democratic government we are now one of the elders of the world. As I look around this table I see very few countries that can claim an unbroken line, an orderly form of government that reaches back beyond the 19th century. History lies heavily on Europe, and most of you have suffered changes in your national life of the most profound and cataclysmic nature—whether from violence of war and foreign occupation or from the disruptions of inner turmoil and revolution. The celebration of continuum in the American Bicentennial a few years back was a rarer event than commonly recognized.

From the beginning foreign observers such as De Toqueville and Bryce have attested to the distinctiveness of American society. People came to America in the main seeking personal liberty and economic opportunity. They found both in abundance—at times too much. Our liberty has also known its license, its excesses. But there is always in America an openness to new people and new ideas, a positiveness in approaching problems, a confidence in the ability of individuals of varying background and status to work together to overcome obstacles. When mountains have got in the way, we have moved them. Indeed, some of our more cautious and traditional-minded friends sometimes find us too informal, too confident. At times they would doubtless feed us pessimism pills if their chemists could invent them. Today America remains a land of hope and welcome—unquenchably optimistic.

As we approach the 21st century, we intend, for instance, to remain on the cutting edge of the new technologies. This Alliance also must remain in that forefront. For the United States, this may well mean expanded activity in the new frontier of space. In that connection, I recall the ribald scepticism in some sophisticated quarters over the belief of an American President that we would put a man on the moon. That target date was met ahead of schedule.

The American relationship with Europe is not an old one, spanning close to half a millenium. My country has profited immeasurably and unceasingly from the moral courage, the intellectual breadth and the scientific skills which have distinguished European civilization and which have continually flowed Westward across the Altantic. These contributions, combined with the effects of geographic isolation, generous natural resources and a productive people have made of the United States a giant among nations. It is difficult being a giant—perhaps as difficult as living with a giant. It is hard to find shoes to fit if you are a giant—and the bed is always too short. Being strong, the giant can afford to be gentle, but he is also awkward at times.

Empire is not in the American nature. A brief fling with the concept of Manifest Destiny was quickly rejected with embarrassment. We have our nationalists, as do other countries, but the idea of coveting foreign territory, of hegemony, is anathema to the average American; although we have not hesitated, in the words of Rupert Brooke, to pour out the "rich red wine" of our youth to restore freedom where it has been violated, to assist in reestablishing national life where it has been extinguished. It is with pain that we hear ourselves credited today with having an affinity for repressive regimes by those who should know better or who, sometimes with an indifference bordering on irresponsibility, cannot be bothered with getting the facts. Down through the years American policy has consistently sought—often in extremely complex and tortuous situations—to support and strengthen the moderate center of democratic government and to press existing administrations toward the center. I have now served under nine American Presidents, and I know of no exception to that rule. This policy has meant at times, as in the phrase used in another context, holding the hand of the devil while crossing a dark bridge in stormy weather. But successive American administrations have sought to keep bridges open in the hope and expectation of brighter weather to come—at times when more fastidious friends closed their doors and their hearts. The Spain of Franco is a case in point—and we all rejoice in the Spanish evolution to its democracy of today. In that case, American judgment proved superior to that of its critics. Other cases come to mind.

We Americans are a sentimental people, often subjective in judgment—some will say such qualities do not bode well for a focussed foreign policy. We are ready to walk the extra mile with friends and carry more than our part of the load, so long as there is trust and confidence and mutual sharing amongst us. But if we are made to feel abused or misused, then our reaction is negative, and the consequences unpredictable.

This leads me to the thought that perhaps no major nation on earth has come more reluctantly to the burdens of world responsibility, or bears more consciously the exercise of great decisions, or would shun more gladly the path of power than would the United States. We do not derive enjoyment from being a super power. Such American attitudes account in good part, in my opinion, for the fits and starts that bedevil our foreign policy from time to time, and which so confuse our friends—and hopefully our foes as well. American Presidents have spoken of the agony of power; a ranking Congressional leader emphasized recently the "lingering nostalgia of Americans for isolation."

There has always been a strong mixture of idealism and realism in the American approach to foreign policy. No country is more given to self-analysis and self-criticism—at times to the point of self-flagelation. The proper balance in policy is a matter of constant and intense discussion in our society. Franklin Roosevelt wrote to Jan Christian Smuts: "I dream dreams but am, at the same time, an intensely practical man." And indeed he was, getting himself elected President for an unprecedented four times. In frontier times our dichotomy was well expressed in the slogan "Praise the Lord and keep your powder dry"—modified in World War II in the popular song, "Praise the Lord and Pass the Ammunition."

We have at times fallen prey to excessive moralism, but we continue to hold with Browning that "A man's reach should exceed his grasp—or what's a heaven for?" For those who would deprecate this approach, I would cite David Reisman, who has warned of the "Gullibility of the cynical." In any event, Idealism, realism—call it what you will—I take pride, pride which I hope is pardonable, in the fact that since my country has been fully joined with you in the security process, western Europe has now enjoyed its longest period of peace and general tranquillity since Roman times, with rising living standards for the whole population.

Mr. Secretary General, I believe firmly, passionately, in the North Atlantic Alliance. It is unquestionably the bulwark of our freedom. It is the true—and the effective—peace movement. However we may differ amongst ourselves on details which are essentially minor, we are a community of shared values and common objectives. We must act more as a community. In today's interdependent world, this dangerously nuclear world, it is in my view extremely shortsighted for anyone of us to insist over much on independent courses of action or to act without due regard for the interests of other Allies, no matter how tempting or useful for domestic purposes. This admonition applies to my own country as much as to any other around the table. We must see things in the larger interests of all; parochialism is not in our long range interest. Benjamin Franklin said it early on: "We must all hang together, or we shall surely hang separately." We heard it proclaimed eloquently and succinctly in Paris a few days ago: "L'Europe a besoin des Etats Unis; ceux-ci ont besoin de l'Europe."

Ultimately, the reality and the vitality of this Alliance rests on the foundation of human relationships and a feeling of community between the peoples of Europe and of North America. Here of late we have not been tending the vineyard well. The generation which forged our shared values through direct and painful experience is moving out now. It is a distressing aspect of today that so many young people have difficulty in differentiating between the moral and political values of the West and the oppressive totalitarianism of the East. After all, liberty of the individual to speak, write, worship, assemble and trade with others—these are not abstract values. Those who lack them under Communist rule understand them well enough. We must put more attention in our schools on the teaching of recent history and on the ethics and common principles of our Western civilization. We must move without delay to rejuvenate and expand the exchange of individuals, particularly our students, our young people, on both sides of the Atlantic. Shared experience brings shared perceptions, shared values. It is the cement of this Alliance.

The responsibility falls on us to ensure that the future lies with freedom. We must cooperate to release the energies of our free society. Let us never underestimate the capacity of that free society to aspire and to achieve, to dare and to do.

At an earlier climatic moment in the history of nations, President Franklin Roosevelt wrote in 1945 in his final, undelivered address—published posthumously—words fully appropriate to us today: "The only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today. Let us move forward with strong and active faith."●

IN MEMORY OF TEXAS STATE REPRESENTATIVE MATT GARCIA

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, this past weekend the people of the United States lost one of its most ardent advocates of improved education, civil rights, and increased voter registration. Texas State Representative Matt Garcia died Saturday evening at the age of 55.

Matt began his career 32 years ago, following his graduation from St. Mary's Law School, as an attorney in San Antonio. In 1973 he was elected to serve in the Texas State House of Representatives. Throughout his life, Matt was a persuasive and tireless advocate for improving the welfare of others. He was a respected and tenacious leader in times of controversy.

When the legislature was deadlocked, Matt was able to bring together differing factions and craft a workable compromise for the good of all Texans.

His career was marked by many notable accomplishments. He cofounded the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund (MALDEF), and the Mexican American Legislative Caucus of Texas State Legislature. He was also a founding member of the Mexican American Democrats, whose membership numbers 10,000. A member of the San Antonio and Texas State Bar Associations, Matt turned down two State judicial appointments offered by Govenor Dolph Briscoe choosing instead to remain in the Texas Legislature. In 1980 President Jimmy Carter asked Matt to serve as the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. However, he declined the offer and continued to serve as an advocate for justice and fairness in the Texas House of Representatives.

Improving the quality of education for the youth of Texas was a top legislative priority for Matt Garcia. In 1981, he coauthored, with Texas State Senator Carlos Truan, landmark legislation which forced Texas schools to offer Hispanic students instruction in Spanish. He was one of the legislature's leaders who consistently pushed for increases in teachers' pay. He believed this would improve the quality of education.

Many of us will look back on Matt's career and remember him for his efforts to improve the quality of education. However, close examination of his record will show he championed many issues and will be recognized in the years to come as one of Texas' ablest and most admired leaders. Matt is survived by his wife Minnie, and their four children, David Matthew, Cecilia Louise, Matt Jr., and Cynthia Marie. The loss of Matt is not only a loss to his family as a father, husband and uncle, but also to the City of San Antonio, the County of Bexar and the State of Texas.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in expressing our condolences to his family, friends, and the people of Texas.●

TRIBUTE TO PRIVATE SHAW OF TOLEDO, OHIO

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, this Nation has always been blessed with young men who have answered their Nation's call to duty. Such was the case with Pvt. Gary F. Shaw of Toledo, Ohio, who was killed in action in Vietnam on November 11, 1967.

On that day, Private Shaw distinguished himself by exceptionally valorous action. While on a search and destroy mission, Gary Shaw immediately volunteered to go to the aid of wounded comrades. Braving constant enemy fire, with bullets striking all around him, he began to pull the wounded from the killing zone and carry them up a hill to safety. After seeing one casualty fall, in an exposed area, Private Shaw ignored exploding mortars and dragged his wounded comrade to the company's defensive perimeter. He then returned to the base of a ridge and killed six enemy soldiers while other members of his unit rescued the remaining wounded. Private Shaw was killed while gallantly covering this withdrawal.

For his extraordinary bravery and heroism, Pfc. Gary F. Shaw was posthumously awarded the Distinguished Service Cross. We Americans must never forget the sacrifice of our soldiers, especially those who make the supreme sacrifice such as Pvt. Gary F. Shaw. We in the Toledo area will always be proud of Gary Shaw. On behalf of all the people in the Ninth District and the House of Representatives, I salute the memory of Gary F. Shaw, an outstanding citizen, who gave up his life for the love of his country.●

A MODEL OF INNOVATION AND CREATIVITY IN THE MEDICAL FIELD

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, throughout this week, the Lake County Health Department will be sponsoring activities to celebrate the presidentially proclaimed "Child Health Day" on October 3.

The Lake County Health Department regards this occasion as an opportune time to disseminate information on child health through brochures, movies and a scheduled radio talk show, as well as to focus visibility on the many services available to the community through the department. As the Congressman representing the Lake County area, this likewise is a fine opportunity to express my pride at having such an exemplary health department serving the people of my district.

Established by referendum in 1956, the Lake County Health Department began its work with a staff of one nurse. Currently, over 300 people serve in the department which has expanded beyond Waukegan, Ill., to several outlying facilities. Services provided by the department include a prenatal clinic to combat the high infant mortality in the Lake County area, a women, infants, and children (WIC) nutrition program, and a well-baby clinic. Available on a free or sliding-scale basis through the department are also: Community health nurses serving the surrounding Lake County area, immunizations, dental screening and education in area schools, hearing and vision testing in community sites, counseling and therapy, drug and alcohol abuse programs, and regular consultation with area day care centers—among others.

The Lake County Health Department has grown by leaps and bounds over the past 27 years but continues to come up with new ways of reaching out and delivering services to the Lake County area. Particularly during the last few years of economic hardship, the department has truly excelled and distinguished itself. At a time when it was forced to operate with reduced funding and no additional staff, the department found the demands for its services increasing appreciably. The fact that the department responded admirably to this challenge was officially recognized when the director of the Division of Nursing Services, Mary H. Carter, R.N., M.P.H., recently received the Y.M.C.A. Award for Innovation and Creativity in the Medical Field—for doing more with less.

I would like to join in applauding Ms. Carter and the staff of the Lake County Health Department for their dedication, pride, and enthusiasm in providing the most basic but essential of services—health care—to the citizens of my district.●

CELEBRATION OF TWO HIGH SCHOOLS

HON. RICHARD J. DURBIN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize today the achievement of a significant educational force in Springfield, Ill., the community in which I live.

This 1983-84 school year marks the 50th anniversary of the first graduating class of Cathedral Boys High School and the 25th anniversary of the founding of its successor, Griffin High School.

Over 5,000 students have graduated from these two high schools and contributed immeasurably to the community through their professional, civic, labor, religious, and business activities.

The clerics of St. Viator, a religious congregation of priests and brothers, have administered and staffed the two high schools from the beginning, along with many lay men and women.

The anniversary celebration of Griffin High School focuses attention upon the excellence of Catholic religious education and its positive impact on Springfield and other communities across the Nation.●

U.S. TRADE POLICY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, over the past several years I have observed the emergence of the American Association of Port Authorities as the recognized national and international spokesman for the U.S. port industry. As issues related to international trade, including our chronic balance of payments deficit, trade and transportation policy, international competitiveness of key domestic industries, and efforts to expand our exports of commodities and services increasingly dominate our national agenda, the AAPA takes on an increasingly important role in the national debate from its unique perspective encompassing much of the institutional and physical infrastructure upon which our international trade depends.

Given the importance of international trade to domestic economic recovery and the long-term competitiveness of the U.S. industrial base and its products in an interdependent global marketplace, the position of the U.S. port industry, as articulated and expounded upon by AAPA, is deserving of recognition and careful scrutiny in congresssional deliberations concerning the course of future U.S. trade policy with profound international implications.

Recently, AAPA has released a position paper entitled "America in the World Economy—the Importance of Free and Fair Trade." I commend this important document to my colleagues for its penetrating insight and clarity of analysis of America's current trade posture at a critical juncture in the evolution of our international trade policy. As the vice chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the Congressional Port Caucus, it is a pleasure for me to present the AAPA's position paper in its entirety for the benefit of my colleagues, along with a recent editorial in the Journal of Commerce attesting to the validity of the position taken and stressing the importance of the critical message contained in the position paper.

In particular, I recognize the efforts of Ron Brinson, AAPA president, James J. O'Brien of the port of Oakland, representing the Commerce Committee, and Anthony J. Tozzoli of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, representing the U.S. Transportation Policy Committee of AAPA, for their efforts in preparing, securing the adoption, and disseminating this important position paper.

The position paper follows:

THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF PORT AUTHORITIES: A POSITION PAPER

AMERICA IN THE WORLD ECONOMY—THE IMPERATIVES OF FREE AND FAIR TRADE: EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

(Prepared by J. Ronald Brinson, President)

Recession in the world's industrialized economies has, quite predictably, generated a penetrating anxiety about international trade policies. In any prolonged period of no-growth, unemployment becomes the most consuming human misery and the thought that goods and services from other countries eliminate jobs at home evolves as a universal haunt to political leaders. The instinct of politicians to do something, anything, becomes pervasive and simple solutions to complex problems flow forth abundantly. International trade suddenly is viewed as a major economic issue as, in fact, it should be. The danger is that it is to be dealt with during a cycle of emotionalism that accompanies the supreme hardships of millions of unemployed Americans.

For the United States, the international trade picture most Americans visualize forms from a composite of negative realities: a built-in dependence on foreign imports of raw materials and manufactured goods; a deficit that seems to be rising dramatically, an extremely strong dollar which adds to the competitive burdens of the U.S. exports, and a stubbornly high unemployment rate that somehow seems linked to the success of foreign products in U.S. markets.

Americans are generally unaware of foreign trade's role in sustaining U.S. economic strength and, in fact, the national security. The United States is today as dependent on the flow of international trade as it ever has been in its history and in many vital was more so. U.S. dependence on imported raw materials for industrial production is growing and is not likely to ever be reversed. U.S. dependence on foreign crude oil supplies is at best stable. The dependence on consumer products made abroad is a dramatic feature of the American lifestyle.

The challenge, of course, is to offset these dependence factors by exporting U.S. goods to foreign markets so as to balance the books. The record suggests some progress. Substantial expansion in U.S. export volumes has been recorded during the last decade, despite the vagaries of bureaucratic systems which do little to encourage export expansion. The U.S. continues to be a net exporter of manufactured goods. Today, one in six jobs in the manufacturing sector is related to exports, a ratio that improved from one in 14 in the mid-Sixties. Yet the Commerce Department estimates that only about one in 10 U.S. firms with capabilities to compete in foreign markets now do so. This suggests a mighty potential for export expansion.

The United States actually faces a double objective in expanding exports. Bringing a more reasonable trade balance is, of course, the most obvious. Given the maturity of many U.S. domestic markets, export markets must also be viewed as natural targets for the necessary expansion of markets for domestic producers.

Unfortunately, the attractive possibilities of export expansion have yet to generate levels of enlightened debate and action. Presently, debate centers on proposals for more restrictive trade policies and for measures aimed at curtailing the flow of foreign-made goods, from automobiles and steel to clothespins and orange juice. It is a familiar refrain, one heard before, but one, despite the lessons of history, whose repercussions are all too often ignored or discounted. It is reality that protectionism, in whatever form it takes, merely invites more of the same. If the United States closes its doors, the rest of the world will be inclined to do the same, and real opportunities for economic expansion through growth in exports will be inhibited.

Few will argue that the open, multilateral trading system has worked to perfection. Many countries do restrict access to their markets, including the U.S. But institutional inequities can and should be addressed through existing international trade agreements. The U.S. should be firm in insisting on reciprocal trading rights from its trading partners, and it is in a very strong position to do so. The American market is the largest and most lucrative in the world. That fact by itself gives the U.S. considerable leverage when it comes to trade negotiations, leverage that should be used boldly.

But there are other things the U.S. can and must do at home. Lagging productivity, inadequately funded research and development and the seeming reluctance of many potentially eligible U.S. firms to enter the export market have undercut American competitiveness abroad. The U.S. must be positive and willing to take some risks. From the national government, there is a need for consistency in direction and policy, assurances, for example, that contracts with foreign buyers of grain and other American commodities will be honored without fear of embargo or other distruptive administrative actions.

Protectionism definitely is not the answer. Indeed, it begs the question. The truth is that protectionism commands its own price, and in the end, all Americans will pay the price.

The quality of American endures along with its inherent ability and determination to compete. International trade, in fact, holds enormous opportunities for the United States in its quest for sustained economic growth and expanded employment. While insisting to its trading partners that business relationships endure only when all parties benefit, the United States must commit itself to enlightened international trade policies in developing this potential.

The American Association of Port Authorities, founded in 1912, represents the public port authorities of the United States as well as the major port agencies in Canada, Mexico, Central and South America and the Caribbean Region. In this policy paper, the Association projects the reality that international trade is vitally important to the economic security of the United States. Enlightened free trade policies, based on doctrines of equity and fairness to all partners, are essential if the United States is to realize its tremendous opportunities in export markets.

Since the earliest colonial times, trade has been of fundamental importance to the American economy. Located for the most part on or near tidewater, the first settlements in what is now the United States were, in many instances, founded or supported by trading companies chartered by royal decree for the purpose of developing profitable commercial relations with the mother countries. Entreprenurial motivation figured as well in colonies founded by religious groups, such as the Pilgrims in Plymouth, the Puritans in Massachusetts Bay, the Catholics in Maryland and the Quakers in Pennsylvania.

Colonial exports—grain, flour, timber, naval stores, tobacco, rice, furs and hides—were traded in Europe for manufactured goods and luxury items the Colonists could not provide for themselves. For New England, ships, shipbuilding and related mercantile pursuits quickly became of primary significance. By 1760, one third of the vessels under British flag were American-built. Philadelphia ranked among the largest cities in the British Empire. Trade continued to expand after the coming of independence, though its complexion was altered somewhat by migration westward and, after 1800, by the Industrial Revolution. During the 19th Century, the export of southern cotton and later northern grain were prime generators of U.S. export earnings. After World War I, the United States surpassed Great Britain to become the world's leading center of finance and trade.[1]

Today, foreign trade is as vital to the United States as it has ever been, and in many ways more so. In the past 20 years, foreign trade's share of the U.S. Gross National Product has grown substantially, from 10 percent in 1960 to approximately 25 percent by 1981.[2] The U.S. exports about 13 percent of its coal production,[3] 60 percent of its wheat, a third of its rice, 30 percent of its feed grains, 40 percent of its soybeans and from 40 to 50 percent of its cotton output.[4] Moreover, in 1980, 8.3 percent by value of U.S. manufacturers were shipped to foreign markets.[5]

What is more, foreign trade means jobs—American jobs. Barely 20 years ago, one in 14 American manufacturing workers was engaged in making products for export. Today that ratio stands at one in six, an increase of 130 percent. In 1980, reports the Bureau of the Census, the export of manufactured goods provided employment for 4.8 million Americans, representing six percent of the country's private sector workforce. Even more telling is that in the 1977-1980 period, four of every five new jobs in U.S. manufacturing were export-related.[6]

The pattern of significance is evident elsewhere in the U.S. economy. Approximately one job is created, for example, for every 900 tons of American coal sold abroad. In 1982, with U.S. exports amounting to just over 105 million tons,[7] that translated into nearly 120,000 jobs for American workers, jobs sorely needed at a time when unemployment in the domestic coal industry was approaching 40 percent. As for agriculture, the government calculates that in 1979, 35,000 jobs were created for every billion dollars worth of American farm products exported, for a total that year of 1.2 million jobs.[8]

Other examples can be cited. The Maritime Administration (MarAd) estimates that a single job is created for every 600 long tons of cargo shipped through American ports. The port industry itself, directly or indirectly, accounts for some one million jobs.[9] In 1980, according to a 1983 MarAd study, the U.S. marine terminal and stevedoring industry by itself, directly and indirectly, accounted for 138,000 jobs. Those jobs all depend ultimately on trade.

The enormity, diversity and strength of the domestic U.S. market and the healthy growth of the world economy since 1945 has sheltered the average American citizen from the necessity of recognizing just how important world trade is to our national economy. The American worker, as a consumer, has grown accustomed to a wide selection of domestic and foreign products, while the average producer has traditionally found domestic demand plentiful. The role of world trade in creating that healthy environment was not understood or simply went ignored by the public at large.

But the current recession, with its unacceptably high levels of unemployment, high interest rates, low investment levels in manufacturing plant and equipment and curtailed domestic demand, has created confusion as to what has brought the U.S. economy to its current state and how to remedy it. In times of confusion bordering on panic, the natural tendency is to reach for quick answers and simple solutions. Trade protectionism has emerged as such an apparently plausible remedy, as workers and many producers seek to shield themselves from competing foreign goods. The feeling is that the way to protect American jobs and industry is to close the door to foreign goods. "Scrap the world trading system as it now exists," the critics seem to be saying, "it isn't working."

Since World War II, fair competition and equal market access within an open, multilateral trading system have been the cornerstone of U.S. international trade policy. That system, despite recognized weaknesses and incongruities, has allowed the unparalleled growth of the international economy in general and that of the United States in particular. To be sure, from a current perspective, the picture appears clouded and uncertain. An 80-year series of annual U.S. trade surpluses was broken in 1971. Only twice since then has the U.S. shown positive trade balances. Twenty years ago, the U.S. led the world in the export of manufactured goods, commanding a 25 percent share of the international market. That share has since slipped to 18 percent.[11]

What should not be overlooked, however, is that the United States is still the world's leading economic power, with a population of greater than 225 million and a three trillion dollar gross national product.[12] Consider, too the following:

With about five percent of the world's population, the U.S. accounts for 21 percent of its output.

If California were an independent nation, it would be the world's ninth largest economy.

The state of Texas outproduces Mexico.

Pennsylvania's output is comparable to that of Australia.

Connecticut's economy surpasses that of Greece.[13]

Over the past quarter century, per capita American buying power has increased 87 percent, civilian jobs by 67 percent, and gross national product by 161 percent.[14]

In viewing present economic problems it is essential not to overlook the basic strengths and resiliency of the American national economy. At the same time, we must recognize that our own prosperity is inextricably entwined with that of the rest of the world.

The flow of imports is also of basic importance to the United States. The U.S., for example, is dependent and in many instances, extremely so, on imported ores and other strategic raw materials needed by its defense industries. Some 30 percent of its petroleum supply comes from abroad.[15] Imported products likewise contribute to the lifestyle Americans enjoy and help ameliorate inflationary impacts by adding to stocks available in the domestic economy.

Imports also produce residual revenue and employment benefits. In 1981, for example, automobiles imported via the Port of Houston generated $192 per ton in revenues to the state and national economy and a total of 573 jobs.[16] Moreover, the Congressional Budget Office calculates that domestic content requirements proposed in legislation currently before Congress, all aimed at curtailing the inflow of foreign automobiles, would cost the National economy a net loss of 150,000 jobs. Referring to that same legislation, a Department of Transportation official estimated that 7,600 to 11,600 direct jobs and 53,200 to 81,200 indirect jobs would be jeopardized at 14 U.S. ports if those requirements became law.[17] Foreign-trade zones in the U.S., reports the government, in 1980 provided employment for 11,700 persons not counting secondary employment impacts.[18]

Political pressures are building in this country for more restrictive trade policies, for measures aimed at curtailing the inflow of foreign-made goods, from automobiles and steel to clothespins and orange juice. Just what that could cost is suggested above. More ominously, protectionism, in whatever form, would invite retaliation. The clamor over imported steel ignores the point that foreign steel makers in Japan, Europe and South America—the sources of those imports—also buy immense quantities of American metallurgical coal,[19] some of it, incidentally, marketed by U.S. steel companies with large coal reserves. Similarly Japan, the target of much of the anti-import auto pressure, is itself the world's leading importer of U.S. agricultural products.[20] Retaliatory actions by America's trading partners would put our own exporters in jeopardy. And that is something the United States simply cannot afford.

Few will argue that the open, unilateral trading system has worked to perfection. What must be determined, and determined precisely, is where it has fallen short and what can be done to correct those deficiencies. It is both simplistic and inaccurate to conclude that the poor track record of the United States in trade balances over the past few years has been due solely to the system. America's ability to sell internationally depends in part on pricing. Pricing is a function of the productivity of our factories and labor. Since the mid-1960's, productivity in the United States has consistently lagged behind that of our principal industrialized competitors. Research and development spending, as a percentage of Gross National Product, is declining in this country at a time when it is rising elsewhere. Characteristically, only a relatively small percentage of American manufacturers export, though the Commerce Department estimates that profitable opportunities exist for ten times the number of firms presently exporting.[21]

Admittedly, there are problems not of our making. Many countries do restrict access to their markets. Barriers to trade in services and direct foreign investment particularly concern the United States, since earnings from overseas investment are a positive force in helping to balance its negative trade in goods. The domestic U.S. work force is shifting from manufacturing to service jobs, the latter now outnumbering the former by a ratio of five-to-three. Service activities such as banking, insurance, data transmission, engineering, consulting, accounting and legal services, are essential in facilitating trade in goods. In the past 20 years, the U.S. export of services has grown tenfold.[22] Foreign constraints are a problem, one not addressed by the General Agreements on Tariff and Trade. Considering that the service sector now accounts for two-thirds of all American employment, it is time that a degree of stability and equity be brought to this vital area.

For the most part, however, mechanisms exist under present international trade agreements to deal with such inequities. These problems, moreover, must be dealth with prudently, and those charged with that responsibility must be highly flexible in their actions. Unfair competitive practices, highlighted most recently in this country by the import steel investigations, can be dealth with adequately under the present "anti-dumping" and counterveiling duty statutes. In such cases, it is essential that these investigations be conducted in a highly professional manner, and that the decisions reached be objective. While bilateral trading agreements now account for at least 25 percent of world trade flows, severely straining the ideal of open, unilateral trade, this problem can be solved by American private sector ingenuity backed by the recently enacted law permitting the formation of export trading companies. The U.S. must also be prepared to react aggressively but not impetuously to barter our "Countertrading" opportunities.

The plight of the unemployed worker is best answered through job retraining programs. From the national government, we need consistency of direction and policy. U.S.—imposed embargoes on grain exports in the recent past have made international buyers wary of committing themselves to American suppliers. Actions of this sort only undermine the effectiveness of U.S. marketing efforts abroad.

The international community we live in today is far too integrated and interdependent to allow for a major shift in American trade policy. Such a shift would cause severe and possibly mortal harm to the American economy. More than a half century ago, with the onset of the Great Depression, the major industrial powers, including the United States, sought to bolster their faltering economies by erecting tariff walls and other barriers to trade. That proved to be no solution at all. In fact, as most economic historians now agree, the antitrade policies of the early 1930s not only failed in their purpose but actually contributed to the economic collapse and the years of hardship that followed. Shutting ourselves off from the world at a time when the U.S. economy is only beginning to emerge from recession will only repeat this bitter experience from the past. Protectionism is not the answer. Rather it begs the question. The truth is protectionism commands its own price. And, in the end, we all pay it.

The quality of America endures as does its inherent ability and determination to compete. International trade in fact, holds enormous opportunities for the United States in its quest to sustain economic growth and create jobs. While insisting to its trading partners that business relationships endure only when all parties benefit, the United States must commit to enlightened international trade policies in developing this potential.

A MESSAGE FROM THE PORTS

The U.S. port industry at last plans a unified public appearance on behalf of the importance of free trade to the nation. The appearance is, of course, motivated in good part by self-interest. It also is somewhat overdue. But it is welcome nontheless.

According to its president, J. Ron Brinson, the American Association of Port Authorities will come out within the next few weeks with a detailed, professionally printed position paper that will go to all the country's major industries, chambers of commerce and the like.

The paper's message, in essence, is that the "United States is today as dependent on the flow of international trade as it ever has been in its history and in many vital ways more so."

The world trading system is hardly perfect, the paper says. But protectionism, it asserts, is not the answer. Instead, the U.S. government should move consistently and firmly toward "enlightened international trade policies."

Too many Americans, according to the two association committees that prepared the 2,200-word paper, see trade in a negative light. Foreign trade, to them, means trade deficits, budget deficits and shameful national dependence on foreign raw materials; it means increased imports of products like autos while Americans in similar industries are being laid off.

What the public must be shown, the paper says, is that trade actually sustains the nation, that it can be a lifeline that can help haul the country back to economic strength. In the AAPA's eyes, trade will be to the decade of the 1980s the kind of dominant issue that energy was to the 1970s and the environment was to the 1960s.

The message itself isn't new. What is new is that the AAPA, which represents virtually all U.S. public port authorities and major ports in Canada and Latin America, is pushing it. And what's encouraging is that this effort is being aimed at the public, not just other sectors of the maritime industry.

International trade is indeed vital to the United States, as the ports' position paper underlines. To use its figures, trade accounted for nearly a quarter of the U.S. gross national product in 1981. America exports 60 percent of its wheat, more than 40 percent of its cotton, 40 percent of its soybeans, a third of its rice and 13 percent of its coal production. One in every six American manufacturing workers today, the paper says, helps make products for export. And, according to government statistics it cites, four of every five new jobs in American manufacturing between 1977 and 1980 were export-related.

Needless to say, the port industry and its workers and suppliers also benefit from open trading because 95 percent of America's international trade moves through its ports.

But the overall figures are dramatic proof of the importance of trade to the United States. And, as the AAPA paper reiterates, they show why erecting trade barriers is so dangerous: other nations are likely to retaliate with barriers of their own, cutting drastically into American export-related industries.

That's not to say we agree with everything in the position paper. Terms like "reciprocity" and "fair trade," catchwords in some circles for advocates of protectionism, seem used too loosely; much reliance seems to be placed on anti-dumping and countervailing-duty laws, although the paper advocates professional, objective evaluations under those laws.

But the thrust of the AAPA paper is laudably on target. We only hope the organization pushes its position as publicly, as widely and as often as possible.

The AAPA traditionally has concerned itself with port issues, worries and disputes rather than the larger overall picture. Many, like dredging—big and small U.S. ports remain divided over funding schemes for such work—are highly important in their own right but seem narrow, technical issues to the public.

The 70-year-old organization should continue, of course, to focus time, effort and energy on port-related matters. But we're happy to see it's also turning its attention and strength to the bigger picture as well. A public interested in and informed about the broader issues may be more receptive to what it once thought were the more technical ones.●

THE ALTERNATIVE ENERGY TAX INCENTIVES ACT OF 1983

HON. CECIL (CEC) HEFTEL

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, today I am joined by 19 of our colleagues in introducing new legislation to extend and expand the business energy tax credits for investment in alternative and renewable fuel equipment and to extend certain credits for investment in synthetic fuel development. The introduction of this new bill represents a substantial new effect to insure the continued development of alternative energy in this country.

Current events in the Middle East should serve to remind us how easily and quickly another world energy crisis could occur. The continuing Iran-Iraq war, the sale of Exocet missiles to Iraq, and the mounting hostilities in Lebanon, in spite of the tenuous cease-fire, represent serious threats to the security of our energy supply. If we learned nothing else from the embargo of the early 1970's, we learned how reliant our economy is on imported energy from foreign sources.

The legislation we are introducing today is the product of extensive negotiations between representatives of the renewable business and consumer communities and the emerging synfuels industry. Moreover, we have succeeded in significantly reducing the revenue impact of the various bills that have been introduced to increase and extend tax credits for investment in these various technologies. This combined reduction was achieved by substantially paring back the credit levels originally sought by supporters of these other legislative initiatives.

This new bill would increase the business renewable energy tax credits—incentives for wind, ocean thermal energy, photovoltaics, and other solar collectors, and geothermal energy equipment—from the current law level of 15 to 20 percent and extend eligibility for the credits through 1990. This slight increase is necessary to offset the effective reduction caused by the basis reduction provision of last year's Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act. This bill also provides a phased down extension of the existing tax credits for residential installation of solars and wind energy equipment through 1990.

Our bill also extends so-called affirmative commitments to renewable energy projects and provides that equipment used in the production of shale oil, including shale oil hydrogenation equipment, and synthetic fuel derived from coal will qualify for extended credit and affirmative commitment treatment. Finally, this bill provides a 10-percent energy tax credit and affirmative commitment treatment for investment in equipment for the production of fuel from tar sands.

Mr. Speaker, although most of these credits do not expire until 1985, the time is now upon us to take up and enact this responsible compromise package. The country has made a significant investment over the past several years to lay the groundwork for a meaningful alternative energy capability. We must not abandon this effort because, for the moment, energy supplies appear to be abundant and world oil prices are soft.

This new bill has the backing of every significant alternative energy organization and sends a clear signal to the investment community that Congress is not about to back down from its commitment to full-scale alternative energy development. Moreover, this new bill represents a reasonable balance between fiscal restraint and sound energy policy. Now we must move quickly to enact this bill.●

A TRIBUTE TO REV. DR. WILL L. HERZFELD

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure and a sense of pride that I have the opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues an outstanding gentleman from my congressional district, Oakland, Calif.

Dr. Will L. Herzfeld is presently pastor of Bethlehem Lutheran Church. He is no ordinary pastor, as he not only practices the word of God, but puts the philosophy in practice. Rev. Dr. Herzfeld has been and is very instrumental in bringing church and community organizations together in projects for progressive action. Because of his work in and for the community, he has developed lasting relationships with several social and political groups and ecumenical organizations. He was a member of the board of directors of the East Bay Conference on Religion, Race, and Social Justice; is presently the first vice president of the Alamo Black Clergy; and is secretary-treasurer for the Center for Urban Black Studies, Graduate Theological Union in Berkeley, Calif.

Rev. Dr. Herzfeld's activism spans many years. He was born and raised in Mobile, Ala., and served as pastor of Christ Lutheran Church in Tuscaloosa. He participiated in the organizing of the Tuscaloosa chapter of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) and served as its first president. He was also president of the Alabama State SCLC and was a close associate of the late Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Since his arrival in California, Rev. Dr. Herzfeld has continued his efforts to improve the conditions of humankind. He has served as county commissioner for the Alameda County Human Relations Commission; is presently chairman of a subcommittee of the Mayor's Blue Ribbon Commission on Crime in Oakland; he sits on the board of directors for the Oakland Citizens' Committee for Urban Renewal, and is treasurer for the Oakland Urban Renaissance Society which is a minority development corporation. Rev. Dr. Herzfeld has received numerous awards and honors for his service.

One would think that this would keep the good Reverend busy enough, but, in addition to the above, Rev. Dr. Herzfeld has traveled extensively—to the Bahamas, where he attended the independence celebration as an official guest of the government; to Dar Es Salaam, Tanzania, where he attended the Lutheran World Federation Assembly; to Germany, France, Nairobi, Kenya, Nigeria, Ghana, Ethiopia, India, Japan, Hong Kong, and Haiti—all places where he served in his capacity as a pastor and a humanitarian.

It is through the travels and efforts of Rev. Dr. Herzfeld that the church he pastors, Bethlehem Lutheran, has, for over a year, sponsored several Haitian relief programs. The congregation receives Haitian refugees from Florida and provides housing and clothing for them. They teach the refugees how to apply for jobs and train them for skills which enable them to become independent and productive human beings.

There appears to be no end to the activism and accomplishments of Rev. Dr. Herzfeld. So often, the media gives publicity to one or two of the do-gooders of society; but, for every one who receives the limelight, there are hundreds more who quietly work day in and day out, without notice or reward, to make life better for numerous people and communities. I am overwhelmingly pleased and proud that one of these great persons of service resides in and is making his enormous contribution to society from my congressional district—Rev. Dr. Will L. Herzfeld, a model for everyone seeking social advancement.●

A TRIBUTE TO ALEXANDER LERNER

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleagues to join me today and pay tribute to Prof. Alexander Lerner, a world renowned Soviet scientist who celebrated his 70th birthday last month.

Unfortunately, Professor Lerner's birthday was not spent celebrating. For the last 12 years of his life this courageous man has repeatedly been harassed and humiliated by house searches, arrests and summonses from the KGB for interrogation. His crime—an application to emigrate with his family from the Soviet Union.

Professor Lerner was the first scientist of his caliber to apply to emigrate from the U.S.S.R. in 1971. During his long distinguished career, Dr. Lerner was awarded the academic degree of candidate (Ph. D.), in 1939, the doctor of science in 1954, and the academic title of professor in 1955. He is the author of 172 scientific works, including 12 books, many of which have been published in English, German, French, Chinese, and Japanese. He was chairman of the department of large scale systems at the Institute of Control Sciences in Moscow; chairman of Moscow University Scientific and Technical Council; member of the Council on Cybernetics; president of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences and served as an editorial board member of several distinguished groups. In addition, Dr. Lerner was awarded a silver and two gold medals for his work at the exhibition of achievements of state economy by the Soviet Government. As a result of his application to leave the Soviet Union he was immediately dismissed from all academic, editorial and research posts—yet denied permission to leave.

In 1973, his daughter, Sonia, was permitted to leave for Israel, while his wife Judith, and son Vladmir were again refused. On July 7, 1981, after 8 long years of separation in which two grandchildren were born in Israel, his wife died.

Following his official expulsion from science, Dr. Lerner tried to maintain scientific viability by meeting with other ostracized colleagues in weekly seminars conducted at his home. Despite the lack of suitable laboratory equipment, Professor Lerner went on to develop a theoretical model for an artificial heart pump which utilizes the body's own endogenous materials for energy supply. It is viewed by the American medical community as a unique contribution to health science.

In the fall of 1981, Professor Lerner was forced to stop his weekly seminars following serious threats from the KGB. In late 1982, Soviet authorities threatened his son with criminal prosecution and loss of Moscow residence rights if he persisted in meeting with Western scientists.

As Professor Lerner enters the 70th year of his life, let us hope that Soviet authorities will grant him a long overdue exist visa, and that his wish to reunite with his family in Israel may finally be fulfilled.●

THE PERSISTENT HUNGER PROBLEM

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, recently I received yet another indication of this administration's commitment to human needs. This time, it came in the form of a manual, distributed by the Department of Agriculture, detailing exactly how to set up a soup kitchen.

I cannot refrain from asking myself and my colleagues whether the money spent putting together and distributing this booklet was not sadly misdirected. This manual does absolutely nothing to put food in the stomachs of hungry Americans. Furthermore, it falsely proposes the soup kitchen as a legitimate solution to the hunger problem. Nothing could more clearly show how far away from its responsibilities to its citizens this administration has moved. The era of the soup kitchen has long passed us by.

When the people behind the Great Society battled hunger and poverty in America, they recognized that soup kitchens neither leave an individual's dignity unassaulted, nor guarantee lasting relief to those who cannot or refuse to receive their meals in this fashion. Instead, they recognized that citizens have a right to a nutritional diet they can choose and prepare themselves, and eat with their families at their own tables.

Three years into this administration, we have yet to see any such commitment. It is a disgrace that this problem persists and grows despite our longstanding knowledge of it.

A return to the soup kitchen moves this country in exactly the opposite direction from where it should head in this area. We cannot allow the hungry and disadvantaged to be made once again to feel responsible for unemployment and suffering brought about by the disastrous economic policy of this administration. We cannot acquiesce in the administration's attempt to remove both the blame for the current crisis, and the responsibility to ease current suffering from its shoulders.

We must, on every possible occasion, speak out against the administration's shirking of its responsibilities in this and other areas of human need. In the soup kitchen, the administration has found a fitting symbol of its regressive policies that move us ever further from the extensive action we need to put a halt to malnourishment and hunger in this country once, and for all time.●

SPEECH OF NORMAN LEAR

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, on September 21, 1983, Norman Lear spoke before the National Press Club. It was an outstanding speech. It follows:

SPEECH OF NORMAN LEAR

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS

I am pleased and honored—and surprised—to be with you today. Pleased because I have so many friends here and I am happy to see them—and honored because of the enormous respect I have for the institution of a free press in a free society—and for so many of you as individual journalists.

The sense of surprise is occasioned by the fact that you actually did gather to hear what may be on my mind. I told my mother that the other day—with great pride I told her how I would be addressing the distinguished members of the national press in Washington, D.C., and my mother, the ultimate leveler, replied: "Listen, if they feel they want to hear you, who am I to say?"

How my grandfather would have loved to see me here today. He came to this country in his early twenties and was an avid reader of newspapers and periodicals. Everything the knew about America—and he knew a great deal—he learned from reading newspapers. Once or twice a month, he used to write the President. He would read those letters to me. They all began the same way:

"My dearest, darling Mr. President," he would write. "Don't you listen to them when they tell you such-and-such and so-and-so. You are right. They are wrong." And even when he disagreed with his leader, the letters started the same way: "My dearest, darling Mr. President, you were wrong when you said such-and-such and did so-and-so."

I went down the four flights of stairs each day for the mail—and every now and then, my ten-year-old heart would flutter wildly—because I'd find a little white envelope that said "White House" on it. I don't really remember seeing a Presidential signature—but nonetheless, it was my grandfather—74 York Street, New Haven, Connecticut—receiving a letter marked "The White House." To the extent that I have any social conscience—and to the extent that I am mindful of the blessings of a free press—I am sure I have my grandfather to thank.

I'd like to thank and congratulate Steve Knickmeyer—this year's winner of the H. L. Menchen Award, for his brilliant, winning editorials: One of which turned a spotlight on the attempt by extremists, censors, in Oklahoma to control the religious and political content of textbooks statewide. I feel a special kinship with Mr. Knickmeyer: To share this moment with such a strong and articulate ally is a privilege.

All right—let's talk network television—and the financial interest and syndication rules. Let's talk the economics of television—how it affects the quality and diversity of television—and how important that is to the public interest. Should the FCC return to the networks the right to negotiate for up to 100% of financial interest in a new show from an outside creator—and also be allowed to effectively control the distribution of that product for five and a half years after the network debut?

The FCC took those rights from the networks 11 years ago to promote diversity and competition in the television programming marketplace. Should they be returned? I had planned to talk some about people for the American way, because I am proud of it—and because I believe its work is so important to the preservation of a free society—but in a way these subjects are very much connected.

The Baltimore Sun honored Steve Knickmeyer for, among other things, an editorial which confronted a group who attempted to control a particular marketplace of ideas, in his case the textbooks. I think this room would agree that every marketplace of ideas should be unrestricted by the political religious, or moral dictates of the controlling group of the day. How then do we feel about television. The largest and most impactful marketplace in the history of man—which is utterly controlled and restricted by yet another dictate: The commercial imperative of the day?

Think about it. What America sees and hears over the public airways licensed to a network inevitably reflects the commercial imperative of that network—that corporation—rather than the visions of the many writers and other artists that are hired to produce those programs.

That is inevitable. They are, after all, the licensees. It is their business. But to the extent that the rules give strength to the independent production entity, there is at least an opportunity for some checks and balances. Because the independent production centers are the source of the writer, the author, that occasional unique and original voice who will challenge the commercial imperatives of the networks.

This has never been an equal battle. There are still only three nearly identical doors that provide access to a potential 90-some percent of all viewers—and that, friends, is power! The only thing that militates against that power is the voice of the author, through the production entity—and attention is only paid that voice when it is strong.

To centralize more power and control in the hands of the network—is to ensure still more of a homogeneous, institutional and undiversified kind of television that so many complain about even now. And, assuming we agree that the quality of television is a matter of the public interest, let me ask you:

How much do you think the quality of MASH would have suffered if the characters never went into the operating room? If the show had been absent the seriocomic flair for which it became so widely respected? That's what the network wanted. They fought every extenson of reality, and every attempt to make the stories adult and mature. You can read the pilot script for MASH and follow the changes the network insisted on by visiting the MASH exhibit at the Smithsonian Institution. Larry Gelbart, its creator, one of those strong voices that provide a degree of check and balance, placed them there.

And, I would be happy to document some of what the network didn't want us to do with All in the Family in the exhibit that features Archie's and Edith's chairs. They fought our doing stories on the subjects of homosexuality, Vietnam, the Jewish Defense League, impotence, dozens of others—and they flatly refused to have us photograph Archie Bunker diapering his infant grandson. Frontal nudity, they called it.

There were days devoted to this argument—but Archie diapered him face up (the network suggested he diaper him on his belly). And surprise, surprise, there was no "knee-jerk reaction from the Bible Belt" as the network promised there would be—and not one state seceded from the Union.

Then there's the Mary Tyler Moore Show. When it was being prepared for production, the script called for Mary Richards to be a divorced woman. The network said no. You see, there was some CBS research, current at the time, which said that America didn't want to see divorcees, Jews, and people with mustaches! So help me! So, Mary Richards had an eight year run, never married, and it took another three years before the first divorced woman character made it to the air waves.

A lead editorial in the New York Times last Saturday, discussed "the war for control of syndicated re-runs, between the television networks and the producers and movie studios that provide most of their programing"—and it made me furious. I don't know whether I was furious at the New York Times, which didn't understand the issue at all, or at those on our side of the argument for not having made our position understood. If, fifteen-some minutes from now, I see in your eyes that it is still not understood—well, how long has it been since you've seen a grown man cry?

Speaking of the proposed modification of the financial interest and syndication rule, which is no modification at all—it is a dead giveaway to the networks, the New York Times says:

"If these changes will not significantly upset the industry, why have they aroused such passion? If the rule doesn't matter much, why rock the boat?

". . . . because it probably does matter a little, and change might be for the good."

"Because it probably does matter a little . . ." what kind of condescending bull is that? It doesn't matter a little, it matters a whole damn lot—and that is why it has aroused our passion!

The Times editorial refers to the network contention that competition from cable and groups of independent television stations has destroyed any justification for their exclusion from syndication revenues. First of all, the mention of cable as real competition to the networks is a red herring. To a large extent, the networks are the new media. They are deeply committed to cable, DBS, video discs, pre-recorded cassettes—and CBS has just formed a new major studio, TriStar, in association with its supposed archenemy, HBO—and Columbia Pictures. Deeply committed means deeply invested with dollars the networks now say they can't afford for quality programing.

In a recent speech to advertisers, the President of ABC Television drew this conclusion: "Total cable advertising last year amounted to less than two-tenths of 1% of all television advertising revenues, which is a real measure of the size and dimension of cable audiences. It ought to tell us something that in spite of the competition from new media, network television continues to grow at record rates."

Here is what NBC told its affiliates recently: "Television networks and their affiliates will command over three-fourths of all television revenues in 1990, according to studies conducted by NBC Corporate Planning."

And CBS Television concluded one of its publications with this: "By the end of the decade the CBS Television Network believes that the predominant share of television audiences, and the bulk of advertising revenues, will continue to be where they are today—in commercial broadcasting."

These are the same institutions who convinced the New York Times that they needed the help of an agency of government to program quality! The FCC is hostage to the networks.

So the mention of cable and/or new technologies is a scare tactic. But the new-found strength of independent television stations is another matter. They do, indeed, provide competition. And the big, big question here is—since increased competition is supposedly what de-regulation's all about—even the networks feign a commitment to that—why then are they running to the FCC, seeking to kill their competitors? I'll tell you why: To protect their 5 government-licensed owned and operated stations from competition for the advertising dollar.

When the financial interest and syndication rule took effect, there were about 75 independent television stations serving 38 markets. Those 75 stations were struggling, losing at the rate of $24,000,000 a year. And why? Because they were unable to compete for advertising. Unable to compete because the networks had control of the off-network use of the programs. Today, there are 179 vigorous independent stations, serving 86 markets. They are competing for advertising revenue—and they are making profits of over $100,000,000. They are doing that by running Barney Miller, Star Trek, MASH—all of the off-network product that compete with the networks' first-run product—with which companies such as mine fashioned a syndication business. It is not hard to see what that means to the networks, but it is hard to see how grown men—there is only one woman currently in any position of real power at a network—can come cryng to a government agency for help because they face a little honest competition.

And how disingenuous! In the next sentence of the Times editorial, it notes the network argument that if they can once again control syndication, it would help stimulate competition among smaller production companies. Did I say disingenuous? That is downright smarmy. Why would they pay incremental dollars for a product they can as easily take as the quid pro quo for doing business, anyhow? The answer is they wouldn't.

One last point about the small production company. Chances are its owners are hoping to be a big production company one day, which is why it went into business in the first place. Unless it is in control of the distribution of its off-network re-runs, it cannot attain its goal. And the networks know that very well.

I am aware that I am talking of vast sums of money here. But the networks like that. They have attempted to characterize this battle as nothing more than a fight between two sets of "financial giants". Well, I'm trying very hard not to feel ashamed for having become a financial giant • • • although if NBC, CBS and ABC are giants, I don't think I can be anything more than a large person. Maybe a very large person. But I thought the name of the free enterprise game was to allow everyone the opportunity to become a large person, a very large person, or a giant. That is exactly what happened to me. I might still be a midget, but for the financial interest and syndication rule.

The deal with CBS for All in the Family was made just before the rule came into place. Our representatives negotiated long and hard for the right to retain syndication. But the network demanded syndication and they got it.

It wasn't until the new shows came along—Sanford and Son, Maude, Good Times, One Day at a Time, and others—that the rule was operative and Embassy, then Tandem, finally in control of its own destiny, was on its way to becoming a very large person indeed.

I believe it is in the public interest for every writer, director, or producer to have the opportunity to grow that way. Often it is necessary. Because a large person can argue more effectively with a giant than a small person. In most cases, the network does not pay enough to cover the costs of production. Take the acclaimed hit series, Hill Street Blues. Last year NBC paid a licensee fee to the Mary Tyler Moore Company $65,000 less per episode than it cost. Total deficits now exceed $3,230,000. But the networks earn their money from the sale of advertising from the very first episode. Let me show you how you get to be a real giant in television.

NBC sells some $1,500,000 in advertising time on each original episode of Hill Street Blues . . . on which it makes a profit of Approximately $250,000! On every re-run, it nets approximately $550,000. Producers of course, do not participate in the advertising revenues. So before the networks solicit help from Big Brother Fowler at the FCC to gain a piece of our syndication revenues—in effect becoming our partners—why not become real partners and let us share in their advertising revenues? We have suggested this possibility often, to no avail. Let's face it, giants are not very friendly, and they have big appetites. But I don't want to be fed to them, especially by an agency of my own government and Chairman Fowler.

Les Brown, one of the most informed writers on the TV scene, speaks of Mr. Fowler as a regulatory nih list, an ideologue who believes free markets are the answer to everything. "Broadcast regulation is shrouded in myths," Fowler once declared in a speech to broadcasters, "myths about service to the community. . . ." It is regrettable that the Chairman of the FCC should think of service to the community as a myth, but it is no wonder that broadcasters award his remarks with standing ovations and that the National Association of Broadcasters—as reported by Brown—jokes about taking up a collection to buy "key man" insurance for this political appointee. . . . I am not a fan of Mark Fowler's.

To return to Saturday's New York Times editorial once more—they quote the networks as saying that the rule—"has reduced our share of total expenditures for programming, while the cost of programming has increased Dramatically." Poor babies! According to their own research, they project a 70 percent share of audience in 1990, with no decline in real audience—they still own five each of the strongest TV stations in the country—and their combined profits have soared 550 percent in the last decade. Don't cry for them, Argentina!

The Times editorial also says that free market economies work best when regulation is used sparingly. I'd like to question the use of the expression "free market economy." Television is a most unusual industry. It is a distorted free marketplace, distorted by an FCC Commission in 1952, that allocated the broadcast spectrum among local TV stations, so that only three national television networks could develop—giving CBS, NBC and ABC a virtual joint monopoly over the national television audience. If that kind of television represents a free market economy, my name is Abe Rosenthal.

There is one more statement in the New York Times editorial to which I take total exception. "Looser regulation is unlikely to have much effect . . . on the quality of programs." Really?

Recently, a group of five jurors gathered for the BANFF International Television Festival to judge 100 hours of television. When the winners were selected, the panel analyzed the list to see if they had anything in common. They did. Virtually all had been independently produced. Even the ABC news documentary that won, "Vietnam Requiem", was made by a couple of independent journalists in San Francisco, rather than by ABC News itself.

"Much of what we didn't like," wrote one of the panelists, "gave us the feeling of being machine-made. The winners in contrast were hand-crafted. They were works, rather than programming, and they smacked of authorship."

I take the use of the word "authorship" to mean the sound of a unique, or original voice. The kind of independent voice you hear today on Cheers, Hill Street Blues, St. Elsewhere, Family Ties. The kind you won't hear if the network owns all programs and we in essence become employees.

It takes a lot of doing for a unique or original voice to be heard in that vast, homogeneous chorus that is network programming today. Because the name of the game for each network when they are deciding what ideas will make it on to the network is: "How do I win Tuesday night at 8 o'clock?" Not, for example, "How do I program with more attention to women? To minorities? To children? and to the elderly?"

I submit that when the most important criterion for selecting a show is how it may rate against the competition, the decision will often be made at the expense of taste, innovation and a sense of responsiblity to the public interest. By the way, how well is the public interest being served in the way the war of the ratings is covered? In what other industry is the competition between three entities reported on so exhaustively, so clinically, and with such hysterical appetite? Newspapers didn't always list the top ten television shows each week. The press created the appetite for this monumental bore and something tells me that the public is never as ravenous for the numbers as the space devoted to them would indicate. But, the artificial insinuation of this now earth-shattering trivia has fanned the flames of competition into a virtual conflagration. It often results in lunacy. Such as the lunacy known as "sweeps weeks."

Four times a year, the television industry pluges into this degrading, competitive ritual. During these high holy days of the TV year, professional market research firms gather demographic data on who is watching what programs. The results are then used by the networks to set advertising rates that profoundly affect profitability. Now the rub is this: During sweeps weeks, the regular weekly programming is moved aside—and in its place are presented one-time-only specials and Movies of the Week, with usually exploitive and sometimes salacious titles and advertising.

Throughout sweeps weeks, nervous programmers await the new Nielsen and Arbitron ratings the way the faithful watch for puffs of smoke over the Vatican. When this masturabatory exercise is all over, the networks resume their normal broadcast schedule. They refer to this charade as "stunting." My father told me you could go blind from such activity.

What is most disturbing about this kind of short-term lunacy—is that it is not restricted to the television industry. It is part of the national climate. In Congress, federal agencies, state legislatures, universities, in business generally, and in other spheres of influence, we seem all too ready to sell the future short for a fleeting moment of success. We witness a growing misuse of human potential in a climate that forgives and condones that misuse for short-term gain. It may be the greatest societal disease of our time.

Professor Abernathy, of the Harvard Business School, has suggested that it may have had something to do with the failure of our auto industry to maintain its world dominance—and the same with consumer electronics, steel, and now machine tools.

I think that it has gotten to us on a family and personal level, too. When we speak of what was called the "Me Generation" and the "Culture of Narcissism"—when we speak of the breakdown of institutions—of impulsive marriages and facile divorces—of the rate of crime and the escalating drug culture—of young people graduating from high schools without the ability to read and write—when we speak of a hundred social ills—I wonder if we aren't talking about a trickle-down value system that has begun to consume us all with this need for quick rewards and instant gratification.

The choice of which show a network will put on the air is made, as I indicated, in the context of this same need. That is the commercial imperative. It appears that a new show, "We Got It Made," may be a hit. It features a nubile young blonde with two breasts—count them, two—who works as a maid for a couple of young men. I mention the breast count because if the show is indeed a hit, you may see another young maid with three breasts on another network. That may not be as funny as it sounds.

I asked a young TV writer to comment on all of this. Here is what he had to say:

"I'm just a writer, so all I can do is write the script and hope for the best. But in my heart I know that unless I'm working with a more powerful writer/producer like Jim Brooks or Steve Bocho or you—I haven't got a chance. I don't think the networks understand real people. Most of execs are only 32 or 33, like me—and we all grew up watching a lot of television—I mean, really a lot of televison. Then we all went to college and studied communications. I don't know how I escaped this, Norman—maybe it's because I always knew I wanted to write—but I swear, most of those guys at the networks are all confused about what real human behavior is. They ask us to write stupid things for people because the only thing they know about how people talk is that they've seen all their lives on televison.

"Sometimes I think TV is not so much a reflection of society as a reflection of other TV shows. And they don't know that. Good luck with your speech."

I repeat, there are no villains in the network executive suite. For a moment, put yourself in the place of one such exec. He wakes up one morning with his newspaper at the breakfast table and he sees that his team has only placed two shows in the Top Ten. He may have anticipated it, but he doesn't like to see it. His breakfast doesn't taste too good and it isn't the best time he's ever spent with his wife and kids.

Although with the baby-boom in network executives, chances are he doesn't have a wife and kids. Newton Minow once called television a vast wasteland. I often think of TV executive suites as a vast playpen. When he arrives in his office, there is a still-warm Xerox of the overnight ratings from last night. Once more his network has failed to win.

Then his first appointment is with a new writer/director, a young man of unusual talent, tomorrow's Rod Sterling. And this writer has an innovative notion: a situation comedy about a Chinese family. I submit that our executive is in no frame of mind to hear, let alone accept, an innovative idea. Risk-taking is long-term thinking. So he asks: "Uh—the Chinese daughter, could she be a blond?"

There are no villains here. It isn't easy to program 22 hours a week: These are mean, difficult jobs, and I respect many of the men and women in network programing. It's just that the writer coming to the network with a new concept is coming from another place. Not that they don't wish to scored high in the ratings, too—but the writers' means to that end is the very best execution of his concept. The network will always, always seek to bend the concept, and the teleplay, and the casting, and the editing, to meet the needs of the marketplace as it perceives those needs at any given time.

Now this battle is an honest one. And what I am most hopeful this audience will understand, is the need for it to continue. Viewers did prefer a more mature MASH. With its serio-comic overtones. So—diminish the effect and the strength of the independent writer/creator and the battle is over. It is in the public interest that that battle never be over.

I want to put this another way because I can't say it strongly enough. If a network must, in its opinion, sacrifice quality for ratings, it will. So will some writers. We do have our hacks. I am suggesting, however, that a writer's gut instinct is to believe that it is only the quality of his or her script that will ensure the ratings. That is all the writer has to go on, and so that is always the way the writer begins.

Whatever we write, good, bad, or indifferent—and no one wishes to write a bad script—we are all writing for the smile of approval from the first person to read us—we are all writing for the respect of our peers—and we all begin by believing that any and all success will depend upon the quality of our script.

But there are other Steven Bochcos who have not caught the brass ring as yet. And tomorrow's Steven Bochco—the innovator, the brilliant writer not yet on the scene—for him, for her—and for a viewing public that must not be denied the authorship of these fresh talents—I speak for all of them when I say that we must not centralize more power and control in network hands.

There is a bill in the Congress to provide a five-year moratorium to study this matter further. Let's take that time to conduct a major examination of all of television. Including further study of exactly what it is dong to us. Let's turn loose our best thinkers and give them the widest possible circulation in the popular press.

Meanwhile, there is Steven Bochco, and all the Steven Bochcos to be.

I thank you for the opportunity to speak to you today, and—help keep Steven Bochco strong.●

CHEMICAL WASTE DUMP MOVED FROM WILSONVILLE

HON. RICHARD J. DURBIN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, the citizens of Wilsonville, Ill., were recently recognized for a significant achievement. The people who live in this Macoupin County community fought a battle for many years to rid their area of a hazardous chemical waste dump which posed health problems to everyone in the area.

The townspeople raised the money that was necessary to oppose the continued operation of this dump. Their battle in the courts was rewarded when the Illinois Supreme Court ruled in their behalf. Removal of the wastes and the closing of the site began in October 1982.

In Illinois, the name "Wilsonville" came to have the same connotation as Love Canal and Times Beach have for the Nation. People throughout the State of Illinois learned of the tenacity of the townspeople of Wilsonville. They first expressed their concerns about the effects of the chemical wastes in across-the-fence discussions and impromptu meetings at the local cafe. There followed town meetings, meetings with State officials, interviews, and stories in the local media, and finally the State media.

This was not a campaign conducted solely by elected officials of Wilsonville, although they played a valuable role. It was rather a community effort that eventually involved everyone who lived in Wilsonville. Their work was not motivated by a desire for publicity, but was an effort of love and concern for their relatives and friends.

Wilsonville's effort was recognized recently when they were awarded the Governor's silver trophy, given to the best overall community project in the State. This award was given by Gov. James Thompson during Illinois hometown awards ceremony on May 19 at the Capitol Convention Center in Springfield.

What the people of Wilsonville achieved is a principle; the principle that the people of a community have a right to know what is being dumped in their area; that they should be involved in the planning of waste storage to make certain it is not a detriment to their health and the health of their children. If we follow this principle across the Nation, we will insure the safest and healthiest means of disposing of our industrial waste products.●

IN HONOR OF RIVERSIDE, CALIF., ON ITS 100TH BIRTHDAY

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, October 17, the city of Riverside, Calif., will celebrate the 100th anniversary of its incorporation. This city is already well known as the place where the seedless navel orange got its start—a fruit that owes its sweetness to Riverside's rare combination of rich soil and dry desert air. But the city deserves to be known for more. Founded upon the social vision of a former Abolitionist, Riverside has long offered the Nation examples of social justice, careful planning, native industry, preservation of natural beauty, commitment to education, and adaptation to changing fortunes. Located a little over 50 miles from Los Angeles in a fold between the San Bernardino and Santa Ana Mountains, Riverside belongs to the first wave of California expansion, the period after the end of Mexican rule and the coming of statehood in 1850. Distinct cities like San Bernardino, begun as a Mormon colony, and Anaheim, started by a cluster of German emigres, sprang up during this period. These were the first California cities not to grow up around a Spanish mission. Riverside followed in 1870, founded by the opponent of slavery and one-time political ally of Lincoln—an upstate New Yorker named John Wesley North.

North was one of the unique breed of visionary and religious-spirited American sages who made the 19th century an era of world improving social plans. He followed in the great tradition of his 18th century revolutionary forefathers who declared their independence from the English monarchy and created a new constitutional democracy, and their 17th century ancestors who, seeking religious freedom, founded the earliest colonies in the New World. Named after the founder of Methodism, the great English preacher John Wesley—who, 135 years earlier, had come to Georgia to convert the Indians—John Wesley North would have been at one with the words of the earliest great American preacher, John Winthrop. Winthrop, in his famous sermon to the Pilgrims, as they entered Boston Harbor, admonished them as follows:

Now the only way to provide for our posterity, is to follow the counsel of Micah, to do justly, to love mercy, to walk humbly with our God. For this end, we must be knit together, in this work, as one man. We must be willing to abridge ourselves of our superfluities, for the supply of other's necessities. For we must consider that we shall be as a city upon a hill. The eyes of all people are upon us.

This is Riverside's heritage.

Modern day Riverside is home to 175,000 inhabitants spread across 72 square miles. It is the site of the Riverside campus of the University of California. This campus was in turn founded on the academic and research base of the Riverside Citrus Experiment Station, begun more than 75 years ago to support the fledgling citrus industry in southern California. Riverside is still the blossom-scented center of the orange-growing industry. While it has changed greatly in the past 100 years, it is nevertheless a city its founder would recognize.

As John North wrote upon first glimpsing where Riverside would take root and grow:

I am at last located on the site of our future city, on a beautiful dry plain, surrounded with varied, picturesque and sublime mountain scenery, and only wanting the waters of the Santa Ana River that flows near us to be conducted onto this plain to make it a scene of surpassing beauty.

The water was conducted onto the plain, and ever since, Riverside has been a scene of surpassing beauty. Now, 100 years after its incorporation, it deserves to be honored not only by its citizens, but by the Nation as a whole.

Riverside can truly claim an authentic lineage from the spirit of our Pilgrim forefathers to the highest aspirations of its leaders today.●

PARENTAL INVOLVEMENT IN EDUCATION

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I received an excellent letter from my constituents Jean and Bill Moulder, Kuttawa, Ky., about the underlying problems of education. The quality of American education has been receiving considerable attention recently, particularly with the findings and recommendations as proposed by the National Commission on Excellence in Education. Jean and Bill Moulder feel very strongly that we need more parental involvement with children and their education. I believe my colleagues will be interested in their September letter which follows:

KUTTAWA, KY.,
September 2, 1983.

Congressman CARROLL HUBBARD,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, DC 20515

DEAR SIR: Merit pay, great increases in salary, master teachers plans, and all other supposedly good ideas people are thinking up for teachers and education are only adding to the symptoms of education.

This quote says it well: "All of us frequently make the mistake of trying to get rid of the symptoms without doing anything about the underlying problem."

The underlying problems of education are that we lack support from lots of parents; we lack their respect; and their use of discipline at home. Therefore, when we attempt to discipline their children, mom and dad do not support us regardless of how fair we are.

Give us parental respect and discipline at home, and teachers can manage the rest of the problems. We would be more specific if we thought present trends, practices, social and economic thrusts were receptive.

Sincerely,

JEAN and BILL MOULDER.●

MORAL AND STRATEGIC IMPORTANCE OF ISRAEL TO THE UNITED STATES

HON. DANIEL B. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, October 4, 1983

● Mr. DANIEL B. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an article in the Journal of Defense & Diplomacy written by Thomas A. Dine, an expert on U.S. foreign and defense policy and the executive director of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. Mr. Dine, appointed by the Reagan administration to be a public member of the Commission on Foreign Security and Economic Assistance, eloquently outlines the moral and strategic importance of Israel to the United States.

The text follows:

SPEAKING OUT

(By Thomas A. Dine)

The United States has both a moral and a strategic interest in Israel. Israel is the only country of the Middle East with meaningful free elections, a robust free press, checks and balances to prevent and correct abuses of authority, extensive protections for the rights of individuals and minorities, basic equality for women and other safeguards and rights that are typical of a free society. It stands in sharp contrast to the other countries of the region, which include feudal monarchies like Saudi Arabia, where all power is permanently concentrated in the hands of a few wealthy princes and the ordinary people are under constant surveillance by the religious police and internal security forces, and dictatorships like Syria, where the government recently slaughtered 10,000 of its own citizens.

We now see in the United States an energetic campaign by enemies of the U.S.-Israel relationship to undermine the moral ties between the two countries. Their method is to focus attention exclusively and relentlessly on any aspect of Israel that puts the Jewish state in a negative light, and thus erode the relationship. Israel, although a democracy, has, like the United States itself, some unsolved social problems. But it is, in any honest accounting, one of the great success stories of the democratic experience in the modern world. None of the Arab countries, whose interests the anti-Israel propagandists seek to promote, has anything approaching the standard of democratic rights and civil liberties Israel has maintained. Aid to Israel is based on a common Judeo-Christian and democratic heritage that is virtually unique in a world of imperfect nations and imperfect alliances. In a wider perspective, Israel compares quite favorably to the other recipients of United States aid in the Middle East, northeast Asia, southeast Asia, South Asia, Africa, the Caribbean and Central America.

Alongside the moral tie between the two nations, the United States' interest in Israel has a strategic dimension. Israel is our only permanent ally in the Middle East and one of only two in the eastern Mediterranean. While we enjoy, for the moment, good relations with a number of other countries in the region, these are based on alliances with unelected ruling elites in societies where the ordinary person has no special love for the United States or for the western world. As we learned in Iran, such alliances with autocratic and unstable elites can be ended by the next coup or revolution, or we can be thrown out by rulers attempting to hold on to power by appeasing radical opinion. In Israel, by contrast, the ordinary citizen and the leaders of all major parties conceive their own interests as part of the Free World. The alliance between the United States and Israel is, therefore, above all, a bond between the peoples of the two countries, and it will endure long after these other "friends," who are really temporary allies of convenience, are now gone.

The strategic value of this alliance to the United States derives from Israel's geographic position in a vital area of the Mediterranean and the Middle East midway between Europe and the Persian Gulf, and from Israel's own strength and effectiveness as the most powerful state in the region. President Reagan has emphasized that the "paramount American interest in the Middle East is to prevent the region from falling under the domination of the Soviet Union." In this regard, Israel's strength has played a critical role in four cases:

Egypt—Israel's willingness to relinquish the Sinai, at great economic cost and strategic risk, has helped to wean Egypt from the Soviet Union and to cement closer U.S. ties with Cairo.

Lebanon—Israel stopped the drift of Lebanon into the Soviet orbit by driving the Syrians and the PLO out of Beirut, thus allowing a pro-western government to come to power and creating a new opportunity for creative American diplomacy.

Jordan—Israel has twice helped the United States to prevent Syria from invading Jordan, thus enabling a pro-western government to remain in power in Amman.

Terrorism—Israel has dealt a vital blow to international terrorism, eliminating its global headquarters in Lebanon and capturing thousands of terrorists based there operating against other countries around the world.

As a result of these Israeli actions, the eastern Mediterranean region, which once looked like fertile ground for Soviet adventurism, is now evolving toward stable relations with the western world. Thanks largely to the actions of Israel, the Mediterranean basin is now virtually a U.S. lake, with the exceptions of Syria and Libya. This basic point has not escaped the attention of Moscow, which understands better than some in the West the profound strategic value of Israel to the United States.

Beyond these cases, Israel is an important strategic asset for the United States, providing significant assistance to our defense and intelligence establishments. Currently, Israel helps the United States in the following ways:

Israel provides the United States with intelligence on Soviet equipment and on Soviet-allied forces in the Middle East and is prepared to provide more.

Israel has demonstrated the vulnerability of Soviet SAM's and interceptors in Lebanon, which may force the USSR to divert large sums in Europe from force expansion to force renovation and replacement and has also discredited the weapons on which much Soviet influence depends.

Israeli air and naval forces are sufficiently strong to challenge Soviet naval forces in the eastern Mediterranean and are thus a significant factor in assessing the East-West naval balance of power in that region.

Israel has provided considerable combat data on the performance of American military equipment, allowing the United States to correct problems and to incorporate improvements without risk to American lives.

Israel has developed equipment and tactics that have subsequently been adopted for use by the United States military.

Israel has directly aided in the improvement of American weapons by developing improvements subsequently adopted by the United States and by funding such programs in the United States.

But the United States has not yet exploited the full strategic advantage of cooperation with Israel. If the United States adopted a systematic program of strategic cooperation, as proposed but suspended a year ago, the areas of potential gain could include the following:

Israel hospitals could save American lives by caring for the large number of American wounded likely to result from a Persian Gulf war; indeed, no other solution is presently visible.

Israel has offered to protect American lines of communication in the eastern Mediterranean in a crisis, thus freeing U.S. aircraft for use elsewhere.

Israel has offered to make available air fields and ports to support U.S military deployments in the Mediterranean and the Middle East.

Israel could be used as a storage site for prepositioning of fuel, ammunition and equipment for use by U.S. forces sent to the Middle East.

Relatively modest assistance from the United States and an agreement on strategic cooperation could expand significantly the value of Israel as a naval ally.

But with or without these additional steps, cooperation with Israel greatly enhances America's strategic position not only in the Middle East and the Mediterranean but indeed throughout the world.

Overall, then, the United States has both moral and strategic interests in Israel, and the program of assistance for FY 1984 serves both. It is a reflection of our concern for the security of Israel, in that it helps Israel to offset the massive quantities of arms that are flowing from most of the world's major production lines to countries hostile to Israel. Aid is also a reflection of our strategic interests, in that it helps our one permanent ally in the region to maintain its strength as an asset in the broader strategic arena.

Aid to Israel has declined considerably in real terms and in proportion to U.S. aid commitments worldwide over the past few years. Still, it remains a substantial figure. A continuing concern of Congress is how to determine what level of aid that is appropriate in light of the national interest of the United States and in terms of what is necessary to support the security of Israel.

The central purpose of aid to Israel is to ensure the security and survival of a vital ally whose strength is an asset in the wider international security system. The ultimate purpose of assistance to Israel is essentially similar to the reason we keep troops in Europe and Korea and a naval presence in the western Pacific: to enhance international security by deterring aggression and ensuring the defense of important friends and allies. To determine whether our assistance to Israel is proportionate to U.S. interests, the appropriate measure is therefore an assessment of the costs and benefits compared with other major expenditures on international security.

Fiscal year 1984 aid to Israel will be less than 1 percent the size of the U.S. defense budget, under one-thirtieth of our expenditures on NATO and European security and a fraction of the cost of our support to the security of Korea. Moreover, unlike many allies, Israel seeks no commitment of U.S. combat forces on its behalf. In light of the important role Israel plays in regional and international security, which we have outlined, aid to Israel is one of the most cost-effective security expenditures made by the United States.

Moreover, a considerable portion of the cost of our aid to Israel is offset by direct economic benefits to the United States. Israel is a substantial net importer from the United States, spending on civilian imports alone about twice what it receives in economic assistance. Every dollar of aid is spent within the borders of the United States, and a major portion of the total consists of loans—on which Israel has an excellent record of repayment. According to Peter McPherson, administrator of the Agency for International Development, every billion dollars of U.S. aid translates into 60,000 to 70,000 jobs in the United States.

But the benefit to the United States goes beyond the aid process itself. For example, when Israel defeated the Syrian's Soviet-supplied SAM and air defense systems in Lebanon, it implicitly dealt an important blow to one of the largest and most important elements of the Soviet and Warsaw Pact military buildup in Europe. The Soviet Union spends more on its SAM system in Europe than it does on its entire land-based nuclear weapons complex. If we add to the surface-based air defenses its expenditures on the MiG–21 and MiG–23 interceptors, which Israel also defeated, it spends more on combined air defense than it does on its entire navy. Over time, the effect of Israel's actions will be to force the Soviets to spend considerable sums on altering and replacing important parts of this huge system. This means a significant diversion of Soviet defense expenditures from force expansion to force replacement and from expenditure on offensive systems to spending on a defensive one. While the results for the United States will not be visible immediately, the implicit effect is to reduce by billions of dollars the Soviet defense buildup that the United States must match.

NET AID TO ISRAEL: ANNUAL GRANTS AND LOANS LESS DEBT SERVICE ADJUSTED FOR INFLATION

Similarly, Israel's combat experience will, over time, affect billions of dollars in U.S. defense expenditures, although, here again, the full effects will take some time to unfold and will not always be visible to casual observers. In the current period of rebuilding the U.S. armed forces to meet the growing Soviet challenge, each of the new systems we acquire involves hundreds of millions or billions of dollars in research, development, procurement, operations and maintenance costs. If Israel's combat experience in Lebanon alters only 5 percent of this activity and its experience in 1973 altered a good deal more—these savings alone, in the form of diverting expenditures from less effective solutions to combat-proven alternatives—will have an economic benefit to the United States comparable to the total cost of foreign aid.

These are but two examples. If we could give a dollar value to the other areas in which Israel is a strategic asset to the United States, such as the value of its air and naval contributions to the Mediterranean balance and its role in securing pro-western governments in Egypt, Lebanon and Jordan, it would be clear that the total gain for the United States greatly exceeds the cost of aid.

The current level of assistance to Israel is thus easily justifiable in terms of the national interest of the United States. The next question is how it compares to Israel's legitimate requirements in terms of the goals of the aid program.

The primary reason Israel needs assistance from the United States is the enormous cost of maintaining a military balance. Israel is a small state of 4 million people, with a GNP of $28 billion, which must somehow defend itself against the relentless hostility of states with 30 times the population and 10 times the GNP. Saudi Arabia's defense budget alone exceeds Israel's total GNP. The combined defense budgets of just five Arab states (Syria, Iraq, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Libya) are five times that of Israel.

The people of Israel are proud and determined to be responsible for their own defense. Unlike many other countries, they do not intend today or ever to ask American soldiers to provide their protection for them. They also contribute the economic cost of their own defense to the limit of their capabilities, spending a much greater portion of their resources on security than the United States, Europe or Japan. But Israel is not capable of matching the unlimited expenditures of the Arabs and the Soviet Union. United States aid is essential to maintaining a stable military balance.

Israelis are deeply grateful for the substantial support that the United States has provided over the past decade and are well aware that the United States above all countries has stood by them during this difficult period. We Americans, both Jewish and Christian, who care about Israel share this feeling and a great pride that our nation has honored its tradition of standing by a vital ally. However, we are also concerned by the unhappy reality that net aid to Israel is declining rapidly due to inflation and the growing burden of service on past loans, while the accumulation of arms by hostile countries continues to accelerate and Israel's vital needs therefore grow. This is leading to a widening gap between Israel's legitimate requirements and the aid that is available from the United States each year.

The fact that net aid to Israel has declined significantly in real terms is not widely understood. In 1976, the congress appropriated $2.214 billion and Israeli debt service on past loans totaled $376 million, leaving a net aid balance of $1.838 billion. For fiscal year 1984, the administration has proposed $2.485 billion, but debt service to the U.S. government will be $1.15 billion, leaving a balance of $1.335 billion in net aid. Taking inflation into account, the aid package is equvalent to $661 million 1976 dollars, a decline of 65 percent. Net United States aid to Israel had declined over the past nine years and is now approximately one-third the former level in real terms.

At the same time, Israel's need for assistance has continued to grow. It derives, primarily, from the necessity to maintain a military balance against an Arab coalition that is receiving ever-larger numbers of more sophisticated arms. Because of its direct relevance to the question of Israel's need for aid, I would like to examine Israel's military balance.

Some people have concluded from Israel's successes against the Syrians in Lebanon last summer that Israel need no longer fear an Arab attack, and that Israel now has all the arms it needs for self-defense. This perception, although widespread, is erroneous and misleading, because the balance between Israel and Syria in Lebanon is but a small piece of the picture, for several reasons:

(1) In 1982, Israel had to fight only a portion of the forces of one Arab country. In the future, Israel must be able to defend itself against a much wider threat, like that of 1973 when 11 Arab countries contributed forces.

(2) Syria is one of the few remaining Arab countries that gets most of its weapons from the USSR. Many Soviet systems are less capable and more vulnerable to Israeli countermeasures than the western-supplied systems that are now entering the arsenals of other Arab countries, such as the Saudi F-15's that can outperform the Syrian MiG-21's.

(3) Syria itself is now in the midst of a major modernization and rearmament, reportedly including a satellite data link connecting Syrian air defense to a control system in Moscow. The Soviets are introducing new countermeasures at a feverish pace to ensure that Syria will fare better in future rounds of fighting.

(4) Israel must take account even of the Soviet Union itself as a potential threat. Russia now has seven airborne divisions whose troops and equipment could be introduced rapidly into a Middle Eastern conflict. It also has several thousand military personnel already on the ground in Syria.

Above all, Israel is forced to plan, not only for the situation that exists at a given moment, but for the more demanding situations that could come about over a 10-year time horizon. If the Arab League is divided today, this can change rapidly, as it does from time to time, and Israel may face a much larger coalition than is apparent at the present time. Taken together, the Arabs pose a formidable threat, possessing collectively almost as many combat aircraft and tanks as NATO (e.g., 1,912 jets compared to NATO's 1,986 in central and northern Europe). The long lead time on aircraft and tank procurement makes it necessary for Israel to plan against this larger threat today.

In the wider strategic perspective, Israel operates on a narrow margin of safety, with the certain knowledge that the first war it truly lost would be the last. Arab military forces have a substantial quantitative advantage over those of Israel, averaging a ratio of about 3 to 1. For example, Israel has about 634 aircraft against the Arabs' 1,912 (2,341 counting Egypt), and 3,600 tanks compared to the Arabs' 7,550 (9,650 if Egypt is included), counting only those Arab countries able to send forces. This is a quantitative disparity considerably larger than that faced by NATO in Europe or by South Korea, and it forces Israel to take extraordinary measures to compensate.

Until recently, this quantitative imbalance was offset by important qualitative advantages in Israel's favor, but these too are eroding. Israel can no longer count on having better weapons than those available to the Arabs. For example, Israel now has a total of about 125 advanced-design combat aircraft (F-15's and F-16's), in service or on order. By comparison, Arab countries now have in service or on order more than 160 western state-of-the-art jets, not to mention the latest Soviet models. If in the future the United States sells to the Arabs another 200 advanced fighters, and the French only add 40, by the end of the decade, the Arabs will have 400 to Israel's current 125.

Allowing the qualitative balance of airpower to tip in the Arab favor is definitely not in the interest of the United States. If the Arabs are able to compound their advantage in quantity with an advantage in quality, the temptation to resort to force will grow dramatically.

Equally important, there are growing indications that the Arabs are acquiring sophistocated electronic warfare equipment from Soviet and western sources, as we are now seeing in Syria. Much of the equipment is state-of-the-art, some developed by western companies with access to highly secret data about the very weapons that are used by Israel.

There are other disturbing trends. The growing range and payloads of Arab ground-attack aircraft may soon mean that the Arabs will have a deep strike capability against Israel, raising the specter of a surprise attack in the air. The sheer number and diversity of revolutionary new systems being introduced into Arab arsenals at the same time raises the possibility of technical breakthroughs that will give an unforeseen advantage to the Arabs (as new missiles and radars did in 1973). The shift that is taking place in several Arab states, from Soviet to western sources of arms, worsens Israel's problems because most of its countermeasures are designed against communist rather than western systems. The very plurality of the arms that Israel now faces, in both numbers and types, raises the danger of a saturation effect, a point beyond which Israel cannot cope. Finally, the growing interventionary power of the Soviet Union raises an unprecedented danger of escalation to superpower involvement.

These new problems come on top of some asymmetries that have long characterized the conflict. The Arabs are able to maintain standing armies while Israel relies on reserves, creating favorable conditions for an Arab surprise attack. In the diplomatic context of Middle Eastern wars, Israel is expected to allow the Arabs to fire the first shot, thus conceding the advantage of choosing the time and place of conflict. The Arabs can lose one war after another and come back to fight again, but Israel cannot afford to lose even one. If Israel wins on the battlefield, it is not permitted to translate these results into a peace settlement at the conference table but must settle for mere cease-fires and begin to prepare for the next round of fighting that the Arabs openly declare is their intention.

In sum, the military balance at this moment may seem favorable to Israel because of the sharp divisions characterizing the situation in the Arab world. But this advantage is temporary and cannot be the basis of sound planning. The longer-term trends in the military balance are disturbing, and Israel's requirement for U.S. aid to offset these adverse trends remains a vital need. The fact that net aid is declining in real terms does not help the situation.
